
Although God is incomprehensible and ineffable, he is nonetheless, acc. to the Fathers, genuinely knowable. A certain knowledge of him is already common to all human beings, even to sinners (DTC 4,1040; 1070-1075). Above all, God can truly be known because of the love with which he is revealed through the prophets and through Jesus Christ to all who, in the power of the Holy Spirit, believe in him. Thanks to revelation in Scripture, in creation and in the soul (Orig., Princ. I, 3,1), human beings can know that God exists (an sit), but also ex parte, what he is (quid). Given the possibility of knowing God partially, Christian authors from the 2nd c. on developed proofs for God's existence (Athenag., Leg. 4-5; Theoph. Ant., Autol. I, 2-4). As compared with Greek philosophy, which they substantially follow, they insist even more on the testimonium animae (Tertull.) and on the innate knowledge of God (Clem. Al.), i.e., they refer to the soul as image of the Word who is the perfect image of God (Basil., Hom. Attende 7; Aug., Lib. arb. II, 2-15). The traditional demonstrations departing from the beauty of the cosmos (Stoics) or from movements in the world (Aristotle) were placed by them into a biblical perspective, in which they prove the existence of the one God, creator of the world, also relying on biblical texts such as Wis 13:5; Rom 1:20; Acts 17:27-28 and in particular Ex 3:14. Also admitting a certain knowledge of the divine nature, the Fathers reflected on the possibility of attributing to God whatever is *good and beautiful, and on the necessity of excluding all that is unworthy of him. They distinguished God's absolute attributes, such as goodness and truth, from his relative attributes such as Lord, creator, merciful. These reflections bear primarily on the divine names in the Bible but, acc. to the culture of individual authors, also took on a more or less philosophical character (Origen and Basil's doctrine on ἔννοιαι).

Elaborated esp. by Origen and the Cappadocians, the theory of the divine names was further developed in Augustine. For him, all that is said of God is said of him substantialiter, except what concerns the distinction of the persons. Nevertheless, we cannot know any perfection as it exists in God. For this reason human beings need metaphors and analogies, as the Bible itself teaches (Trin. I, 1,2). We do not even have a name that says everything about him; rather, we need many names to express the simplicitas multiplex and the multiplicitas simplex (DTC 4,1112-1116). Ultimately, human beings know God only by seeking his face and reaching out to him in hope (Trin. XV, 1,1). Departing from Middle Platonic premises, Clement of Alexandria, Gregory of Nyssa and esp. ps.-Dionysius conceived the method of the three ways: affirmation, negation and eminence (or transcendence). That is, one can attribute a created perfection to God, but must immediately add that it does not exist in him according to human conceptions, but in a much more perfect way (DTC 4,1094-1119).

The sources of the knowledge of God are very complex: on the one hand, the revelation given by the Bible and the visible creation, and on the other, the interior life of the soul. The Fathers were faced with the problem of the relation between the knowledge of faith and rational knowledge, between simple faith and further investigation of that faith. While Origen insisted on faith as the basis of gnosis, Basil recognized a certain priority of the knowledge of God through creation (Ep. 235,1). Augustine took up the Alexandrian distinction between simple faith and spiritual gnosis (credo ut intelligam), putting it, however, in a Latin framework, opposing ratio to auctoritas fidei. Moreover, more than Origen, he based the knowledge of faith on history (historia), i.e., on the narratio of the love of the humble God, thus indicating in what sense the knowledge of God based on faith surpasses the theologia naturalis of the Platonists, the culmination of philosophical criticism of the Greek myths (Civ. Dei VIII). Nor does he neglect rational examination of the utilitas credendi (Ep. 120,3; Ver. rel. 24,45): he analyzes the process that leads from the rational knowledge of divine authority to the act of faith, and from it to the rational intelligence of faith. While perhaps still too enclosed within the Platonic tradition and failing to distinguish clearly between the knowledge of the truth made possible by the magister interior and the knowledge of faith aided by the grace of Christ, Augustine nevertheless indicates that God is known only because he has manifested himself in his love (cf. the more negative evaluation in LTK[3] 3,783).

All of the Fathers acknowledge that, in this life, even holy people such as *Moses and *Paul only arrive at a partial knowledge of God. They stress, therefore, that knowledge of God on the part of homo viator is only a preparation for and anticipation of the eternal vision reserved to the *angels and the blessed.

DTC 4, 1023-1152; DSp 3,838.929; RGG[3] 2, 1717-1722; H. Crouzel, Origène et la "connaissance mystique," Bruges 1961; E. von Ivánka, Platonismo e neoplatonismo: Dizion. Teol. II, Brescia 1967, 659-670; G.L. Prestige, Dio nel pensiero de Padri, It. tr. Bologna 1969; R. Tremblay, La manifestation et la vision de Dieu selon s. Irénée de Lyon, Münster 1978; I. Escribano-Alberca, HDG I,2a; K.H. Lütcke, Auctoritas: AugL 1 (1994) 489-410; G. Watson, Cogitatio: AugL 1 (1994) 1046-1051; T. Pröpper, Erkenntnis Gottes: LTK[3] 3, 781-786; B. Studer, La cognitio historialis di Porfirio nel De civitate Dei di Agostino, SEA 50, Rome 1996, 520-553; Id., History and Faith in Augustine's De Trinitate: Augustinian Studies 28 (1997) 7-50; Id., Schola Christiana, Paderborn 1998.

B. STUDER

GOGO (d. 581). A Frankish layman in the service of Sigebert I (535–575) from 565 and, relying on the testimony of *Venantius Fortunatus, who goes so far as to compare him to Orpheus (Miscellanea 7,1-4: PL 88, 231-237), also a poet of a certain merit. As advisor, Gogo became a figure of great prestige at court, where he filled the charge of maior domus and after 575 was named, probably by Brunhilda, nutricius of Childebert II (570–596) king of Austrasia. He died in 581. From Gogo only four letters have reached us, concerning life at court (Ep. Austrasicae 13, 16, 22 and 48), indicative at any rate of a notable cultural formation.

CPL 1061; W. Gundlach ed., MGH, Epp. III, Berlin 1892, 127-128, 130, 134-135, 152-153; repr. in CCL 117, Turnhout 1957, 431-

432, 434-435, 441-442, 469-470; D. Norberg, Ad epistulas varias merovingici aevi adnotationes: Eranos 35 (1937) 105-119; E. Ewig, Die Merowinger und das Frankenreich, Stuttgart 1988, 44-45, 86, 93; I.N. Wood, Administration, Law and Culture in Merovingian Gaul, in R. McKitterick (ed.), The Uses of Literacy in Early Medieval Europe, Cambridge 1991, 63-81; J. George, Venantius Fortunatus. A Poet in Merovingian Gaul, Oxford 1992, 14, 136-140; Patrologia IV, 303-304.

P. MARONE

GOLDEN RULE. The Golden Rule is an *ethical maxim that expresses the good quality of human relationships, marked by reciprocity. Present under positive or negative formulation in all the great religions and world cultures (Buddhism, Jainism, Confucianism, Shintoism, Sikhism, etc.), the Golden Rule constitutes, inasmuch as it is a basic norm, the "principles" of universal moral action. It does not prescribe specific behaviors, but rather indicates the form of a truly human way of acting, because it commands the good disposition of one human being toward another, and in the ultimate analysis, one human being's existence for the other. In the ethical reflection of the ancient church, which was largely indebted to Hellenistic *philosophy, and bent toward the actualization of an authentic righteousness in the double indication of the gospel's command to *love, the universal and interiorly obligating character of the dictum constitutes the common supporting theme of the most authoritative Fathers' teaching.

Although in early Christianity it was believed that the Golden Rule came from a biblical source, the Golden Rule still possessed its own tradition both in the Hellenistic world and in the cultures that were much older than Greek culture, because its most remote written codification dates back to Zoroaster (628–551 BC), although one can be reasonably certain of its presence in the Vedic Indian tradition as early as the year 3000 BC, then codified in the writings of the Hindu text Mahabharata (300 BC–AD 300), as the "summa of Dharma-obligations": "do not do to others what would make you feel pain if done to you" (5:15,17). In Old Testament wisdom, it reached its first formulation through a long development between the 3rd and the 2nd c. BC, to the time of the redaction of the Book of Tobit, where we find the statement: "do not do to anyone what you do not like" (Tob 4:15). The passage of the Golden Rule into Old Testament and *Hellenistic Judaism was decisive, however, both because in a period in which an attempt was made to simplify the precepts of the Torah, the recapitulating function of the entire law was attributed to the Golden Rule and it was associated to the command of love, and because only thanks to the values taken from Hellenism did it acquire a truly universal openness. The positive New Testament formulations of the Golden Rule (Mt 7:12; Lk 6:31) therefore inherited this process of refinement, and nevertheless the ethical value ascended toward the elevated heights of Jesus' teaching because if Mt 7:12 summarizes, as an attentive *exegesis notes, the entire *Sermon on the Mount, the Golden Rule is associated with the command of a superior love that is capable of including love for enemies (Mt 5:44).

In the first occurrence in patristic texts (Didache* 1,2), although the precept is placed within the doctrine of the two ways and placed next to the precept of love, the scope of the Matthean Golden Rule—which does not simply establish a dictum for respecting another person's freedom but rather allows for the actualization of the fullness of a truly universal love—regresses toward an extrinsic moralizing command. In subsequent patristic reflection, the movement toward an extrinsic evaluation of the Golden Rule became even more pronounced, to the point of making it an ethical norm of *justice (*Justin, Dial. 93,1; *Clem. Alex., Strom. II, 139; *Cyprian, Test. ad Quir. 3,119; ps.-Clem., Recogn. 8,56; *Lactantius, Epit. 55,1-3)—even if the dictates of the gospel that captures the spirit with which the Christian must love in every circumstance has not been forgotten (*Tertullian, Marc. IV, 16).

In the Latin patristic tradition, one should appreciate how profound and diverse was *Augustine's reflection, who, in a philosophical dialogue, defined the Golden Rule in its negative formulation a "common dictum" (vulgare proverbium), to which one must appeal for inspiration in educating young people (De ordine II, 8,25). The meaning of this statement is clarified by Augustine in his subsequent reflection, which would identify in the negative formulation of the Golden Rule a natural law written within the heart of each person (C. Faustum XV, 7; Ep. 157,3,15; Conf. I, 18,29). In truth, it did not contradict that positive formulation, which reaches human beings through biblical revelation; nevertheless, the negative formulation possesses an ethical breadth with respect to the other, because in the dictum of not doing to another what one does not want to happen to oneself, one can include wicked actions (flagitia) that offend God (Sermo 9). Just as the natural law, the Golden Rule contains the characteristics of immutability and knowability inasmuch as it carries in itself a type of justice that remains identical independent from the changes of culture (Doctr. Chr. III, 14,22). Therefore, the transgression of the Golden Rule can be charged to a human being's wicked and guilty will (En. Ps. 35,1; Conf. II, 4,9).

With the passing of time, Augustine's reflection on the Golden Rule also became more profound, and it accompanied the theological problems that he had to face. Thus, although he had identified in the negative formulation of the Golden Rule an instrument for resolving ethical problems such as possible conflicts of conscience (En. Ps. 57,2), the value of the positive formulation, which in the Latin version of the gospel texts available to him commanded one to do to others all good things (Mt 7:12: omnia ... bona) that we would want done to us, also bore weight (Serm. dom. m. II, 22,74, NBA X/2, 269). To avoid any possible subjectivism in the evaluation of the *good, Augustine presupposes, making reference to the *Stoic doctrine of the three "good affective dispositions," the existence in the acting subject of an authentic "will," understood as a "good" will, which is only possessed by the wise person (Civ. Dei XIV, 8,1). Nevertheless, due to the *Pelagian controversy, he would have the opportunity to specify that the will is made good only through God's *grace and, definitively, by observing the Golden Rule, one has absolute need for God's help, because in a postlapsarian condition without the grace of Christ, the human being does not possess virtues that lead to salvation (C. Iul. IV, 3,25).

The preference Augustine showed toward the negative formulation of the Golden Rule is found in the writings of other authors, as in other contexts of Christian life, from *epigraphy to *poetry (see Bastiaensen), to the monastic *rules. In the Regula Benedicti, the Golden Rule, which was believed to derive from the Bible (scriptum est), was held in great esteem, seeing that it was cited immediately after the precept of love for God and the brethren (IV, 9). Nevertheless, it acquired the value of a universal precept that was applicable furthermore not only to the monk but to every believer: it indicated, i.e., not a special way for the monk's perfection, as much as a necessary "precautionary principle" to avoid what is *evil, esp. for those who live in community (61,14; 70,7).

Thanks to its frequent occurrence in ancient Christian literature (see Dihle 1962, 103-109; Id., 1981, 938-939), the Golden Rule passed as a foundational ethical principle to the Western Medieval authors, who made it a summary norm for every morality, whether rational or revealed. In the ethical teaching of *Gregory the Great, whose authority in this transition of ages was determinative, the Golden Rule played a role of primary importance for the implementation of justice. The pope suggested that there underlies a hierarchical gradation between the negative Old Testament formulation and the positive one found in the gospel formulation, an expression of the NT's fullness (Hom. in Ev., II, 38,11; Moralia in Iob VI, 35,54). One would be a natural precept, the other a revealed norm (regula testamenti). In any case, the performance of the Golden Rule allowed one to implement the fullness of gospel justice, that each person can regard as a spiritual tribunal (tribunal mentis) in one's own heart (in foro cordis) (Moralia in Iob XIX, 22,35).

A. Dihle, Die goldene Regel. Eine Einführung in die Geschichte der antiken und frühchristlichen Vulgärethik, Göttingen 1962; Id., Goldene Regel: RAC 11 (1981) 930-940; A. Bastiaensen, Le "praeceptum aureum" dans la tradition épigraphique et littéraire: RBen 98 (1988) 251-257; J. Wattles, The Golden Rule, Oxford-New York 1996; C. Vigna - S. Zanardo, eds., La regola d'oro come etica universale, Milan 2005.

V. Lombino

GOOD. The Fathers based their notion of the Good both on Greek *philosophy and on the *Bible. As for the first source, Socrates's Good (ἀγαθόν), conceived by him at an essentially *ethical level, as *virtue and science, was for the first time identified by Euclides with Parmenides's Being-One, which constituted a shift to the metaphysical plane. But it was above all *Plato who elaborated the metaphysical doctrine of the Good: he put it at the top of the Ideas and posited the Good as the supreme principle in his *protology, together with the Dyad. All things derive their reality and knowability from the Good. At the same time, the Demiurge, i.e., the God who is the creator of the cosmos, is said to be "good" in Tim. 29A and Rep. II 379BC; similarly, in Phaedr. 247A and Tim. 29E, Plato affirms that malevolence is alien to God's nature. Thus, the intelligible world depends on the Idea of Good, and the sense-perceptible world depends on the Demiurge's goodness. In Aristotle's thinking, the Unmoved Mover, which is the prime Substance and the supreme *Nous, is identified with the Good and the Beautiful, and by virtue of this is the final cause of all. *Middle Platonism, both *pagan and Christian, identified God with the supreme Good: see Plutarch, De Iside, 53; Albinus, Epit. 10,3; Numenius ap. Eus. PE XI 22, who identified the supreme God with the αὐτοαγαθόν, the same term that *Origen too applied to God. In this respect, the most important *Neoplatonic development is offered by *Plotinus, who expressly identified the Good with the One, his first *hypostasis, beyond Being and Thought.

It is in a Middle Platonic context, however, that we see the first synthesis between the philosophical tradition and biblical *exegesis in the conception of God-Good, with *Philo, who was a precursor of the Fathers in conjoining Platonism and the Bible. In Philo's view, God is One, totally transcendent and good: what is more, God is φιλάνθρωπος (Virt. 77), but God's love for human beings seems to be restricted to the virtuous (Abr. 50; Mutat. 18). This aspect will change in Christianity, when God's goodness and love will be considered to have all human beings, and all creatures, as their object. Both Philo and the Christians, however, shared the common ground of the Bible—or better, of the Old Testament, whereas it is the New that explains the discrepancies between Philo and even those Fathers who knew him best and followed him most closely, such as *Clement, Origen and *Gregory of Nyssa.

Let us consider the Bible. The Septuagint contains 548 occurrences of ἀγαθός and 236 of καλός; in the New Testament, the former occurs 102 times and the latter again 102 times. The meaning "good" also for καλός is patent in Heb 5:14, e.g., where καλόν and κακόν are opposed to one another as "good" and "*evil"—therefore, καλόν is here synonymous with ἀγαθόν. It likewise means "good" in John 10:11, 14, where Jesus is ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός, i.e., "the good shepherd" (rather than "the handsome shepherd"); in the *Genesis description of the Tree of Good and Evil as of "καλόν and κακόν"; and above all in the *creation narrative, which is also fundamental for the Platonic Fathers' reflection on the metaphysical value of the goodness of creation. In the Genesis account, where, by the way, only καλός is attested and there is no occurrence of ἀγαθόν, after each creating act God contemplates the created being or beings resulting from that act, καὶ εἶδεν ὁ θεὸς ὅτι καλόν, "and God saw that it was a good thing." All that God created is good, because it was set into being by God, who is the Being (Ex 3:14) and is the Good. As a result, what was not created by God has no ontological existence and is not good.

In the New Testament, too, God is described both as intrinsically good and as giver of good things. In Mt 19:17 Jesus famously asserts that only God is good (Mk 10:18; Lk 18:19; Mt 20:15). According to Origen's subsequent interpretation, this means that only God is the Good, and never loses his goodness, whereas all created beings simply participate in the Good, so they are not stable in it, and their choices may also turn to evil. From the fact that only God is the Good, it also follows that all possible good things come only from God, as is declared in Jas 1:17: every good endowment and every perfect gift (πᾶσα δόσις ἀγαθὴ καὶ πᾶν δώρημα τέλειον) comes from on high, from the Father of lights, or of illuminations (πατὴρ τῶν φωτῶν). Of course, καλός in the sense of "good" is also applied to human deeds or created things in the New Testament: deeds, fruits, seeds, bread and so on. Moreover, it is said to be καλόν, decidedly meaning "good," to enter life (clearly, life eternal) with one eye, rather than to keep both eyes but to be cast into Gehenna (Mt 18:9; cf. Mk 9:43, 45). Likewise, καλόν means "good" in 1 Cor 7:1, where Paul states that it is καλόν for a man not to touch any woman, and presumably vice-versa.

But these statements belong to the ethical sphere. The ontological assertions will be even more momentous for the Fathers, esp. the Platonic Fathers, such as Clement, Origen, *Evagrius and the Cappadocians. And in relation to the Good are these assertions: that only God is good, indeed God is the Good, and all that God created is good. Thus, only the creatures of God are good and have ontological subsistence. God created only what is good; evil entered the world because of a deception and an error: it is not a creature of God, but the result of a bad choice, and it has no ontological subsistence. Evil in turn brought about *death, but evil and its consequence, death (Wis 1:13), have no ontological substance, in that they are not creatures of God, and therefore cannot subsist forever. There was a time in which evil did not exist, and there will be a time when evil will no longer exist (this is a fundamental tenet of Origen's, Gregory of Nyssa's and Evagrius's thought), whereas it is the "germs of Good" that are absolutely inextinguishable (Evagrius). This is what Paul foretells in 1 Cor 15:26-28: Christ will reign until all enemies have submitted to him (in a submission that Origen and Gregory of Nyssa identify with salvation, achieved through spiritual healing and conversion. *Eusebius, an admirer of Origen, will call it ἡ θεραπευτικὴ καὶ διορθωτικὴ βασιλεία τοῦ Χριστοῦ. The creatures of God will convert; the powers of evil, on the other hand, and the last enemy, death, will be destroyed. Then God will be all in all, i.e., God alone will be all good things for all. Evil and death, which entered the world with *Adam, will vanish in the reign of Christ: as all die in Adam, all will receive life in Christ (1 Cor 15:22-23). Due to one person, the condemnation has reached all human beings; likewise, also thanks to the work of *righteousness of one person, the vivifying justification reaches all human beings and all will be made righteous (Rom 5:18-19). As Gregory of Nyssa puts it in In Illud: Tunc et Ipse Filius 11 (Downing), Adam brought evil to all, whereas Christ has brought the Good to all: "the Good has entered human nature, pouring from one human being to all, just as evil had poured into all through one single human being."

Only the Good (and life) will remain, not evil, because the Good is God (and the life is Christ), and all that is good has God as its creator and ontological guarantor—God who is Being par excellence (Ex 3:14).

The equation God-Good-Being, which is particularly clear in Origen and in Gregory of Nyssa, is an important feature in patristic thought. Both *Athanasius and *Gregory of Nazianzus, who knew the Platonic doctrines but also Origen's thought very well, took up the affirmation of God's essential goodness in De incarnatione 3 and 42, and in De oratione 28,11, respectively. Origen in his Περὶ Ἀρχῶν and Gregory of Nyssa in his In Illud: Tunc et ipse Filius explain that the Good is present in a permanent and substantial manner only in the *Trinity, whereas in all other beings, i.e., in all creatures, including the angels, it is present only partially and by participation, so that they can lose it. Only God is good, and indeed is the Good. Origen in Princ. I, 2,13 describes God the Father as "original and absolute Good" and "the Good itself," αὐτοαγαθόν. This is why Jesus says that only God is good. The Son, who is begotten by the Father, and the Spirit who proceeds from the Father, reproduce this original Good, whereas the creatures participate in it. As a consequence, "they have in themselves an accidental good, not the substantial Good"; in the creatures, "the Good is not present in a substantial way, as it is in God, in Christ and in the Holy Spirit. For only in the Trinity, who created all things, the Good exists in a substantial way. The other beings possess it in an accidental way, so that it may fail, and they are in bliss only when, and insofar as, they participate in the holiness of Wisdom and of the divinity itself" (Princ. I, 6,2; cf. I, 8,3, etc.). Gregory of Nyssa in De anima et resurrectione (92D-93AC) depicts God as "the nature that exceeds all possible concepts of Good and transcends all power, in that it lacks nothing of what is possible to conceive in respect to the Good, because it is the fullness of good things and does not happen to be in a condition of beauty and goodness by participation in something that is beautiful and good, but it is itself the essence of beauty and of the Good. . . . Since, then, divine nature transcends all other good things, and the Good always and absolutely loves the Good, then, while it looks at itself, it both wishes what it has and has what it wishes, without admitting anything alien in itself. On the other hand, outside it there is nothing but evil. Now, evil—albeit it is paradoxical to say—has its own being in non-being, since the origin of evil is nothing else than a lack of what is. And what properly and primarily is, is the nature of the Good. Thus, what is not in what is, certainly is in non-being." God is absolute Good and absolute positivity; in God there is no evil nor malevolence; as a consequence, punishments inflicted by God are not retributive, but purifying and exclusively aimed at the improvement of the sinners.

The infinitude of God-Good and, on the opposite side, the finitude and limited nature of evil is emphasized esp. by Gregory of Nyssa: "Only that which is contrary to the Beauty and the Good is limited, whereas the Good whose nature is not susceptible of evil will progress toward the unlimited and infinite" (De an. 97AB). An important consequence of this statement is that an eternal permanence in evil is utterly impossible, in that once one has touched the deepest point of evil, as in the case of the devil, one will only move back and return to the Good, i.e., to the true Being. For only those who are in the Good do truly exist; those who are in evil indeed tend to nonexistence: as a consequence, they cannot endure forever in evil. One alternative may be that they will vanish, and this theory was actually supported by a few patristic authors, such as *Arnobius—who was notably anti-Platonic—but Origen, Nyssa, Evagrius and their followers refuse to endorse this conclusion because these beings were created by God to exist, not to fall out of existence; otherwise God's creative action would result in a failure. Therefore, if these creatures cannot endure in evil forever, the only possible alternative is that they will convert and return to the Good. It will be sin and evil, not the sinners, that are extinguished forever, because the sinners are creatures of God, whereas evil is not. And in the end all will be found in the Good, i.e., in God, in an infinite loving tension toward the supreme object of our love. Because of their mutability, the voluntary submission of all creatures to Christ and to God will be indispensable for them to be able to participate in God's good things (In Illud: Tunc et Ipse 7 Downing).

Moreover, in the end—and only in the end—the creatures will never again abandon the Good in order to turn to evil, which in the apokatastasis* will have vanished completely. For all, then, will participate in divine life, and God will be all good in all, so that their free will will never turn to any other object. The apokatastasis will be the reign of perfect unity in love, and there will be no more fall, because "love will never fall," as Origen maintains, quoting 1 Cor 13:8 in Comm. in Rom. V 10,15-16, and as Gregory of Nyssa repeats in De Anima, 96BC: "The divine Apostle . . . foretells the end of all our concerns and solicitudes, and their cessation in peace . . . but of love alone he does not find the end . . . because love never falls, which is tantamount to saying that it always remains in the same condition. . . . Thus, if the soul will reach this end, it will find itself in such a condition as to need nothing else, in that it will be surrounded by the fullness of existing realities, and it alone seems, in some way, to keep in itself the stamp of divine beatitude. For the life of the superior nature is love, since what is beautiful and good is lovable in all respects for those who know it; now, the divinity knows itself and such a knowledge immediately becomes love, because that which is known by it is beautiful and good by nature, and insolent satiety does not attach itself to what is truly beautiful and good. Thus, since satiety does not interrupt the disposition to love what is beautiful and good, divine life will always endure through love, for it is both beautiful and good by nature, and disposed by nature to love the beautiful and the good, and feels no satiety in this activity acc. to love, because it is impossible to find a termination to the Beautiful and the Good." The infinity of the Good that is God is again the guarantee of the stability of the eventual condition of perfect unity and love. This condition is also salvation, which is "the culmination of all good things" (τὸ ἀκόρτατον τῶν ἀγαθῶν πάντων, In Illud: Tunc et Ipse Filius, 25 Downing) and is achieved through the alienation from evil (διὰ τῆς τοῦ κακοῦ ἀλλοτριώσεως), the result of which will be the complete destruction of evil. Only the Good will remain, and divine life will permeate all.

*Augustine also posits the supreme Good in God. In an early work (De mor. Man. II 7,9), he had the final restoration depend upon God's goodness (not in a psychological but in an ontological way): Dei bonitas . . . omnia deficientia sic ordinat . . . donec ad id recurrant unde defecerunt. Augustine returned to this passage in his Retractationes I, 7,6, to explain that it should not be understood in an Origenian sense, and that the damned, those doomed to the so-called eternal fire, should be excluded from the final restoration: Non sic accipiendum est, tanquam omnia recurrant ad id unde defecerunt sicut Origeni visum est . . . non enim recurrunt ad Deum a quo defecerunt qui sempiterno igne punientur. But originally Augustine's words are likely to have referred to the apokatastasis, and I deem it probable that Augustine was inspired by a precise passage of Origen's De Principiis (1.6.1), which Rufinus translated in AD 397 or immediately thereafter: In unum sane finem putamus quod bonitas Dei per Christum suum universam revocet creaturam. In both passages, of Origen's and Augustine's, it is God's goodness that makes the restoration of the fallen creatures possible. And God's goodness is not simply God's kindness or compassion, but the ontological identification of God with the Good. Indeed, Augustine's polemic against the *Manicheans surely reinforced this identification of God with the Good and the idea that evil is not at all a principle that is equal and antithetical to God. He was on the same track as Origen, Evagrius and the Cappadocians in stressing the ontological nothingness of evil—which, of course, had obvious consequences also for eschatology.

In Augustine's view, God is the One, is pure Being (idipsum esse), acc. to Ex 3:14 (Expl. Ps. 101,2,10; 134,4; Trin. III 10,21; XV 5,8), and is the sum of all goods and all intelligible things. In De vita beata 4,34, the One or Good is said to be "the measure and limit of all things," just as in *Plotinus's Enn. I 8,2,5, which Augustine certainly knew. On the contrary, evil is reduced to a lack of order and measure, a privation of form, with no ontological existence. And in De mor. Man. I 15,17 it is properly God the Father who is the Good. In 83 Quaest. 6 the idea appears again that evil is a privation of form, measure and beauty. Augustine argues that all beings have some beauty or form (species), and beauty implies measure, and measure entails good; evil, having no good, has no measure, and thus has no form, but what has no form does not even exist. God is the source of all beautiful things and all good things because he reduces to order what is out of order: in God supreme Beauty coincides with supreme Good and is perfect Unity (De libero arbitrio; Serm. 241). In Civ. Dei XI and XII Augustine often repeats that evil does not exist but is rather a "damage," not in God, who is the Good and is immutable, but in the creature who chooses to separate from God: such a decision has no reason in itself, but is made possible by the fact that creatures are created ex nihilo and are attracted by nothingness, and surely evil is nothingness. But it is in Conf. VII 11,17 that the ontological argument from creation comes forth: every substance was created by God, but God did not create evil; therefore, evil has no substance and no ontological existence. This conception of evil as a mere lack, with no positive existence of its own, will appear again in works of the last period of Augustine's work, such as C. Iul. I 9,44-45 (after AD 420), where he takes up the Platonizing and Origenian characterization of evil in Ambrose's Isaac vel anima 7,67 as "a privation of good." Likewise, Augustine describes evil as a result of a wrong act of will, a defectus a summo Bono, ubi bonum creatum Bono creante privatur.

It is clear that the notion of evil as a lack of order, measure and form implies that the opposite of evil is a good that is also beautiful; all of Augustine's De Ordine is imbued with this conception, which is also found in passages from De Trinitate, De civitate Dei, De quantitate animae, etc. This bivalence has its roots not only in Greek thought and Platonism in particular, but also in the abovementioned biblical use of καλόν in the sense of "good." Especially in Gregory of Nyssa, the concept of good is expressed, not only by ἀγαθόν, but also by καλόν (properly meaning "beautiful, beauty"). Especially in his *homilies on the *Song of Songs, Gregory presents God as infinite Beauty; in God's image human beings were created (Hom. op. 4). In his De mortuis and De anima, too, God is the supreme Beauty, and human beings will recover their original beauty, which reflects that of God, and which was obfuscated by *sin. It is because beauty is essentially divine—and in God it is the same as the Good—that Gregory of Nazianzus in Carm. II I 39 in versos suos, 48-51, justifies his own *poetry in that he does not want to leave the adorned discourses to the pagans, but he wishes to preserve beauty for Christian poetry, and he adds that for the Christians κάλος consists in θεωρία (contemplation).

Finally, one of the most interesting observations that emerge from a systematic study of the history of the Christian doctrine of apokatastasis (Ramelli) is that the patristic authors who supported it did not base it on a metaphysical—let alone cosmological—necessity, but essentially on Christ's *incarnation, sacrifice and *resurrection, and on God's ἀγαθότης/ bonitas, i.e., on the fact that God is the Absolute Good.

A. Meredith, The Good and the Beautiful in Gregory of Nyssa, in Ἑρμηνεύματα: Festschrift für H. Hörner, ed. E. Herbert, Heidelberg 1990, 133-145; A. Capbosq, Schönheit Gottes und des Menschen, Bern-Frankfurt am Main 2000; M.S.M. Scott, Shades of Grace, in HTR 99 (2006) 65-83; D. Iozzia, Il paradosso della bellezza divina. Gregorio di Nissa, In Cant. VI, 191, 7-9, Orpheus 28 (2007) 100-115; M. Ludlow, Gregory of Nyssa, Ancient and (Post)modern, Oxford 2007, esp. 142ff.; I. Ramelli, Christian Soteriology and Christian Platonism, VChr 61,3 (2007) 313-356; Id., Gregorio di Nissa Sull'anima e la resurrezione, Milan 2007; Id., Philosophical Allegoresis of Scripture in Philo and Its Legacy in Gregory of Nyssa, Studia Philonica Annual 20 (2008); Id., 1 Cor 15:24-26. Submission of Enemies and Annihilation of Evil and Death, SMSR 74,2 (2008) 241-258; Id., Apocatastasi, Milan 2009.

I. Ramelli

GORGONIA (d. 369/374). Probably the older sister of *Gregory of Nazianzus, born before ca. 330, wife and mother, she is known thanks to the funeral oration pronounced by her brother. Having married young and almost certainly baptized shortly before marriage, she had her husband Alypius and the children baptized as well, two of whom became bishops. She died between 369 and 374, after her brother Caesarius and before her parents. The location of her tomb is unknown, but perhaps it was at *Iconium. Of Gorgonia we know the funeral eulogy; it is the only source for the life of Gorgonia, except for several verses of the Anthologia Palatina and compositions by Gregory (SC 405, 57-60). Her veneration appeared in a later period, in the footsteps of Gregory of Nazianzus. The martyrology of Rabban Sliba names her along with all the members of her family 25 January (AB 27, 174). Information about her veneration is found in Nicephorus Callistus. Only the Greek codex 1582 of Paris (13th c.) of the Synax. Eccl. CP, as well the Menaia in Venice (16th c.) cites the feast on 23 February. Baronius inserted her in the Mart. rom. on 9 December.

BHG 704; PLRE 1, 398; BS 7, 121-122; R. Van Dam, Families and Friends in Late Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

GOSPEL of the SAVIOR. This title is used to refer to two different fragmentary texts of noncanonical gospels, which refer to Jesus with the title "Savior." (a) The first is the MS P.Oxy 840, which is full of lacunae and was discovered at Oxyrhynchus in 1905, a fragment in Greek, which presents a debate with the High Priest Levi on the question of ritual purity in relation to the *temple, the High Priest having washed in contaminated water, although *baptism which is a rebirth, is accomplished "in the waters of eternal life." This document emerged from a *Jewish-Christian context. The anonymous author, acc. to Kruger, knew of the canonical gospels (Mk 7:1-23; Lk 11:37-52; Mt 23:1-39; Jn 7:1-52; 13:10). (b) The second is P. Berol. 22220, *papyri fragments with numerous lacunae, in Sahidic *Coptic, the editio princeps of which was published in 1991 by Hedrick and Mirecki, to be completed now with some fragments from Strasburg. The papyrus dates to the 4th-7th c. The two editors think that the Greek original goes back to the late 2nd c. The fragment pertains to the Savior's last hours: the protagonist dialogues with his disciples after the Last Supper, prays to the Father that the chalice be taken from him and then turns directly to the cross and says, "O cross, do not be afraid! I am rich." The anonymous author depended on the gospels of *Matthew, *John and the book of *Revelation.

Editions: Hennecke - Schneemelcher, English edition, Cambridge 1991, 94-95; Erbetta 1, 105-106; Moraldi 1, 422-423; M.J. Kruger, The Gospel of the Savior. An Analysis of P.Oxy. 840 and Its Place in the Gospel Traditions of Early Christianity, Leiden-Boston 2005. Studies: H.-M. Schenke, Das sogenannte 'Unbekannte Berliner Evangelium' (UBE): Zeitschrift f. antikes Christentum 2 (1998) 199-213; C.H.W. Hedrick - P.A. Mirecki, Gospel of the Savior. A New Ancient Gospel, California Classical Library, Santa Rosa, CA 1999; T. Nagel, Das Unbekannte Berliner Evangelium und das Johannesevangelium: ZNTW 93 (2002) 251-267; S. Emmel, The Recently Published Gospel of the Savior ("Unbekanntes Berliner Evangelium"). Righting the Order of Pages and Events: HTR 95 (2002) 45-72; Id., Preliminary Reedition and Translation of the Gospel of the Savior. New Light on the Strasbourg Coptic Gospel and the Stauros-Text from Nubia: Apocrypha 14 (2003) 9-53; C.W. Hedrick, Caveats to a "Righted Order" of the Gospel of the Savior: HTR 96 (2003) 229-238; B.D. Ehrman, Lost Scriptures, Oxford 2003, 52-56; Id., I cristianesimi perduti. Apocrifi, sette ed eretici nella battaglia per le Sacre Scritture, Rome 2005; A. Destro - M. Pesce, Constellations of Texts in Early Christianity. The Gospel of the Savior and Johannist Writings: AnSE 22 (2005) 337-353.

A. Di Berardino

GOSPELS (apocryphal)

I. Texts pertaining to the life of Jesus, Mary, Joseph and John the Baptist - II. Texts preserved in fragments.

This phrase was used as a norm for indicating the extracanonical accounts pertaining, usually, to some periods or events from the life of *Jesus but also *Mary, *Joseph and *John the Baptist; only rare and rather late apocryphal gospels recount the entire life of Jesus. There exists, moreover, a group of fragments of texts from the first centuries that often call themselves, or are called by the authors who cite them, "gospels." These two groups are normally treated as "apocryphal gospels." It would be mistaken, however, to regard these texts as alternative gospel accounts. The authors seek rather to complement the gospel accounts, to explain them, to express their own theological opinions and to give an *exegesis of biblical texts through images with the objective of interesting the readers. These texts only rarely offer new traditions about Jesus and Mary, but they do exhibit a very interesting image of the piety of Christians for the age in which they were written.

I. Texts pertaining to the life of Jesus, Mary, Joseph and John the Baptist. (a) The first group is established by texts on the infancy of Mary and Jesus. The foundational text, upon which all the other works are based, is the Nativity of Mary (from the 16th c. onward it was called the Protevangelium of James*), a Greek apocryphal text from the 2nd half of the 2nd c. The text tells of Mary's birth, her infancy, her marriage to Joseph, the Annunciation and birth of Jesus. This text exists in numerous traditions and independent paraphrases (e.g., Nativity of Mary, a 9th-c. Latin text) or inserted in other texts (*Gospel of ps.-Matthew, a Latin apocryphal text; the Armenian Infancy Gospel and others). The second foundational text of this group is the Paidika Kyriou (popularly referred to as the Infancy Gospel of Thomas), an apocryphal Greek text from the 2nd c.: it contains a series of accounts about baby Jesus and his wondrous deeds; the number of these accounts and episodes is different in the various collections (concordance in CANT, pp. 38-39). Even this text, which is often translated and paraphrased, exists in an independent form or rather inserted into various texts (e.g., in the Armenian Infancy Gospel). Alongside this text is an apocryphal Ethiopian text, The Miracles of Jesus. The Gospel of ps.-Matthew contains an account of the holy family's trip to *Egypt, which was noticeably developed in the Arabic Gospel and in the Armenian Infancy Gospel. In various texts (esp. Eastern ones) the story of the three *Magi is developed, as in the *Syriac legend, the Georgian Gospel or in the correspondence between *Longinus and *Augustus.

As an appendix to this group, scholars have included the works concerning St. Joseph and St. John the Baptist. With respect to St. Joseph we have an important text: The History of Joseph the Carpenter, written in Greek, but preserved in Coptic (Sahidic and Bohairic) and Arabic: Jesus recounts the death of his putative father; inserted therein are fragments on the life of Jesus. There exists, moreover, two Greek and Syriac lives of St. John the Baptist.

(b) Another group of apocryphal gospels or texts pertain to the passion and resurrection of Christ. The most ancient text is the Gospel of Peter, a Greek apocryphal text from the 2nd c., preserved in fragments and the papyrus of Akhmin: it recounts Pontius *Pilate's judgment, the passion and resurrection. The most popular text was the Acts of Pilate, also called the Gospel of Nicodemus (5th c., but the existence of an apocryphal text under this name was known already in the 2nd c.). This text gives an account of God's judgment on Pilate, his condemnation, death and *descent into hell (this last part was esp. popular). This work also exists in versions in various languages. We have, moreover, a group of approximately ten works, usually later texts, primarily in Latin but also in Greek and Eastern languages, and rather brief, called the Cycle of Pilate (the most important being Epistula Pilati ad Claudium, Anaphora and Paradosis Pilati [Arabic, Armenian, Syriac and Slavic translations], Epistulae Pilati et Herodi, Epistula Pilati ad Tiberium, Cura sanitatis Tiberii, Vindicta Salvatoris, Mors Pilati, Narratio Iosephi de Arimathaea [in Latin and Georgian], Martyrium Pilati in Syriac, and the Evangelium Gamalielis in Ethiopian). These texts pertain to various individuals who were connected in some way to the death of Jesus, i.e., Pilate and his wife called Procla (Procula) (who, in the Ethiopian apocrypha, become saints), Herod, *Joseph of Arimathea and others. There are biblical (Herod, Pilate) historical (*Titus, *Tiberius and *Vespasian) or even fictitious characters (Nathan, the woman with the flow of blood who was over time given the name *Veronica). Several accounts mention the events after the death of Jesus (the death of Pilate and Herod, the destruction of *Jerusalem, the discovery of Jesus' garments). These texts have the form of an account, a letter or a report. These apocryphal texts, which are bereft of reliable historical or artistic value, performed, however, a significant role in medieval culture.

(c) In addition, there is a group of apocryphal gospels, usually of a later production, which account more or less for the entire life of Jesus, such as the Georgian Gospel (extensive fragments of which remain); the Arabic Gospel (at one time called the Gospel of the Infancy; until the discovery of some fragments concerning the entire life); the Arabic Gospel of John and the Gospel of Barnabas, a late text produced by Islamic propaganda, which was preserved in the vernacular language.

(d) Another group of apocryphal gospels are usually associated the Transitus, and though typically numbered among the gospels, they are also connected to the literature pertaining to the apostles, in which they perform an important role. The various Transitus speak of Mary's dormition (death) and assumption; they constitute an extensive group of texts transmitted in various languages. The Transitus, ascribed to St. *John the Evangelist, Joseph of Arimathea, *Melito of Sardis and others, are rather late texts (6th c.) but probably preserve much more ancient fragments.

II. Texts preserved in fragments. (a) The fragments of the ancient gospels constitute a group of an entirely special character; some of them come from the 1st-2nd c. These were the texts used most by the Jewish Christians, *gnostics, *heretics and by more or less orthodox authors, usually preserved in Greek and Latin, which were mentioned or cited by the writers of the patristic age. The most important are the Gospel of the Hebrews (nearly 60 fragments, also medieval), the Gospel of the Ebionites (8 fragments) and the *Nazarenes (Nasoreans) (usually connected to that of the Hebrews, or rather identified with it). These are the most studied texts and are very important for the study of Christianity of the 1st-2nd c. We have, moreover, another group of more than 20 texts whose titles we know (often imprecise) or of which unintelligible fragments remain. These are the gospels of *Andrew, *Basilides, *Bardesanes, *Cerinthus, Eve, *Philip, *Judas Iscariot, *Mani, *Marcion, *Mary Magdalene, *Matthew, Perfection, the Twelve, at least four gospels of the Egyptians, the Seventy, the Four Cardinal Points, the Living Gospel (or Gospel of the Living), Genna Marias, Questions of Mary Magdalen (perhaps identical to the Gospel of Mary Magdalene), *Traditions of Matthias (perhaps identical to the Gospel of Matthias), Memories of the Apostles. Lastly, in the Letter to *Theodore, which is attributed to *Clement of Alexandria, some fragments of a gospel of St. *Mark have been discovered; the question of its authenticity is still unresolved.

(b) Alongside these are fragments of anonymous gospels in the *papyri: P. Oxy 840 and 1224, P. Egerton 2, P. Berol. 11,710, P. Fayum, P. Cair. 10.7359 and P. Merton 51. Three fragments in the papyri of Oxyrhynchus (1, 655, 656) were identified as the Greek version of the Gospel of Thomas of *Nag Hammadi (codex II), a collection of 114 logia of Jesus; close to this work is the Gospel of Philip, likewise from Nag Hammadi (codex II).

(c) Another group of texts about Jesus, preserved in fragments, are found in texts outside the gospels: in the Epistula Apostolorum*, the Ascension of Isaiah*, the Odes of Solomon* and the Sibylline Oracles; and in the gnostic texts *Justin the gnostic's Baruch and Pistis Sophia. These texts, just as those of the papyri, are of special interest to biblical scholars. Another group of texts about Jesus are found in the writings of Jews—rather late and clearly anti-Christian traditions—such as the Toledoth Ješu (on this point, see Agobard of Lyons, PL 104, 87-88). Lastly, fragments on Jesus, usually taken from the apocrypha, are found in the works of Muslim authors (the Qur'an, a long fragment about Jesus in Tabari's Chronicle from the 9th/10th c., a Muslim writer of agrapha*.

(d) To this group of fragmentary gospels belong the agrapha, i.e., sayings attributed to Jesus that are found outside the canonical gospels, usually in Greek or Latin; there exists, moreover, a series of Muslim agrapha found in the writings of Arabic authors.

All these texts, although incomplete, poorly preserved and often imprecise, have great importance for understanding the history of ancient Christianity.

CANT 1-20, 28-83. A. de Santos Otero, Los evangelios apócrifos, Madrid [6]1988, bilingual ed.; K. v. Tischendorf, Evangelia apocrypha, [2]Leipzig 1876 (Hildesheim 1966). The apocryphal gospels (complete and fragmentary texts) usually constitute the first volume (or the first part) of all the collections of the NT apocrypha such as those of Elliott, Erbetta, Moraldi, Schneemelcher, Starowieyski, EApC; other collections of apocryphal gospels are those of Craveri, A. de Santos Otero, Madrid 2001 (only Sp. tr.) and others.

Agrapha: we only have the collections of A. Resch, TU 15, 3/4, 1906 (Darmstadt 1974) and W.D. Stroker, Atlanta 1989; Muslim agrapha: PO 13,3, 1916; 19,4, 1926.

Jewish-Christian translations: see the collections of the apocrypha, esp. A.F.J. Klijn, Jewish-Christian Gospel Tradition, Leiden 1992.

Jewish traditions about Jesus: G. Dalman, Jesus Christ in the Talmud, Midrash, Zohar and the Liturgy of the Synagogue, Cambridge 1893; J.B. Aufhauser, Antike Jesus-Zeugnisse, Bonn 1913; R.T. Hereford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash, London 1903; B. Pick, Jesus in the Talmud. His Personality, His Disciples and His Sayings, Chicago 1913; H.L. Strack - P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrash, 1, Munich 1922, 36-40; J. Maier, Jesus von Nazareth in der talmudischen Überlieferung, Darmstadt 1978; J.P. Osier, L'Évangile du Ghetto, Paris 1984 (Fr. tr.).

Muslim traditions about Jesus: Tabarî (839–923), La Chronique, Histoire des prophètes et des rois, trans. H. Zotenberg, 1, Paris 2001, 86-121. D. Sidersky, Les origines des légendes musulmanes dans le Coran et dans les Vies des Prophètes, Paris 1933, 136-150; J.M. Abd-el-Jalil, La vie de Marie selon le Coran et l'Islam, in Maria, Études sur la Sainte Vierge, 1, Paris 1949, 183-211; J. Jeremias, Zur Überlieferungsgeschichte des Agraphon "Die Welt ist eine Brücke": NAWG (1953) 95-103; H. Sahlin, "Die Welt ist eine Brücke": ZNE (1956) 286-287; S.M. Stern, Quotations from Apocryphal Gospels in 'Abd-al-Jabbār: JTS 18 (1967) 34-57; 19 (1968) 128ff.; F.F. Bruce, Jesus and Christian Origins Outside the NT, London 1974, 167-186; R. Arnaldez, Jésus, fils de Marie, prophète d'Islam, Paris 1980; A.J. Wensinck - P. Jonstone, Maryam, in Encyclopédie de l'Islam, 6, Leyden 1986, 613-617 (bibl.); K. Kościelniak, Tradycja muzułmańska na tle akulturacji chrzecijańskoislamskiej od VII do X wieku, Kraków 2001.

M. Starowieyski

GOTHIC LITERATURE. The early church, in its work *evangelizing the Roman world, was already doing what today we usually call inculturation. It placed the Christian message, without sacrificing anything from it, within the culture of Roman society: it transmitted this message to its recipients both through the humble expressive systems and culture of the popular masses of the empire (speaking Greek, Latin or other languages), and through the elevated expressive systems and culture of the social and intellectual elites. Indeed, in this second area, the Christians, since their religion was founded on the "Book" (the *Scriptures) and was therefore an educated religion, made use of the disciplinae (or artes) liberales taught in the imperial schools, disciplinae considered by them as useful instruments for studying and teaching the scriptural text. There were two paths of inculturation in the Roman world, therefore: inculturation on the popular level and inculturation at the level of the social and intellectual elites.

This is worth emphasizing: thanks to inculturation, the Christian teaching was carried out, just as it is today, respectful of cultures, in confrontation with them, incarnated and rooted in them so as to create new cultural riches. In turning next to the peoples outside the Roman world (acc. to the Messianic mandate: "Go and make disciples of all nations" [Mt 28:19]), Christianity continued its inculturation in the various areas then called barbarian, using the languages and cultures of their masses. But since these new realms lacked the support for biblical hermeneutic that the disciplinae (or artes) liberales supplied within Romanitas, the disciplinae were therefore introduced into the horizons of the Christianization of the barbarians. Consequently, the inculturation within the Roman world at the level of the intellectual elites, turned into Roman acculturation, which created, as it progressed, Christian intellectuals, Roman not by birth but by culture. With the progressive Christianization of the non-Roman world, Christian inculturation, brought about by *preaching to and *catechesis of the masses, and Roman intellectual acculturation, brought by the study and teaching of the scriptural text, proceeded therefore in parallel. The same Christianization, on the one hand, legitimizing and favoring the local languages and cultures that led to the birth of the plurality of literatures in vernacular (and "national") languages, on the other hand, also led to the birth of an intellectual and supranational common tongue (koinē) of linguistically and culturally traditional Roman education that became the bearer of classical culture. Christianity became, therefore, the central engine of the process of cultural formation of Europe.

Gothic Christian culture, which formed and flowered in the 4th c., was brought about directly by the inculturative and acculturative action produced by the Christianization of the Gothic world. It was the first epochal step in the encounter, thanks to Christianization of the Roman, Germanic and Celtic worlds, from which Western European culture would be born.

It is mentioned that a certain Theophilus, bishop of Gothia, sat among the Fathers participating in the Council of *Nicaea of 325 (Patrum Nicaenorum nomina, ed. H. Gelzer - H. Hilgenfeld - O. Cuntz, Lat. ser.: nos. 216, 219; Gr. ser.: no. 211; index Patr. Nicaen. restitutus: no. 219), and that Nicetas was a disciple, still in Gothia, of the same Theophilus (*Martyrium S.

Nicetae Gothi 2, PG 115, 705B). This tells us that there were Christians among the Goths in 325: there is reason to believe that seeds of Christianity were already present in the Gothic world, having penetrated there, as often happened elsewhere, through prisoners and merchants from the Roman world, and that, just as elsewhere, the official church intervened at a later time with the dispatch of a bishop (cf. the Greek character of the name both of the bishop mentioned as well as that of his disciple and collaborator). This phase can be considered the prehistory of the Christianization of the Goths. But the history of their Christianization coincides above all with their Arianization. For the great trinitarian controversy that agitated the Roman world in the 4th c. did not remain without reflection in the area of the Goths, and *Wulfila (or Vulfila or Ulfila) was precisely the great protagonist of the Arianization of the Gothic world, in which nevertheless Christians of Nicene faith continued to exist.

Born ca. 311 in a family descended from Christian prisoners captured on the occasion of a Gothic incursion into Cappadocia and fully assimilated to Gothic society (his name itself is Gothic: Wulf- [nom. sing. Wulfs] + -ila, and means "Wolfling," "Little Wolf"), after having been lector of his church, Wulfila was consecrated bishop in 341 by the moderate *Arian *Eusebius of Nicomedia. He adhered to Arianism, present above all in the Eastern part of the church, and spread the Arian creed among the *Visigoths (settled in a region bordering the E provinces of the empire), who in turn passed it to the *Ostrogoths (settled to the N of the Black Sea) and other Germanic groups lying to the E of the Empire. After seven years of exercising the episcopate in the formerly Roman Dacia, Wulfila, moving with many other Christian Visigoths into imperial territory, into *Moesia, to escape the *persecution at the hands of the *pagan Gothic King Athanaric, persevered for another thirty-three years in the episcopal mission among his people and, thanks to his knowledge—as testified by his disciple, the Arian *Auxentius of Durostorum—not only of Gothic, but also of Greek and Latin (Epistula de vita, fide et obitu Ulfilae 53 and 54, PLS 1, 705), he participated in the great contemporary trinitarian debate: in fact, the Arian doctrine of Wulfila, initially moderate, developed into a radical Arianism of *Eunomian character.

Thanks to Wulfila, the translation of the Bible into Gothic (large fragments have reached us, almost exclusively of the NT)—the greatest expression of his episcopal activity—took place in the Arian Christianity of the Goths. It was a remarkable event of inculturation, performed by him for his people, during which he created the national Gothic alphabet, basing it on the Greek biblical majuscule with the addition of certain characters from Latin uncial and some runic signs. If, as mentioned above, inculturation can produce new cultural riches, Wulfila's inculturative enterprise was clearly the epochal turning point in the history of Germanic culture. With his translation he lifted Gothic from an oral language, up to that point exclusively so, to a written one, which thereafter rose to become a literary language: the Wulfilan Bible was the first literary monument of the entire Germanic culture.

The Christianization of the Goths prior to Wulfila and esp. Wulfila's translation of the Bible enriched Gothic greatly. To understand this adequately it is useful to look back at the linguistic reflections that Christianization had already produced among the Latin-speaking masses. The Christian education of these people posed the problem for the preachers of transmitting to them, in a linguistically accessible manner, a doctrine whose first disseminators had preached and written in Greek. Catechesis resolved it in the way that we can define as most natural linguistically. A complex of Greek terms indicating concrete Christian realities (things, religious duties, institutions) were transferred en masse into Latin (with integration, naturally, into the morphological system of this language). The acquisition, on the Latin side, of those concrete realities was also, automatically, the acquisition and consequent assimilation of their names (acc. to a typology of loan words, apparent in the contacts between different languages both ancient and modern). The Latin language was enriched therefore with new Hellenisms such as apostata, apostolus, baptismus or baptisma, catechumenus, diaconus, ecclesia, eleemosyna, episcopus, evangelium, martyr, neophytus, presbyter, propheta and others. But there were also fundamental theological concepts that had to be borrowed from the theology in the Greek language. In order for these to be understood by the Latin-speaking masses incapable of understanding Greek, it was catechetically necessary that the propagators of the Christian creed in the West replace the relevant Greek terminology with adequate Latin terms. These, therefore, were either taken from the traditional Latin lexical heritage and acquired therefore obvious semantic enrichment in a Christian sense, giving rise to semantic neologisms (fides, credere, caro, spiritus, tingere, lavacrum, sanguis, diligere, etc.), or they were new formations based on already-existing Latin words and began to express new and exquisitely Christian concepts and giving rise to true and proper lexical neologisms (Salvator, Trinitas, dilectio, regeneratio, revelatio, carnalis, spiritalis, etc.). The special Christian language (Sondersprache), which the Nijmegen school had the merit of discovering and investigating, came therefore into being within Latin.

A similar reality was created in the Gothic language by Christian preaching and above all by the Wulfilan translation of the Bible. The expression, whether in the pre-Wulfilan or in the Wulfilan phase, of the Christian message in Gothic could not help but bring with it the introduction in the language itself of numerous Christian Hellenisms and/or Latinisms indicating concrete things, ecclesiastical duties and institutions (aggilus, "angel"; aikklesjo, "church"; aipiskaupus, "bishop"; aipistaule, "epistle"; aiwaggeljo, "gospel"; apaustaulus, "apostle"; daimonareis, "possessed"; diabaulus, "devil"; diakaunus, "deacon"; praufetes, "prophet," etc.), which came thus to join the profane Latinisms and Hellenisms already acquired by the Goths, by mercantile and other contacts, starting from the time of their settlement in the Vistula region (similarly, Gothic, through the Greek and Latin of the Christians, did not fail to acquire a few Hebrew words: gaiainna ["Gehenna"], rabbaunei and rabbei [honorific title of a master of the law, a form of address given to Christ]).

Next, fundamental theological concepts were taken, such as those of *faith, believe, save, *grace, *justification, *love as agape, flesh as worldliness, etc. In the *evangelization of a people neither Latin nor Greek, it is evident that Greek or Latin terminology would have been absolutely unfit for expressing these difficult concepts. Therefore the concept of faith (Gr. πίστις; Lat. fides) was expressed, as the Wulfilan text of the Bible shows, with the Gothic galaubeins. In parallel, the concept of believing (πιστεύειν in Greek, credere in Latin) was expressed with galaubjan, "to believe." Thus also the other concepts mentioned above were rendered in the following ways: to save (Gr. σώζειν, Lat. salvare): Goth. nasjan; Savior (Gr. Σωτήρ, Lat. Salvator): Goth. nasjands; to baptize (Gr. βαπτίζειν, Lat. ting(u)ere and later, Hellenizing, baptizare): Goth. daupjan; baptism (Gr. βάπτισμα or βαπτισμός, Lat. tinctio and later, in a Hellenizing coinage, baptisma or baptismus): Goth. daupeins; grace (Gr. χάρις, Lat. gratia): Goth. ansts; justification (Gr. δικαίωμα, Lat. iustificatio): Goth. garaihtei; to be justified (Gr. δικαιοῦσθαι, Lat. iustificari): Goth. garaihts wairdan; agape (Gr. ἀγάπη, Lat. dilectio): Goth. frijapwa; flesh as worldliness (Gr. σάρξ, Lat. caro): Goth. leik.

Given the absence of a pagan Gothic literature before the Bible of Wulfila, we do not have documentation of the use of Gothic words in pagan contexts. Consequently we cannot have that comparative vision of their pagan and Christian use that would allow us to grasp concretely their semantic change, or their semantic enrichment in a Christian sense. Nevertheless one can easily intuit how those words belonged, already in themselves (without Christian connotation), to the daily and profane life of the Goths and how therefore they preexisted the Christianization of this people. For example, the verb galaubjan expressed, already outside the Christian sphere, the notion of believing as a pure and simple mental operation, linked to the most diverse contingencies of ordinary life. The verb nasjan expressed the common idea of healing or saving. Daupeins and daupjan expressed, respectively, the notions of the bath and of bathing as merely natural and corporal facts. Leik was the body in flesh and bone. It is equally easy to intuit the semantic enrichment that these same words acquired thanks to their assumption, on the part of Wulfila and the other evangelizers, as words indicating clearly Christian—and therefore profoundly new—concepts. Consider galaubjan: from believing generically to believing specifically understood as a salvific act of faith; nasjan: from the notion of the generic and natural act of healing or saving to the notion of the specifically supernatural and redemptive act carried out by Christ; daupjan: from the notion of the merely material act of immersion to the concept of bodily immersion with a spiritually regenerative effect; garaihts: from the notion of a person naturally just to the notion of a person rendered supernaturally just by the redemptive act; frijapwa: from the notion of love as a natural sentiment among people to the notion of the supernatural love of God for human beings and the entirely spiritual love of humans for God; leik: from the notion of body and flesh to the notion of worldliness.

Special attention should be given to the fact that before the well-attested and consolidated Greek and Latin ways of designating the regenerative bath (βάπτισμα, βαπτισμός, baptisma, baptismus), Christian Gothic, rather than taking over wholesale, as in many other cases (see above), the Hellenism/Latinism, instead translated, making use of the national words daupjan ("to bathe") and daupeins ("bath"): it is a significant example of the evangelizing effort to express with genuine Gothic words the rite of Christian initiation. Furthermore, Christianity also brought into Gothic certain lexical formations that were definitely novelties compared to pre-Christian Gothic. Certainly daupjands ("baptizer, baptist") was a new Christian formation, based on daupjan: if daupjan, as already mentioned, in pre-Christian and therefore profane Gothic was the material act of immersion and in Christian Gothic was now the profoundly new act of bodily immersion with supernaturally salvific effect, i.e., baptism, it is evident that daupjands, inasmuch as it indicates he who presided at this rite, could not be anything but a new lexical acquisition. Next we have evident calques of Latin or Greek words: armahairts ("merciful"), formed on Latin misericors, with arma- (<arms, "miserable") corresponding to miseri-, and -hairts (<hairto, "heart") in clear correspondence with cor (cf. Goth. armahairtei, "mercy," calque of Lat. misericordia); midwissei ("conscience"), formed either on Latin conscientia or else on Greek συνείδησις, with mid- corresponding to Latin cum- or to Greek συν-, and -wissei (in which the notion of knowledge is present) in correspondence with Lat. scientia or with Greek εἴδησις, "knowledge." And again: gudhus ("temple," "synagogue"), formed on the Latin expression domus dei, is clearly constituted from gud ("god"), corresponding to Latin deus, and from hus ("house"), corresponding to Latin domus. And it is not improbable that a calque from Greek is present in usstass ("resurrection"), corresponding to the Greek ἀνάστασις (of the same meaning), with us- traceable to ἀνά- and -stass (cf. the Gothic verb standan) traceable to στάσις: furthermore, the fact that the concept of resurrection was so Christian and new legitimizes the interpretation offered here.

The global evaluation of these aspects of Christian Gothic (Hellenisms and Latinisms indicating concrete realities, semantic neologisms and new lexical formations) leads us to conclude that also within Gothic a special Christian language came into existence as a consequence of Christianization and of the Wulfilan translation of the Bible, in a dynamic analogous to that which took place in the Christian Latin environment.

Finally it should be pointed out that the Gothic translation of the scriptural text reveals an influence of the Arian faith of its author. Philippians 2:6, "who [Christ Jesus], despite being of divine nature, did not consider it robbery to be in equal [ἴσα] condition to that of God," was translated in this way by Wulfila: saei in gudaskaunein wisands ni wulwa rahnida wisan sik galeiko guda. On the one hand, the Greek adjective ὅμοιος ("similar") is always rendered by Wulfila with the Gothic adjective galeiks, and the verb ὁμοιοῦν ("assimilate, make similar") is rendered by him with the Gothic verb galeikon, and the substantive ὁμοίωμα ("similarity") with the Gothic substantive galeiki. On the other hand, the adjective ἴσος, "equal," is translated sometimes samaleiks and sometimes samalaups, and ἰσο- ("equal, of the same nature"), as first element of a composition, is rendered in Gothic with ibna, and the substantive ἰσότης ("equality") is given as ibnassus. However, only in the cited Phil 2:6 is the adverbial form ἴσα (adj. aequalem in the Vulgata) is rendered by Wulfila with the adverb galeiko, which on the basis of the mentioned relationship ὅμοιος/galeiks and the like, we have to interpret "of similar condition." It is then evident that against the relationship of equality of nature of Christ with God, and therefore of the Son with the Father, Wulfila, translating polemically, articulated a relationship of similarity of nature of Christ with God. John 5:18 is not included among the Wulfilan biblical fragments, where the evangelist relates that the Jews sought to kill Jesus for the fact that the latter considered himself son of God and equal (ἴσον/aequale) to God. But on the basis of what we have said above concerning ἴσα/galeiko in Phil 2:6 it is not difficult to conjecture that also concerning the Greek of Jn 5:18 Wulfila used the Gothic adjective galeikana ("similar").

Gothic Christian inculturation also helps account for the surviving Catholic Gothic community at *Constantinople. We learn from a sermon of *John Chrysostom (PL 63, 472) that in the ecclesiastical communities of Constantinople, religious songs resounded in Greek, Latin, Syriac and a barbarian language. Regarding the latter, the conjecture that this was Gothic is easy and immediate. We know nothing of their melody, but we can postulate the structure of their versification on the basis of the common old Germanic verse technique: they would have been songs in anisosyllabic, bipartite and alliterative verses. The inculturation is therefore clear: the ministers of the Word composed or had composed, with a catechetic or euchological purpose, songs in Gothic and in Gothic meter (and, perhaps, Gothic melodies) destined for the people in order that they, thanks to the familiarity of the language and the metrical structure (and perhaps of the music), might easily absorb and retain the contents of the Word.

Let us turn to acculturation, creator of Christian intellectual life. The already-mentioned Auxentius (Epistula de vita, fide et obitu Ulfilae 54) testifies that Wulfila wrote treatises and explanations in three languages: that means, obviously, he used, acc. to the addressees and the situations, Gothic, Greek and Latin. The treatises were certainly writings of theological controversy; the explanations were *commentaries on the Scriptures. With his translation of the biblical text into Gothic, Wulfila, as stated above, elevated the Gothic language itself to a literary language: this naturally revealed itself in the Wulfilan writings in Gothic, as we find them in the so-called Skeireins, which have reached us in anonymous fragments. This substantial monument from Gothic literature, as its fragments show, was an explanation (the meaning of the term Skeireins is precisely "explanation") of the gospel of John. We notice that in Skeir. 5, 23-24 the author cites Jn 5:23, "in order that everyone honor the Son just as [καθώς] they honor the Father," and clarifies that this must be understood "not equal, but similar honor" (ni ibnon ak galeika sweripa). The coherence of this *exegesis with the Arian doctrine, and more specifically with the Gothic translation of Phil 2:6, which we have already discussed, is clear. Therefore Arianism did not fail to make its mark on the Skeireins also. We also know from *Theodoret (Hist. eccl. V, 30, ed. Parmentier - Hansen, GCS, N.F. 5) that Chrysostom engaged, using an interpreter, in theological discussions with Gothic interlocutors. Finally, *Jerome furnished to the Goths Sunnia and Fretela (evidently of Nicene faith), after they had appealed to him, explanations concerning criticism of the text of the *Psalms (Ep. 106, ed. Labourt of the letters of Jerome, V, Paris 1955).

This entire latter category of data, considered as a whole, lets us see, in the Christianized Gothic world, a world of true and proper Christian intellectuals (whether of Arian or Nicene confession). Among themselves, as far as we know, they cultivated the reading of biblical commentaries, doctrinal treatises and works of textual-critical interest in the Holy Scriptures. All this is clearly along the lines of much analogous literature already in flower in the Greek and Latin Christian culture.

On the prehistory of the Christianization of the Goths: B. Luiselli, La formazione della cultura europea occidentale, Rome 2003, 118-124.

On the Christianization of the Goths: E.A. Thompson, The Visigoths in the Time of Ulfila, Oxford 1966; P. Scardigli, La conversione dei Goti al cristianesimo, XIV Settimana di Studio del Centro Italiano di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1967, 47-86; B. Luiselli; Cristianesimo e fenomeni regionali dell'inculturazione nei secc. IV-VII, in Cristianesimo e specificità regionali nel Mediterraneo latino (secc. IV-VI), XXII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome, 6-8 maggio 1993, Rome 1994, 12-19; L.C. Russel, The Germanization of Early Medieval Christianity. A Sociohistorical Approach to Religious Transformation, New York-Oxford 1994, 135-140; B. Luiselli, La formazione, 124-132; B. Luiselli, Dall'arianesimo dei Visigoti di Costantinopoli all'arianesimo degli Ostrogoti d'Italia: RAL 16,1 (2005) 5-30.

On the teachings of Wulfila: M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975, 442, 460, 481, 482, 502, and esp. Id., L'arianesimo di Ulfila: RomBarb 1 (1976) 297-323.

For the text of the Gothic Bible: Die gotische Bibel, ed. W. Streitberg, I: Der gotische Text und seine griechische Vorlage, II: Gotisch-Griechisch-Deutsches Wörterbuch (repr. Heidelberg 1971 from 3. unveränd. Aufl.). The famous Codex Argenteus (late 5th-early 6th c.), from the University Library of Uppsala (ms. DG I), is the most important witness of the Gothic Bible. Its last folio was found in 1971 at Speyer, on which see F. Haffner - P. Scardigli, Unum redivivum folium, II. Anhang a P. Scardigli, Die Goten. Sprache und Kultur, Munich 1973, 302-319. On Christian Gothic as a special language (Sondersprache), see B. Luiselli, La formazione, 460-467. On the influence of the Arian creed on the Gothic tr. of the Bible, see G. Mirarchi, L'arianesimo nei frammenti della Bibbia gotica: Annali dell'Istituto Universitario Orientale di Napoli, Filologia germanica 19 (1976) 163-184; B. Luiselli, Storia culturale dei rapporti tra mondo romano e mondo germanico, Rome 1992, 455-458. Editions of the Skeireins. Die gotische Bibel, ed. W. Streitberg, ibid., I. Anhang, 456-471; see also The Gothic Commentary on the Gospel of John. Skeireins aiwaggelions pairh Iohannen. A Decipherment, ed. and tr. by W.H. Bennett, New York 1960. On Arianism in the Skeireins: B. Luiselli, Storia culturale, 459-460. K. Schäferdiek, Die Fragmente der "Skeireins" und der Johanneskommentar des Theodor von Herakleia, in Schwellenzeit. Beiträge zur Geschichte des Christentums in Spätantike und Frühmittelalter, ed. W.A. Löhr - H.Ch. Brennecke, Berlin 1996, 69-87 (proves that the Skeireins is the tr. of the lost commentary of *Theodore of Heraclea).

B. LUISELLI

GOTHS. An ancient Germanic population, probably originally from Scandinavia (Gotland). The name, close in its etymology to the Gothic giutan, has a disputed orthography among authors: Γούτωνες in Strabo, Gutones in Pliny, Gothones in Tacitus, Getae in *Jordanes and others (there is frequent confusion with the Getae or Dacians). Their early historical events are obscure and uncertain: acc. to some sagas, they were led by King Bering in emigrating from Scandinavia, and, after having fought against the Ulmerings and the *Vandals, they occupied the S coast of the Baltic Sea. Classical sources in the 1st c. BC put them at the mouth of the Vistula (Tac., Germ. 44) and, thereafter, that of the Danube. Then, in the course of their slow but constant expansion, the Goths entered into battle with the Roman Empire during the time of *Caracalla (Hist. Aug., Carac. 10, 6), dealing the imperial armies numerous serious defeats. After sporadic encounters with the troops of *Maximinus Thrax and *Philip the Arab, they obtained their first great victory at Abritus (251) against *Decius, who died in the battle. After they overcame the weak resistance of the Romans, they and other peoples devastated *Thrace, *Moesia and Greece, sacking the cities of Trebizond, *Chalcedon, *Nicomedia and *Ephesus (Jordanes, Get. 20, 107); at the end of 261 they obtained *Cappadocia, from where they deported many Christian prisoners, among whom must have been the grandparents of Wulfila. After they completed another ruinous expedition against the cities and ports of Greece (sacking those of *Athens, *Corinth, *Sparta, Argo), the Goths were stopped at Naissus (269) by *Claudius II Gothicus (Hist. Aug., Claud. 9, 4). Thereafter they obtained the territories N of the Danube from *Aurelian (Hist. Aug., Aurel. 39, 7), from which, however, they would cross to devastate the bordering provinces at the beginning of the 4th c. After being defeated several times by *Constantine (315, 323, 324), the Goths were then received into the service of the Roman army as auxiliaries, and they fought under *Constantius and *Julian against the Persians (Amm. Marc., Rer. gest. libri 20, 8,1, and 23, 2, 7). In 376 the invasion of the *Huns put an end to the rule of the Goths along the Black Sea. This led to their definitive separation into *Ostrogoths and *Visigoths. The former submitted and remained in the territories occupied by the Huns; the latter preferred to emigrate S. Other Goths fled to the Crimea. From this moment the historical vicissitudes of the Goths were clearly divided.

Even though *Valens had welcomed them into Thrace, the Visigoths, lead by Fritigern, rebelled and inflicted a serious defeat upon the imperial forces at Hadrianopolis in 378 (Ammian. XXXI, 11-13). After a truce with *Theodosius, the Visigoths returned to their raiding in Thrace, Greece and Illyria. They entered *Italy guided by *Alaric, but they were stopped at Pollentium in 402 and at *Verona in 403 by *Stilicho, whose death in 408 took away any remaining defense of Italy, henceforth directly exposed to the Goths' invasions, which reached their height in the famous sack of Rome in 410. Alaric then headed to the S of Italy, probably wishing to conquer *Africa, but he died at Cosenza in 410. Under his successors Athaulf and Wallia, the Visigoths withdrew to *Gaul, where they founded the kingdom of *Toulouse (419–507), and then to Spain "*Tarraconensis." The kingdom reached its greatest splendor under *Euric (466–484), who laid the foundations of Visigoth rule in Spain, but then it was annexed by the *Franks after *Clovis's victory over Alaric II at Vouillé (507). The Visigoth kingdom in Spain enjoyed long periods of prosperity with *Leovigild (567–586), *Recared (586–601) and Recceswinth (649–672), until the 8th c. (711, victory of the Arabs over the Visigoths led by Roderic).

The Ostrogoths, led by Vladimir, settled in *Pannonia during the course of the 4th c., later occupying Bulgaria and Lower Moesia. With the agreement of the emperors, they exercised a containing action against the other barbarian populations. In 451 they contributed, perhaps in a decisive manner, to the victory of *Aetius over the Huns in the battle of Catalaunian Fields. After repeated raids in Illyria (459), Gothic hostages, *Theodoric among them, were deported to Constantinople. After Theodoric gained the imperial house's favor, he intervened directly in their affairs, helping the legitimate sovereign *Zeno against the usurper, *Basiliscus. In 488, by Zeno's explicit invitation, Theodoric moved to conquer Italy, which was ruled at that time by *Odoacer. Theodoric defeated and killed him at *Ravenna (493), then he founded his own government with the consent of the Byzantine emperor. An effort at maintaining ancient institutions and astute political alliances with other barbarian sovereigns, often based on matrimonial ties, made Theodoric's rule a period of happy internal prosperity. This was disturbed only in his final years by *persecutions and excesses against the senatorial nobility (the death of *Boethius, and of the senators *Symmachus and Albinus). After Theodoric died (526), the grave disagreements between the Goths and the Romans came to light, and were sharpened by their different religious beliefs. The death of Amalasunta (535), Theodoric's daughter and regent in the name of her son Athalaric, had for its consequence the military intervention of *Justinian, who sent into Italy an army commanded by the generals *Belisarius and *Narses. For almost 20 years the Goths resisted bitterly under the princes Theodatus, Totila, Vitiges and Teias, but the defeats suffered by the latter, at Busta Gallorum (552) and at Mons Lactarius, near *Naples (553), signaled the definitive fall of Ostrogothic domination in Italy.

Ruled by somewhat primitive institutions and customs, the Goths did not remain unaffected by the superior civilization of the Romans, and thus they made an effort, if not to assimilate their cultural heritage (in the field of legislation and in the administrative system), at least to promote and to develop a peaceful coexistence. This attempt encountered several obstacles, among which was the adherence to different Christian churches. Linked originally to polytheistic cults (the Asen, Jordanes, Get. XIII,78), the Goths discovered Christianity during the course of the 3rd c., during their raids in Cappadocia (264), where they encountered Christian communities. In 325, at the Council of *Nicaea, bishop Theophilus Bosphoritanus signed the Creed as bishop of Gothia. But the Goths were evangelized by *Wulfila (311–383, ordained bishop by *Eusebius of Nicomedia in 341), and converted to the *Arian doctrine. Arianism allowed the Goths to preserve their national identity even during the most troubled moments of their history, though they probably never fully understood its doctrinal differences with orthodoxy (Procopius, B.G. IV, 4,11). In the course of an *evangelization effort lasting about seven years, Wulfila aimed to create a network of small ecclesial communities, acting in turn as centers of doctrinal radiation. The main instrument of the conversion of the Goths was the translation of the Bible, which Wulfila himself carried out in his mother tongue (see *Gothic literature). The Christianization of the Goths, after experiencing grave obstacles in the persecution by the pagan Athanaric, was fully accomplished in the 2nd half of the 4th c. with the conversion of King Fritigern, with Wulfila's help, to Arianism. While the Ostrogoths never abandoned their adherence to the Arian creed, the Visigoths were converted to Catholicism under Recared (586–601).

Sources: Numerous sources deal with the Goths, in particular for the 4th-6th c. Worthy of mention are the following important authors: Pliny the Elder, Strabo, *Tacitus, *Ammianus Marcellinus, *Sozomen, *Socrates, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, *Philostorgius, *Claudian, *Sidonius Apollinaris, the *Anonymous Valesianus, *Ennodius, *Jordanes, *Cassiodorus, *Procopius, *Isidore of Seville.

Studies: PWK Suppl. 1, 797-845; EI 25, 754-756; EC 6, 937-940; I. von Bredow, NP IV, 1025-1027; I goti in Occidente. Problemi. Settimane de studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, III, Spoleto 1956; M. Wallace-Hadrill, The Barbarian West, Oxford 1966; D. Claude, Adel, Kirche und Königtum im Westgotenreich, Sigmaringen 1971; P.D. King, Law and Society in the Visigothic Kingdom, Cambridge 1972; P. Scardigli, Die Goten, Sprache und Kultur, Munich 1973; B. Saitti, Aspetti sociali ed economici dei regni romano-barbarici, I, Catania 1974; T.S. Burns, Transformations in Ostrogothic Social Structure, Ann Arbor 1974; Ph. Dixon, Barbarian Europe, Oxford 1976; B. and P. Scardigli, I rapporti tra Goti e Romani nel III e IV secolo: RomBarb 1 (1976) 261-295; G. Pepe, Il medioevo barbarico in Italia, Turin [6]1977; A. Carile, Il Bellum Gothicum dall'Isonzo a Ravenna: AAAd 13 (1978) 147-193; Th.S. Burns, Calculating Ostrogothic Army and Population: AncW 1 (1978) 187-190; Id., The Ostrogoths. Kingship and Society, Wiesbaden 1980; H. Wolfram, Storia dei Goti, 2 vols., It. ed. revised and expanded by M. Cesa, Rome 1985; A. Ambrosioni - S. Lusuardi Siena, I Goti in Italia alla luce delle fonti scritte e delle testimonianze archeologiche, Milan 1985; V.A. Sirago, Gli Ostrogoti in Gallia secondo le Variae di Cassiodoro, REA 89 (1987) 63-77; Teoderico il Grande e i goti d'Italia. Atti del 13° Congr. int. di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Milan, 2-6 novembre 1992, Spoleto 1993; P.J. Heather, The Goths, Oxford 1996; B. Luiselli, Dall'arianesimo dei Visigoti di Costantinopoli all'arianesimo degli Ostrogoti d'Italia: RAL 16,1 (2005) 5-30; G. Pilara, Ancora un momento di riflessione sulla politica italiana di Teoderico, re dei Goti: Studi Romani 53/3-4 (2005).

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

GRACE

I. Introduction - II. Eastern Fathers - III. Latin Fathers

I. Introduction. The technical use that Western theology makes of the term grace (Lat. gratia, Gr. χάρις) from the 5th c. onward and the interpretation of patristic texts depend on *Augustine's theological reflections, who is called by later tradition doctor gratiae (RAC 11, 315-386; 426-427). Influenced by this fact, some scholars believed that the Eastern churches did not elaborate a doctrine of grace, and that Western theology on grace began with Augustine (Kähler 1637). It is true that Eastern theologians, while acknowledging the free character of the divine initiative in the *economy of salvation, did not write treatises titled De gratia. And it is certain that they were not carried away by the crucial concerns of Augustine, though it cannot be denied that there was some reception in the East of the Augustinian doctrine on grace (Fransen 656-657; Lorenz 70). Moreover, the issues developed by Augustine from 412 until his death (430), in reaction to *Pelagius and his followers, have undeniably influenced the Western theological reflection on the free character of grace. Indeed, grace as the medicina for every descendant of *Adam, and an indispensable auxilium for every salvific action, would definitively establish in Western thought the question of the relation between eternal *predestination and human *free will. Nevertheless, this problem does not exhaust the thought of Augustine, who has much broader theological perspectives, esp. in his *homilies. Much less can one limit patristic theology on grace to that period. In fact, it is very significant that the Fathers should make use of χάρις and of gratia in order to describe, in general, the benevolent favor of God and all his benefits, and esp. the economy of salvation (the redemptive work of Christ), *baptism, *martyrdom and *virginity. On the other hand, they have a wide range of equivalent expressions, e.g., under the aspect of divine favor, εὐδοκία, εὔνοια, εὐεργεσία, φιλανθρωπία, συγκατάβασις, vocatio, praedestinatio; under the aspect of a benefit communicated: πνεῦμα, δύναμις, δόξα, donum, iustitia, etc. The concept itself of grace as auxilium gratuitum, employed in the Pelagian controversy, i.e. to say, the relationship between the transcendent God and the human being's corrupted free will, also includes fully the doctrines on God and humanity, i.e., *anthropology, and indeed *christology and *ecclesiology. For Augustine, auxilium, which every descendant of Adam needs, is always Christ's grace and grace given in the church.

In any case, though taking into account the extent of the problem of grace in patristic theology and in the thought of Augustine, a Western scholar can only with difficulty avoid an excessive influence of Augustine's perspective on the Pelagian controversy. The seriousness of this risk becomes even more evident when one also takes into account that later theology, more or less in the wake of Augustine, introduced a clearer distinction between grace as a favor or the presence of God (gratia increata), and grace as a benefit or gift of God in the human being (gratia creata) (from 1225 onward), and has developed since the 16th c. the concept of the supernatural (Fransen 644-645). Therefore one easily runs the risk either of restricting or explaining the texts of the Fathers, and of Augustine himself, too much in the light of subsequent theological concerns.

In order to avoid unilateral interpretations, rather than simply study the use of χάρις and gratia, we examine the fundamental idea of the salvation that the one God freely communicates by means of the Spirit of the Risen Christ in his church, an idea expressed sometimes in other words and categories (RAC 11, 386). Though widening in this way our analysis, we do not, however, intend to expound in this article the full meaning of the union with the living God bestowed on human beings (the remission of sins, reconciliation with God, *justification, divine filiation, capacity for the spiritual, anticipated glorification, etc.). In highlighting its free character, which is its characteristic as a gift, we take into consideration only the free initiative of God on which it is based. Salvation, on the other hand, inasmuch as it is accomplished by Christ, announced in the church, carried out in the person and the world, is reserved for other entries (see *soteriology, *justification, *sacraments, etc.).

The focus on the free character of grace corresponds, after all, with the orientation of the Bible: (1) the OT texts that exalt God full of grace and mercy (RAC 11, 351, with Ex 34:6-7); (2) the Pauline texts that oppose the righteousness of faith in the grace of Christ to the righteousness in which the person faithful to the law takes pride (Rom 3:27-28.; 1 Cor 4:7) and that place grace, whereby God lowers himself to humanity, in the eschatological perspective of the perfect vision to be attained in heaven (1 Cor 13:2; 2 Cor 5:7); (3) the fundamental idea that the gospel is nothing but the good news of the grace of God (Acts 20:24). Augustine, who defined grace as quod gratis datur (En. Ps. 103,3,8, and other texts in Seeberg 464; cf. also Hil., In Mat. 28,1), understood this point, central to all divine revelation, better than the other Fathers. Nevertheless, the other Fathers of the church, both Eastern and Latin, have discussed the idea that God unites himself to the human being how and when he wants (Fransen 636-637; DSp 6, 704-705).

Considering grace first under the formal aspect of salvation freely communicated by God in Christ, in addition to discovering a greater consensus between East and West, one also understands the essence of Christianity even better. In fact, reading the patristic texts anew in this light, we understand more clearly that the main themes of grace pertain to (a) the nature of God, who is *good and merciful, just and *faithful; (b) the meaning of the economy of salvation, which culminates in the incarnation of the only Son of God; and (c) the destiny of the human being, a creature of God, but totally open to him and thus in communion with all creatures.

II. Eastern Fathers. In the 1st half of the 2nd c., Christian authors, in accordance with the primarily hortatory intention of their writings, emphasized the moral requirements of the new life of Christ. *1 Clement, however, speaks of Christ's blood that has brought the "grace of conversion" to the whole world (7,4-8,5); *Ignatius of Antioch sees grace in Christ (Eph. 11,1; Smyr. 7,1) and also recalls the *Eucharist, pledge of eternal life (Eph. 20,2); the Didache* shows the path that leads to life through baptism and the Eucharist (1-10, cf. Barn. 18-21); the epistle of Barnabas* insists on the novelty of the covenant (RAC 11, 362, texts); 2 Clement warns not to neglect Jesus the author of our salvation (1,1-5). These authors describe the new life put into operation by the *Holy Spirit, also called God's χάρις (Martín).

Later, the Greek *Apologists, dealing with the Jewish tradition and the religious aspirations of the *pagans, try to prove that only in Jesus Christ, the Messiah and the incarnate Word of God, has the true alliance been established and the fullness of truth been manifested. Thus, they not only defend the antiquity of the Christian religion, and therefore its universal value, but at the same time they also emphasize the unprecedented novelty of the gospel of Christ. Ad Diognetum also affirms the necessity of grace (8,6; 9,1).

Toward the end of the 2nd c., antignostic theology, provoked by the dualistic and elitist pretensions of a certain Christian movement, started to defend the divinization of the whole human being, based on the incarnation of the Word (Iren., Adv. haer. III, 19,1), and the vocation of all people to the vision of the invisible God (Tremblay). Thus *Irenaeus, while giving considerable importance to human freedom, presents the salvation that takes place in history under the aspect of education and the *recapitulation of all things in Christ, a development over time that originates entirely in the *love of the one God who reveals himself, when and in what manner he wills (Adv. haer. IV, 20,5). This presentation of the initiative of the God who saves is all the more significant because it is not inspired by a misinterpretation of Paul (see the Antitheses of Marcion), but by the apostle's complete thought, indeed, by the *Bible as a whole. From now on, the faith begun in the salvation freely offered by God, Father and creator of all things, also appears in the baptismal profession (RAC 11, 375-376). That same baptismal spirituality, by calling baptism a seal or an illumination, almost identifies it with grace (gratia baptismi). In fact, by restoring instantaneously and perfectly, although not magically, divine life, it attests to the free character of salvation (Clem. Al., Paedag. I, 6,25-6; Tertull., Bapt. 15,3). Likewise, acc. to hortatory and hagiographic Christian writings, the great ideals of the faith—martyrdom and virginity—cannot be realized by human effort, but only with the grace of the Holy Spirit and therefore are a clear demonstration of the novelty of the Christian religion (Ign., Rom. 1,1-2; Eus., HE 5, 1: history of the martyrs of Lyons; Tertull., Virg. 13-4; Cypr., Hab. virg. 3-4; cf. RAC 11, 379-382).

In the 3rd c. Christian *gnosticism develops in its own way the divine origin of Christian existence. *Clement of Alexandria (d. before 215), introducing the question of ὁμοίωσις θεῷ in a *Platonizing interpretation of 2 Pet 1:4, appears, perhaps, to exaggerate the relationship between the human being and God, but, also acc. to him, the gnostic person returns to perfect resemblance with God through divine love for people (RAC 11, 392-393). *Origen (d. 253/254), trying to explain, in light of the regula fidei, the whole meaning of the universe, its origin and purpose, insists strongly on the role of free will in rational beings in this whole process of departure and return. For this reason, he distinguishes between the two creations: the first of rational beings, the second (infralapsaria) of the material world, thus announcing the theme of the felix culpa, acc. to which the incarnation of the Word, in a more astonishing way, leads back to the original state. At the same time, Origen emphasizes that the spiritual progress of free persons, their supernatural transformation (C. Cels. 5,23), takes place through the Logos in the Holy Spirit (De Princ. I, 3,5), and that by means of the grace of baptism (Comm. Jo. VI, 33).

This explanation of the world, taking over in substance the trinitarian view of Irenaeus in a philosophical perspective, found a greater theological and christological elaboration during the dogmatic disputes of the 4th and 5th c. As is well known, the anti-Arian theologians such as *Athanasius, *Basil and *Didymus defend before all else, starting from the true divinization of the believer, both the divinity of the Word, the true Son of God, and the divinity of the Holy Spirit, the source of life and holiness. Basil in particular, focusing on the dominion of the Holy Spirit not only uses the word χάρις often (De Spir. s. 8,17-18) but, with this term, also distinguishes the divine essence of the Spirit and his benefits (8,17; 27,68: distinction applied to Christ) (RAC 11,400-401). More important, however, is the way in which these theologians point out the Nicene distinction between genitus and factus, in reality between nature (φύσις) and grace (θέσις χάρις). Origen had already contrasted the *Trinity, altogether incorporeal, with rational beings, but the discussion of Arius's Origenism leads the defenders of the faith of Nicaea to draw a clearer distinction between the Trinity and creatures. According to the logic of this distinction, they also distinguished between Christ, the Son of God per naturam, and human beings, joined one to another per naturam, but children of God per adoptionem or per gratiam. In light of this double distinction, their doctrine of salvation freely offered takes on a more precise outline. On the one hand, they derive the salvation of human beings both from Christ, true God, and the Holy Spirit, equally true God, i.e. to say, from the Trinity, known only through revelation, indeed an incomprehensible mystery. On the other hand, they clearly state that divine filiation is solely due to the benevolent will of the Father for reasons beyond the mere existence of a corruptible creation. In addition, in seeking the reasons for the incarnation of the Logos, Athanasius (d. 373) does in fact admit that Adam, though by nature (φύσει) created and subject to corruption, knew God directly when in paradise, thanks to the presence of the Logos in him. The first man, however, having sinned, lost his original state as image of the Logos, which is knowledge of the truth and eternal life. Nevertheless, through the incarnation, the Logos has so united himself to humankind such that an incorrupt nature, and therefore the knowledge of God, has been incorporated into him forever (Incarn. 5; 11; 54). God, not content with bringing human beings to paradise, but wanting to ensure the salvation of humankind and securing it through the incarnation of his Son, has demonstrated in the clearest possible way that human salvation is due to his grace. The κατὰ χάριν of being κατ᾽ εικόνα τοῦ λόγου was accomplished by the κατὰ χάριν of being ἐν σαρκί τοῦ λόγου (RAC 11, 397-400). The incarnational theology of grace reaches its perfection in *Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444). Forced by his Antiochene opponents to clarify the soteriological vision of Athanasius, so dear to him, not only does he clearly distinguish between Christ μονογενής, and Christ πρωτότοκος of the brethren (Incarn.: PG 75, 1229B, 1233BC; cf. Com. Jo. I, 9 [1,12]: PG 73, 153BC) but is also concerned to safeguard the true incarnation of the Logos itself, the true Son of God, thus deepening the wholly unheard-of mystery of the union of Christians with God. Moreover, even his formulas on the Holy Spirit, gift of the risen Christ, exceed those of the prior tradition.

At this time of great dogmatic controversies, some authors are also interested in the more limited question of the relationship between divine grace and human freedom. *Gregory of Nyssa (d. 394) speaks of χάρις esp. in the context of his doctrine on ὁμοίωσις θεῷ, understood as the beauty of the *soul. He is concerned in particular with the cooperation (συνέργεια) between χάρις, a new force communicated in baptism, and the free efforts of the person. According to him, grace is added to human action, and not vice versa, because grace is more powerful (RAC 11, 406-407). *John Chrysostom (d. 407) expresses himself in a similar vein, though in a broader context. An astute exegete of the Pauline letters, he considers grace as a force that drives the soul to do good, provided, however, that this has been deserved. Nonetheless, he remembers that God does not fail to do the greater part, and indeed that the reward for good works is itself a gift of grace (RAC 11, 408-411). It is clear from the way they refer grace to baptism how much Gregory of Nyssa and John Chrysostom, while recognizing the crucial role of human freedom, attribute to divine initiative (see also Cyril of Jerusalem: RAC 11, 400).

The interest of these two authors in the problem of grace and human freedom is naturally present in the *monastic environments close to them. Engaged in constant *prayer and *asceticism, these monks obviously emphasize human action. Nevertheless, it is they who defend most the deification from above of the righteous person and give great value, often too much, as for example the *Messalians, to the experience of the Holy Spirit, who alone could purify and perfect the spiritual person (RAC 11, 403-406).

In the wake of these currents, monastic Byzantine authors of the 6th and 7th c. deepen further the doctrine of the spiritual union of the person with God. As part of the hierarchies of all spiritual beings, ps.-*Dionysius traces the origin of the believer's enlightenment through the upper hierarchies to the transcendent God. By highlighting the divine origin of all knowledge, he also creates the expression ὑπερφύσις, translated later by supernaturalis (Deneffe). *Maximus the Confessor (d. 662), loyal to the Chalcedonian faith, matured by monastic experience and the suffering of *persecution, modifies the Dionysian vision of the universe more than a little. He not only adds charity to gnosis, but sees its foundation in the *cross of Christ. By distinguishing the two wills in the one *hypostasis of the Word, bringing the problem of indivise-inconfuse to a personal level, he makes the comparison between the incarnation of the Word and the mysterious relationship between creator and creature more relevant, and also identifies unambiguously the incarnation of the Word as a model of the absolute free character of grace, i.e., of ὑπερφύσις that perfects φύσις, as he proposes in his explanations of charismatic knowledge (Quaest. Thal. 59: PG 90, 604D-608C) and of the joy that God, in his grace, grants to the nature of those who are worthy (Cap. quinq. cent. IV, 20: PG 90, 1312C) (Stoeckle 91-98). His ideas were summarized in part by *John of Damascus in the Expositio fidei. His distinction between φύσις and χάρις (Expos. 81: IV, 8) is noteworthy, as well as that between voluntas antecedens and voluntas consequens (Expos. 43: II, 29), taken up again by medieval theology.

III. Latin Fathers. In the West, the theology of grace developed partly in a similar way, partly in new manner. Following Irenaeus, *Tertullian (d. ca. 220) distinguishes between imago and similitudo, i.e., between the human being created by means of the Word, and one perfected by the work of the Holy Spirit, seeing the incarnation as the necessary basis for the later work of perfection (Res. 6,3-5; 9,1-2; Bapt. 5,6-7). He defends, moreover, human freedom, which is understood as a gift from God (Adv. Marc. II, 5-6). However, paying attention to the psychological analysis of human action (De anima), he identifies, esp. with the expressions meritum and satisfactio, the will as the fundamental principle, which will form the basis of the more practical theology of the Latin Fathers, thus paving the way for the fundamental distinction between natura and gratia, characteristic of all theology after Augustine (cf. DSp 6, 706-707, with Tertullian, Anim. 21,6). Fighting the Marcionite antithesis between the God who is good and the God who is just, he directs Latin theology toward the concept of predestination in which *justice is bound to the goodness of God. Finally, the great importance he attaches to baptism, which, as paenitentia prima, is a much easier conversion than the paenitentia secunda, which is very difficult, is later confirmed by his follower, *Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258). He states that baptism is the only path toward light (Ad Don. 4-5), and then only in the church, which alone possesses the Holy Spirit (Ep. 70,1). Grace itself is defined as free (Test. III, 100).

The great controversies of the imperial church also had repercussions in the West. Defending the Nicene faith in Gaul, *Hilary of Poitiers (d. 367) proposed a theology of glory, in which the divine origin of salvation appeared in a new light. On the question of human freedom, he asserted, however, that man takes the first step toward God through merit, thus obtaining his further assistance (RAC 11, 413-414). *Marius Victorinus (d. after 362), granting importance to the universal divine activity, emphasized instead divine mercy, by which people attain salvation (RAC 11, 412-414). *Ambrose of Milan (d. 397), the great defender of the Nicene faith in N Italy, took from Athanasius the clear distinction between the divine sonship of the only Son of God, which he has by nature, and the adoptive sonship of Christians. He did so from the perspective of the Latin distinction between natura and gratia (Szabó), but followed him in the doctrine of the felix culpa. According to Ambrose, Adam, by losing original grace, transmitted to his descendants guilt and *sin (Apol. Dav. I, 11,56; II, 12,71; see also the distinct position of *Ambrosiaster: RAC 11, 415-6). Therefore, the human being is in need of grace, esp. for initial conversion (Com. Luc. 1,10: a Deo enim praeparatur voluntas hominis; 7,27; 7,132). With respect to advancing in the Christian life, Ambrose seems to be less consistent. For this reason he admonished the faithful to anticipate with prayer the coming of Christ, true sun of justice (In Ps. 118,19,30). However, by clearly acknowledging original sin, emphasizing the scope of the incarnation of the only Son of God, developing the doctrine on the Holy Spirit, the giver of grace and divine gift, sometimes even referring the election of human beings to divine benevolence, he affirmed very precisely the absolutely free character of salvation (RAC 11, 414-415).

The doctrine of grace proclaimed by Ambrose comes into full clarity in Augustine of Hippo (d. 430). Thanks to his experiences as a convert, both the negative and positive influences of *Manicheism and *Neoplatonism, his loyalty to the African tradition, esp. with respect to infant baptism, and most of all thanks to the intense study of the Pauline letters, he clarified the question at its heart, i.e., the more personal Divine-human relationship. Augustine, however, did not take into account only this thorny problem to which, from 412 onward, and esp. from 415 to 418, he devoted many letters and treatises (see list in Patrologia III, 365-366) but also found many fine words about the presence of God in us (Ep. 104,4,10), on the divine inhabitation (Serm. 57,2,2) and other major themes of the earlier tradition (Philips 98-109). It is certain, however, that he was driven by this issue to a very laborious theological reflection, perhaps the greatest ever known.

While, in fact, in his earlier writings, esp. in the anti-Manichean ones, he had insisted on human freedom, around 395/396, under the decisive influence of the great letters of the apostle Paul, he began to make every salutary act dependent on divine grace, understood as an inner light and effective force (effectrix bonae voluntatis) (see for the importance of the Ad Simpl. on the new orientation, Löhrer 778-781, with bibl.; Lettieri, esp. part 4, with the history of the most recent research). This radical position particularly characterizes the Confessions, but is almost absent from the first part of De doctrina christiana (Lettieri 23-64). From 412 onward, he deepened the fundamental insight of 396, whose revolutionary aspect he himself later revealed (gratia vicit) (Retract II, 1; Praed. IV, 8; cf. RAC 11, 418). He discusses it in the context of the issues raised by *Celestius and Pelagius regarding infant baptism in remissionem peccatorum, i.e. to say, from original sin, and of the possibility of remaining without sin in this life (Ep. 157; Peccat. merit.). Later, Augustine continued to better define the relationship between natura and gratia, i.e., between what is common to all descendants of Adam and what God brings to pass in the elect. While for Pelagius, human nature has remained intact despite the sin of Adam, and has in itself the possibility not to sin and to do good, acc. to Augustine, human nature was so corrupted by Adam's sin (natura vitiata) that now only an inner and efficacious grace, the grace of Christ, the new Adam, can return true freedom to the free will, i.e., produce in it and through it individual salutary acts. The positions of Augustine from 412 to 418, and that which the Synod of *Carthage had taken in 411, were enshrined in the African council of 418 (DS 222-230) and largely accepted also by the Apostolic See (Fransen 654-655).

From 418 onward, against the insistence of Julian of *Eclanum, Augustine sought to further explain the need for the Christian to be healed completely from the concupiscentia carnis, which, together with superbia, ignorantia and difficultas voluntatis, continues to demonstrate the reatus originalis of all men (Lorenz 59-60). Although he asserts the goodness of marriage, it is compromised, acc. to his opponents, by his doctrine of original sin. In 426/427, he also answered the objections of the monks of Hadrumetum. According to them, his ideas on the necessity of grace call into question each and every act of asceticism and correction. He clarified finally, against attacks from the so-called *Messalians (called from the 17th c. on "Semi-Pelagians"; Fransen 657), his thought on the initium fidei and on the gratis perseverantiae and thus on predestination as well, without which, acc. to him, the free character of grace could not be safeguarded (Praed.; Persev.). These later elaborations are attested in the second part of De Doctrina Christiana (Lettieri 429-437). Thus pointing out the relationship between the interior aid of God and the saving effectiveness of human action, he highlighted the indisputable absolute gratuity of the whole economy of salvation, and indeed, by placing in the incarnation of the Word the model of the free character of grace (Praed. 15,31; Persev. 24,67; C. Iul. op. imp. I, 138) surpassed his predecessors. The abundant grace of Rom 5:20 is not for him, in fact, only grace permanently inserted in sinful humanity through the incarnation (as suggested by Athanasius and those who had taken up the doctrine of the felix culpa), nor does it simply coincide with the incarnation, in which the history of salvation reaches its climax. Rather, Augustine saw the incarnation of the only Son of God as the grace of all graces, perceiving that the grace of Christ unites the creature with God in such a way that no creature, qua creatura, could expect more from the immense goodness of its Creator (Studer, Gratia Christi, 110-119).

The discussions concerning divine predestination and the efficacy of baptism continued after the death of Augustine (Fransen 675-676; Lorenz 68-69). His friends, esp. *Prosper of Aquitaine, in the face of resistance from the Messalians, while faithfully following his teacher, gave more importance to the universality of salvation. Finally, the Council of *Orange (529), under the guidance of *Caesarius of Arles and with the approval of the Apostolic See, confirmed the mitigated Augustinianism that had developed during the 5th c. and that later influenced the theology of the High Middle Ages (Lorenz 71). Still later, *Gregory the Great (d. 604), who was so widely read during the Middle Ages, took up this form of Augustinianism also, but putting more emphasis on consentire and accipere than on the divine communication of grace (Auer 988). Thus, the idea of the free character of grace, that Augustine had defended against Pelagius and his followers, entered the heritage of the faith of the Latin church, and was moreover received by some of the other churches. His position can still be used to evaluate the various issues with which the church of the Fathers, following the Bible, and particularly the letters of the apostle, had in some way expressed the essence of the Christian faith, namely, the concept that initiative for the unheard-of union with God belongs only to the Father, who with the Son and the Holy Spirit is the one and only God.

R. Seeberg, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, II, Leipzig [2]1910 (still useful, esp. for Augustine); A. Deneffe, Geschichte des Wortes "supernaturalis": ZKTh 46 (1922) 337-360; E. Kähler, Gnade, IV. Dogmengeschichtlich: RGG[3] 2, 1637-1640; J. Auer, Gnade, III. Zur Geschichte der Gnadenlehre: LTK 4, 984-991 (cf. Sacram. Mundi 2 [Freiburg 1968], 445-450); B. Stoeckle, "Gratia supponit naturam," Geschichte und Analyse eines theologischen Axioms, Rome 1962; R. Lorenz, Gnade und Erkenntnis bei Augustinus: ZKG 75 (1964) 21-78; C. Moussy, Gratia et sa famille, Paris 1966; C. Baumgartner, Grâce: DSp 6, 701-726; F. Szabó, Le Christ créateur chez s. Ambroise, Rome 1968; R. Lorenz, Das vierte bis sechste Jahrhundert. Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte, Göttingen 1970, 54-71; J.P. Martin, El Espíritu Santo en los orígenes del Cristianismo, Zürich 1971 (cf. Augustinianum 20 [1980] 471-481); G. Philips, S. Augustin a-t-il connu une "grâce incréée"?: EThL 47 (1971) 97-116; Id., L'union personelle avec le Dieu vivant, Gembloux 1974; G. Greshake, Gnade und konkrete Freiheit. Eine Untersuchung zur Gnadenlehre des Pelagius, Mainz 1972; P. Fransen, Dogmengeschichtliche Entfaltung der Gnadenlehre: MySal IV/2, Einsiedeln 1973, 631-765 (bibl.); M. Löhrer: MySal IV/2, 778-781: Sull'Ad Simplicianum di S. Agostino; A. Vanneste, Nature et grâce dans la théologie de s. Augustin: RecAug 10 (1975) 143-169; O. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius, Stuttgart 1975; B. Studer, Soteriologie der Kirchenväter: HDG III/2a, Freiburg 1978; R. Tremblay, La manifestation et la vision de Dieu selon s. Irénée de Lyon, Münster 1978; H. Dörrie - H. Dittmann - O. Knoch - A. Schindler, Gnade: RAC 11, 313-446 (fundamental, extensive bibl.); TRE 13, 476-511; G. Greshake - E.-M. Faber, Gnade, V.: LTK[3] 4, 772-779; R. Rieger, Gnade: RGG[4] 3, 1027-1032; G. Lettieri, L'altro Agostino, Brescia 2001 (bibl.).

B. Studer

GRATIAN (359–383). Son of *Valentinian I, he was emperor of the Western Roman Empire from 375 to 383 when on 25 August, at age 24, he was killed as a result of a conspiracy that arose within his own army, while he was preparing to fight in *Gaul *Magnus Maximus, who had assumed the imperial title. For a brief period (August 378 to January 379), following the death of *Valens, he also ruled the E half of the empire, which he then decided to entrust to the general Theodosius, proclaiming him Augustus. Educated esp. by the poet *Ausonius, he spent the first years of his rule in *Trier, in Gaul, from where in 376 he made a quick journey to Rome (at which time the philosopher *Themistius dedicated to him his Oration XVI). Because of the threats of the Goths in the E, and to bring aid to the provinces of Illyricum, he left Gaul and settled first at *Sirmium and then at *Milan. At Sirmium (probably in July 378, see Palanque, Saint Ambroise, 497) he must have met for the first time *Ambrose, establishing a relationship as his student that would last the rest of his life. The occasion was a council convened to ratify the deposition of six *Arian bishops from their sees in Illyricum. Dating to 380 (Palanque, 501-502) is a letter of Gratian to Ambrose, who responded after a few months (Ep. 1). In it he asks Ambrose to join him in Trier, where he had returned in the autumn of 379. Ambrose, at the request of the emperor to be instructed in the faith against the Arian heresy, wrote for him the De fide and later, to complete the education previously provided, sent three books on the *Holy Spirit. Perhaps Ambrose also exalted the figure of Gratian, the just man, in his work De Noe. In 381 Gratian himself convened the Council of *Aquileia, and ensured the execution of the judgments established there (Ambr., Ep. 10 and 11) in order to eradicate Arianism from the Western empire. In 382 he convened the Council of *Rome (Jer., Ep. 108 and Soz., HE VII, 11), which also dealt with the followers of *Priscillian. After meeting with Ambrose, his policy of total support for Catholicism is manifested in concrete measures such as the abolition of the title pontifex maximus given to the emperor; the removal of the altar of Victory from the senate house; the abolition of grants and immunities enjoyed by *pagan priests and the vestal virgins (for antipagan laws, see CTh XVI, 7.1-2; 10.7,8); and the laws of 3 August 379 and 22 April 380, which proscribed heresy (CTh XVI, 5.5).

J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'Empire Romain, Paris 1933, 39-115; M. Fortina, L'imperatore Graziano, Turin 1953; H. Glaesener, L'empereur Gratien et S. Ambroise: RHE 52 (1957) 466-488; G. Gigli, Il regno dell'imperatore Graziano, Rome 1963; G. Gottlieb, Ambrosius von Mailand und Kaiser Gratian, Göttingen 1973; A. Paredi, Ambrogio, Graziano, Teodosio: Antichità Altoadriatiche 22 (1982) 17-49.

M.G. Mara

GRATUS. The name of numerous saints: (1) The bishop of Aosta with this name ought to be identified, it seems, with the priest who in 451 signed, in the name of his bishop Eustasius (PL 54, 948B), the synodal letter of the provincial Council of *Milan and was his successor (PCBE 2,1, 940-941). He was present at the translation of the relics of Innocent, martyr of the *Theban Legion, into the basilica of Agaunum/S. Moritz (BHL 5741-5745). He died 7 September in a year unknown to us, ca. 500 (CIL 5, 6859). His Vita has no historic value (BHL 3634a-3634b). (2) The bishop of *Carthage named Gratus, who lived around the middle of the 4th c., is known for the council that was held at Carthage during his episcopacy (CCL 149A, 3-10). He is the first bishop not a martyr whose name appears in the Calendarium Carthaginense, on 5 May (Mart. hier.: 29 April); (3) The bishop of Chalon-sur-Saône, present at the council that was held in this city between 647 and 653 (O. Pontal, Die Synoden im Merowingerreich, Paderborn 1986, 193-197) and at the assembly of Clichy in 654; he is remembered 8 October (BHL 3635). (4) The first bishop we know of Oloron (in the lower Pyrenees), present at the Council of *Agde in 506, remembered 19 October.

BS 7, 156-160; LCI 6, 425-426; 192-197; R. Devos, Le culte populaire de saint Grat dans l'ancien diocèse de Genève-Annecy, in M. Costa (éd.), Le culte et ses rites. Des témoins manuscrits aux expressions de la dévotion populaire, Actes du Colloque international d'Aoste (2 et 3 avril 1993), Aoste 1994, 109-120; A.P. Frutaz, Le fonti per la storia della valle d'Aosta, Aosta [2]1998.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

GRATUS of Carthage (d. before 359). Successor of *Caecilian as Catholic bishop of *Carthage during the *Donatist schism. With the strengthening of religious unity and the exile of *Donatus under *Constance in 347, Gratus found himself without a Donatist rival in the city. He was present at the Council of *Serdica in 343. He then took the opportunity to call a general council of the N African church in Carthage, around 348, in an attempt to restore and define ecclesiastical discipline for a unified church. The Donatist insistence on a second baptism for all who had fallen into schism or for heretics was condemned (can. 1), and there was an attempt to bring more order to the cult of the *martyrs (can. 2). In order to improve discipline they insisted on continence for clergy and widows (can. 3 and 4). They forbade the clergy from holding positions of administration of landed property (can. 6 and 9) and exacting interest on loans (can. 13). Bishops were forbidden from usurping the jurisdiction of their neighbors and removing communities from their jurisdiction (can. 10). During the discussion, Gratus proved himself a good presider and administrator but not a leading figure. All was not well in N Africa, as demonstrated by Antigonus's complaint, who was bishop of Magina. According to him, his old Donatist rival in the diocese was considered by the people a "father," but he was seen as a "stepfather" (can. 12: susurrat populis ut illum patrem, me vitricum nominent). Gratus must have died before 359, since *Restitutus represented the N Africans as bishop of Carthage at the Council of *Rimini.

Concilium Carthaginense sub Grato a. 345-348: Ch. Munier (ed.), Concilia Africae A. 345-A. 525. CCL 149, 3-10; Monceaux III, 216 and 221-226; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford [2]1971, 177-184; PCBE I, 544-545.

W.H.C. Frend

GREEK, CHRISTIAN. Christianity can be historically connected with the religious life of late Judaism. The Qumran documents testify, with a significant amount of data, that the religious expressions of the Jews, the Greeks and the Christians were similar, but with a significant note of isolation on the part of the Jews. From the moment that the Christian message spread in a prodigious way beyond the borders of Judea to cover almost the entire area of Greek influence, via both culture and language, a process of Christianization of the Greek-speaking world became necessary, which involved, as a consequence, a process of Hellenization of the new religion. The first phase of Christian Hellenism can be traced back to the apostolic age, because of the use of the Greek language in the writings of the NT and in those known as the Apostolic Fathers. The term hellenismos, in fact, originally meant, as the verb hellenizo indicates in Greek, the correct use of the Greek language. This was a term of classical *rhetoric to indicate the first and the most important of the five virtues of speech: the grammatically correct use of language. It was already in use by Theophrastus, when a strong foreign presence in Greece threatened to undermine the purity of the language. Christian Greek, in a strong continuity of thought and expression with the classical world (see *Christianity and classical culture), became the most appropriate tool to expound with original and developed contributions the new message, by means of the whole ensemble of concepts, philosophical and rhetorical categories, metaphors and subtle nuances of meaning that were typical of classical Greek culture.

The Christians had to overcome comparison with a language and a culture so advanced. From a purely Jewish movement they managed to merge into the structures of the Hellenized Jews in Paul's time, not only in the regions of the Diaspora but in *Palestine itself. The Jewish aristocracy was in fact not at all open to other peoples, as Josephus notes also, and was even less inclined to learn a "barbaric" language. The Hellenized section of the Jewish people, open to Greek culture, became the first recipient of the mission of Christian preachers. The apostles of the *Jerusalem community, who in the Acts are called Hellenistai, spread throughout Palestine after the martyrdom of *Stephen. They are always in opposition to the Jews, but they are not Greeks, although they knew how to speak or understand Greek. It is an important fact that the name Christian was born in the Greek city of *Antioch, where the Hellenized Jews exercised their first missionary activity. The large following of converts among the Gentiles is explained by the fact that they could understand the language spoken and used in the *synagogues of the Diaspora, as evidenced by *Philo of Alexandria, who also uses literary Greek, esp. for his fellow Jews, assimilated and learned.

The missionary activity of *Paul, his discussions with the Jews during his apostolic journeys and his letters are documents of literary Greek, placed at the service of *evangelization, with all the subtleties of logic and classical rhetoric. It is very significant that his citations of the OT do not conform to the original Hebrew but the Greek translation of the Septuagint. Even the literary genres soon became the heritage of Christian *preaching, which, starting from *protreptic and apology, and even the word metanoia (conversion), borrowed from *Plato, were adopted as the badge of a new *philosophy, which like others required first a shift in attitude and life.

Christians made extensive use of the thesis and antithesis in vogue in the schools of rhetoric to convince the educated public to accept the Master who possessed and revealed the truth to all. Paul, visiting *Athens, the cultural and intellectual center of classical Greece and the symbol of its historical tradition, preaches about the unknown god to an audience of Epicurean and *Stoic philosophers in the venerable seat of the Areopagus (Acts 17:17). He quotes the verse of Aratus or Cleanthes: "We are his offspring"; his language and his arguments are Stoic and aimed at convincing minds educated in philosophy.

Even in the *Acts of the Apostle Philip, the protagonist comes to Athens, like Paul, with a clear intent to imitate, and says: "I have come to Athens to reveal to you the paideia* of Christ," thus presenting Christianity as a continuation of the classical paideia of the Greeks. The acceptance of a confrontation or dialogue was easy for those who claimed to be indigenous and to possess the ancient paideia.

The translation of sources became an unstoppable process from the moment when the first evangelists, going back to the oldest oral or written reports of the sayings and deeds of Jesus, translated them, adapting them from the original Aramaic to Greek. Luke considered defective both the language and style of the material collected earlier. *Clement and *Origen were educated in the Platonic intellectual system, which was the dominant culture. The progress of civilization from *Homer to Plato was reinterpreted in a spiritual and providential manner. Especially Plato, pointing to the immaterial world, with the sweetness of the language of his dialogues, indicated in the reality beyond this world a journey and a destination. It is not therefore surprising that in the Mediterranean basin, particularly in the E and neighboring areas, whether or not subject to the Roman Empire, the gospel was preached in Greek, a language that became sacred because it was used in writing the entire NT and in translating all the canonical books of the OT. The language used was koine Greek, the everyday speech of the inhabitants of the various regions of the Hellenistic world; a language colored by Semitic expressions, under the decisive influence of a people whose mother tongue was Aramaic. The first *evangelization took place among the Hellenized Jews of the Diaspora, who were better prepared religiously and culturally for the message, accompanied by an apologetic production, adapted to explain to the Gentiles the elements that characterized the Jewish religious tradition. *Alexandria was the city where all the sacred books of the Jews had been translated, the translation known as the Septuagint, which was received in common also by the Greek-speaking Christian communities. At Antioch, and perhaps even Rome, *preaching and *catechesis in the synagogues was given in Greek, thus developing a particular religious language, which probably influenced the language of the New Testament. Already in the Apostolic age the linguistic tradition of the Septuagint, by means of its liturgical, catechetical and homiletic use, became a characteristic aspect of Christian Greek. The Greek translation of the OT edited by the learned proselyte Jews Aquila and *Theodotion was neglected, as well as that by the *Jewish Christian *Symmachus.

The novelty of the Christian message enriched the traditional vocabulary of the koine with new words and meanings, without, however, upsetting the syntax—not, at least, to the extent it did to Latin in the West, and definitely rejecting the language compromised by the *pagan worship of the gods.

Therefore, the creativity of Christian Greek is apparent in the context of the *liturgy and *sacraments, in the organizational structure of the community, in an effort to adequately express the content of *dogma and, above all, in the effort to adapt to the comprehension of a humble audience, both culturally and socially, terms and constructs familiar to the people and often used only in the specific geographic area concerned.

The Semitic matrix of the Old and New Testament tradition and of various authors of the first generation of preachers of the gospel converged into a unique language group, which was consolidated and developed considerably, allowing the survival in the liturgy of terms such as sabaoth, hosanna, alleluia, amen, gehenna, pascha, seraphim, cherubim. Common terms of the koine Greek acquired new semantic meanings in the context of the Jewish religion, and became familiar in the Christian community: Semitic borrowings of the type δόξα ("opinion, renown") come to mind, which was adopted by the Septuagint translators as an equivalent of the Hebrew kabod, and became the common word expressing the glory, majesty, sublimity of God and, therefore, also of Christ. Another example is the verb ἐξομολογεῖσθαι ("recognize, admit to a fault or error"), which became the equivalent to hodah, with the added meaning of "to confess one's faith" and "to praise," "celebrate God" in confessing one's sins and faith. Another example is διαθήκη ("treaty," "alliance" and "testament") equivalent to berith, which indicates a sacred trust, the covenant between God and his people, and later came to indicate the salvific economy of God for Israel and the Christian people, and therefore of the books and the written documents that manifest the divine economy in the OT and NT.

The word εἰρήνη, translation of shalom, has the common meaning of *peace or the absence of war in general. It adds the notion of the Messianic peace, peace within human beings in their relations with God, external peace, the absence of *persecution of the church, and esp. of internal peace in the church, of communion among the bishops and between the bishops and the faithful, which became almost synonymous with συμφωνία, ecclesiastical peace. Δικαιοσύνη corresponds to sedaqah, and may indicate *justice in general as well as interior holiness before God; σάρξ, which translates basar, "flesh," can refer to the human nature of the Son of God incarnate, or human nature as corrupted by *sin, in opposition to the spirit. Examples of Semitic borrowings include the elative genitive of the type εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων ("the ages of ages"), a common expression in the doxology; the genitive of quality in place of an adjective, such as ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἀνομίας, a sinful man (in Latin: homo/vir peccati); constructs with ἐν and the instrumental and associative dative, modeled on the Semitic phrases with the preposition be, such as ἐν τούτῳ νίκα, "conquer in this" (Latin: in hoc vince), ἐν σαρκὶ ἔρχεσθαι (Latin: in carne venire) to describe the incarnation of Christ, ἐν δόξῃ ἔρχεσθαι, "come in glory" (Latin: in gloria venire) to describe the glorious *parousia of Christ; the pleonastic use of the verba dicendi, esp. in biblical quotations; the use of the plurals οὐρανοί, "the heavens" and αἰῶνες, "the ages"; the periphrastic construction of εἰμί with the participle instead of the finite form of the verba dicendi.

Even Christian self-definition and self-knowledge, as compared to Judaism and paganism, resulted in the creation of new terms, esp. in a profound semantic renewal of the terms of the linguistic tradition of the Septuagint or of terms from the common language: e.g., ἐκκλησία is adopted to designate the Christian community, under the influence of the Hebrew qahal, which refers to the liturgical assembly of the Israelite people in the desert, rather than under the influence of ʿedah, the term usually referring to the Qumran community; ἀπόστολος changes from meaning "sent" to the more specific "apostle," i.e., "one of the twelve disciples of Jesus"; ἐπίσκοπος, πρεσβύτερος, διάκονος, κλῆρος, κατηχούμενος—"*bishop," "priest," "deacon," "clergy," catechumen"—which seem to have antecedents in the Aramaic language of the Qumran community, designate a strong hierarchical structure and particular ecclesiastical institutions. Sacramental theology is enriched by "technical" terms such as βάπτισμα, "*baptism," a form peculiar to Christianity and used in preference to βαπτισμός; ἐξομολόγησις, "sacramental penance, confession"; εὐχαριστία, "thanksgiving," "*eucharist"; and χειροτονεία, imposition of the hands, i.e., "ordination" (of the bishop and the priest). A particular ethical-religious affection in community relations is designated by ἀγάπη, "Christian charity," κοινωνία/communio, the ecclesial communion, which sometimes is synonymous with εἰρήνη, the "ecclesiastical peace" and with συμφωνία, "reciprocated harmony."

On the other hand, the following words acquired negative semantic connotations: ἀποστασία and ἀποστάτης, "apostasy" and "apostate"; αἵρεσις and αἱρετικός, "*heresy" and "heretic." The development and deepening of doctrine also enriched the vocabulary with new words and new theological and ecclesiological terms such as σαρκοφόρος, σάρκωσις, ἐνανθρώπησις, σαρκοῦσθαι—"incarnate," "incarnation," "to become incarnate," in reference to the mission of Christ; παράδοσις to emphasize the "*tradition"; πάθος and ἀνάστασις to describe the passion and *resurrection of Christ. The technical use of terms is also developed in the context of theological disputes: παράκλητος and πνεῦμα ἅγιον to describe the *Holy Spirit, λόγος to designate the preexistent Christ, οἰκονομία to describe both the interpersonal organization of the divine life as well as the plan of salvation.

However, the excessive wealth of the Hellenistic religious and philosophical language prevented a more creative development of the Christian idiom; indeed, from the time of Clement of Alexandria and Origen there is a tendency to accept fully the tradition of the pagan philosophical-religious language, while the great writers and orators of the 4th c. affirm their willingness to comply with the canons of the highest linguistic and literary classical tradition. Therefore, the creativity of Christian Greek (almost limited solely to vocabulary and almost insignificant with respect to morphological and syntactic structures, as compared to the koine) is much lower than that of Christian Latin, strong in the works of the great writers of the 4th c. such as *Augustine, *Jerome, *Ambrose, who can be considered the champions of the new Christianized classical Latin.

G.J.M. Bartelink, Lexicologish-semantische studie over de taal van de Apostolische Vaders, Utrecht 1952; E. Hatch, A Concordance to the Septuagint and the Other Greek Versions of the Old Testament, Graz, Akademische Drucku. Verlagsanstalt 1954; H. Thyen, Der Stil der jüdisch-hellenistischen Homilie, Göttingen 1955; G. Dix, Jew and Greek, Westminster 1955; F. Blass - A. Debrunner - R.W. Funk, A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, Chicago 1961; J. Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology, Nijmegen 1962; G.Q. Reijners, The Terminology of the Holy Cross in Early Christian Literature, Nijmegen 1965; DB 3, 312-331; DBS 3, 1320-1369; Chr. Mohrmann, Linguistic Problems in the Early Church, in Études sur le latin des chrétiens, I, Rome 1958, 103-111; Id., Wortform und Wortinhalt. Bemerkungen zum Bedeutungswandel im altchristlichen Griechisch und Latein: MTZ 7 (1956) 99-115 (repr. in Études sur le latin des chrétiens, II, Rome 1961, 11-34); Id., Linguistic Problems in the Early Christian Church: VChr 11 (1957) 11-36 (repr. in Études sur le latin des chrétiens, III, Rome 1965, 171-196); Id., L'étude du grec et du latin de l'antiquité chrétienne. Passé, présent, avenir, in Études sur le latin des chrétiens, IV, Rome 1977, 91-110; H.B. Timothy, The Early Christian Apologists and Greek Philosophy Exemplified by Irenaeus, Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria, Assen 1973; G.A. Kennedy, Greek Rhetoric under Christian Emperors, Princeton, NJ 1983; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'Impero Romano, Milan 1984; Id., Alessandro Magno tra storia e mito, Milan 1984; P. Wendland, La cultura ellenistico-romana nei suoi rapporti con giudaismo e cristianesimo, Brescia 1986; A. Barzanò, I cristiani nell'Impero Romano precostantiniano, Milan 1990; M. Zerwick - M. Grosvenor, Grammatical Analysis of the Greek New Testament (A), Rome 1996; W. Jaeger, Cristianesimo primitivo e paideia greca, Florence 1997; P. Grelot Pierre, Regole e tradizioni del cristianesimo primitivo, Casale Monf. 1998; E.W. Stegemann - W. Stegemann, Storia sociale del cristianesimo primitivo. Gli inizi nel giudaismo e le comunità cristiane nel mondo mediterraneo, Bologna 1998; J. Swetnam James, Il greco del Nuovo Testamento, Bologna 1998; M. Lombardi, Aspetti innovativi della diegesi nel vangelo di Luca: Orpheus 23 (2002) 50-73 (cf. 19-20 [1998–1999] 326-362).

V. Loi - B. Amata

GREGENTIUS (4th c.). Bishop of Tapfar (or Zafar) in the country of the Himyarites (S *Arabia), he is a saint celebrated by the Byzantine church on 19 December. There is uncertainty about his life and works. He was born perhaps at Bliarès (ancient Ulpiana in *Moesia?), as stated in his Life (BHG 705d) published by A. Vasiliev (viz. Vremennik 14 [1907] 23-67) or, less probably, in *Milan, as stated in the Greek Menaion. Perhaps a bishop in *Ethiopia, he later worked in S Arabia about the year 535, at the time of *Justinian, when the *persecution of Christians had ceased, and the *Ethiopians dominated the region, contributing to the conversion of Arab Jews and participating in some religious controversies. A testimony to his activities are two works of historical and cultural interest attributed to him, almost certainly erroneously, which are probably collections of news gathered from different works: Leges Homeritarum (BHG 706 h, 706 i), legislation drafted under the name of King Abraham, and Disputatio cum Herbano Iudaeo (BHG 706-706 a,b), a public debate, held before the king and various authorities, including religious ones, and transcribed by Palladius, a disciple of Gregentius. In reality, this Disputatio (the MS tradition has yet to be studied in depth) is a passage from the Life of Gregentius.

CPG 7008-7009; PG 86, 567-784; R. Dareste, Lois des Homérites: Revue Historique 29 (1905) 157-170 (Fr. tr.); A. d'Emilia, Intorno ai Νόμοι τῶν Ὁμερητῶν, in Atti Congr. Int. Dir. Rom., 1, Verona 1953, 181-182; Krumbacher 59; E. Mangenot, Gregentius: DTC 6, 1775-1776; DHGE 21, 1385-6; ODB 2, 874; Beck 386, 407; R. Janin, Gregenzio: BS 7, 167-168; H. Hunger, Die hochsprachliche profane Literatur der Byzantiner, II, Munich 1978, 428; Patrologia V, 306-7; D.G. Letsios, Some Remarks on Reflections of Byzantine Foreign Policy in the "Martyrdom" of Arethas and the "Acts" of Gregentius: Graeco-Arabica 4 (1991) 141-155; Id., Die äthiopisch-himyaritischen Kriege des 6. Jahrhunderts und die Christianisierung Äthiopiens: JÖBG 41 (1991) 25-41; D.M. Olster, Roman Defeat, Christian Response, and the Literary Construction of the Jew, Philadelphia 1994, 138-157; A. Berger, Das Dossier des heiligen Gregentios, ein Werk der Makedonenzeit: Byzantina 22 (2001) 53-65; BBKL 42, 460-461.

A. Labate

GREGORY, presbyter (of Caesarea/of Cappadocia?). Name of two persons often confused: (a) (6th-7th c.?) author of a life of *Gregory of Nazianzus (BHG 723-723c; PG 35, 244-305); (b) (or also George or Germanus, 7th-9th c.?) author of an encomium of the Fathers of *Nicaea (BHG 1431; PG 111, 420-440). Other works are found sporadically in the Greek MSS under this name (see CPG 4662).

CPG 7975; Beck 459, 545-546; S.J. Voicu, Rifacimenti pseudocrisostomici di omelie basiliane: Augustinianum 16 (1976) 503.

S.J. Voicu

GREGORY II, pope (d. 731). Native of *Rome, a member of the Savelli family, he succeeded *Constantine I (708–715) and was consecrated 19 March 715. He first entered the Benedictine order, handling responsible tasks for the Apostolic See and acquiring experience and competence in ecclesiastical affairs. In this role in 710 he followed, as deacon, his predecessor to *Constantinople, meeting *Justinian II and earning his esteem. Gregory launched notable measures in matrimonial law, ecclesiastical discipline and *liturgy, confirming the absolute validity of the *sacraments and denying the necessity of repeating *baptism administered by unworthy priests, toward whom the pope recommended a merciful approach and an effort to regain them. On the external front, Gregory promoted the *evangelization of *Germany beyond the Roman limes, relying on the collaboration of Wynfrith, who, after rebaptism as *Boniface and having become bishop of Thuringia, founded monasteries in Bavaria and eliminated the *pagan persistences. The pope's position was clear and decisive when faced with the iconoclasm of *Leo III the Isaurian, esp. after the resignation and death of the patriarch of Constantinople, *Germanus, replaced by the iconoclast Athanasius. Gregory defended the *orthodox doctrine, distinguishing between the adoration and veneration: a thesis that the Council of *Nicaea II (787) would confirm. Pope Gregory also had the merit of stopping, with the help of the Dukes of Spoleto and of Benevento, the advances of the Lombard King Liutprand, obtaining for this the gift of the castles in Sutri and Bieda, the first nucleus of the temporal power of the popes. Having thus obtained full control of Rome, Gregory restored the monuments that were destroyed by the *Longobards and revived the monastery of Montecassino. He died 10 February 731. From him remain 15 of his letters (to Leo III on the veneration images, to Boniface and to other personages), a decree treating discipline and 17 *anathematas declared by the synod of 721 against illegitimate marriages.

PL 89, 495-534; MGH, Ep. III, 93, 266-270; 273-277; 699-702 (The attribution to Gregory II or to Gregory III of the two letters on p. 702 is doubtful); LP I, 396-414; Jaffé I, 249-257; DTC 6, 1781-1785; DHGE 21, 1420-1421; W. Kelley, Pope Gregory II on Divorce and Remarriage, Rome 1976; T.F.X. Noble, The Republic of St. Peter. The Birth of the Papal State, Philadelphia 1984; D.S. Sefton, The Popes and the Holy Images in the Eighth Century: Studies in Med. Culture 23 (1987) 117-130; H. Michels, Zur Echtheit der Briefe Papst Gregors an Kaiser Leon III: ZKG 99 (1988) 367-1991 (against authenticity); LTK[3] 4, 1013-1014 (A. Angenendt); G. Dagron, Empereur et prêtre. Étude sur le "cesaropapisme" byzantin, Paris 1996, 169-197; EPapi I, 647-651 (P. Delogu).

M. Spinelli

GREGORY III, pope (d. 741). By origin a Syrian, he succeeded *Gregory II (715–731) and was consecrated 18 March 731. He was the last pope to receive the backing of the exarch of *Ravenna. Very cultivated, a good orator, knowledgeable in Greek and in the Scriptures, Gregory followed in the footsteps of his predecessor, continuing the fight against iconoclasm, consolidating papal authority and completing the *evangelization of *Germany. For this last work he enjoyed, as did his predecessor, the collaboration of *Boniface, granting him the archbishop's pallium, making Germany a regular ecclesiastical province with more dioceses and finishing the reform of the churches of Bavaria, Hesse and Thuringia. Against his will, the relationships with *Byzantium were stormy. The pope, by means of a legate, sent a letter to *Leo III the Isaurian wherein he invited him to abandon iconoclasm; the emperor not only rejected the request, but he arrested and exiled the papal representative. Gregory therefore convoked a council in 732 to approve the cult of images. The Isaurian reacted by sending a military fleet in 734 against Rome (which was overwhelmed by storm) and confiscating the ecclesiastical properties in the S of Italy. On the Italian front, the now normal exigency of self-defense against the *Longobards made Gregory the first pope to enter into contact with the *Franks: Faced with the threat of new attacks from Liutprand's side, who reproached Gregory for having offered hospitality to the rebel dukes of Spoleto and Benevento, the pope sought the aid of Charles Martel, duke of the Franks. Though he did not obtain from the Lombard king the restitution to Gregory of the invaded territories, Charles Martel was able to keep him far from Rome. From a liturgical-disciplinary point of view, Gregory perfected the legislation on matrimony and drew up other significant norms for the life of the church, showing himself a clear and firm custodian of orthodoxy. He died 27 November 741. His letters to Leo III, Charles Martel and Boniface remain. There is the dubious attribution to Gregory of the Excerptum ex Patrum dictis et canonum sententiis, a manual for confessors.

PL 89, 575-588; MGH, Ep. III, 278-280; 290-294; 476-479; 703-709 (the two letters on p. 702 are perhaps from Gregory II); LP I, 415-425; Jaffé I, 257-262; DTC 6, 1785-1790; DHG 21, 1421-1422; C. Capizzi, Decisioni conciliari e impegno storiografico: Critica Storica 18 (1981) 48-73; F. Kerff, Das Paenitentiale Pseudo-Gregorii III: ZRG Kanon. Abt 69 (1983) 46-63; P. Llewellyn, The Popes and the Constitution in the Eighth Century: EHR 101 (1986) 42-67; M. De Jong, Wat bedoelde paus Gregorius III, in Convivium aangeboden aan prof. J. M. van Winter, Verloren 1988, 177-200; E. Dekkers, Benedictiones quas faciunt Galli. Qu'a voulu demander saint Boniface: Lateinische Kultur im VIII Jahrhundert – Traube Gedenkschrift, St. Ottilien 1989, 41-46; F. Marazzi, Il conflitto fra Leone III Isaurico e il papato e il "definitivo" inizio del Medioevo a Roma. Un'ipotesi in discussione: Papers of the British Schoool at Rome 59 (1991) 231-257; Id. Roma, il Lazio, il Mediterraneo. Relazioni fra economia e politica dal VII al IX secolo, in La storia economica di Roma nell'Alto Medioevo alla luce dei recenti scavi archeologici (L. Paroli - P. Delogu), Florence 1993, 267-285; LTK³ 4, 1014 (A. Angenendt); EPapi I, 651-656 (P. Delogu).

M. Spinelli

GREGORY of Agrigentum (7th c.–early 8th c.). A certain Leontius, priest-monk (hegumen*) of the monastery of St. *Sabas of Rome, who claims to have gathered information from his monastery, wrote the not very trustworthy biography, with numerous anachronisms, of Bishop Gregory of Agrigentum (BHG³ I, n. 707f.: PG 98, 549-716, now edited by Berger, who places it between 750 and 830) and without chronological coordinates. Gregory was born of a rich family in the area neighboring Agrigentum; he must have had an education, and after having spent some years in the East and having visited Rome, by papal nomination he became bishop of Agrigentum. Accused, he was constrained to come to Rome to defend himself and was found innocent. Gregory has left some writings as well, among which are biblical *commentaries. From another source we know of a Gregory of Agrigentum who was forced to come to Rome, during the time of Gregory the Great, in 591 (Gregory, Ep. 1,70; 3,27), and after two years was declared innocent. We tend to distinguish the two Gregorys; the exegete would have been the one who lived later. His feast day falls on 23 November.

There is an Explanatio super Ecclesiasten by Gregory (PG 98, 741-1181, crit. ed. by G.H. Ettlinger, in preparation, in CCG) that reveals the vast cultural formation of the author, both classical and Christian, for he knew the great Greek Fathers (*Basil, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa, *John Chrysostom), and he manifests a noted interest in philosophical and theological problems, with particular regard to the problem of *free will. The prologue indicates his method of historical and spiritual interpretation, even if in practice the literal interpretation is most prevalent. Actually, Gregory does not adopt any fixed exegetical schema in a constant and systematic manner, not even the bipartite type that was theoretically enunciated in the prologue, but he lets himself be guided by the tenor of the biblical text. Regarding the comprehensive interpretation of Ecclesiastes, Gregory, at the beginning of the *commentary, gathers from the previous exegetical tradition and makes his own the christological interpretation, which sees in Solomon the type of Christ who speaks mystically to the church (PG 98, 745-746, with derivation from Gregory of Nyssa regarding the allegorical significance of the name ekklesiastes).

This typology is not, however, exploited throughout the rest of the commentary, in which, as it was said, the literal interpretation predominates. Gregory, in contrast with his predecessors, does not seem to have been excessively disturbed or preoccupied by the "Epicurean" content of Ecclesiastes. A more attentive and appropriate consideration of the literal sense allows him to attenuate the range of the so-called Epicurean passages and to interpret them as an acceptable invitation to the moderate use of earthly goods, acc. to the divine plan and the necessities of nature (PG 98, 833, 873, 1072-1076, etc.). Otherwise he shows himself to be independent in comparison with previous expositors.

CPG 7950; PG 98, 741-1181; BS 7 (1966) 169-173; DHGE 21 (1986) 1464-1467 (extensive bibl.); ODB 2 (1991) 879-880; LTK³ 4, 997; I. Croce, Per la cronologia della vita di S. Gregorio Agrigentino: Bollettino della badia Greca di Grottaferrata, n.s. 4 (1950) 189-207; 5 (1951) 77-91; S. Gennaro, Influssi di scrittori greci nel Comm. all'Eccl. di Gregorio di Agrigento: Misc. di Studi di Lett. crist. ant., III, Catania 1951, 162-184; G. Stramondo, Gregorio di Agrigento, Catania 1952; E. Merendino, Gli inediti nella tradizione agiografica di S. Gregorio di Agrigento: OCP 45 (1979) 359-372; S. Leanza, L'Ecclesiaste nell'interpretazione dell'antico cristianesimo, Messina 1978; Id., L'atteggiamento della più antica esegesi cristiana dinanzi all'epicureismo ed edonismo di Qohelet: Orpheus n.s. 3 (1982) 73-90; Q. Cataudella, La cultura bizantina in Sicilia, in Storia della Sicilia, IV, Naples 1980, 1-56; G.H. Ettlinger, The Form and Method of the Commentary on Ecclesiastes by Gregory of Agrigentum: SP 8 (1985) 317-320; S. Leanza, Sul Commentario all'Ecclesiaste di Gregorio di Agrigento, in Il cristianesimo in Sicilia dalle origini a Gregorio Magno, ed. V. Messana and S. Pricoco, Caltanissetta 1988, 191-220; D. De Gregorio, Gli insegnamenti teologici di S. Gregorio di Agrigento nel suo "Commento all'Ecclesiaste," Rome 1989; Leontios Presbyteros von Rom, Das Leben des heiligen Gregorios von Agrigent, Kritische Ausgabe, Übersetzung und Kommentar von A. Berger, Berlin 1994; BS 7, 169-173; Leonzio, Vita di S. Gregorio Agrigentino, intr., tr. and notes by D. De Gregorio, Agrigento 2000.

S. Leanza - A. Di Berardino

GREGORY of Antioch (d. 593/594). According to the historian *Evagrius Scholasticus, Gregory began his monastic career in the Byzantine monastery founded by *Abraham of Ephesus at *Jerusalem, of which he became abbot. The emperor *Justinian II (565–578) transferred Gregory to the *Sinai, where it seems he retained the position of abbot; here he opposed an attack on his monastery by some Arabs. According to *John Moschus, Gregory was also abbot for some time in the monastery of Pharan in *Palestine. In 569–570 he became patriarch of *Antioch, again by order of the emperor, who had deposed the former patriarch *Anastasius. Gregory was an influential figure in the ecclesiastical and political questions of his time. He opposed also the comes Orientis, for which he had to undergo vituperation and public interrogation. Before 588 he was asked to come to Constantinople in order to appear before a synod regarding various accusations, probably invented, and he was judged innocent. It is most likely that ecclesiastical successions were at the basis of such accusations. His intervention was requested during the mutiny of Roman troops then involved against the Persians; thereafter the emperor Mauritius asked him to open negotiations with them. Again, after a little while, by invitation of the same emperor, Gregory went to Martyropolis (Maipherqat) to persuade the Roman troops to continue their siege of the city. When the Persian King *Chosroes II sought refuge in his own dominion, Gregory and Domitian, metropolitan of Meliten, were sent to meet him and his guard in a border town. When Chosroes returned to *Persia and was restored to the throne, he sent Gregory a cross that he had carried away as booty from Sergiopolis. The patriarch of Antioch sent this cross and another which the king of Persia had sent to him to the sanctuary at Sergius, then he completed a tour of the countries along the frontier to bring back the *monophysites to the Chalcedonian faith. He died in 593–594 due to a medicine he took to calm the pains from gout. The previous patriarch, Anastasius, succeeded him.

In the 20th c. Gregory was recognized also as a homilist thanks to the studies that restored to him *homilies that hitherto had gone by another author's name. To judge by the five homilies that can now be attributed to him, the patriarch was a gifted orator, and for this reason they were translated into various Eastern languages. Three of the homilies, CPG 7385-7387, were preached in succession. The so-called Oratio ad exercitum, CPG 7388, seems, most probably, to be the work of *Evagrius Scholasticus, and the supposed homily on the "Protomartyr *Stephen," CPG 7389, which remains only in a *Georgian translation, seems more likely to be a letter.

CPG 7384-7390; PG 88, 1848-1866; PG 10, 1177-1189; PG 61, 761-764; PG 88, 1872-1884. L'Oratio ad exercitum is in Evagrius, Historia ecclesiastica, ed. J. Bidez - L. Parmentier; Evagrius. The Ecclesiastical History, London 1898, repr. Amsterdam 1964, 229-231; for the supposed homily on the "Protomartyr Stephen," see N. Marr, Le synaxaire géorgien. Rédaction ancienne de l'Union arméno-géorgienne: PdO 19 (1926) 689-699, and for the panegyric of St. Stephen, see ibid., 699-715. S. Haidacher, Zu den Homilien des Gregorius von Antiochia und des Gregorius Thaumaturgus: ZKTh 25 (1901) 367-369; P. Goubert, Patriarches d'Antioche et d'Alexandrie contemporains à S. Grégoire le Grand: REB 25 (1967) 65-76; M. Aubineau, Une homélie de Grégoire d'Antioche (570–593), retrouvée dans le Vaticanus gr. 1975: Byzantion 42 (1972) 595-597; P. Allen, Evagrius Scholasticus the Church Historian (Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense 41), Leuven 1981, 217-218, 250, 263; A. Battikha, DPAC 1, 1695-1696; P. Allen, The Sixth-Century Greek Homily. Problems and Approaches, in M.B. Cunningham - P. Allen, The Homilist and the Audience. Studies in Christian and Early Byzantine Homiletics, Leiden 1998.

P. ALLEN

GREGORY of Cyprus. Born at Nastir in the 1st half of the 7th c., Gregory was a merchant until his conversion. He became a monk in Bet Huzaye (Susania or Khuzistan, in the S of present-day Iran), lived for a certain time in *Cyprus and then went to live in a monastery on Mount Izla, founded by *Abraham of Kashkar to the N of *Nisibis. He wrote three letters and seven treatises on the monastic life, of which only a treatise On Holy Contemplation has been published.

BO I, 170-174; DSp 5, 920-922; I. Hausherr, Gregorii monachi Cyprii de theoria sancta (OCA 110), Rome 1937. The vita is in A. Scher, Histoire Nestorienne I/2 (PO 5), Paris 1909, 273-275. P. Bedjan, Liber Superiorum seu historia monastica auctore Thoma, episcopo Margensi, Paris-Leipzig 1901, 445; A. Mingana, A New Document on Christian Monasticism: Expositor 9 (1925) 365-378; I. Hausherr, Origines de la mystique syrienne: OCP 4 (1938) 497-520.

K. DEN BIESEN

GREGORY of Elvira (d. ca. 400). Around 359 he was elected bishop of Iliberis (Spanish Baetica). A fervent anti-*Arian, he did not sign the pro-Arian formula of faith at the Council of *Rimini (Jerome, Chron. s.a. 370). Around 380–385 he was head of the *Luciferians in the West. He was very old by 392 (Jerome, Vir. Ill. 105). He may have been alive still at the beginning of the 5th c. Until the beginning of the 19th c. the only knowledge of his literary activity was through *Jerome, acc. to whom he had composed some *homilies, mediocri sermone et de fide elegantem librum. Important studies by G. Morin and A. Wilmart, supplemented by MS discoveries, above all those of A.C. Vega, have established with certainty that the De fide and various writings of a homiletic character are Gregory's.

The Tractatus de libris sanctarum scripturarum, published in 1900 under the name of Origen (Tractatus Origenis) and subsequently attributed to Gregory, is a collection of 20 homilies on scriptural subjects: 19 are dedicated to a treatment of the OT, the last treats the *Holy Spirit based on Acts 1–2. Tract. 3 seems to depend on the Rufinian translation of Hom. Gen. 7,2-3, published around 403, which could imply that Gregory was still alive at that time. The Tractatus de arca Noe, also passed down under Origen's name, interprets the ark allegorically as a typos of the church and *Noah as a figure of Christ. The Tractatus in Cantica Canticorum presents in 5 books an interpretation of the *Song of Songs up to 3:4, understanding—acc. to the traditional *exegesis—the bridegroom as a figure of Christ and the bride as a figure of the church. There are also, of more restricted dimensions and still characterized by typological exegesis, the Fragmenta tractatus in Gen. 3,22 et 15,9-11, the Expositio de psalmo XCI, to which we may add with certainty some long fragments De Salomone, with an allegorical interpretation of Pr 30:19 and two short Fragmenta expositionis in Ecclesiasten (3:2 and 3:6).

Gregory's exegetical activity was aimed above all at the explanation of the OT, which was little known in the West by the mass of the faithful. Via a typological interpretation of a traditional character, he interpreted the facts and figures of the OT as a prefiguration of the facts and figures of the NT. In this line he distinguishes the triplicem significantiam (Tract. script. 5,1), i.e., the literal, typological and prophetical sense, and he combines influences of Asiatic origin with others of an Alexandrian character.

His De fide is an anti-Arian work. Gregory wrote a first anonymous version in 360 to refute the formula of faith of Rimini, and some years later, after *Constantius the pro-Arian emperor had died, he published a second redaction in his own name, in which he responded to some critiques by *Catholics who had accused him of *Sabellianism. He modified certain details of the previous text. Both versions have come down to us, the first was ascribed to *Ambrose, the second to *Gregory of Nazianzus. Here Gregory uses *Tertullian, *Novation, *Hilary and Phoebadius for a defense of the Nicene homoousios, which shows some archaic flavor in the first edition and is corrected in the second version.

Of dubious attribution, besides the De diversis generibus leprarum, an allegorical interpretation of passages from Leviticus on leprosy, is a profession of faith known as libellus fidei, fides catholica, fides Romanorum: compared to the De fide, the theology of the Holy Spirit is more deeply explored and the anti-*Docetist Christology is influenced by the *Priscillianist controversy. If this text is by Gregory, it must be dated some years after the De fide, not before 380.

CPL 546-577; PLS 1, 352-527 (cf. 1743-1746); CCL 69, 1-283; ES 55-56; Patrologia III, 79-83 (bibl.); M. Simonetti, Gregorio di Elvira. La fede, Turin 1975; J. Aldazábal, Influencia de Gregorio de Elvira y de Justo de Urgel en el Liber psalmographus hispánico: Fons vivus, Zürich 1971, 143-161; BBKL II, 330-331; J.A. Molina Gómez, La exégesis como instrumento de creación cultural. El testimonio de las obras de Gregorio de Elvira, Universidad de Murcia, 2000.

M. SIMONETTI

GREGORY of Nazianzus (ca. 330–390)
I. Life - II. Works - III. Doctrine - IV. Influence.

I. Life. Doctor of the church (feast 2 January). His father, *Gregory the Elder, was bishop of Nazianzus (SW *Cappadocia) from ca. 325, after having been for a long time a *Hypsistarian, or, a follower of the Judaizing syncretism, "worshiper of the Most High" (PG 35, 992A and 45, 484A). His mother was the pious *Nonna, his siblings were Caesarius and *Gorgonia, by whom he had for nephews *Amphilochius, bishop of *Iconium, and Nicobulus. He was a close friend of *Basil the Great and *Gregory of Nyssa. After brilliant literary studies at Cappadocian *Caesarea, Palestinian *Caesarea, *Alexandria and *Athens, he received *baptism around 358 and made the decision to live the monastic "philosophy," but without deciding—as he had promised—to leave his family to join Basil, except for briefs stays, during which the two friends saw to their theological formation by studying the writings of Origen (redaction of the Philocalia). Around Christmas 361 he was ordained a priest by his father; in 372 Basil forced him, for the needs of his own religious policies, to accept the episcopate at the postal station of Sàsima, but he refused to go to his see. In 374, on his father's death, he briefly ruled the church of Nazianzus, but soon he retired to Seleucia in Isauria.

When *Valens died (378), the Nicenes regained their hope of prevailing. The see of the capital had been since 351 in the hands of the *Arians. To regroup the small orthodox community influenced by Basil, despite the latter's death, they turned to Gregory, who settled in the house of a relative (chapel of the Anastasis). Gregory's human and religious gifts and the 22 memorable discourses from these years assured him an outstanding prestige immediately, but not without opposition from right and left. *Hagiography, too trusting in Gregory's own testimony and in the fame that he later obtained, usually closes its eyes to the objections raised by his policies—though prudent—as well as his *trinitarian doctrine. The support of the court and of *Meletius of Antioch, who in 381 prevailed on the emperor to call a council at Constantinople (which would later be numbered as the second ecumenical), only aroused against Gregory the reservations of Rome, Alexandria, the Arians and the *pneumatomachoi. At the unforeseen death of Meletius, Gregory was elected president of the council, but found himself at odds with the proposed creed, which he felt would only "cloud with bitter currents the sweet spring" of Nicaea (De Vita sua, 1707-1708; A.M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel, Göttingen 1965, 253-270). He wanted a much clearer proclamation of the divinity and consubstantiality of the *Holy Spirit. On the other hand, he would have liked to satisfy the wishes of the Westerns for the succession to Meletius, but he succeeded only in discontenting both parties, and Rome refused to acknowledge his transference to the capital see. With profound bitterness Gregory was not slow to hand in his resignation to the emperor; after two years at Nazianzus, he had his cousin Eulalius elected bishop there (383), and he finally retired definitively to his estate of Arianzus.

His great sensitivity made him see facts and doctrines in such a personal way that his writings are made relatively easy to date and they constitute a sincere, if not impartial, documentation of his faith and of the evolution of his feelings. A characteristic trait of his temperament was flight in front of responsibility: entering a monastic community, the priesthood, the episcopacy, ecclesiastical struggles, the direction of the council were all occasions when his first and last impulse was withdrawal and in which letters, orations and poems express his irresolution and his effort to take up the role imposed upon him.

II. Works. A. Discourses (CPG 3010; PG 35 and 36). Tillemont and the Maurists classify chronologically the 44 discourses (plus no. 35, spurious), which go from his episcopal consecration (372) to his retirement (383). Some touchups to this order are necessary or possible. A complete edition—with opportune comments and introductions by SC—is underway. They were written in a quite refined style; some have been retouched for publication, which was therefore planned by the author. Many are jewels of patristics, valued highly since the 5th c.; Rufinus translated into Latin, after 400, nos. 2, 6, 16, 17, 26, 27, 38-40, with great praises: these are also of high priority for readers today. We cite in particular Discourse 2, Apologia (or On the Priesthood), from 362, which inspired *John Chrysostom (De sacerdotio); 41, *On Pentecost (379); 32 and 33 (summer 379), On the Holy Spirit and On the Trinity; 27-31 or Theological Discourses (summer 380), a coherent set on the spiritual conditions for knowledge of *God and the Trinity, which more than anything else earned Gregory the title of Theologian, to be taken in a literary and mystical sense, not at all professorial; 36 (On Himself) and 42 (Final Farewell) (sometime after 27 November 380 and before the summer of 381), rereadings of history from an apologetic point of view. We note also Discourse 21, Panegyric of Athanasius (379), intended not only to defend the Nicene cause, but also to reconcile the Athanasian party; and Discourse 43, the Funeral Elegy of Basil (1 January 382), an homage to his teacher and friend, as well as a reaction against the Basilian theological tendency that had prevailed at the Council of Constantinople. Several other discourses regard personal and familial circumstances; few are of an exegetical character. Gregory prefers to refer to Scripture by citing only a few words together rather than forcing himself to follow line-by-line. He was inspired more willingly by a solemnity, a dogmatic discussion or by his own religious experiences.

B. Letters (CPG 3032; PG 37, 21-388; ed. P. Gallay, Gregor von Nazianz. Briefe: GCS 53, Berlin 1969; Id., S. Grégoire de Nazianze. Lettres I-II, Paris 1964–1967). There are 249 letters ascribed to Gregory, but a certain number of them are not his. They span from the year 359 to his last years at Arianzus (a period for which it is difficult to fix precise dates). It is often a continuing correspondence: twelve correspondents receive 2 letters, eight 3, four 4 (we include here Nectarius of Constantinople, without admitting the authenticity of Letter 88), five 5, two 6, one 7; besides his faithful friends: 8 are directed to Gregory of Nyssa and to the rhetorician *Eudoxius; 9 to Amphilochius of Iconium; 10 to Philagrius; 13 to *Olympius, prefect of Cappadocia II (we observe also that 5 are addressed to his assessor Asterius) and another 13 to the metropolitan of the same province, *Theodore of Tyana; finally there are 20 to Basil, not a surprising number even though direct contacts were frequent and though Basil was dead by 379. These letters are in general brief and pointed, of an even more refined elegance than that of the discourses. The MSS contain three Theological Letters (101, 102, 202), regarding *Apollinarianism, published by P. Gallay (SC 208, Paris 1974). To the letters we add the Testament (CPG 3033; PG 37, 389-396).

C. Poetry (CPG 3034-3039; PG 37, 397-1600; 38, 11-130). The poetic works of Gregory develop in the same stylistic line, though even more artificial. They are divided into the Carmina dogmatica (1-38), moralia (1-40) and historica (De seipso 1-99; quae ad alios spectant 1-8); Epitaphia (1-129) and Epigrammata (1-94). Two alphabetical poems of hortatory character, whose authenticity is probable, are missing in the PG, which, on the other hand, includes compositions of a later date. The whole adds up to 17,000 verses, many of which are void of inspiration; someone has irreverently compared this literary exercise, which is dated in particular during Gregory's retirement to Arianzus, to crossword puzzles done to kill time. Yet the ambition to engraft Christianity into the conventional Greek culture is not without interest and can lead the author to express his personality and his sentiments in an original and almost modern form (M. Pellegrino, La poesia di s. Gregorio di Nazianzo, Milan 1932). A critical edition of the poetry is in preparation, edited by M. Sicherl and J.T. Cummings. More important poems include H.M. Werhahn, Gregorii Nazianzeni: Synkrisis Biôn, Wiesbaden 1953; C. Jungck, Gregor von Nazianz: De vita sua, Heidelberg 1974; A. Knecht, Gregor von Nazianz: Gegen die Putzsucht der Frauen, Heidelberg 1972. Among the nonauthentic poems are A. Tuilier, Grégoire de Nazianze. La passion du Christ: SC 149, Paris 1969.

III. Doctrine. Neither the eulogies of Athanasius or Basil, nor the critiques of *Julian the Apostate, the Arians, the Apollinarians or the Council of Constantinople can be taken for objective information. Not even Gregory's *exegesis, as penetrating as it may be, is much preoccupied by adhering to the biblical data. The work of the Holy Spirit unfolds gradually: "The OT manifestly proclaimed the Father, more obscurely the Son. The NT manifested the Son and gave a glimpse of the divinity of the Spirit. Now the Spirit has the right of citizenship among us and concedes to us a clearer vision of himself" (Disc. 31,26). "The Savior loaded his disciples with a multitude of teachings, but there were some which they could not immediately comprehend" (ibid. 27). Here Gregory consciously proclaims the Holy Spirit God and consubstantial, just like the Son. By the fact that he allows himself to be guided by expository coherence, he has the gift of balanced and clear formulae, more than the solicitude to gather the apostolic or traditional thought or to express the requirements of ecclesiastical experience. He loves to synthesize, to trace a via media between two excesses, which he fixes not as theorist, but as an attentive observer of discordant opinions. One word satisfied him: procession. Basil confessed that he was unable to define the difference between the generation of the Son and the Holy Spirit's mode of existence. Gregory proposed the term procession (ekporeusis) (Disc. 31,8), which is little more than a word, but it rendered great services. Gregory then, in a certain sense, goes beyond Basil, whose prudence he deplored, without understanding his truly theological motives. Nevertheless, it was the Basilian doctrine—a little attenuated by the understanding of Athanasius, for fear of *tritheism—that informed his own trinitarian conception. Against *Apollinaris, he pushed ahead in Christology and would be perhaps the principal source of *Neochalcedonian orthodoxy, though perhaps he was partially responsible for the grave difficulties that rendered it necessary; he is often cited even by *monophysite polemicists. As for his admirable conception of the mystery of God, accessible to the intellect purified by grace, this is certainly an Origenian inheritance shared with Basil. Gregory, greatly gifted for contemplation, enriched it by a prolonged contact with the Platonic and *Neoplatonic ideal.

IV. Influence. Gregory's Cappadocian friends Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Amphilochius and his disciple *Evagrius of Pontus owed him much. *Jerome, who met him upon the occasion of the Council of Constantinople, was struck by his sane Origenism. His theological formulae rather quickly gained attention and respect. His works had a vast dissemination and—an exceptional occurrence—were the object of innumerable *scholia, esp. on account of their cultural (mythological) allusions, which interested the Byzantines. On these scholia, see CPG 3011-3031, 3042-3051; F. Lefherz, Studien zu Gregor von Nazianz, Bonn 1958.

CPG 3010-3125; PG 35-38. Recent editions, e.g., in SC, offer a good bibl. DSp 6, 932-971; P. Gallay, Grégoire de Nazianze, Paris 1959; J.M. Szymusiak, Eléments de théologie de l'homme selon S. Grégoire de Nazianze, Rome 1963; J. Mossay, Perspectives eschatologiques de S. Grégoire de Nazianze: QLP 1964, 329-339; Id., La mort et l'au-delà dans S. Grégoire de Nazianze, Louvain 1966; T. Špidlík, Grégoire de Nazianze, Rome 1971; H. Althaus, Die Heilslehre des hl. Gregor von Nazianz, Münster 1972; F. Trisoglio, S. Gregorio di Nazianzo in un quarantennio di studi (1925–1965), Turin 1974; M. Kertsch, Bildersprache bei Gregor von Nazianz, Graz 1978; CPG/S 3010-3128; B. Wyß, Gregor von Nazianz: RAC 12, Stuttgart 1983, 793-863; J. Mossay, Gregor von Nazianz: TRE 14, 164-173; C. Moreschini, Filosofia e letteratura in Gregorio di Nazianzo, Milan 1997; Gregorio di Nazianzo, Tutte le Orazioni, ed. C. Moreschini, Milan 2000; J. McGuckin, Saint Gregory of Nazianzus. An Intellectual Biography, Crestwood, NY 2001; Gregory of Nazianzus. Images and Reflections, ed. J. Bortnes - T. Hägg, Copenhagen 2006; C. Moreschini, Introduzione a Gregorio di Nazianzo, Brescia 2006.

J. Gribomont

GREGORY of Nyssa (ca. 335/340–ca. 395)
I. Life and Works - II. Dissemination of writings: Editions - III. Doctrine.

I. Life and Works. Last of the great Cappadocians, brother of *Basil of Caesarea, but much younger, born between 335 and 340, bishop of Nyssa in 372, he died after 394. The chronology of his works is often subject to conjecture. As far as is known, he was not educated in any of the great intellectual centers. He presents himself as having been taught by Basil (Ep. 13,4) and by his sister *Macrina (Basil connected his religious formation with Macrina the Elder, Gregory's grandmother). His reading was vast: Greek literature, *Platonism (he read the Phaedo, the Phaedrus and the Republic of Plato, but also the manuals of *Middle Platonism derived from *Posidonius, from whom he learned Cicero; and, acc. to Daniélou, *Plotinus for mysticism, *Porphyry for logic and ontology, *Iamblichus for cosmology), *Stoicism and the Hellenistic sciences. He was often inspired by the ecclesiastical writers who preceded him, esp. *Origen, and by *Philo. He often developed the theses of Basil, but also of *Macarius. At the origin of all his works one can recognize a model that inspired him. Throughout his life he cultivated this bookish culture; he was not afraid to use his sources abundantly, without ever being servile. An elevated rhetorical formation can be recognized throughout.

When, around 355, Gregory's family turned to *asceticism, he found their devotion somewhat exaggerated at times (PG 46, 785A). He accepted ordination as a lector—and therefore *baptism—around 360. But he did not manifest the intention to follow the evangelical life as did his brother (Basil, Ep. 14,1), and *Gregory of Nazianzus reproves him for having rejected the sacred books and preferred, in his "drunkenness," the title of orator to that of Christian. He married (365?), and this led him later on to use particularly bitter terms with regard to the conjugal life.

Basil, having become bishop of *Caesarea in 370, called together all his collaborators, and his brother was promoted to the episcopal See of Nyssa, an unimportant village. He showed no administrative talent, and Basil refused to consider him, among others, for an important negotiation in Rome. From that time on, he demonstrated, more so than his brother, kindness toward the "old Nicenes," esp. for *Marcellus of Ancyra, whom Basil accused of *Sabellianism, despite the protection which the latter had found in *Athanasius and in *Rome. In 376 the *Arian opposition deposed Gregory under the pretext of economic misappropriations, so that he was forced to remain in exile until 378. When, in the same year, the emperor *Valens fell under the blows of the *Goths and *Theodosius I showed himself favorable to the Nicene party, Gregory found himself heir to Basil, who died on 1 January 379. The following were years of intense activity.

We know of only one work written by Gregory during the lifetime of Basil, the treatise On Virginity. It is a *panegyric of the ascetical activity of his brother, in some chapters inspired by the experience of his communities, but it focused on a philosophy of purity and of the impassibility of the incorporeal nature. To judge from the different perspectives of the two brothers—in *dogmatic theology, in *exegesis, in *philosophy—and from certain anti-Origenist positions of the mature Basil (in the *Hexameron), the impression is given that Basil was fairly harsh toward his younger brother, and that his presence did not favor the free expression of Gregory's thought.

On the other hand, from 379, Gregory took an active part in the ecclesiastical reorganization at the Council of *Antioch, where he perhaps compromised in favor of the Marcellians. The trinitarian treatise Ex communibus notionibus is best explained in the light of this council. He also completed Basil's Hexameron with the important De opificio hominis (Easter 379; see Homily III In sanctum Pascha, of the same year), then with the Hexameron, an apology written at the end of the same year. Having gone to *Sebaste to put in order the succession of *Eustathius, who for a long time had opposed Basil, Gregory found himself constrained to act as bishop there for a long time, a duty which he then passed on to his brother Peter. The same year, after the Council of Antioch, Macrina died. Gregory gave his treatise On the Soul and the Resurrection the form of a dialogue with his dying sister. This literary form suggests that the work dates to the period in which the memory of the event was still vivid. The same may be said of the Life of Macrina. One cannot, however, insist on such chronological connections.

In 381 and 382, Gregory carried out an important role in the Councils of *Constantinople, where Theodosius designated him as one of the most important representatives of *orthodoxy, with whom communion was requested by the bishops of the region. At the same time, he responded to the great Arian theologian *Eunomius. Having been sent into exile and reduced to silence by the three books in which from 364 on Basil had refuted his Apology, Eunomius completed an Apology of the Apology. Gregory responded with a first book in 380, a second soon after (erroneously numbered 12B in the old editions, as in PG 45), a third treatise between 381 and 383 (soon divided into twelve books = 3-12 in PG 45); and finally a fourth treatise in 383, in response to a Profession of Faith of Eunomius (given as Book II in PG 45). Although Gregory's work is, on the whole, polemical and subtle, it constitutes a summa of Cappadocian theology. A philosophical introduction can be found in Mühlenberg; M. van Parys has promised an annotated edition of the last treatise for SC. Belonging to the same activity are the panegyric of Basil (1 January 381) and that of *Meletius of Antioch, given before the Council of Constantinople of 381; and, probably during the same council, on the occasion of the promotion of Gregory of Nazianzus to the capital see, the sermon improperly called In propriam ordinationem. A large number of his preserved letters also belong to these years of activity.

Constantinople had recourse again to Gregory for certainly functionary discourses in 383 (De deitate Filii et Spiritus Sancti) and in 385 (funeral discourses for the child princess *Pulcheria and later for the empress *Flaccilla).

Around 385 came a work of his maturity, the *Great Catechesis, a doctrinal summa for teachers who needed a system in their instructions. While there is a strong metaphysical foundation, Gregory was heir to an entire tradition of baptismal initiation concerning one God in three persons, *creation, the fall, the *incarnation, *redemption and the *sacraments of initiation. The last chronological point of reference concerns the 15 homilies On the Song of Songs, since these are dedicated to the deaconess *Olympias, with whom Gregory recalls the long years of friendly relations, which takes us necessarily to the 390s. It was thought possible to date another exegetical treatise to this period, the Life of Moses, which after having presented the historia, describes in a theoria the ascent of humans to God even into darkness, where they encounter the Lord who reveals himself. R.E. Heine has recently questioned this late date. Gregory gave his signature to the Council of Constantinople in 394, after which there is no trace of his activity. The measures taken by the episcopate of Asia Minor against the *Messalians at the Council of *Side (difficult to date) differ greatly from his benevolent and moderate approach: he was either dead or else no longer capable of imposing his own opinion.

Numerous works remain the date of composition of which is uncertain. These are above all dogmatic treatises. The work Quod non sunt tres dei (Ad Ablabium) is considered by Hübner to be a correction to the Ex communibus notionibus of 379. The De fide sancta (Ad Simplicianum) is mutilated. The authorship of the Adversus Arium et Sabellium is strongly disputed. On the other hand, too little considered is the treatise on essence and *hypostases, printed as Letter 38 of Basil, but which certainly contains the doctrine of Gregory, and is without doubt a relatively weak work of his youth (but after the death of Basil). Many patrologists have wronged Basil's strength by attributing this doctrine to him and using it to comment on his affirmations, which are much more nuanced. Other opuscula are connected more directly with the controversy on the Holy Spirit: a sermon against the pneumatomachi and a letter on the *Trinity (Ad Eustathium = Ep. 189 attributed to Basil). Others attack *Apollinaris and his followers; the one addressed to *Theophilus of Alexandria is certainly later than 385. Also worthy of note is a small treatise Against Destiny.

Among the exegetical works, particularly contrived is The Titles of the Psalms. Pushing to its limits his need to systemize, Gregory claims to find a progression in the placement of the 150 psalms, which leaves space for his genius at the cost of a proper understanding of the *Psalms. The exegetical school begun in Antioch radically refused the authority of these Psalm titles, and perhaps not by chance. One would like to believe that such a work was not simply a product of adolescence.

The eight Homilies on Ecclesiastes (comment up to 3,13) in a certain sense form a unity with the homilies on the *Song of Songs. A brief essay De pythonissa takes a position on a controversy that had by then become classical, abandoning the literalism of Origen, who had held that there was an appearance of Samuel's ghost. This abandonment of Origen is almost a paradox in the exegetical choices of Gregory, but even this exception is significant. While Gregory felt he was the heir of Alexandrian themes and methods, he was prepared to sacrifice anything that raised strong ecclesiastical opposition.

On the NT there exists a cycle of five homilies on the *Lord's Prayer and a similar cycle on the *Beatitudes. Finally, brief but important is the homily In illud: Quando sibi subiecerit omnia (1 Cor 15,28), which boldly deals with Origen's apokatastasis*, discussing at the same time the purpose of the incarnation. The so-called ascetical writings renew a discussion already treated from the exegetical point of view. Apart from the De virginitate, these are later works. The De perfectione (Ad Harmonium) is a work of his old age, and the De perfectione (Ad Olympum) comes after it. We would like to be able to date above all the De instituto christiano. From the time that this work and the Great Letter of ps.-*Macarius were properly edited (not forgetting what remains to be done), the close relation between the two has been has been recognized. Now that the priority of Macarius has been recognized, some hesitate to affirm that Gregory could have followed the *Messalian author so closely. The work appears rather to be from a disciple of Gregory, which would explain the Gregorian elements. The work is certainly full of Macarian features, but for studying its Nyssan character, these are not the features to consider.

The rest of Gregory's work is homiletic. Daniélou tried to determine the chronology of the liturgical sermons: one for *Epiphany (383), some for *Easter (but not Sermon II, which is by *Severus of Antioch), others for the *Ascension and Pentecost (both in 388). The authenticity of a sermon for Christmas is affirmed by Usener, because it supposedly uses the Protevangelium of James (but this citation was already used by Origen and then Basil, so it must have become acceptable) and the term Theotokos*, arguments that a majority of critics find unconvincing. The sermon Adversus eos qui differunt baptismum, delivered the day after Epiphany (381), just as that of Basil inviting the catechumens to baptism, also belongs to the liturgical cycle. The same can certainly not be said of the *panegyrics of the martyrs and saints, which have a local character. Above all worthy of mention is a *Life of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, whose Origenian legend served as an ideal for the faith of the Cappadocians. The moral sermons deal above all with love for the poor, usury (in the footsteps of St. Basil), and fornication (on 1 Cor 6:18).

II. Dissemination of writings: Editions. Gregory was seldom translated into Latin, either because he came too late—after *Rufinus (although Chrysostom had translators)—or because his inspiration was too Hellenic, which is precisely what makes him interesting today. Nevertheless, the De opificiio hominis found two translators: in the 6th c. *Dionysius Exiguus and in the 9th John Scotus Erigena (who was also interested in *Maximus the Confessor and *Dionysius the Areopagite). The Life of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus also found a translator in S Italy. A few translations exist in other Eastern languages, esp. the homilies on the Song of Songs, the *Lord's Prayer and the Beatitudes, as well as the De opificio hominis and the De virginitate. But Gregory did not have the great authority of the other two Cappadocians. He was not among the preferred doctors, and even in Greek the MSS are relatively few. Apart from a few partial editions in the 16th c., only in 1615 did Morel publish a complete Greek edition in Paris, which was mediocre, based on the MSS that he had at hand. In recompense, the modern era is elevating to Gregory an exceptional monument of critical erudition.

III. Doctrine. Many historians and philosophers have a deep admiration for Gregory, going so far as to consider him superior to the other Cappadocians. In particular, H. U. von Balthasar and J. Daniélou emphasized the value of his philosophy of knowledge and interiority that he maintains from the ancient inheritance and that he adapts acc. to the demands and suggestions of Christian faith. A.M. Ritter, G.C.

Stead, R. Hübner and others hold that Gregory was not successful in realizing a coherent synthesis. He makes extensive use of the partial expositions of the various schools, correcting them acc. to the Christian philosophical traditions, but it is pointless to seek a logical coherence between such diverse expositions. Where Basil was content to take advantage of the distinctions proposed by the philosophers, Gregory follows them in their analysis; and while he is careful to note the transcendence of the Christian God, nevertheless he does not have the Basilian prudence with regard to the limits that should be placed on philosophical ontology. All the Cappadocians can be considered heirs of the efforts of Origen, conscious of the dangers that threaten an all-too-daring synthesis. Basil is above all careful to respect the data of Scripture and *Tradition. Gregory safeguards something of Marcellus of Ancyra (Hübner) and even of his important adversary Eunomius. He remains, naturally, in the line traced out by Basil, but hopes to go further in scholastic explanation. Guided by excellent authors, capable of returning systematically to the sources, forced by controversies to consider deeply the points in question, he brings a notable contribution to theological elaboration, and it must at least be said that he pushes dogmatic theology to the construction of a Christian Platonism. Characteristic of his reflective effort is its mystical character, whatever the precise sense given to this term; it certainly refers to a knowledge connected to purity of heart. The connection with biblical *revelation, rendered difficult because of an exceedingly subtle use of allegory which does not enter into the authentic line of Origen, is nevertheless not without effect, and is strengthened by his ecclesiastical and monastic experience.

CPG/S 3135-3226; PG 44-46. Translations: Eng. - FC 58 (ascetical works); Fr. - SC 119 (De virg.), SC 1bis (Life of Moses), SC 178 (Life of Macrina); It. - S. Lilla, La verginità, Rome 1976; Id., Fine, professione e perfezione del cristiano, Rome 1979; Id., L'anima e la risurrezione, Rome 1981; C. Brigatti, La vita di Mosè, Alba 1967; R. Criscuolo, Epistles, Naples 1981; Omelie sul cantico dei cantici, ed. C. Moreschini, Rome 1988; La Vita di Macrina, ed. E. Giannarelli, Cinisello Balsamo 1988; L'Uomo, intr., tr. and notes by B. Salmona (Collana di Testi Patristici 32), Rome 1982; La Grande Catechesi, intr., tr. and notes by M. Naldini (Collana di Testi Patristici 34), Rome 1990; Gregory of Nyssa and John Chrysostom, La verginità, intr., tr. and notes by S. Lilla (Collana di Testi Patristici 4), Rome 1990; La vita di Mosè, ed. M. Simonetti, Milan 1984; Teologia Trinitaria. Contro Eunomio, Confutazione della Professione di Fede di Eunomio, intr., tr., notes and apparatus by C. Moreschini, Milan 1994.

Studies: E. Moutsoulas, Gregory of Nyssa (bibl. up to 1968): Nea Sion 65 (1970) 141-194 (in Greek); M.M. Bergadá, Contribución bibliográfica para el estudio de Gregorio de Nisa, Buenos Aires 1970; H.U. von Balthasar, Présence et pensée. Essai sur la philosophie religieuse de Grégoire de Nysse, Paris 1942; J. Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique. Doctrine spirituelle de saint Grégoire de N., Paris 1944 ([2]1953); J. Cuesta Janini, La antropología y la medicina pastoral de s. G. de N., Madrid 1946; R. Leys, L'image de Dieu chez Saint Grégoire de N. Esquisse d'une doctrine, Brussels 1951; J. Daniélou, La chronologie des sermons de G. de N.: RecSR 29 (1955) 346-372; D.L. Balás, Metousia Theou. Man's Participation in God's Perfections According to Saint G. of. N. (SA 55), Rome 1966; E. Mühlenberg, Die Unendlichkeit Gottes bei Gregor von Nyssa, Göttingen 1966; J. Gribomont, Le panégyrique de la virginité, oeuvre de jeunesse de G. de N.: RAM 43 (1967) 249-266; J. Bernardi, La prédication des Pères cappadociens. Le prédicateur et son auditoire, Montpellier 1968; J.M. Shea, The Church According to Saint Gregory of Nyssa's Homilies on the Canticle of Canticles, Baltimore 1968; J. Daniélou, L'être et le temps chez Grégoire de Nysse, Leiden 1970 (collection of previous articles); M. Harl (ed.), Écriture et culture philosophique dans la pensée de Grégoire de Nysse, Actes du coll. Chevetogne 22-26 Sept. 1966, Leiden 1971; H. Dörrie (ed.), Gregor von Nyssa und die Philosophie, Acts II coll. int., Münster 18-23 Sept., Leiden 1976; R.M. Hübner, Die Einheit des Leibes Christi bei Gregor von Nyssa, Leiden 1974; R.E. Heine, Perfection in the Virtuous Life, Philadelphia 1975; F.L. Mateo Seco, Estudios sobre la cristología de San Gregorio de N., Pamplona 1978; P. Pisi, Genesis e phthorà. Le motivazioni protologiche della verginità in Gregorio di Nissa e nella tradizione dell'enkrateia, Milan 1981; G.I. Gargano, La teoria di Gregorio di Nissa sul Cantico dei Cantici: OCA 216, Rome 1981; M. Canévet, Grégoire de Nysse et l'herméneutique biblique. Étude des rapports entre le langage et la connaissance de Dieu, Paris 1983; J.T. Cummings, The Holy Death-Bed. Saint and Penitent, in The Biographical Works of Gregory of Nyssa. Proceedings of the Fifth International Colloquium on Gregory of Nyssa, Philadelphia 1984, 241-263; M. Altenburger - F. Mann, Bibliographie zu Gregor von Nyssa, Leiden 1988; D.L. Balás, TRE, 14, 173-181; H. Dörrie, RAC 12, 863-895; LACL 299-304; A. Meredith, Gregory of Nyssa, London 1999; H.R. Drobner, Gregory of Nyssa as Philosopher. "De Anima et Resurrectione" and "De Hominis Opificio": Dionysius 18 (2000) 69-102; A. Meis - A. Castellano - J.F. Pinilla, El dinamismo del encuentro entre Dios y el hombre en los comentarios al "Cantar de los Cantares" de Orígenes, Gregorio de Nisa y Juan de la Cruz, Santiago de Chile 2000; N. Melikisvili, Traduction des oeuvres homilétiques de Basile le Grand, de Grégoire de Nazianze, de Grégoire de Nysse et de Jean Chrysostome, Tbilissi 2000; Gregory of Nyssa, Homilies on the Beatitudes. An English Version with Commentary and Supporting Studies, ed. H.R. Drobner - A. Viciano, Leiden 2000; Discours catéchétique, Grégoire de Nysse; texte grec de E. Mühlenberg (GNO III, IV); intr., tr. and notes by R. Winling, Paris 2000; Lexicon Gregorianum. Wörterbuch zu den Schriften Gregors von Nyssa, ed. F. Mann, Leiden 2001; Semillas de contemplación. Homilías sobre el Cantar de los cantares; Vida de Moisés. historia y contemplación, de Gregorio de Nisa, ed. T.H. Martín, Madrid 2001.

J. Gribomont

GREGORY of Tours (ca. 538–594). George Florentius, later called Gregory after one of his forefathers, was born around 538 in Clermont-Ferrand into a family of Roman origin. He entered an ecclesiastical career and was bishop of *Tours from 573 until his death (15 November 594). He was deeply involved in the complicated political-ecclesiastical affairs in *Gaul at that time, even with personal risk on account of Queen Fredegund's hatred of him.

In spite of his Roman origin, his education was not extensive. He read little of either classical or ecclesiastical authors (*Eusebius, *Jerome, *Sulpicius Severus, *Orosius and little more), and had little grammatical preparation, a sign of the cultural decadence in Merovingian Gaul of which Gregory was well aware, even if at times he hid his rusticitas behind the topos of the contempt that Christians should have for beautiful form. But this awareness did not keep him from writing; in fact, he was a historian and writer of rare quality.

Except for a lost Commentary on the Psalms and the De cursibus ecclesiasticis, a description of the constellations and of divine and human mirabilia, his work is divided into two parts: those of hagiographic and of historical interest. Of a hagiographical character is a corpus of 8 books: De gloria martyrum (I) on Jesus, the apostles, the martyrs; De miraculis S. Iuliani (II); De miraculis S. Martini (III-VI); De quorundam feliciosorum vita (VII), dedicated to 20 holy men of the time, some known personally to him; In gloria confessorum (VIII), which completes book I, adding to the memory of the martyrs that of the confessors, i.e., of the saints who were not martyrs, chosen for the most part from monks in Gaul, esp. in the region of Tours. The work is composed organically as a sort of summa of the theme of hagiography, but the content ends up disappointing us when compared to the ambition of the program. Gregory is interested above all in miracles and relics of the saints, and by miracles he means even commonplace facts in addition to clearly fantastic miracles, so that the work often has more a superstitious than a pious character and is never historical.

Gregory manifests a quite different character as historian and narrator in the Historiarum libri X, usually referred to as the Historia Francorum. At the beginning, the work is presented as universal, and the first book extends from the creation of the world to the death of St. *Martin (397); but the following books concentrate on Gaul, rarely giving information concerning the neighboring regions, and the account becomes more and more particular as it approaches the age of the author: the last five books cover a space of only eleven years (580–591) and close with the death of King Guntram.

The historical perspective of Gregory is both political and religious: he laments the situation in Gaul (by then France) of his time, divided by various powers struggling against each other and prey to violence and anarchy, which do not respect even the rights of the church. By contrast, he looks back fondly on the strong and ordered Gaul of *Clovis, the initiator of the kingdom of the *Franks and protagonist of their conversion to Catholic Christianity. Compared to such merits, the savage crimes of which that king was guilty take second place, though Gregory relates them with care and the very success of *Clovis's policies is a guarantee of his divine favor for Gregory's somewhat barbarized moral sense. It is easy to speak of the fragmentary and anecdotal character of Gregory's work, but precisely through this we are presented with not just a quantity of historical facts but a vision of the whole of the life and the mentality of the period. And the apparent indifference, the bare essentiality with which he presents the facts, even the most atrocious, gives the work an uncommon dramatic depth in its tight, simple, direct representation of human passions and illusions.

CPL 1023-1032; PL 71; MGH (SRM) I, 1-2; G. Vinay, S. Gregorio di Tours, Carmagnola 1940; var. aus., Gregorio di Tours, Todi 1977; B. Vetere, Strutture e modelli culturali nella società merovingia. Gregorio di Tours. Una testimonianza, Galatina 1979 (bibl.); BBKL II, 339-340; M. Heinzelmann, Gregor von Tours (538–594) "Zehn Bücher Geschichte." Historiographie und Gesellschaftskonzept im 6. Jahrhundert, Darmstadt 1994; I.N. Wood, Gregory of Tours, Bangor 1994; A.H.B. Breukelaar, Historiography and Episcopal Authority in Sixth-Century Gaul. The Histories of Gregory of Tours Interpreted in Their Historical Context, Göttingen 1994; Patrologia IV, 304-314.

M. Simonetti

GREGORY THAUMATURGUS (ca. 213–ca. 270). The unanimous hagiographical liturgical literature places Gregory in the 2nd half of the 3rd c. in Asia Minor as bishop of *Neocaesarea in *Pontus and as a great evangelizer of that region. The eloquent nickname explains the great popularity that surrounded him and his memory immediately in the East and later on in the West as well. The most ancient and trustworthy information about him comes from *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 6,30), who presents him as *Theodorus, who also bears the name of Gregory, illustrious bishop in Pontus, a student of *Origen together with his brother *Athenodorus. Later (7,28) Eusebius speaks of the two brothers among the bishops who worked to unmask the heterodoxy of *Paul of Samosata without success. In HE 6,30 Eusebius adds that Origen had dissuaded the two brothers from the study of profane literature and had kept them at his school for five years. This period of discipleship under Origen is also spoken of in a biography in the form of a *panegyric that *Gregory of Nyssa composed around the end of the 4th c. It integrates the little information given by Eusebius with local and mostly legendary hagiographical traditions; later anonymous biographies follow in the same path. Eusebius had acquired the information about Gregory's study under Origen from an oration, the Panegyric to Origen, which has in fact come to us under the name of Gregory Thaumaturgus ("Wonder Worker"). The author, about to take leave of Origen after several years in his school, thanks his teacher. The doctrine of the Logos is present in the oration, and Gregory praises Origen's teaching method. Based on this writing it was possible to identify as the Wonder Worker a Gregory who is the recipient of a letter, transmitted by the Philocalia*, in which Origen exhorts him to study Greek *philosophy in order to put it at the service of the gospel.

Other than these writings, various others have come to us under the name of Gregory Thaumaturgus: the Metaphrase of Ecclesiastes, a very free paraphrase of this book of the Bible, looking to resolve in a manner compatible with Christianity the various passages contained in it that have hedonistic and Epicurean content; the Canonical Epistle, which examines problems regarding ecclesiastical discipline that were provoked by an invasion of the *Goths in Pontus; the Exposition of Faith, which has trinitarian content and insists on the traditional doctrine of the Logos, which Gregory of Nyssa gives in his biography of Gregory Thaumaturgus, clarifying that this doctrine was still prominent in the church in Neocaesarea (PG 46, 912-913); two brief treatises To Theopompus, On the Impassibility or Passibility of God, in translation in Syriac, and To Evagrius (or Philagrius), in epistolary form, which we have in Greek and in Syriac with various attributions of authorship, the latter dealing with the *Trinity, the former with *Christology, both with an evident *monarchian tendency; a passage of the lost To Gelianus, containing monarchian and specifically anti-Origenist doctrine. In addition to these writings, some authentic and others in any case involved in the difficult affair of which we are about to speak, there are others that are certainly false: the treatise On the Soul to Tatian, which was written by *Apollinaris, some *homilies and another writing, regarding which see CPG 1, 1772ff.

Until a few decades ago, scholars attributed to Gregory not only the Metaphrase and the Canonical Epistle, concerning which the consensus is unanimous but which offer little help in determining the doctrinal views of the author, but also the Panegyric to Origen and the Exposition of Faith, the latter confirmed by Gregory of Nyssa, the former by Eusebius. There were, however, some doubts with regard to the authenticity of the treatise To Theopompus, and many with regard to the treatise addressed To Evagrius (Philagrius). But in 1976 and 1977, L. Abramowski and P. Nautin called into doubt the authenticity, respectively, of the Exposition of Faith and the Panegyric to Origen, and consequently also the identification of the Wonder Worker with the Gregory who received of the letter of Origen handed down by the Philocalia. H. Crouzel attempted to reply to this devastating criticism, but with little success, since some of the arguments put forth by the other scholars were quite strong: the Exposition of Faith is certainly inauthentic in its last part, which belongs to the trinitarian debate in the 2nd half of the 4th c., and perhaps the whole work should be considered spurious; further, the author of the Panegyric to Origen quite probably was named Theodorus, and we do not know what foundation Eusebius had for identifying him with Gregory Thaumaturgus, who in any case is distinct from the Gregory who received the letter from Origen. These results put in question the entire work, and therefore also the doctrinal views, of the Wonder Worker. The author's discipleship under Origen is also called into doubt since this had been confirmed doctrinally and culturally, both directly and indirectly, by his presumed authorship of the Panegyric to Origen and the Exposition of Faith.

On the other hand, the monarchian tendency recognizable in the treatises To Theopompus and To Evagrius fits well with the monarchian expression of the otherwise lost To Gelianus, certainly authentic since it is supported by the authority of Basil—only a few words but deeply significant since, in perfect antithesis with Origen, the Father and the Son are said to be two with regard to the ἐπίνοια but one with regard to the ὑπόστασις. The monarchian character of these three works can hardly be considered random. It should be added that the Metaphrase of Ecclesiastes resolves the difficulties of a moral character that this book of *Scripture presents, without ever departing from the literal sense, while Origen had resolved them resorting to his beloved allegorical method. Given all these facts, it is difficult to consider the Wonder Worker as a disciple of Origen, as Theodorus was, who is the likely author of the Panegyric. At this point we must ask whether the period of discipleship of Gregory under Origen should not be considered simply an idea of Eusebius, derived from the identification of the unknown Theodorus author of the Panegyric and Gregory the evangelizer of Pontus and bishop of Neocaesarea renowned in his time. But the questions proposed in this discussion are many; therefore, the whole matter should be considered sub iudice.

CPG 1, 1763-1794; PG 10, 963-1232; PG 46, 893-957 (Gregory of Nyssa, Vita di Gregorio Taumaturgo); St Gregory Thaumaturgus. Life and Works, tr. by M. Slusser, Washington DC 1998; Remerciement a Origène: ed. with Fr. tr. SC 148 (1969, ed. H. Crouzel); Encomio di Origene, It. tr. and comm. by M. Rizzi, Milan 2002; L. Abramowski, Das Bekenntnis des Gregor Thaumaturgus bei Gregor von Nyssa und das Problem seiner Echtheit: ZKG 87 (1976) 145-146; P. Nautin, Origène. Sa vie et son oeuvre, Paris 1977, 83-86; 183-197; H. Crouzel, Faut-il voir trois personnages en Grégoire le Thaumaturge?: Gregorianum 60 (1979) 287-288; M. Simonetti, Una nuova ipotesi su Gregorio il Taumaturgo: RSLR 24 (1988) 17-41; Id., Origene dalla Cappadocia ai Cappadoci, in Origene e l'alessandrinismo cappadoce (III-IV secolo), ed. M. Girardi and M. Marin, Bari 2002, 13-16.

M. Simonetti

GREGORY the Cappadocian (d. 345). A native of *Cappadocia, he studied at *Alexandria. A pro-*Arian, he was elected bishop of *Alexandria in 339 by the Eusebians in place of *Athanasius, who had to leave his episcopal residence 18 March. The election was irregular since Gregory had been ordained outside of Alexandria without the participation of Egyptian bishops. In any case, he took possession of the see with the support of the imperial military and was ferocious with Athanasius's faithful clergy. The anti-Arian Council of *Rome in 341 declared his election irregular, but with no practical results, similar to his ineffectual excommunication as an Arian leader by the Western bishops at *Serdica (343), even though Gregory did not participate in the council's works. He died 25 June 345.

DCB 2, 739; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim; DHGE 21, 1468-9.

M. Simonetti

GREGORY the Elder (275–374). Born around 275 in Nazianzus in Cappadocia. After having adhered in his youth to the Judeo-pagan sect of the *Hypsistarians or "Adorers of the Most High," he married *Nonna, with whom he had three children: *Gorgonia, *Gregory the Theologian and *Caesarius. Drawn probably by the example of his wife, he soon embraced the Catholic faith and became bishop of Nazianzus in 329. During his episcopacy he was involved in the doctrinal controversies that were dealt with in the councils of *Rimini and *Seleucia in 359. He died at almost 100 years of age at the beginning of 374 and was celebrated by his son Gregory in a famous funeral oration (Oratio funebris in patrem, PG 35, 985-1044).

CPG 3010; DHGE XXII, 14-15; A.W. Ziegler, Gregor der Ältere von Nazianz, seine Taufe und Weihe. Ein Beitrag zur Kirchengeschichte des IV Jhts: Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift 31 (1980) 262-283; K.G. Bonis, Le père de Grégoire de Nazianze était-il d'origine grecque ou juive?: Θεολογία 53 (1982) 537-561; R. Van Dam, Families and Friends in Late Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003.

P. Marone

GREGORY the Great (ca. 540–604)
I. Life - II. Works - III. Aspects of Gregory's thought.

I. Life. Gregory was born into a Christian family of the senatorial aristocracy, related to Pope *Felix III (483–492) (In evang. II, 38,15). Educated in the traditional schools of grammar and *rhetoric, he also studied basic concepts of natural science and Roman law (Greg. Tours, Hist. Franc. X, 1); whether he also acquired Greek is still debated: very likely (evidence: ibid. VIII, 28; X, 10) acc. to some scholars, for whom it is untenable that, having carried out diplomatic duties at the Byzantine court, he remained ignorant of the language used there (Petersen 1976, 124-133). According to others, it is very doubtful (Richards 1984, 44-45; Chadwick 2001, 658), given that Gregory explicitly denies it (Ep. VII, 29; XI, 55). The presence of the library instituted by Pope *Agapetus (535–536) on the Caelian, near the family residence, must have contributed to his knowledge of Christian texts, side by side with the classics. This dual cultural heritage emerges constantly but is balanced in different ways at different moments of his life.

Early in life he entered a political career, becoming praefectus urbi, then, after some hesitation, he decided to devote himself fully to God (Moral., ded., 1), around 574–575, probably after the death of his father. Then, able to dispose of inherited patrimony, he founded six *monasteries in Sicily, in the territories inherited from his mother, and another one, named after St. Andrew, in the family palace on the Caelian, where he retired. Here he led an *ascetic life, guided by self-discipline, humility and meditation on *Scripture, which are recurring themes in all his writings. Many of his future collaborators entered this monastery, including *Maximian, who became bishop of *Syracuse, and *Augustine, who was later sent on a mission to *Britain. The rule of life adopted here was not necessarily that of St. *Benedict, as is often thought because of the author's interest in the saint. His monastic peace was lost when Pelagius II ordained him deacon and sent him to Constantinople as apocrisarius to the emperor, Tiberius II at first, then from 582 Maurice. He was sent in order to solicit aid against the *Longobards in *Italy, who had arrived on the peninsula some ten years prior, and continued their incursions into the territories of the *Byzantine Empire, including Rome. In these years (ca. 579–586) to his diplomatic efforts was added the doctrinal controversy with the patriarch of *Constantinople, *Eutyches, on the *resurrection of the body, which ended with the imperial approval of the theory supported by Gregory (Moral. XIV, 56,72-57,77). Meanwhile, he became deeply involved in the interpretation of the book of Job, at the request of his group of friends, who were united by common spiritual interests. Among them was *Leander of *Seville. Gregory remained in contact with him after his return to Rome. There, Pelagius made use of Gregory in the political and ecclesiastical problems concerning, among other things, the Lombards and the question of the *Three Chapters (see the letter written to the bishops of Istria by Gregory on behalf of Pelagius: Registrum Epistolarum 2, MGH, ap. III, 3; Paul Diac., Hist. Lang. III, 20). The pontiff died 7 February 590, struck by bubonic plague following the flood of the Tiber in 589; a week later, Gregory organized a procession in the city, bound for S. Maria Maggiore, to implore from God the end of the plague (Greg. Tours, Hist. Franc. X, 1; Paul Diac., Hist. Lang. III, 24). Already esteemed for his role under Pelagius, he was acclaimed by the Roman people as Pelagius's successor and, after a few months, received imperial approval, followed by the episcopal consecration on 3 September 590.

From that time he began the series of letters, gathered in the Registrum, that document his pastoral, political and administrative activities, as well as his personal relationships. The collection has also preserved the synodal epistle (Ep. I, 24, February 591), sent, acc. to custom, to the other patriarchs, to reaffirm the common faith, the veneration of the four gospels and of the four councils, together with a reflection on the figure of the bishop typical of Gregory. Among his first letter recipients is also Teoctista, sister of the emperor, to whom he expressed his regret over his election (Ep. I, 5, October 590); now, in fact, he is diverted from the preferred contemplative otium and immersed in negotia of a worldly character, for which he feels inadequate, having to steer a decrepit and battered ship (Ep. I, 4).

Nevertheless, his previous political, legal and administrative experience must have helped him in the practical management of the church and the Patrimonium Petri, made up of territories scattered in different parts of Europe, often reduced on account of the barbarian invasions, but still widespread in the islands, esp. in Sicily. From here came most of the supply for the city of Rome, esp. wheat (Ep. I, 2; 70), that the church distributed each month to the citizens, esp. the poor (John Diac., Vita Greg. II, 26; cf. Arnaldi 1986, 25-30). This and other duties proper to the imperial administration, by this time effectively neglected, were taken up by the pontifical administration, under the direction and supervision of the pope. He also attempted to reform the church in a monastic direction, both within the Lateran curia and by supporting the appointment of monks as bishops as well as by founding monasteries in Rome (Ep. III, 17; IV, 18; VI, 44; IX, 138). In the city, he limited his architectural projects to the consecration of former *Arian churches for Catholic worship (S. Agata in the Suburra: cf. Dial. III, 30,2-3, S. Severinus: cf. Ep. III, 19), and the maintenance of existing ones, in particular, works in the sanctuaries of the respective basilicas of St. Peter and St. Paul (John Diac., Vita Greg. IV, 68). In addition to the letters, the homilies on the gospels, particularly the first, delivered on the first Sunday of Advent in 590, just days after a heavy storm hit Rome with disastrous results, bear witness to the difficulties of the contemporary social and political situation. Such disasters were compounded by the problem of the Lombards throughout the entire period of his pontificate, with alternating periods of crisis. At the beginning of his ministry, at the death of the Arian king Authari (590), who had opposed the Catholic baptism of his subjects, Gregory communicated to the other bishops of Italy his missionary zeal for the conversion of the Lombards who were still *pagans or *heretics (Ep. I, 17). He expressed his opposition to them in some stories narrated in his Dialogues involving incidents of resistance on the part of Catholics, written at a critical period (593–594; for example Dial. III, 27-28).

On the political and civil front, he was forced, without the defensive support of the Byzantine court, to deal with first the threat of Ariulf, duke of Spoleto, then of Agilulf. The latter, reacting to the offensive of the Roman exarch, followed the example of the duke of Spoleto, marched on Rome and besieged it in late 593 and early 594. On this occasion, Gregory interrupted his *exegesis on Ezekiel, because he was unable, he said, "even to live" (In Ezech. II 10.24). From then on a succession of truces follow, not always successful: at times boycotted by the exarch Romanus (Ep. II, 38; V, 40), at times on account of the belligerence or excessive demands of the Lombard leaders (Ep. IX, 44; 196). When renewing negotiations for the cessation of hostilities, he relied on the mediation of *Theodelinda, the Catholic wife of Agilulf though an adherent to the schism of the Three Chapters, and for this reason often encouraged her to move closer to the dogmatic position of the Roman Curia (Ep. IV, 4; 33; IX, 68; XIV, 12).

To the period of truce with the Lombards date the first fruits of the mission to the Anglo-Saxons (Ep. VIII, 29, July 598), undertaken in 596 by sending forty monks of St. Andrew on the Caelian, led by their prior, Augustine. This enterprise was undertaken, acc. to the declaration of the pope himself, because of his desire to meet the request of the islanders to be initiated in the Christian religion (Ep. VI, 51; 60), and perhaps in order to recover, no longer for political motives but religious ones, a former Roman colony that had been conquered by the Anglo-Saxons from the mid 5th c. The missionaries, arriving in the spring of 597, established themselves in *Canterbury with the support of Aethelberth, the king of Kent. They were followed in their work of *evangelization and supported from afar by the pope, as evidenced by the numerous letters sent to Augustine, the local rulers, and earlier to the *Franks, so as to obtain logistic support for the mission.

Relations with the kings (esp. with Queen Brunhilda, regent of Austrasia and Burgundy after the death of Childbert) and with Frankish clerics began some years before (595), when Gregory intervened in *ethical questions and the internal discipline of ecclesiastical organization, urging his recipients to combat any residual paganism (Ep. VIII, 4) and esp. the phenomenon of "simony," identified with awarding nobles devoid of any pastoral qualifications with high ecclesiastical duties (Ep. IX, 214; 216). While his interventions in Gaul were meant to be final and decisive, he was more sporadic and prudent with the *Visigoths of Spain, who had just converted en masse to Catholicism, following the example of the successor to the throne of Leovigild, *Recared. Gregory addressed a single letter of congratulations to him for this change of religion, for which he identifies him as a "king-shepherd," urging him to exercise the virtues proper to that model (Ep. IX, 229; see also I, 41 to Leander of Seville). Thus Gregory's approach to the individual Germanic rulers was calibrated differently, acc. to the different religious situations and his ability to intervene in them: if with respect to the conversion of the Visigoths he remained only a spectator, limiting himself to some advice on political *ethics, he played a directive role with respect to the Anglo-Saxons. This involved him in the ecclesiastical organization and pastoral guidance of the new converts, as evidenced by a letter of June 601, with guidelines for the clergy and the *liturgy (Ep. XI, 39) and the Libellus responsionum on issues raised by Augustine, transmitted by *Bede (Hist. eccl. I, 27), whose contested authenticity has found recent confirmation (Meyvaert 1986, 543-550; Chadwick in Gregorio 1991, 207-211). In this latter field, the pope did not necessarily impose uniformity with the Roman use, conceiving of the unity of the church more on the mystical plane (cohesion of the members of the body of Christ: Ep. IV, 3) than on a ritual level.

Another ecclesiological question debated between 591 and 596 was that of "*Donatism," or rather, of widespread demands for autonomy in some African churches, jealous of their traditional practices and hostile to any imperial or papal interference. This was understood by the bishop of Rome as a revival of heresy, against which he urged the local authorities, both ecclesiastical and secular, to intervene (Ep. I, 75; II, 39; IV, 35; VI, 36 and I, 72; 82; IV, 32; VI, 62) and finally even the emperor, entrusting to him the resolution of the conflict (Ep. VI, 64). Maurice was also involved when, from 595, Gregory argued against the epithet "ecumenical," adopted by the patriarchs of Constantinople *John and later (from 597) *Cyriac, since it seemed to him an act of pride, to which he contrasted the title, chosen by him, of servus servorum Dei (Ep. V, 37; 39; 41; 44; VII, 5; 24; 28; 30; VIII, 29; XIII, 41; 44). From the letters addressed to the basileus one can see, on the one hand, the loyalty of the pope toward the imperial authority, on the other, some differences of opinion with Maurice (Epp. III, 61; V, 36; 37; VII, 30). For this reason, in May of 603, Gregory demonstrated a renewed hope that Phocas would ascend the throne, a usurper, but in his eyes a potential restorer of justice and freedom (Ep. XIII, 32). Sometime later he addressed a letter to the Germans, or rather to Theodelinda, praising the Catholic baptism of her child and her efforts to mediate peace (Ep. XIV, 12). Later in 603, apparently not without good hope for the future, he was troubled by the return of the plague in Rome. The letter to the queen is among the last of the Registrum, interrupted in the beginning of 604 because of the pontiff's death, which occurred 12 March. This is the traditional dies natalis in the liturgy for Gregory. After the Second Vatican Council, the liturgical feast of the saint, to prevent its recurrence in Lent, was moved to 3 September, the date of his consecration as bishop.

His liturgical memorial developed early, at first outside Rome, where his tomb was originally in front of the old sacristy of St. Peter's Basilica (LP I, 66; John. Diac., Vita Greg. IV, 68), and finally, after several translations, in the Clementine Chapel of the present basilica. There is a vast hagiographic production of a wide chronological and geographical range on him: a chapter in *Isidore's De viris illustribus (40), two Vitae, written respectively by Paul the Deacon during his stay at Monte Cassino (ca. 787) and by John the Deacon at the Roman curia (9th c.); older and almost contemporary productions are the Vita of the anonymous monk of Whitby (ca. 713) and wide digression devoted to Gregory by Bede in his Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum (HE II, 1). Also in an Anglo-Saxon milieu, a Northumbrian tradition regards him as a bridge between the local and the universal church (Chadwick 2001, 674). In the Carolingian period his authority was invoked to justify the adoption in the Frankish liturgy of the Roman chant attributed to him (Antiphonale Gregorianum), also because he reformed the schola cantorum of the Lateran. In addition, a liturgical book with prayers that probably are partly written by him is transmitted under his name (Gregorian Sacramentary: see Deshusses 1971, 50-53); finally, he was eulogized in the Mart hier. (from the late 7th c. onward) of Rabanus Maurus and Ado (9th c.), as well as several menologia and synaxaria of the Eastern church (see BS 7, 271-275).

II. Works. Among the writings attributed to Gregory by the MS tradition, those largely considered authentic belong basically to three genres: letters, exegesis, hagiography. In their various stages of composition they cover a time span between the eighties of the 6th c. and the death of the pontiff. The first are the Moralia in Iob, begun during his stay in Constantinople, completed in Rome before his election as bishop, with later occasional editing approximately up to the year 600. In the thirty-five books a complete interpretation unfolds, verse by verse, of the book of Job, considered from four points of view: literal, allegorical, typological and moral (Moral., ded., 3). Similar criteria, which in general also apply to his other commentaries, are presented in the dedicatory letter to Leander of Seville, one of the addressees of this exegetical work, considered by Gregory providential. In fact, by a divine plan, the sorrow of Job finds in him an interpreter that is much more capable of understanding him, as he is similarly subject to suffering. He sees in Job not only the "type" of Christ, with his redemptive passion, but also that of the church, whose history is understood as the history of *preaching the gospel and of the subsequent trials (Moral., praef. 7,16 and IX, 11,13), until the end of time, when, once the elect are gathered together from all nations, it will enjoy the eternal reward promised by the Lord (Moral. XXXV, 14.27).

This eschatological perspective is constantly present in the Homilies on the Gospels as well, composed between autumn 590 and early 592 for the liturgical assemblies gathered now in one, now in another, Roman church for the feasts of Christ and the saints. The forty sermons, preached sometimes in person, sometimes in moments of severe illness given to others to be read, were arranged in two volumes and revised in the final written draft by the author himself, who in this case, as for the Moralia (Ep. XII, 6), warns his readers, specifically here Secundinus of Taormina (In evang., ded.), to beware of "pirated" copies, circulating without his permission and previous inspection.

If the audience of the homilies on the gospels is varied and changeable acc. to the occasion—in fact there are some sermons addressed only to bishops (e.g., In evang. I, 17)—the audience is more restricted, predominantly to the latter, for the Regula pastoralis, written probably between September 590 and February 591 and sent to his colleagues in the episcopate, such as John, bishop of Ravenna and dedicatee of the work, Venantius of Luni and Leander of Seville (Ep. V, 17 and 53). In the treatise, divided into four parts, he discusses the role of the pastor, also called the rector, praedicator, etc., together with his moral and spiritual requirements, and his conduct, balanced between contemplation and preaching, mindful of the different receptive capacities of the recipients.

The figure of the praedicator is also central in his Homilies on Ezekiel, given probably in late 593 and early 594 for a group of clerics and laypeople interested in exploring spiritual and theological issues of considerable complexity. The exegesis, reworked a few years later in two books of twelve and ten homilies, is incomplete. The author, assailed by multiple troubles and concerns on account of the Lombard attack on Rome and the surrounding areas, jumps from the first four chapters to Ezekiel's vision of the temple in the fortieth chapter, an object of curiosity to his audience (In Ezech. II, praef.), and then is forced to interrupt his meditation. Under circumstances so distressing, Gregory seems to have perceived a similarity between his situation and that of the *prophet in exile with his compatriots, whom he admonished to repent and return to God; the dreadful events of his time, acc. to the commentator, should in fact lead to repentance and purification (In Ezech. II, 6,22.24).

He also mentions these events in the Dialogues, composed around the same time as the Homilies on Ezekiel, but using various documents on the Italian saints of the period that had already been collected for some time. Their lives and miracles are narrated in four books during the course of the dialogue between Gregory and the subdeacon Peter: a rhetorical device that allows him to frame anecdotes of a miraculous character within a deeper theological and ethical reflection, such as to dispel the "popular" character often attributed to the work. This is perhaps the main reason for doubts about the Gregorian authorship of this work; the tone is so different from his other works, sharing, however, with them some content in common: not only are some exempla from the Homilies on the Gospels and the Dialogues the same (e.g., Redempta and Romula in In evang. II, 40,11 and Dial. IV, 16,1-7), but some considerations about prophecy as well, and the role of the prophet, present both in the Moralia and in the commentary on Ezekiel, and above all, in the second book of the Dialogues, dedicated entirely to the life of St. Benedict (Moral. II, 56,89.91; In Ezech. I, 1,15 and 5,11; Dial. II, 21,3-4). This work on Benedict is exceptional for the hagiography of the period, even though the stories about other saints, mostly monks and bishops, have aspects of originality, esp. with respect to the criteria of selection, both geographically (Italy, esp. central) and chronologically (the contemporary viri Dei).

The commentary on the *Song of Songs dates from a few years later (594–ca. 600) or, acc. to another hypothesis (Fiedrowicz [3]2002, 259), to the years before the papacy. It was composed, as is also assumed for the Commentary on 1 Kings, from lectures given by Gregory to the monks of the Caelian, including Claudius, former abbot in *Ravenna, who later reworked the notes taken during his stay in Rome (between 595 and 598: cf. Ep. XII, 6, and the introductions of R. Bélanger, SC 314, 22-28 and of A. de Vogüé, SC 351, 33-40). This text has not come down to us in full (only up to Song 1:8), perhaps due to an accident in the MS tradition. It reworks exegetical ideas already present in *Origen, in *Augustine and *Aponius. He identifies the bridegroom with Christ and the bride with both the church and the *soul. Thus an ecclesiological and *tropological interpretation alternate systematically, proceeding from a single starting point: the spiritual blindness in which humanity has fallen after *sin, from which we are called upon to be redeemed by faith in Christ and by meditation on the word of Scripture that direct us to the love of God.

The commentary on 1 Kings is also incomplete, written up to the royal anointing of David (1 Kgs 16:13) in six books. He develops in particular monastic and ecclesiological themes concerning the priesthood, taking as a starting point the various typological meanings of the characters: e.g., Elkanah is a figure of Christ and of the monk wavering between the contemplative (Anna) and active life (Peninnah); Anna is a figure of the church, Peninnah of the synagogue; Samuel a figure of the Christian preacher converted from paganism, Saul of the newly ordained bishop, who subsequently falls; David is a figure of Christ and of the new bishop. The authenticity of the work has long been discussed. Originally identifying it as the last work by Gregory (SC 351, 38), Adalbert de Vogüé, editor of the critical edition for Sources Chrétiennes, is now more inclined to attribute it to Peter, a 12th-c. monk of the abbey of Cava, who nonetheless reused material and the style of Gregory (SC 432, 9-10 and SC 449, 9-10.20-23).

Many letters of the Registrum, esp. those on administrative matters, were prepared using conventional formulas by the notarii* of the Lateran chancellery, to whom the pope himself dictated most of the letters attributed to him, with the exception, perhaps, of those of a more confidential nature. He also arranged the order of the collection in 14 books, one for each indiction that passed during his pontificate. The compiled codex was purposely kept in the archive (scrinium) of the Lateran, as had been the case for over a century for the collections of papal letters. At present the archetype is not known, but a reconstruction of the original Registrum would seem to contain 847 letters, to which are joined a dozen or so that have come down to us independently. These letters attest the variety of problems and projects of his episcopate, how they were perceived by Gregory and how they were addressed by him on a practical level, and thus reveal the face of a pontiff pressed by multiple duties, able to handle them with expertise on the political, legal and economic front, and yet always drawn by a longing for the quiet contemplation of the heavenly mysteries.

III. Aspects of Gregory's thought. From the beginning, the *spirituality of Gregory was characterized by the tension between contemplation and action, presented at times as difficult to reconcile, esp. because action, with its related concerns, removes one from the quiet necessary for concentrating on contemplation (Ep. I, 5; In Ezech. II, praef.). At other times he presented them rather as complementary, since the former inspires the love of God and neighbor, while the second expresses it in practice (In Ezech. II, 2,11). The contemplative meditation on the Word of God marks the Weltanschauung of the bishop, more oriented toward moral issues, which emerge from a profound interior inspection, than toward purely theological ones. In this he differs from Augustine, but Gregory's study of him is frequently reflected in his thought.

The complementarity of contemplation and action unfolds in the life of Gregory and is programmatic in his conception of pastoral ministry. In fact, he recommends the first to the praedicator as necessary nourishment for a preaching ministry; to the latter, on the other hand, he calls also whoever has dedicated himself by vocation to a more withdrawn life, like the monks of St. Andrew on the Caelian, who were sent to evangelize the Anglo-Saxons. The preacher, bishop or monk is the spokesman for God's message to his contemporaries, and in this he inherits the task of the Old Testament prophet (In 1 Reg. III, 34; see also Benedict in Dial. II, 11-21). Like Augustine and other fathers, Gregory understood prophecy as the specific gift of examining the human heart and understanding God's message encrypted in the events of life (In Ezech. I, 1,1; Moral. XI, 20,31, cf. Aug., Gen. ad litt. XII, 9, Cassiod., In Psalm., praef. 1). To this is connected the necessity of communicating the revelation received in order to guide souls to the Lord in repentance and the expectation of his coming. The link, then, between prophecy and preaching is intimate, developed in a particular way by Gregory, as well as the systematic examination of the former, based on scriptural passages analyzed acc. to the criteria of classical dialectic in the first homily on Ezekiel (In Ezech. I, 1,1-17). If the Old Testament prophets are the prototype of today's preacher, at the same time the preacher surpasses them, being born after the incarnation and so enjoying a higher degree of revelation (In Ezech. II, 4,12). Given this, the prophetic message in the Christian church no longer refers to a coming Messiah except in an eschatological perspective. The advent of Christ as judge, whom all should prepare to encounter, is a recurring theme in the writings of Gregory, whether addressed to the listeners of his homilies or the recipients of his letters (e.g., Ep. XI, 37 to Aethelberth). From this expectation of the coming Messiah derives the insistence on promoting the spread of the gospel, in order to increase the number of the elect to the total amount foreseen at the end of time (Moral. IV, 7,12). In addition, the members of this ecclesia sancta universalis include the "saints" of the Old Testament, and those Jews predestined, in the end, to be redeemed (Moral. II, 36,59 and In Ezech. I, 12,6, etc.). Also on account of this conviction, Gregory legally protects the Jews in Italy and, usually, exhorts his contemporaries not to force them to conversion (Ep. II, 45; V, 7; VIII, 25; IX, 196), which he advocates instead for the Germans who had settled within the borders of the former Western empire.

Therefore, his missionary zeal and the perception of a world in decline are interconnected, a vision often expressed in relation to natural and social disasters of the period (e.g., In evang. I, 1,1; In Ezech. II, 6,22; Ep. III, 29), issues that can be reconciled in a vision directed toward the transcendent, to which history and life on earth must aim, both in a spiritual sense (conversion and contemplation of the heavenly mysteries) and a temporal sense (preparation for the universal *judgment). From this consideration derives the warning to detach oneself from every earthly affection, characteristic of a monastic *asceticism that does not go so far as demonizing the material world or the body, but considers it a source of temptation and a burden; it is nonetheless of benefit to the extent that the limitations it imposes (sharply experienced by Gregory during his illness) attract those who want to elevate themselves inwardly to the humble recognition of human weakness and the need of the divine help (Moral. XIX, 6,12).

In this earthly life, which from the beginning is undermined by sin (In cant. 1), a divine pedagogy unfolds for the salvation of human beings, who, thanks to the alternation of adversity and prosperity, can progress spiritually (Ep. III, 51): in fact, the former provides the opportunity for repentance and purification, and the latter the opportunity for relief, which should never be separated from a vigilance against possible temptations, which are more insidious under prosperity than adversity (Moral. II, 43,68). Gregory asserts how in the divina dispensatio *justice and mercy, punitive discipline and tender indulgence are balanced (In Ezech. I, 1,18). Nevertheless he insists on our inability to comprehend God's ways, which defy any attempt to probe or to oppose them (e.g., Moral. XXIX, 29,56–30,57 and VI, 18,33). This view is consistent in his thinking, which is structured on the complementarity of opposites (e.g., Moral. XIX, 6,12; In Ezech. II, 2,3; cf. Walther 1941, 74-76; Straw 1988, 267-272). This characteristic still shows the sense of proportion typical of classical culture in an author who would have an authoritative influence in the Middle Ages, with his allegorical exegesis, his hagiographical and eschatological representations of the Dialogues, his Bischofsideal and the political role he established and extended for the papacy in the former Western empire. For this reason, the title of consul Dei inscribed on his epitaph is particularly apt (ICUR II, 4156, 15 and John Diac., Vita Greg. IV, 68 and the Christianized meaning of consul in Moral. IV, 30,59).

Sources: CPL (1995), 1708-1721; CCL 140-144 (Ep., In evang., In Ezech., Moral., In cant., In 1 Reg.); SC 251, 260, 265 (Dial.), 381-382 (Past.), 351, 391, 432, 449, 469 (In 1 Reg.); for the Vitae see CPL 1722-1723, BHL (1898-1899), 3636-3651; Suppl. (1911), 3636-3648; Novum Suppl. (1986), 3637-3651c.

Bibliography: (For bibl. references see those of R. Godding indicated below, the relevant reviews and additions, the works indicated in the manuals of patrology and the dictionaries and encyclopedias. Only the most recent contributions and those mentioned in the body of the article follow below in chronological order). R. Godding, Bibliografia di Gregorio Magno (1890–1989) (Opere di Gregorio Magno Complementi 1), Rome 1990. Entries on Gregory by V. Monachino, in BS 7, 222-278; R. Klein, in Reallexikon der Germanischen Altertumskunde 12, 608-612; S. Boesch Gajano, in EPapi 1, 546-574; M. Fiedrowicz, in LACL ³2002, 259-262.

Studies: J. Deshusses, Le sacramentaire grégorien. Ses principales formes d'après les plus anciens manuscrits (Spicilegium Friburgense 16, 24, 28), Fribourg (Switzerland) 1971, 1979, 1982; M. Walther, Pondus, Dispensatio, Dispositio. Werthistorische Untersuchungen zur Frömmigkeit Papst Gregors des Großen, Bern 1941; J.M. Petersen, Did Gregory the Great know Greek?: Studies in Church History 13 (1976) 121-134; J. Richards, Consul of God: The Life and Times of Gregroy the Great, London-Boston 1980; P. Meyvaert, Le Libellus responsionum à Augustin de Cantorbéry. Une oeuvre authentique de Saint Grégoire le Grand, in J. Fontaine - R. Gillet - S. Pellistrandi (eds.), Grégoire le Grand, Paris 1986, 543-550; G. Arnaldi, L'approvvigionamento di Roma ai tempi di Gregorio Magno: StudRom 34 (1986) 25-39; F. Clark, The Authorship of the Gregorian Dialogues. A Challenge to the Traditional View: SP 18/4 (1990) 120-132; B. De Margerie, Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégèse, IV. L'Occident latin, Paris 1990, 141-185; L. La Piana, L'Omelia in S. Gregorio Magno: EphLit 104 (1990) 51-64; V. Paronetto, Gregorio Magno e gli Anglosassoni, Rome 1990; E. Pitz, Papstreskripte im frühen Mittelalter. Diplomatische und rechtsgeschichtliche Studien zum Brief-Corpus Gregors des Großen, Sigmaringen 1990; C. Azzara, Gregorio, i Longobardi e l'Occidente barbarico. Costanti e peculiarità di un rapporto: Bollettino dell'Istituto Storico Italiano per il Medioevo 97 (1991) 1-74; S. Müller, "Feruorem discamus amoris." Das Hohelied und seine Auslegung bei Gregor dem Großen, Diss. Theol. 46, St. Ottilien 1991; A. Bruzzone, Sulla lingua dei "Dialogi" di Gregorio Magno: Studi latini e italiani 5 (1991) 195-280; 6 (1992) 181-283; G. Cracco, Francis Clark e la storiografia sui "Dialogi" di Gregorio Magno: RSLR 27 (1991) 115-124; L. Giordano (ed.), Gregorio Magno. Il maestro della comunicazione spirituale e la tradizione gregoriana in Sicilia, Catania 1991; Gregorio Magno e il suo tempo (SEA 33-34), Rome 1991; M. Banniard, Viva voce. Communication écrite et communication orale du IVᵉ au IXᵉ siècle en Occident latin (Collection d'Études Augustiniennes 25), Paris 1992, 105-179; Ch. Pietri - L. Pietri, Église universelle et "respublica christiana" selon Grégoire le Grand, in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes. Miscellanea Saxer, Vatican City 1992, 647-665; P. Stefanetti, Tipologia e teologia simbolica nelle Omelie sugli Evangeli di San Gregorio Magno, Rome 1992; F.E. Consolino, I doveri del principe cristiano nel "Registrum Epistularum" di Gregorio Magno: Augustinianum 33 (1993) 57-82; M. Banniard, "Zelum discretione condire." Langages et styles de Grégoire le Grand dans sa correspondance, in Papauté, monachisme et théorie politiques. Mélanges Marcel Pacaut 1, Lyon 1994, 29-46; B. Calati, Sapienza monastica. Saggi di storia, spiritualità e problemi monastici (Studia Anselmiana 117), Rome 1994, 176-193, 315-364, 468-489; E. Gandolfo, Gregorio Magno. Papa in un'epoca travagliata e di transizione, Rome 1994; B. McGinn, The Presence of God. A History of Western Christian Mysticism, 2. The Growth of Mysticism. From Gregory the Great to the Twelfth Century, New York-London 1994, 34-79; G. Arnaldi, Gregorio Magno e la giustizia, in La giustizia nell'Alto Medioevo (secoli V-VIII) (Settimane del Centro Italiano di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo 42/1), Spoleto 1995, 57-102; J.C. Cavadini, Gregory the Great. A Symposium, Notre Dame, IN 1995; M. Fiedrowicz, Das Kirchenverständnis Gregors des Großen (RQA, Suppl. 50), Rome 1995; L. Giordano, Saggi di ermeneutica gregoriana, Catania 1995; S.Ch. Kessler, Gregor der Große als Exeget. Eine theologische Interpretation der Ezechielhomilien (IThS 43), Innsbruck-Vienna 1995; P. Meyvaert, Uncovering a Lost Work of Gregory the Great. Fragments of the Early Commentary on Job: Traditio 50 (1995) 55-74; P. Riché, Petite vie de saint Grégoire le Grand (540–604), Paris 1995; M. Doucet, Modernité de Grégoire le Grand. Son travail de vérification des documents: BLE 97 (1996) 119-135; G. Hofer, "Victrix ratio" – "Vera philosophia." La "rationalitas" nei contenuti e nelle strutture argomentative di Gregorio Magno: SM 37 (1996) 625-670; V. Recchia, Gregorio Magno papa ed esegeta biblico (Quaderni di Invigilata Lucernis 4), Bari 1996; Id., Le "circumstantiae personarum" e la teologia della storia secondo la meditazione biblica di Gregorio Magno, Hom. in Ezechielem 2,1: Invigilata Lucernis 18-19 (1996–1997) 201-241; A. de Vogüé, L'auteur du commentaire des Rois attribué à saint Grégoire. Un moine de Cava?: RBen 106 (1996) 319-331; F. Clark, The Authorship of the Gregorian Dialogues. The State of the Question: SP 33 (1997) 407-417; B. Judic, Grégoire le Grand, un maître de la parole, in R.M. Dessì - M. Lauwers (eds.), La parole du prédicateur Vᵉ-XVᵉ siècle, Nice 1997, 49-107; R.A. Markus, Gregory the Great and His World, Cambridge 1997; M. Simonetti, Gregorio Magno e la nascita dell'Europa: VetChr 34 (1997) 311-327; F. Clark, Authorship of the Commentary In 1 Regum. Implications of A. de Vogüé's Discovery: RBen 108 (1998) 61-79; E. Gandolfo, Gregorio Magno, servo dei servi di Dio, Vatican City 1998; L. Giordano, Giustizia e potere giudiziario ecclesiastico nell'Epistolario di Gregorio Magno (Quaderni di VetChr 25), S. Spirito (Bari) 1998; M. Schambeck, Contemplatio als Missio. Zu einem Schlüsselphänomen bei Gregor dem Großen (Studien zur systematischen und spirituellen Theologie 25), Würzburg 1999; C.E. Straw, Gregory I, in A.D. Fitzgerald (ed.), Augustine Through the Ages. An Encyclopedia, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 402-405; Id., Gregory the Great: Perfection in Imperfection, Berkeley, CA 1988; M. Doucet, L'ordo expositionis dans les Moralia de Saint Grégoire le Grand: BLE 101 (2000) 99-120; S.Ch. Kessler, Gregor der Große und seine Theorie der Exegese. Die Epistula ad Leandrum, in L'esegesi dei Padri latini. Dalle origini a Gregorio Magno 2 (SEA 68), Rome 2000, 691-700; J. Stern, Israel et l'Église dans l'exégese de saint Grégoire le Grand, in ibid., 675-689; A. de Vogüé, Du nouveau sur les Dialogues de saint Grégoire?: Collectanea Cistercensia 62 (2000) 193-198; Id., Les vues de Grégoire le Grand sur l'action missionaire en Angleterre, in C. De Dreuille, L'Église et la Mission au VIᵉ siècle. La mission d'Augustin de Cantorbéry et les Églises de Gaule sous l'impulsion de Grégoire le Grand, Paris 2000, 55-64; H. Chadwick, The Church in Ancient Society. From Galilee to Gregory the Great, Oxford 2001, 658-674; G. Cremascoli, L'esegesi biblica di Gregorio Magno, Brescia 2001; R.L. Wilken, Interpreting Job Allegorically. The "Moralia" of Gregory the Great: Pro ecclesia 10 (2001) 213-226; C. Ricci, Mysterium dispensationis. Tracce di una teologia della storia in Gregorio Magno (Studia Anselmiana 135), Rome 2002; M. Iadanza, Il console di Dio. Pensiero e azione sociale nel Registrum Epistolarum di Gregorio Magno, Naples 2003; Gregorio Magno nel XIV centenario della morte, Accademia naz. dei Lincei, Rome 2004; G.I. Gargano (ed.), L'eredità spirituale di Gregorio Magno tra Occidente e Oriente, San Pietro in Cariano 2006.

C. Ricci

GREGORY the Illuminator (ca. 260–ca. 328). Saint, apostle of the Armenians. His life is recounted, not without anachronisms and contradictions, by the History of "Agatangelos" (ca. 490?), whose essential core is, nevertheless, believable, because it is confirmed by independent witnesses. According to the History, Gregory, of noble origin, embraced Christianity at *Caesarea in Cappadocia; when he returned to *Armenia, King Tiridates II had him tortured so that he might abjure the faith and, not succeeding, had him thrown into a pit, in which Gregory remained for 15 years. Meanwhile, the emperor *Diocletian fell hopelessly in love with Hripsimè, a Christian virgin who lived in a monastery. To save her, Gaianè, the superior of the monastery, took her, with 35 other nuns, to Armenia. At Diocletian's request, the fugitives were discovered by Tiridates, who himself fell in love with Hripsimè and, faced with her refusal, condemned her and her companions to martyrdom. Tiridates lost the use of his reason as a divine punishment. It was revealed to his sister Khosrovidukht' in a dream that only the intercession of Gregory could cure the ruler. The apostle, after having buried the holy martyrs, healed the king and converted him to Christianity, which became the official religion of Armenia. The homilies that Armenian tradition assigns to Gregory are spurious.

BS 7, 180-190; LTK[2] 4, 1206-1207; BBKL 2, 331.

S.J. Voicu

GUNDEMAR (d. 612). *Visigothic king, successor to Witteric after his assassination (610). During his reign he published two decrees that have been conserved and that declare the See of *Toledo the metropolitan of the ecclesiastical province of Cartagena. One is the agreement on the matter reached by the bishops of the province of Cartagena while united in Toledo in October 610; the other is the confirmation of the agreement on the part of the king. It has been held that these texts are apocryphal (G.B. Pérez, Baluze), but this suspicion is not accepted by Flórez.

Gundemar gave stability to Catholicism in his states and defended it from the Basques and the Byzantines.

Decretum de ecclesia Toletana: CPL 1234; PL 80, 179-184; PL 84, 482-484; C. García Goldaraz, El códice Lucense de la Colección Canónica Hispana, III, Rome 1954, 231-234; J.F. Rivera Recio, Encumbramiento de la Sede Toledana durante la dominación vigótica: Hispania Sacra 8 (1955) 3-34; E.A. Thompson, The Goths in Spain, Oxford 1969, 159-160; L.A. García Moreno, Historia de España Visigoda, Madrid 1989, 145-147.

E. Romero Pose

H

HABAKKUK (iconography). The figure of Habakkuk in early Christian iconography is closely linked to the depiction of Daniel in the lions' den (Bel [Dan 14 Vg] 31-39). Habakkuk is unknown in Roman painting. He appears, no earlier than the 4th c., on Roman and Italic *sarcophagi, more rarely on Iberian and Gallic, almost always in a short, belted tunic, often in an exomis, his legs wrapped, approaching Daniel with food in his hand, on a plate or in a basket. The food is usually one or more loaves marked with a cross or, more rarely, a fish. The food Habakkuk brings is obviously a clear allusion to the salvific food; so the image of the prophet accentuates the concept of salvation already implicit in the portrayal of Daniel among the lions. At times the figure of an angel is inserted in the composition, generally opposite Habakkuk, as on a sarcophagus at *Arles (Ws. 122,3), where Habakkuk (bearded) and the angel (headless) are portrayed: the first offers fish, the latter bread. On the left side of a fragmentary sarcophagus from the mid-4th c. preserved at Brescia (Ws 208,10), the angel is depicted with a raised hand that seizes Habakkuk by the hair to carry him into the pit with Daniel (Bel 36): the prophet has a plate in his hand with fish and bread on it. The only pictorial evidence (late 4th c.) is that in the hypogeum of S. Maria in Stelle in Verona (Dorigo, fig. 4), in which Habakkuk has a plate with loaves of bread in his left hand and in his right a small amphora. Habakkuk appears on objects in ivory (e.g., a 6th-c. pyx at the British Museum: Volbach, n. 167), on some African lamps (Ennabli, nn. 32-46), in the codex of *Cosmas Indicopleustes (9th c.)—the prototype for which, however, is 6th c. (Stornaiolo, pl. 50)—and on other objects pertaining to furnishings of various sorts. Habakkuk is shown independently on a panel of the wooden door of St. Sabina at Rome (5th c.): at the far left the angel seizes Habakkuk by the hair as he is about to bring a plate with three loaves of bread to fieldworkers (Bel 33-36), here represented by a goatherd pasturing three goats (Jeremias, pl. 33).

The minor prophet Habakkuk—it is uncertain whether he is the same Habakkuk as in the episode with Daniel—is portrayed in a mosaic of Hosios David (mid-5th c.) at *Thessalonica (Volbach-Hirmer, pl. 135), in the 6th-c. codex of Rabbula (Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., pl. 7b) and with Nahum in the codex of Cosmas Indicopleustes (Stornaiolo, pl. 33).

DACL 6, 2, 1930ff.; BS 1, 8ff.; LCI 2, 204, C. Stornaiolo, Le miniature della topografia cristiana di Cosma Indicopleuste (vat. gr. 699), Milan 1908; W. Dorigo, L'ipogeo di S. Maria in Stelle in Val Patena (Verona): Saggi e Memorie di Storia dell'Arte 6 (1968) 9-31; Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage; Rom und Ostia, ed. F.W. Deichmann - G. Bovini - H. Brandemburg, Wiesbaden 1967; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1976; E. Ennabli, Lampes chrétiennes de Tunisie, Paris 1976; G. Jeremias, Die Holztür der Basilika S. Sabina in Rom, Tübingen 1980; M. Perraymond, Abacuc e il cibo soterico: iconografia e simbolismo (Dan. 14, 33-39): SMSR 16 (1992) 67-93; TIP 89-91.

D. Calcagnini

HADRIAN, emperor (76–138). Ruled 117–138, culminating a brilliant political career, having established himself as a person of vast culture (a typical product of the fusion of the Roman and Greek worlds) and a brave soldier. Hadrian succeeded Trajan, whose great-granddaughter Vibia Sabina he married. He traveled widely throughout the empire, had grandiose monuments built at Athens, Jerusalem, Rome (Hadrian's mausoleum) and other cities, as well as the famous Hadrian's Wall in Britain. He had the perpetual edict codified and reorganized the imperial administration. Possessing little religious spirit, he was nonetheless tolerant toward Christians: in a rescript to Minucius Fundanus, proconsul of Asia, he threatened punishments for anonymous denunciations and violence toward Christians, ordering that procedural rules be followed to arrive at condemnations, and this only for specific crimes (Just., 1 Apol. 68; Eus., HE 4,9). Hadrian's rescript can be linked to Trajan's: with the latter, however, those accused of Christianity could be convicted or acquitted based either on evidence adduced by the judge or by their own replies; Hadrian's rescript, rather, brought anti-Christian trials into the realm of common law, requiring accusers to prove the guilt of the accused, with provision for the punishment of calumniators. Trajan's rescript did not sanction false accusers because he wanted to facilitate the pardoning of apostates.

M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965, 151ff.; G. Lanata, Gli atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 60ff.; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan 2004; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; E. Andreoni Fontecedro, "Animula uagula blandula": Adriano debitore di Plutarco: QUCC 55 (1997) 59-69; A. Ziólkowski, Storia di Roma, It. tr., Milan 2000; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

HADRIAN, exegete (d. before 450). Syrian by birth, Hadrian, exegete of the school of *Antioch, is probably the same as the monk and priest of the same name, addressee of three letters of St. Nilus (PG 79, 225, 437 and 516). He lived in the 5th c. (probably died between 440 and 450) and was remembered by Cassiodorus (Inst. div. I, 10) among the introductores Scripturae divinae, after *Tyconius and *Augustine, and before *Eucherius and *Junilius. We have his Introduction to the Sacred Scriptures in Greek, which is a kind of biblical hermeneutic. (The term εἰσαγωγή appears here for the first time as the title of a book.)

In three sections Hadrian deals with figures of thought (including anthropomorphisms), of word and of construction (here adding a brief review of a wide variety of tropes). This work, which shows a fine sense of language and originality in the distinction of rhetorical figures, is a reasonable tool for the interpretation of Scripture.

CPG 6527. D. Hoeschen, Augsburg 1602 (= PG 98, 1271-1312); F. Goessling, Berlin 1887; Bardenhewer IV, 254-55; EC 1,335; G. Mercati, Pro Adriano: RBi 1914, 246-55; M. Fiedrowics, Principes de l'interprétation de l'Écriture dans l'Église ancienne, Bern 1998, 175-177; R. Sanz, La introducción a las Sagradas Escrituras de el Monje. Edición crítica y estudio, Tesi Ist. Patr. Augustinianum, Rome 2000.

A.V. Nazzaro

HADRIAN of Canterbury (d. late 7th c.). Native African, abbot at Nisida, near Naples, was appointed by Pope Vitalian in 668 to fill the office of bishop of Canterbury in England, which had been vacant. A man of study, Hadrian declined the post and suggested Theodore, a Greek living at Rome, as a person more apt for the task. Vitalian accepted the suggestion, ordaining Theodore bishop of Canterbury, but sent Hadrian to England with him to look after the doctrinal and cultural responsibilities of the mission. He was abbot at the monastery of Peter and Paul at Canterbury, and his teaching of the Sacred Scriptures was much praised.

DHGE 1,612; M. Lapidge, The School of Theodore and Hadrian: ASE 15 (1986) 45-72.

M. Simonetti

HADRIAN of Nicomedia (d. 303). Martyr under Domitian. On 4 March the Mart. hier. records an official of the Roman army under this name, martyred at the time of the emperor *Diocletian. Hadrian, a jailer who was struck by the faith and firmness of 23 Christian prisoners who were tortured, converted to Christianity, was arrested and condemned to death with them. According to the Greek passio (BHG 27-29), after his hands and feet were cut off, he was killed with a hammer in front of his wife, Natalia, who had supported and encouraged him during his imprisonment. His body, together with those of his 23 companions in martyrdom, was transported to *Byzantium by a certain Eusebius and buried in a place called Argiroupoli, where Natalia was also later buried. She wanted to be buried beside him, acc. to the classic practice that had nonetheless gained new significance in the Christian setting, that of the union and faithfulness of the beloved even in death and burial. Hadrian is thus also remembered 1 December, the day of Natalia's death. The saint of Nicomedia's cult spread quickly, including in the West; at Rome, Pope *Honorius (626–638) had a church built in his honor in the Senatorial Curia, and a diaconia was built there about a century and a half later. Its presence there next to the nearly contemporary church of S. Martina gave rise in the Middle Ages to the conviction that she, and not Natalia, was Hadrian's wife. The celebration of the saint 8 September, recorded in the martyrologies of Bede, Florus, and Adonis and accepted in the Mart. rom., is probably due not so much to the translation of the relics to Rome, attested only relatively recently, as to the procession in honor of the Madonna starting in front of the church of St. Hadrian. Pope *Sergius I (687–701) designated this church as a gathering place and point of departure for the Marian processions of the Annunciation, the Assumption, Candlemas and Christmas. In the East Hadrian is celebrated 26 August, both by the Greek and Armenian Synaxaria, while the Copts remember him 19 August.

AASS Septembris, III, 209-255 (Paris 1866); BHG 27-29e; BHL 3744-45e; BS I, 269-71; Cath V, 478-9; DHGE I, 608-10; LCI V, 36-8; LTK[3] IV, 1137; Grande Libro dei Santi I, 25-6.

V. Novembri

HADRIAN of Nicomedia (d. 315?). Martyr under *Licinius. The Greek synaxaria also celebrate another Hadrian, a martyr at the time of Licinius, almost unknown to Latins and inserted in the Mart. rom. by Baronius. According to the Greek passio (BHG 26), in many respects fantasy, Hadrian was the Christian son of the Caesar Probus (276–282). Having gone to Nicomedia to preach and to ask the emperor to end the persecutions, he was imprisoned and tortured for this, and ultimately beheaded. His brother, then bishop of Constantinople, took charge of his burial. The actual existence of this martyr is controversial: On the one hand, authoritative scholars, among them Delehaye (Mart. rom.), consider him a duplication of the other Hadrian, also a martyr at Nicomedia and buried at Constantinople, but at the time of *Diocletian; acc. to the Bollandists Pinius and Stilting, on the other hand, the two martyrs are to be considered different persons.

AASS Augusti, V, 808-11; BHG 26; BS I, 271; DHGE I, 610-11; Prop. AASS Dec., 46; Grande Libro dei Santi I, 26.

V. Novembri

HADRUMETUM. Ancient Hadrumetum, made a colonia by *Trajan, was part of Proconsular Africa until *Diocletian, then made capital of the new province of Byzacena; renamed Hunericopolis under the *Vandals, Justinianopolis after the Byzantine reconquest, and is now the city of Sousse (Tunisia). Christianity arrived early at Hadrametum; some of its martyrs go back to the early 3rd c., some catacombs to the mid-3rd c. Of its martyrs we know Maiulus (Tertull., Scap. 3,5), Rutilius (Tertull., Fug. 5,3), Boniface and Thecla (DHGE 9,923), Felix (ibid., 16,904) and Victorinus (Victor of Vita, Hist. pers. Afr. 3,4–5,4 1), from the time of the Vandal domination. Of its bishops we know Polycarp (256), Abundantius (345–358), Philologus (397–411), the Donatist Victorinus, Felix (437), Servitius (484), Servus Dei (525) and *Primasius (553). A number of councils were held in the city: general councils for Africa in 397 and 507, provincial councils in 541 and 646. For monks of the local monastery disturbed by the problem regarding grace, Augustine wrote De gratia et libero arbitrio (426) and De correptione et gratia (427), which reestablished peace in the community. The Christian importance of the city was made clear by the five catacombs, now inaccessible, found there at the time of the French occupation. The early Christian era ended with the Arab attack of 647.

DACL 6, 1981-2010, LTK[1] 2, 671-2; DHGE 1, 705-801, passim; 22, 1493-1496; PWK 7/2, 2178-80; F. Leynaud, Les catacombes africaines: Sousse Hadrumète, Sousse 1910; A. Ferrua, Hadrumetum. Le iscrizioni delle catacombe: Aevum 47 (1973) 189-209; J.-L. Maier, L'épiscopat de l'Afrique romaine, vandale et byzantine, Neuchâtel 1973, 151; C. Lepelley, Les cités de l'Afrique romaine au Bas-Empire, Paris 1981, 2, 261-264; Encyclopédie berbère, 22, Hadrumetum-Hidjaba, Aix-en-Provence 2000, 3307-3461.

V. Saxer

HAERESES, ADVERSUS OMNES. A short catalog of 32 heresies by an unknown author, in the past falsely attributed to *Tertullian because it was included as an appendix to De praescriptione haereticorum, for its similar theme. Scholars differ on whether it was written first in Greek and then translated into Latin, or vice versa. It must have been written at Rome in the first decades of the 3rd c. at the time of Pope *Zephyrinus (d. 217); some have attributed it to Zephyrinus or to his circle. Schwartz maintains that this catalog, composed in Greek at Rome at the beginning of the 3rd c., was translated into Latin and reworked in an anti-*Origenist sense by *Victorinus of Petovium, to whom *Jerome attributes a similar work (De viris ill. 74). This hypothesis was rightly rejected by M. Dulaey. It cannot be demonstrated that the author draws on the Syntagma of *Hippolytus; he does draw on *Justin and *Irenaeus; later writers also used the work. The author briefly expounds the heretical opinions of various personages, beginning with *Simon Magus, without drafting a refutation. To the heretics mentioned by Irenaeus he adds others such as Dositheus, Apelles, the two *Theodotuses (the tanner and the banker), *Praxeas, etc.

CPL 34; Verzeichnis, Ps. TE hae; CPPM II, 1621; PL 2, 61-74; CSEL 47, 213-226; CCL 2, 1399-1410; PLS 1, 29; Eng. tr.: ANF 3, 649-654; DTC 15, 2285; A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, urkundlich dargestellt, Leipzig 1884 (repr., Hildesheim 1963); A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, Leipzig 1904, 2, 430-431; E. Schwartz, Zwei Predigten Hippolytus: SBA, Fasc. 3, Munich 1936, 38-45; J. Hausleiter, Victorinus von Pettau: PE 20, 614-619; PW 8A, 2, 2081-2085; Nouvelle Histoire de la littérature latine, ed. R. Herzog, Turnhout 2000, 5, 466-471; M. Dulaey, Victorin de Poetovio, Paris 1993, 45-50; R. Bratoz, Il cristianesimo aquileiese prima di Costantino fra Aquileia e Poetovio, Udine 1999.

A. Di Berardino

HAGIOGRAPHY

I. Sources - II. Questions of method - III. Holiness.

Hagiography is a branch of the historical disciplines with the purpose of the scientific study of the life, cult and legends of the saints. It is of primary importance for Christian *archaeology in its various specializations.

I. Sources.

1. Calendars and martyrologies (see separate entries).

2. Liturgical books. From the early 2nd c., first the martyrs, then saints of other types, were venerated and a cult grew up around them. For this reason all of the liturgical texts that pertain to the sanctorals are relevant for hagiography (e.g., *canons, *anaphorae, *sacramentaries, synaxaries).

3. Documentary and narrative sources. These include inscriptions, itineraries, diplomatic sources, chronicles, annals, *letters, memoirs, *panegyrics, Acts (authentic documents of the martyrs), passions (apologetic-catechetical documents), legends (romanticized passions), vitae sanctorum, narrationes animae utiles of the monastic milieu, libelli miraculorum* (accounts of miracles at the tombs of the saints and written primary sources of pilgrimages), accounts of the finding, and translation of relics (i.e., the transfer of remains from one place to another).

II. Questions of method.

1. Heuristics. The first stage of hagiographical work is the research of documents (the saint's "dossier"), facilitated by the existence of repertoria. Still useful is the Repertorium fontium historiae Medii Aevi. Also useful are the catalogs of MSS of the great libraries (Vatican, Paris etc.), if one is looking for unpublished material on a saint. Indispensable as well are the specialized repertories (Catalogi codicum hagiographicorum) published by the Bollandists in the Subsidia Hagiographica of Paris, Brussels, Rome and the Vatican. The various hagiographical libraries—Latin (BHL), Greek (BHG) and Eastern/Oriental (BHO)—are useful for a first approach to both published and unpublished material. A review of recently cataloged hagiographical texts and MSS has appeared in the AB (1970ff.) under the title Catalogues récents de manuscrits.

2. Textual criticism. The critical text of the Life, the miracles, the finding or translation of a saint are established acc. to the usual rules of classical philology. Classification of MSS, their genealogy and evaluation of variants are done to determine, if not the original text, at least the common archetype for all surviving MSS. Textual-critical problems for hagiographical texts are nevertheless often unique. In the case of a unique MS, the editing must be diplomatic (with all the abbreviations and particularities of the text); ordinarily, however, not only are there numerous testimonies but also multiple recensions. The problem is then to present them as successive stages of a living text that has evolved and adapted to the various needs of those who use it. Once the critical text has been established, historical questions remain open: author, date, provenance, Sitz im Leben etc. The determination of the sources provides one of the essential criteria of historical criticism. All of this research makes possible a judgment on the literary genre of the hagiographical text, which makes possible a distinction between a reliable account or one that is rhetorical or one-sided, or a hagiographical romance.

3. Critique of the cult. One of the most difficult problems of hagiography consists of poorly or little-documented saints, whose very existence may sometimes be a question. H. Delehaye developed verification criteria for this problem: the "hagiographical coordinates." If certain conditions are met, the criteria allow a scholarly movement from the cult to the saint. The classical examples are provided by the Roman Depositiones,* the Calendar of Carthage or the *Syriac Martyrology. This method not only makes possible the distinction between homonymous saints, but also the ascertainment of the existence of a cult at the time of the document. The closer the document is to the time of the saint's death and to the sanctuary where he is buried, the stronger the guarantee of authenticity, not only of the cult, but also of the saint; one thus moves, using these criteria, from the cult to the saint. The coordinates can be in a funeral inscription, in local calendars, in itineraries, passions, lives and sacramentaries. Among these, the most important and authentic coordinates are the place of burial and the anniversary of the historical saint. Martyrologies are more difficult to interpret, as possibilities for error multiply the further one gets from the original sources. But even the errors in a document or a deliberate falsification tell us, not so much about the saint, but about the history of his cult and the intentions of his devotees.

III. Holiness. Hagiography is also necessary for clarifying the concept of holiness through the centuries. Areas to be considered include: holiness in paganism, Judaism and Christianity; the types of saints (martyrs, apostles, ascetics, virgins, bishops, soldiers), martyrdom as the basic model of all holiness; Christ as the protomartyr; the mission of the saint (nonviolence, martyrdom, witness to the faith, chastity, miracles); the intercessor saint; the patron saint; hagiographical metaphors (militia Christi, athlete of Christ, etc.); the various types of veneration of the saints as compared with the cult of the heroes and with the Hebrew cult of the OT righteous (P.W. van der Horst, Japheth in the Tents of Shem: Studies on Jewish Hellenism in Antiquity, Leuven 2002, 119-137); canonization; and special problems (suicide saints, tyrannicide, etc.).

Manuals: R. Grégoire, Manuale di agiologia, Fabriano [2]1996; R. Aigrain, L'hagiographie. Ses sources, ses méthodes, son histoire, Brussels [2]2000; G. Philippart (ed.), Hagiographies. Storia internazionale della letteratura agiografica latina e volgare in Occidente dalle origini al 1550, 1ff., Turnhout 1994–. Encyclopedia: BS. Indexes: in the volumes of the Analecta Bollandiana. Sources: BHG; BHL; BHO; CPL 781-786; Verzeichnis 49-90. Archaeology: RivAC 71 (1995) 183-186. Iconography: LCI 5-8. Magazines: AB; Hagiographica.

LMA 4, 1840-1862; RAC 14, 1-183; RAC, Suppl. 1, 1171-1326; LACL[3] 311-313; H. Günter, Legenden-Studien, Cologne 1906; E. Lucius, Les origines du culte des saints dans l'église chrétienne, Paris 1908; L. Petit, Bibliographie des Acolouthies Grecques, Brussels 1926; H. Delehaye, Étude sur le légendier romain, Brussels 1936; E. Donckel, Ausserrömische Heilige in Rom, Luxemburg 1938; G. Philippart, Les légendiers latins et autres manuscrits hagiographiques, Turnhout 1977; M. Puzicha, Vita iusti (dial. 2,2). Grundstrukturen altkirchlicher Hagiographie bei Gregor dem Großen, in E. Dassmann - K.S. Frank (eds.), Pietas, Münster 1980, 284-312; F. Leo, Die griechisch-römische Biographie nach ihrer literarischen Form, Leipzig 1901, repr. Hildesheim 1990; E. Schurr, Die Ikonographie der Heiligen, Dettelbach 1997; N. Everett, The Hagiography of Lombard Italy: Hagiographica 7 (2000) 49-126; R. Henke, Autobiographie und Hagiographie. Das Proöm des taciteischen "Agricola" und seine Nutzung durch Petrus Diaconus, Bibliothekar von Monte Cassino: JbAC 44 (2001) 110-126; E. Elm, Die Macht der Weisheit. Das Bild des Bischofs in der Vita Augustini des Possidius und anderen spätantiken und frühmittelalterlichen Bischofsviten, Leiden 2003.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

HARMONIUS (3rd c.). Son of *Bardesanes. Like his father he composed hymns in *Syriac, into which he introduced Bardesanite doctrines. *Ephrem adapted new orthodox verses to Harmonius's old melodies, which remained in liturgical use (Soz., HE 3,16). Though Ephrem speaks of a son of Bardesanes, there is some doubt that his name was in fact Harmonius.

A. Camplani, Rivisitando Bardesane: Cristianesimo nella storia 19 (1998) 519-596.

E. Prinzivalli

HEALING of the MAN BORN BLIND

I. Literary sources - II. Iconography.

I. Literary sources. In addition to the healing of blind men in groups (Lk 7:21; Mt 15:30-31; 21:14), the NT records the following miracles related to blind men healed by Christ: one that occurred when he was leaving Capernaum, involving two blind men (Mt 9:27-31); another that occurred on a street in Jericho, also for a pair of blind men (Mt 20:29-34); the healing of the beggar Bartimaeus (Mk 10:46-52) or of an unknown blind man (Lk 18:35-43); again, a miracle in Bethsaida (Mk 8:22-26); and finally, one which took place near the pool of Siloam (Jn 9:1-41).

John's account has, before the imposition of mud mixed with saliva upon the eyes, the purification in the pool. Some fathers of the church, thinking primarily of this account, emphasize the baptismal symbolism of the miracle, because of the allusion which they found in it to the sacrament of illumination (Tertull., Bapt. V, 5; Ambrose, Sacr. II, 3,7 and Myst. 4,22-24; Chromat., Serm. 14; Cyprian, Test. III, 27 and Ep. 12,2). Others focus on the correspondence between the man born blind to the sinner from his birth, and the blind man illuminated to the man restored by the grace of baptism (Isidore, Alleg. 240; Bede, In Io. 9). For Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. V,15,13) and Augustine (In Io. 44,2) the washing in the pool of Siloam refers to the lavacrum baptismale, and what immediately precedes is to be identified with the catechumenate; for Ambrose (Sacr. III,11-15 and Ep. 80) it should be identified with humanity, whose heart had been blind, after Siloam opened their eyes. The miracle is also present in literature of a liturgical character; it is found in the Apostolic Constitutions (I,7,27) and in the two prayers of ps.-Cyprian (I,45; II,4) and appears later in the Roman biblical readings of the 7th c. for the liturgy of the catechumenal period. The same liturgical practice was carried out in Milan and Naples on Saturday of the third week of Lent (Magistretti, Monumenta, 151). In the Ambrosian liturgy the miracle of the healing of the man born blind enters into the prayers in the blessing of the baptismal font, bringing out its strict connection with the catechesis of initiation (ibid., 206).

II. Iconography. There are five iconographical groups of representations (De Bruyne, L'imposition, 144-150): (1) The blind man is standing, small compared to Christ, and lifts his arms in an act improperly said to be of prayer (Bisconti, Contributo, 17-27), while Jesus places his hands on the blind man's head. This is the most ancient iconography, prevalent in cemetery frescoes (Wp pls. 68; 70; II, 50), where apostles or spectators are never represented, and always present on *sarcophagi (Ws pls. 227,2; 157,2; 179,2; 39,1; 229,8). (2) Christ touches the eyes of the blind man. This form is unknown in painting, but is the most recurrent in sculpture (Ws pls. 29,3; 113,1; 286,10; 228,5; 184,5; 112,2 and 3; 158,3; 111,1; 116,2; 111,3; 96; 86,3; 127,1; 184,1; 206,7; 214,8; 215,7; 218,1 and 2; 229,1; 233,9; 235,7; 252,1; 260,2; 126,1; 127,2; 212,2; 128,1; 228,6; 226,2; 40,1; 285,2; 126,1; 228,3; 92,2; 145,7 and 8; 291,1). In a small subgroup Christ puts his left hand on the head of the man, while with his right hand he touches the man's eyes or cheek, or else makes some other sign to indicate his words (Ws pls. 9,2; 99,1; 115,1; 292,1; 45,2; 122,2; 113,3; 197,5). (3) The blind man appears kneeling with his hands raised, both in painting (Wp II, 204, but also see Leper) and in sculpture (Ws pl. 114,1). (4) The blind man is sitting; this position is found in sculpture (Ws pl. 220,1) and in the minor arts (Salvatore, Note, 80). (5) Two blind men—three in a sarcophagus of Pretestato (Wp pl. 208,1)—hold themselves up or else use a staff. This iconography appears only in sculpture (Ws pls. 230,5 and 6; 230,3; 214,6; 231,2) and primarily in a group of sarcophagi "of Bethesda" (Simon, Sur l'origine 201-223). The representation of the miracle, as all biblical scenes represented in paleo-Christian art, fits perfectly into the theme of salvation and rebirth (Bisconti, Sull'unità, 731ff.). The popularity of the man born blind continued into Late Antiquity and the early Middle Ages in literature (Miracula Christi, MGH, Auct. Ant. 10,412 and Prud., Dittoch. 129f.; Apoth. 686f.) and in art, as in the Codex Purpureus Rossanensis (Munoz, Il codex, 4f.) (4th c.) and on ivory, plaques, cruets and other miniatures (6th–9th c.) (Salvatore, Note, 83f.).

A. Muñoz, Il codice purpureo di Rossano e il frammento sinopense, Rome 1907; G. Morin, Liturgie et basiliques de Rome au milieu du VII^e siècle d'après des listes d'Évangiles de Würzburg: RBen 28 (1911) 303; M. Simon, Sur l'origine des sarcophages chrétiens du type Béthesda: Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire (1938) 202-223; L. De Bruyne, L'imposition des mains dans l'art chrétien ancien: RivAC 20 (1943) 144-150; M. Magistretti, Monumenta veteris liturgiae ambrosianae. Manuale ambrosiano, Milan 1944, S. Sabugal, La curación del ciego del nacimiento (Jn 9,1-41), Madrid 1977; M. Salvatore, Note sull'iconografia del miracolo del cieco: VetChr 16 (1979) 77-85; F. Bisconti, Contributo all'interpretazione dell'atteggiamento di orante, ibid. 17 (1980) 17-27; Id., Sull'unità del linguaggio biblico nella pittura cimiteriale romana, in Misc. S. Cipriani, Brescia 1981, 731-740; C. Ranucci, TIP, 200.

F. Bisconti

HEALING of TIBERIUS (Cura Sanitatis Tiberii). A Latin apocryphal writing which has many elements in common with the Prophecy of the Savior. It deals with the sending of Volusianus, the sickness and healing of Tiberius, and Pilate and the image of Christ brought to Rome by Veronica. The chapters on Nero, the letter to Claudius, the sections concerning Simon and the dispute with Peter, and finally the section on the death of Pilate in Armenia constitute an addition to the text itself. The work, which was popular in the medieval period, is difficult to date: perhaps 8th–9th c., perhaps 6th c.

CANT 69; BHL 4218; E. von Dobschütz, Christusbilder, 1899, 173-189 (critical ed.). It. tr.: Erbetta 1/2, 381-387 (without the last chapters); Moraldi 2, 754-764; Pol. tr.: Starowieyski 1/2, 704-712.

M. Starowieyski

HEGEMONIUS (3rd–4th c.). Name linked to one of the first anti-*Manichean works, the Acta disputationis Archelai cum Manete, handed down in Latin from a Greek original, attested only fragmentarily by *Epiphanius in the Panarion. In the MS which contains the translation of this work, Hegemonius claims to have transcribed the debate, whereas Jerome (De viris illustribus) attributes the work to Archelaus himself. The text, minimally narrative, is essentially the account of two fictitious public debates between the (otherwise unknown) Mesopotamian bishop Archelaus and Mani, in which the bishop quite obviously has the upper hand. The account gives many elements related to Mani's doctrine and life which, once subjected to an attentive and severe criticism, may prove useful for the reconstruction of primitive Manicheism; a piece of information on *Basilides is of notable importance for the history of *gnosticism. Fragments of the work became part of the History of the Church of Alexandria, precisely in the section where it continues *Eusebius of Caesarea's Historia ecclesiastica.

CPG 3570-3571; CPL 122. Editions of the Acta: PG 10, 1429-1524; Hegemonius. Acta Archelai, ed. Ch.H. Beeson (GCS 16), Leipzig 1906. Eng. tr. and commentary: S. Lieu - M. Vermes, [Hegemonius], Acta Archelai, Translation and Commentary (Manichaean Studies IV), Turnhout 2001. On the evidence of the History of the Church of Alexandria: T. Orlandi, Storia della Chiesa di Alessandria. I-II, Milan 1968-1970; Id., Coptic studies: 1. Encomio di Marco. 2. Le fonti copte di Severo di Ashmunein. 3. La leggenda di S. Mercurio, Milan 1968; E. Spät, The "Teachers" of Mani in the Acta Archelai and Simon Magus: VChr 58 (2004) 1-23.

A. Camplani

HEGESIPPUS (mid-2nd c.). Writer, probably of Jewish origin, who went to Rome via Corinth during the pontificate of *Anicetus (155–166) and remained there until the pontificate of *Eleutherus (174–189). Known as the author of five books of hypomnemata ("memories"), intended to relate "the tradition, without error, of the apostolic preaching"

(see Eus., HE 4,8,2), in evident polemic against *gnosticism. Hegesippus is one of the sources of *Eusebius of Caesarea, who gives some fragments of him, mostly on the history of the primitive *Jerusalem community (HE II, 23, 4-18; III, 20,1-2; 32,3,6; IV, 8, 2; 22, 2-7). It is disputed whether Eusebius's statement on Hegesippus's activity at Rome (Eus., HE 4,22, 3) refers to the verification of the authenticity of the apostolic tradition preserved there, or to the compilation of a list of the bishops of Rome. It was Hegesippus who claimed that the various gnostic groups originated from Jewish sects (Eus., HE 4, 22, 3).

Quasten I, 254-255 (ample bibl.); W. Telfer, Was Hegesippus a Jew?: HThR 53 (1960) 143-155; N. Hyldahl, Hegesipps Hypomnemata: STh 14 (1960) 70-113; A. Lumpe, Zum Hegesippsproblem: ByzF 3 (1968) 165-167; H. Kemler, Hegesipps römische Bischofsliste: VChr 25 (1971) 182-196; L. Abramowski, Diadoché und orthoi logoi bei Hegesipp: ZKG 87 (1976) 321-327; M. Kropp, Arabischäthiopische Übersetzungstechnik am Beispiel der Zena Ayhud (Yosippon) und des Tarikä Wäldä-'Amid: Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft 136 (1986) 314-346, M. Durst, Hegesipps Hypomnemata. Titel der Gattungsbezeichnung: RQA 84 (1989) 299-330.

F. Scorza Barcellona

HEGESIPPUS, pseudo (De bello judaico). Under the name Hegesippus (derivation from Lat. Josippus = Gk. Ἰώσηπος) we have a free translation of Flavius Josephus's De bello iudaico (Jewish War), which in the MSS is attributed to *Ambrose. Composed in the 4th or 5th c. in a careful style, it reduces the seven books of the original to five, abbreviating but also at times amplifying the Greek text. It goes back to the same time as the translation attributed to Rufinus and, similar to it, is an important witness of the transmission of the Jewish historian's famous work. In it Hegesippus claims to have also worked on the biblical books of Samuel and Kings. Similar summaries also exist in various Eastern languages.

PLS I, 576; PL 15, 2061-2310; V. Ussani, Hegesippi qui dicitur Historiae Libri V: CSEL 66,1 (1932); K. Mras, Die Hegesippus-Frage: AA WW 95 (1958) 143-153; O. Michel - O. Bauernfeind, Flavius Josephus, De Bello Judaico, I, Munich [2]1962, XXX-XXXI; G. Rowekamp, LACL (2002) 315-316.

B. Studer

HEGUMEN. From the Greek ἡγέομαι ("I guide, am at the head of"). The term indicated the superior of a community of monks or a group of *anchorites (the superior of the idiorrhythmic monasteries on Mt. Athos is still called hegumen). "Hegumen" is synonymous with προεστώς = praepositus and is the equivalent in the Greek world of the Latin abbot (Nilus, Ep. 1, 34; 2, 64; Soz., HE 6, 20).

DACL 11, 1838-1840; DIP 3, 1075; P. de Meester, De monachico statu iuxta disciplinam byzantinam (Codificazione canonica orientale, Fonti serie II fasc. X), Vatican City 1942, 202ff.; Th. Spidlík - M. Tenace - R. Cemus, Questions monastiques en Orient, Rome 1999, 117-142.

M.G. Bianco

HELENA (d. 328/329). Fl. Iulia Helena, mother of the emperor *Constantine I, venerated as a saint in the Greek and Latin churches. Born probably at Drepanum in *Bithynia (which changed its name to Helenopolis under Constantine: Soz., HE 2,2,5; Procopius, Aedif. 5,2,1-5), of humble origins (stabularia); wife or concubine of *Constantius Chlorus, who sent her away so that he could marry—for reasons of state—Theodora, stepdaughter of the Augustus *Maximian. She returned in honor in 306, when her son Constantine recalled her to court at *Trier, and then went to live at Rome in the palatio Sessoriano (today S. Croce in Gerusalemme, Rome), where a basilica was built before 325. She received the title of Augusta, perhaps in 325, and her effigy was minted on coins; the province of Helenopontus is named for her. She was converted to Christianity by her son Constantine (Eus., Vita C. 3,47). Famous for her works of charity and assistance, as well as for promoting the building of new churches in Rome, Constantinople and Palestine. She took a journey to the East and to Palestine during 327/328 (ibid. 3,42-47). A tradition known to St. Ambrose (De obitu Theod. 41-48), and present in the 5th-c. ecclesiastical histories, attributes to her the discovery on Golgotha of the "true" cross of the passion, a fragment of which she brought back to Rome and placed in the basilica of S. Croce. Died perhaps at Constantinople ca. 329 (in the spring of that year her effigy ceased to appear on coins), soon after returning from the pilgrimage in Palestine. Her body was transferred to Rome, in the mausoleum now called Tor Pignattara, on the Via Labicana. The splendid porphyry sarcophagus is now in the Vatican Museums. Helena's cult as a saint spread quickly in both East and West, often associated with that of Constantine; their two figures beside the cross often appear on balance-weights—symbol of equity and justice—and on Byzantine coins also used as amulets.

H. Leclercq, DACL VI, 2126-2135; on the Ambrosian version of the inventio of the cross, see C. Favez, L'épisode de l'invention de la Croix dans l'oration funèbre de Théodose par saint Ambroise: REL 10 (1932) 423-429; coins with the image of Helena in J. Maurice, Numismatique Constantinienne I, Paris 1908; iconog-raphy in E. Croce, BS 4, 992-995; S. Borgehammer, How the Holy Cross Was Found: From Event to Medieval Legend, Stockholm 1991; J.W. Drijvers, Helena Augusta: The Mother of Constantine the Great and Her Finding of the True Cross, Leiden 1992; H. Pohlsander, Helena: Empress and Saint, Chicago 1996.

M. Forlin Patrucco

HELENUS (d. after 268). Bishop of Tarsus, 2nd half of 3rd c. We know from *Dionysius of Alexandria's letter to Pope *Sixtus II that Pope *Stephen excommunicated Helenus, *Firmilian of Caesarea (Cappadocia) and the whole regions of *Cilicia, *Cappadocia and *Galatia because they rebaptized heretics (Eus., HE 7,5,4). At the time of Pope *Cornelius, Helenus participated in, and probably presided over, a synod at *Antioch (perhaps in 253) against the *Novatian heresy (Eus., HE 6,46,3); he also attended two other synods of Antioch (264 and 268), which condemned *Paul of Samosata (Eus., HE 7,27-30); he presided over the final sessions of the second synod because of Firmilian's death. He was one of the most eminent bishops of his region. Date of death unknown.

BS 4, 999; G. Bardy, Paul de Samosate, Louvain 21929, 295-315; J.A. Fischer, Die Synode zu Antiochien im Frühjahr 253 (?): AHC 17 (1985) 243-251; Id., Die antiochenischen Synoden gegen Paul von Samosata: AHC 18 (1986) 9-30; 11.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

HELIODORUS (d. before 404). Bishop of Altinum (near Aquileia), saint. Feast 3 July. Renounced a military career to become a priest. Friend of *Jerome, he was, with *Rufinus, *Chromatius and others, part of the *ascetic community of *Aquileia (ca. 372); he followed Jerome to Syria but later returned to Aquileia and became bishop of Altinum. As such he took part in the Council of Aquileia (381). He and Chromatius, now bishop of Aquileia, kept up a correspondence with Jerome, then at Bethlehem, relying on his help for scriptural questions (Jerome, Ep. 48-49) and sending him copyists and financial help. Jerome dedicated the Vulgate Wisdom books to them both.

DCB II, 887-888; BS 4, 1076-1077; PCBE 2, 965-967.

E. Prinzivalli

HELIOGABALUS (204–222). Emperor (218–222), his real name was Varius Avitus Bassianus, a native of *Emesa in *Syria: he came from a family of hereditary priests of the local sun-god, El Gabal, whence his surname. Proclaimed emperor at only 14 years of age by the soldiers stationed in Syria, in opposition to Opellius Macrinus (Caracalla's murderer), this corrupt young prince tried to impose a distinctly Eastern form of government on the whole empire. Given his enthusiasm for the solar cult, of which he was a priest, he did not defend the old Roman religion: indeed, acc. to Aelius Lampridius (Hist. Augusta: Vita Heliog. 3, 3ff.), he displayed a resolve to fuse all religions, including the christiana devotio, with his cult of the Sun. He was tolerant, if not benevolent, to the Christians, not out of eccentricity but because this attitude corresponded to the political line of the Severi; indeed, Heliogabalus's murder in 222 did not influence this policy, which was continued by his cousin *Alexander Severus.

C. Giannelli - S. Mazzarino, Trattato di Storia Romana, II, Rome 1962; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965, 237-239 and 434 (bibl.).; T. Optendrenk, Die Religionspolitik des Kaisers Elagabal im Spiegel der Historia Augusta, Bonn 1968; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; M. Christol, L'Empire romain du III^e siècle. Histoire politique (192-325 après J.-C.), Paris 1997; M. Frey, Untersuchungen zur Religion und zur Religionspolitik des Kaisers Elagabal, Stuttgart 1989.

L. Navarra

HELLADIUS of Caesarea (4th c.). Bishop of *Caesarea in Cappadocia, he succeeded *Basil in 379. Participated in the Council of *Constantinople (381) and the Synod of Constantinople (394), in which the schism between Agapius and Bagadius was resolved. At times his relations with *Gregory of Nyssa and *Gregory of Nazianzus were stormy, esp. when Helladius removed Sacerdos (Σακερδώς) from the direction of the hospice for the poor founded by Basil (Greg. Naz., Ep. 219-220).

DCB II, 889.

E. Prinzivalli

HELLADIUS of Tarsus (5th c.). Friend and fellow student of *Nestorius and a faithful companion of *Theodoret, Helladius is known to us through the Latin translation of seven letters, some of which, to tell the truth, are collective. The translation was done by *Rusticus, the Roman deacon deposed by *Vigilius in 550 and who, after an exile in Egypt, ended his days at *Constantinople in the convent of the *Acoemetae. For his collection Rusticus used the five-volume work Tragoedia by Irenaeus of Tyre, a loyal friend of Nestorius; from there he took Helladius's correspondence. In many letters addressed to *Alexander of Hierapolis, Helladius laments the intervention of the Egyptians. Before consenting, in a synodal letter in common with the bishops of *Cilicia, to the provisions of Ephesus in a letter addressed to the emperors, Helladius had addressed a letter to Nestorius himself in which the nobility of religious sentiment shows to what extent he felt forced to acquiesce.

CPG 6435-6443; ACO v. 1, 4, Berlin 1922-23, letters 157, 199, 202, 218, 252, 281, 282; PG 84, 675-746.

M. van Esbroeck

HELLENISM and CHRISTIANITY. It was inevitable that the Christian religion should confront, from its very beginnings, the Greek culture that had permeated first the Hellenistic world and then the Roman Empire itself. While Christian authors all agreed in their radical rejection of Greek religion—its anthropomorphic polytheism and its mythology—their attitudes to Greek philosophy display a gamut of different nuances, which can be summed up in three distinct positions: from the 1st to the 5th c., Christian authors oscillate between (1) a rejection and total condemnation, (2) a moderate openness, (3) and an enthusiasm, leading even to an impassioned defense of Hellenic thought, not prejudiced by the conviction—inherited from *Hellenistic Judaism—of its substantial dependence on the Hebrew books (see *theft of the Greeks). The question of the various Christian authors' attitude to Greek philosophy must always be kept distinct from the presence in their thought of doctrines coming from the various Greek philosophical schools (see *Aristotelianism; *Platonism and the Fathers; *Stoicism and the Fathers). The case of *Tertullian shows that his rejection of any type of rapport with Greek philosophy does not correspond to a total absence in his thought of the influence of Stoicism. St. Paul had already put the Christian communities on guard against the errors and deceptions represented by philosophy, identified sic et simpliciter with human and wordly knowledge and hence condemned (see the famous passage of Col 2:8); philosophical knowledge is not just a source of deception (Col 2:8) but also puffs up (1 Cor 8:1) and is immeasurably inferior to God's wisdom (1 Cor 1:25). Both *Tatian and *Athenagoras show themselves to possess a fair knowledge of Greek philosophy; but whereas Tatian shows only contempt for it, since he considers it dependent on "barbarian philosophy" (Ad Graecos c. 1, 2-4: Schwartz, c. 31 p. 31, 4-5) and full of incongruities and contradictions (c. 25 pp. 26,28-27,9), Athenagoras (Pro christ. c. 6 pp. 6,13-7,29 Schwartz) appreciates the teaching of the major philosophical schools: with the intention of demonstrating to the emperor *Marcus Aurelius that there is no real irreconcilability between Christian monotheism and Greek philosophy. He emphasizes that Philolaus, Plato, Aristotle and the Stoics themselves had affirmed the existence of one God (see pp. 7,23; 7,27). Tatian's completely negative attitude reappears in the author of the Cohortatio ad gentes, who rejects the doctrines of all the philosophers, emphasizes their contradictions and reaffirms, from ch. 9 on, Moses's greater antiquity than the Greeks.

*Justin martyr explores the line that Athenagoras had begun to trace: the theory of the dependence of the Greek philosophers on Moses (see 1 Apol. 44, 8-9 p. 36,28-37,4 Krüger; I, 59-60 pp. 50-51) is for him a proof of the presence in everyone, and hence also in the Greek philosophers, of "seeds of truth" (1 Apol. 44, 10 p. 37, 4-5). Moreover, the Greek writers succeeded in attaining a faint knowledge of the truth, either thanks to their reason, the fragment of the universal logos innate in human beings (2 Apol. 8, 1 p. 67, 5-6; 13, 5 p. 72, 6-7), or by participation in the "disseminated" gifts of the universal logos itself, which functions as "sower" (2 Apol. 8, 3 p. 67, 11; 10, 2 p. 68, 17-19; 13, 3 p. 71, 28-30). So not only is there no real opposition between philosophy and Christianity, but we may even affirm a substantial identity between them ("all speak in imitation of our doctrines," 1 Apol. 60, 10 p. 51, 13-14; "what all have said well, belongs to us Christians," 2 Apol. 13, 4 p. 72, 1-2).

In no patristic author does the rejection of Greek philosophy take on such virulent tones as in Tertullian: Quid ergo Athenis et Hierosolymis? Quid academiae et ecclesiae? Quid haereticis et Christianis? Nostra institutio de porticu Salomonis est, qui et ipse tradiderat dominum in simplicitate cordis esse quaerendum. Viderint qui stoicum et platonicum et dialecticum Christianismum protulerunt (De praescr. 7, 9-11). The last sentence of this passage shows that around the mid-2nd c., attempts at a synthesis of Christianity and philosophy were already being made, of the kind done by Justin, in whose work Stoic and Platonic influences are undeniable. Tertullian does not hesitate to assert that philosophy is the origin of all heresies, ipsae denique haereses a philosophia subornantur (De praeser. 7, 2 cf. De an. 3, 1 philosophis . . . patriarchis . . . haereticorum), basing himself on the authority of St. Paul's passage, Col 2:8, cited in De praescr. 7,7. This total rejection of philosophy is not mitigated by the admission that agreement sometimes exists between the philosophers and Christianity, plane non negabimus aliquando philosophos iuxta nostra sensisse (De an. 2, 1), and that Seneca often seems a Christian, Seneca saepe noster (De an. 20, 1). Tertullian's judgment of philosophy as the origin of all heresies is fully shared by *Hippolytus: all the leaders of the heretical sects drew on the philosophers (Ref. I, 4, 7-9 Wendland); in particular, *Valentinus appropriated Platonic and Stoic doctrines (Ref. VI, 3: 134, 9-11); *Secundus, *Ptolemy and *Heracleon "made use of the very teachings of the Greek sages" (Ref. VI, 4: 134, 13-14); and what *Basilides taught came not from Christ but from Aristotle (Ref. VII, 14: 191, 13-14 and 17-18). For Epiphanius, the various Greek philosophical systems should be counted among the heresies (Pan. 3, 1-9; 5, 1-8, 1: I 163-166 Holl); *Origen himself fell into heresy, deceiving his followers, because he was blinded by his excessive "Greek education" (Pan. 64, 72, 9: II 523, 14-18 Holl; see also H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1966, 100).

If Athenagoras and Justin had laid stress on the substantial harmony between Christianity and the teaching of the various Greek philosophical schools, and if Justin had gone so far as to connect philosophy with the universal logos—i.e., with Christ himself—in *Clement of Alexandria we see a further and consequent development of this tendency. In him there is not just a great openness to Greek thought: aware of the fact that the Christian religion could never have become a theology without the decisive contribution of Hellenism, in books I and VI of the Stromata he does not hesitate to defend the latter before the members of his own Christian community, the simpliciores, who felt only diffidence and fear of it, considering it, like Tertullian, the origin of all heresy. Clement considered the Hellenistic-Jewish theory of the dependence of the Greeks on the OT—which develops with a great show of erudition in books I, V and VI of the Stromata—a further reason not to reject philosophy. (Ch. 25 of book I of the Stromata is very instructive on the theme.) Like Justin, whose subject matter he develops and enriches through motifs and images from Hellenistic-Jewish philosophy and Philo, he affirms that the Greek philosophers succeeded in knowing part of the truth, thanks either to the divine element present in the human being (the intellect, image of the logos) or to the direct inspiration of the logos, which, in the guise of a sower, lets fall the good seeds, depicted as a beneficent rain (Strom. I 37, 2); into all those who engage in philosophy a divine rain is infused (Protr. 68, 2: I 52, 2-4). The different systems of Greek philosophy, with the single exception of the Epicurean, are thus fragments of the truth—identical with the logos—separated from each other like the members of Pentheus's body (Strom. I 57, 1: II 36, 8-11); by proceeding to the reunion of the partial truths dispersed in the various systems, it is possible to attain contemplation of the absolute truth (Strom. I 57, 6: II 36, 31-37, 2). For this reason philosophy as a whole is a clear image of the truth, a gift of God to the Greeks (Strom. I, 20, 1: II 29-30). Thanks to its coming from the divine logos, it plays in human history the providential role of preparing the Greeks for Christianity, as the Mosaic law had done for the Jews. Clement also makes his own Philo's conception of philosophy as "handmaiden of theology": this relation between philosophy and Christian theology is fulfilled both in history (Greek philosophy is an anticipation of Christianity) and in the progress toward higher gnosis of the Christian who wishes to become perfect, since it is philosophy that, guiding the exegesis of Scripture, discloses its truer, recondite meaning (on all these points see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 9-59).

Origen, even more than Clement, is aware of the need for a deeper knowledge of the "classical" systems of Greek philosophy (Platonism, Stoicism, Aristotelianism), and also of the most important philosophical works of the first three centuries AD, in view both of the construction of a "Christian theology" and of the defense of Christianity against the attacks of its enemies. (His work Contra Celsum is the clearest evidence of this latter intent.) For this reason, as he himself says in a letter preserved by Eusebius (HE VI, 19, 13: II 562, 12-17), he did not hesitate to follow the lectures of an Alexandrian philosopher, who should probably be identified with *Ammonius Saccas (on Origen as Ammonius's pupil see Porphyry in Eusebius, HE VI, 19, 6: II 558, 26-27; Theodoret, Graec. aff. cur. VI, 96, PG 83, 977 B 1-5 and also W. Theiler, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 1 and H. Chadwick, 68). Origen's great erudition in the field of Greek philosophy is attested by Porphyry in Eusebius, HE VI, 19, 6-7: II 558, 26-560, 7 (but Porphyry is wrong in thinking him a pagan converted only subsequently to Christianity: see E.R. Dodds, Numenius and Ammonius, in Les sources de Plotin, Entr. sur l'ant. class. V, Geneva 1960, 31 n. 1) and by Epiphanius, who ascribes his heresies to this (Pan. 64, 72-79: II 523, 14-18 Holl). The deep commitment to the study of the various philosophers that characterized the school of which Origen was head—only the openly "atheist" authors were excluded—is recorded by *Gregory Thaumaturgus, Panegyric to Origen XIII, 150-153 (p. 158 Crouzel, SC 148, Paris 1969). A careful reading of Contra Celsum shows both the diligence that Origen put into the study of philosophical works and their real assimilation: the citations of passages from Celsus are accompanied by a precise discussion, in which the criticisms often do not rule out the acceptance of certain doctrines of the Platonist philosopher (see *cosmos). And yet, as J. Quasten (Patrologia I, Turin 1967, 318) and H. Chadwick (102) have noted, Origen's attitude to Greek philosophy is much less amicable than Clement's, though he shares Clement's idea of the propaedeutic value of philosophy in the study of Christian doctrines and scriptural exegesis (see the letter to Gregory Thaumaturgus, c. 1, pp. 186, 10-188, 14 ed. Crouzel, SC 148; cf., e.g., Clement, Strom. I 28, 1: II 17, 33).

*Eusebius of Caesarea makes his own the thesis of Athenagoras, Justin and Clement on the substantial accord between Greek philosophy and Jewish wisdom (Praep. ev. X, 4, 1: I 567, 20-22: "Those of the Greeks who have approached philosophy in the best way and have had theological ideas above the vulgar opinions have not discovered any true doctrines different from those already in vogue among the Jews"). To prove this thesis, Eusebius first documents, in almost all of book X (chs. 4-14), the greater antiquity of the Hebrews than the Greeks, citing large sections of the works of Clement, Sextus *Julius Africanus, Tatian and Josephus; he then goes on in book XI (II, 5-81) to show the accord between Mosaic teaching and Greek thought, which depends on the former (this dependence is openly affirmed in Praep. ev. X, 14, 19: I 613, 12-13). As for Clement, so for Eusebius the highest teachings of Greek philosophy prepare Christianity in history: in the title (in GCS) of book XII of the Praeparatio evangelica it is said explicitly that Plato did not profess beliefs different from the Christian ones (II, 91).

St. *Basil the Great, in his Address to the Young on How to Profit from Greek Letters (ed. F. Boulenger, Paris 1935), shows great openness toward Greek literary works: the precepts of some secular authors agree with those of the gospel and are therefore useful also on the moral plane (see ch. 5). On St. *Augustine's great enthusiasm for *Neoplatonism before his conversion—analogous to that of Justin Martyr for the "*Middle Platonism" of the 2nd c.—and on his comparison between Neoplatonist and Christian doctrines esp. in De civitate Dei, see *Platonism and the Fathers. It is enough to record here that his judgment on the Neoplatonists recalls that of Athenagoras, Justin Martyr, Clement and Eusebius on Greek philosophy: there are no significant differences between Neoplatonists and Christians, paucis mutatis christiani fierent (De vera rel. c. XII); apud platonicos me interim quod sacris litteris nostris non repugnet repertum esse confido (Contra Acad. III, 20).

In the study of the relation between Hellenism and Christianity, another fundamental aspect must be borne in mind, that of the radically critical, contemptuous and polemical attitude of the pagan intelligentsia toward the new religion and the immediate apologetic reaction on the part of Christians, a phenomenon already present in the 2nd c. and that would continue until the late 5th c. Already *Galen, as R. Walzer has shown (see bibli.), does not hide his reservations regarding the Christian idea of faith. The criticism of Christianity assumed a radical and vehement tone in the Truthful Discourse of the Middle Platonist philosopher *Celsus (178) and in *Porphyry's great work Against the Christians, from the 2nd half of the 3rd c. The 4th c. saw a revival with the emperor *Julian, a follower of the Neoplatonist *Iamblichus, in his work Against the Galileans, composed at Antioch between 362–363 and to a large degree dependent on Porphyry. The Christian reaction was prompt and vigorous: Clement, when he elaborates his doctrine of pistis, is not unaware of objections against the idea of faith like those of Galen (see Lilla, Clement of Alex., 118 n. 1); he probably has Celsus's theory of the archaios logos clearly in mind when he polemically sustains the dependence of the more recent Greek wisdom on the more ancient wisdom of the Eastern peoples, and esp. on that of the Hebrew people (Lilla, 31-41). Origen responds directly to Celsus in Contra Celsum; replies to Porphyry came from *Methodius of Olympus, Eusebius of Caesarea, *Apollinaris of Laodicea, *Philostorgius and, in the Latin West, *Arnobius. *Cyril of Alexandria and *Theodore of Mopsuestia wrote against Julian. Indeed, it is to Christian authors that we owe the preservation of fragments of the anti-Christian writings of Celsus, Porphyry and Julian, which would have otherwise been lost.

E. de Faye, Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1906; E.R. Bevan, Hellenism and Christianity, London 1921; C.N. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture, Oxford 1944; J. Daniélou, Message evangélique et culture hellénistique, Tournai 1961; W. Jaeger, Early Christianity and Greek Paideia, Cambridge, MA 1961; A. Momigliano (ed.), The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century, Oxford 1963; E.R. Dodds, Pagans and Christians in an Age of Anxiety, Cambridge 1965; H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1966; H. Crouzel, Grégoire le Thaumaturge. Remerciement à Origène, SC 148, Paris 1969, 68-70; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971; J. Dillon, The Middle Platonists: A Study of Platonism 80 B.C. to A.D. 220, London 1977; D. Wyrwa, Die christliche Platonaneignung in den Stromateis des Clemens von Alexandrien, Berlin 1983; M. Simonetti, Cristianesimo antico e cultura greca, Rome 1983; R. Berchman, From Philo to Origen: Middle Platonism in Transition, Chicago 1984; P. Hadot, Exer- cices spirituals et philosophie antique, Paris 1987, 57-84; M.C. Bartolomei, Ellenizzazione del Cristianesimo, Methodus 12, L'Aquila-Rome 1994.

See also the following:

1. On Galen: R. Walzer, Galen on Jews and Christians, Oxford 1949, 14-15, 53 (taken from Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 118 n. 1).

2. On Celsus, Origen and the possible response of Clement to Celsus: L. Rougier, Celse ou le conflit de la civilisation antique et du Christianisme primitif, Paris 1925; A. Miura Stange, Celsus und Origenes. Das gemeinsame ihrer Weltanschauung, Beiheft 4 zur ZNW, Giessen 1926; R. Bader, Der Ἀληθὴς λόγος des Kelsos, Tübinger Beiträge zur Altertumswissenschaft 33, Stuttgart-Berlin 1940 (collection of fragments of Celsus); C. Andresen, Logos und Nomos. Die polemik des Kelsos wider das Christentum, Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte 30, Berlin 1955; H. Chadwick, Origen: Contra Celsum, tr. with intr. and notes, Cambridge 1965; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 34-41; H. Dörrie, Die platonische Theologie des Kelsos in ihrer Auseinandersetzung mit der christlichen Theologie, NAWG Phil. Hist. Kl. 1967, 2 (= Platonica Minora, Munich 1976, 229-262); K. Pickler, Streit um das Christentum: der Angriff des Kelsos und die Antwort des Origenes, Regensburger Studien zur Theologie, Bern 1980; var. aus., Discorsi di Verità: Paganesimo, Giudaismo e Cristianesimo a confronto nel Contro Celso di Origene, ed. L. Perrone, SEA 61, Rome 1998; J.W. Hargis, Against the Christians. The Rise of Early Anti-Christian Polemic, PSt 1, New York 1999, 17-61.

3. On Porphyry: A. Harnack, Porphyrius "Gegen die Christen" 15 Bücher Zeugnisse, Fragmente und Referate: AKPA (1916), 1, 1-115; Id., Neue Fragmente des Werks des Porphyrius gegen die Christen: AKPA (1921) 266-284, 834-835; E. Nestle, Die Haupteinwände des antiken Denkens gegen das Christentum, in Griechische Studien, Stuttgart 1948, 597-660 (Aalen ²1968; It. tr. ed. G. Piccaluga, Florence 1973, 463-520); A. Meredith, Porphyry and Julian Against the Christians: ANRW II 23,2 (1980) 1119-1149; G. Rinaldi, L'Antico Testamento nella polemica anticristiana di Porfirio di Tiro: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 97-111; Id., Tracce di controversia tra pagani e cristiani nella letteratura patristica delle Quaestiones et Responsiones: Annali della Storia dell'Esegesi 6 (1989) 99-124; Id., Biblia Gentium. Primo contributo per un indice delle citazioni, dei riferimenti e delle allusioni alla Bibbia in autori pagani, greci e latini, di età imperiale, Rome 1989; J.H. Hargis, Against the Christians. The Rise of Early Anti-Christian Polemic, PSt 1, New York 1999, 63-90.

4. On Basil: Basilio di Cesarea, Discorso ai giovani, ed. N. Naldini, Biblioteca Patristica 3, Florence 1984.

5. On Julian, Cyril of Alexandria and Theodore of Mopsuestia: C. Neumann, Juliani imperatoris librorum contra Christianos quae supersunt, Leipzig 1880; W.J. Malley, Hellenism and Christianity: The Conflict Between Hellenic and Christian Wisdom in the Contra Galileos of Julian the Apostate, AG 210, Rome 1978; A. Meredith, Porphyry and Julian Against the Christians: ANRW II 23,2 (1980) 1119-1149; P. Athanassiadi, Julian and Hellenism: An Intellectual Biography, Oxford 1981, London-New York ²1992; A. Guida, Frammenti inediti del "Contro i Galilei" di Giuliano e della replica di Teodoro di Mopsuestia: Prometheus 9 (1983) 139-163; Id., La rinunzia evangelica ai beni: la polemica di Giuliano e la replica di Teodoro di Mopsuestia: Sileno 10 (1984) 277-287; Id., Teodoro di Mopsuestia. Replica a Giuliano imperatore, Biblioteca Patristica 24, Florence 1994; J.H. Hargis, Against the Christians: The Rise of Early Anti-Christian Polemic, PSt 1, New York 1999, 91-127.

6. On the 4th c.: J. Geffcken, Der Ausgang der griechisch-römischen Heidentums, Heidelberg 1929, Darmstadt ²1972, 90-177; A. Momigliano (ed.), The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century, Oxford 1963.

7. On Arnobius: P. Courcelle, Anti-Christian Arguments and Christian Platonism, in A. Momigliano (ed.), The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century, Oxford 1963, 151-192 (on Porphyry as the object of Arnobius response, see p. 156); E.C. Fortin, The viri novi of Arnobius and the Conflict Between Faith and Reason in the Early Christian Centuries, in var. aus., The Heritage of the Early Church, Essays in Honour of the Very Rev. Georges Vasilievich Florovsky, OCA 195, Rome 1973, 197-226 (on Porphyry, see p. 220).

S. Lilla

HELLENISTIC JUDAISM. Hellenistic Judaism refers to the encounter and fusion between the Jewish religion and Greek language, culture and philosophy which took place mostly in *Alexandria in Egypt in the period between the 3rd c. BC and the 1st c. AD. The first encounter on a large scale between Judaism and Hellenism occurred in the Greek translation of the OT known as the Septuagint, i.e., "translation of the Seventy" (on this translation, which is not only the work of various authors but also dates to different periods—its oldest nucleus is represented by the translation of the Pentateuch, carried out perhaps under Ptolemy Philadelphus, 283–247 BC—and on the later translations of Aquila, *Symmachus and *Theodotion, see E. Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, III, Leipzig 1909, 424-442; R. Devreesse, Introduction à l'étude des manuscrits grecs, Paris 1954, 102-108). The Letter of Aristeas to Philocrates refers with a wealth of details to the facts which led to the "translation of the Seventy"; modern criticism has raised strong doubts concerning its historical value (see, e.g., Schürer, 424), and it should be considered a spurious work, composed between 200 and 100 BC (see Schürer, 611).

Given the spread of the Greek language and culture in the entire E Mediterranean from the beginning of the 3rd c. BC—the center of its dissemination being Alexandria in Egypt—it is no wonder that numerous authors of Hebrew race and religion between the 3rd c. BC and the 1st c. AD wrote their works directly in koine Greek, taking as models the products of classical and Hellenistic Greek literature, in which the different literary genres were already clearly established. It is not possible here to list even in summary fashion all the various exponents of this Hellenistic Jewish literature, which counts historians such as Demetrius, Eupolemus, Artapanus, Malchus, the author of the second and third books of the Maccabees, Tallus, Flavius Josephus, Justus of Tiberias, epic and dramatic poets such as Philo and Ezekiel, philosophers such as the author of the Wisdom of Solomon, Aristobulus, Philo of Alexandria and pagan authors who loved to write verses masquerading as "classics" but which in reality are of a clear Jewish stamp, such as ps.-Hecataeus, ps.-Phocylides, ps.-Menander and the author of the Sibylline verses. (An exhaustive and detailed treatment can be found in vol. III, p. 468-633, of the already cited and fundamental work of E. Schürer.)

We will, however, linger briefly over the major exponents of Hellenistic Jewish philosophy, which have enormous importance in the birth of Greek patristic literature and in which doctrines can already be discerned which anticipate *Neoplatonism by several centuries.

In the Wisdom of Jesus Son of Sirach or Ecclesiasticus, composed in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. BC (see Schürer, 216-217), the motif of the self-revelation within the entire creation of the wisdom of God (1:9 and 1:19) is a clear prelude to the Philonian idea of the goods and graces which pour out like rain onto humankind (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 18-19) and to the Neoplatonic doctrine of the ἀπόρροια or ἀπορροή, concerning the pouring out into the universe of the overflowing power of the first and second hypostases.

The Wisdom of Solomon, composed after the Ecclesiasticus and prior to Philo (see Schürer, 508), reveals a strong Stoic imprint: in the wisdom of God which contains in itself an "intelligent, holy and subtle spirit" which traverses everything and stretches from one end of the universe to the other governing it in a just way (7:22-23; 8:1), it is impossible not to recognize the Stoic doctrine of the Weltpneuma, the immanent divine principle of the universe, identical with λόγος, with πῦρ, with πρόνοια and with fate, which fulfills the same functions (see SVF I, 87, 88, 153, 158, 159, 161, 530, 533; II, 310, 1009, 1029, 1033, 1035, 1037; II, 454: on the spirit which stretches from one extremity to the other); also Stoic is the idea of a providence which governs everything (Wis 14:1; see, e.g., SVF II, 634, 1106-1126), the designation of wisdom as τεχνῖτις (14:2; cf. the πῦρ τεχνικόν of SVF II 1027), the emphasis put on the four cardinal virtues (Sap 8,6-7; cf. Schürer, 508). The doctrine of the divine ἀπόρροια, which would have so much importance in Clement and in Neoplatonism, is already clearly formulated in Wis 7:25; and an obvious anticipation of the Neoplatonic theme of the μονή and the πρόοδος is found at 7:27: "despite remaining in itself, it renews everything and transferring itself into holy souls."

An important place in Hellenistic Jewish philosophy belongs to Aristobulus, who lived around the middle of the 2nd c. BC, at the time of Ptolemy VI Philometor (see Schürer, 512 and N. Walter, Der Thoraausleger Aristobulos, TU 86, Berlin 1964, 38-40). The testimonies about him and his fragments—both present above all in Clement of Alexandria and in Eusebius and to a lesser degree also in Anatolius, Origen and the second book of Maccabees—have been collected and analyzed by N. Walter (7-9, 10-35; see also Schürer, 512-522). The attempts to deny the authenticity of the work of Aristobulus and his existence in the 2nd c. BC carried out by R. Simon, by H. Hody and later by A. Elter have been adequately criticized by L.C. Valckenaer, Diatriba de Aristobulo Iudaeo, Lugd. Bat. 1806, 19-29, by Schürer, 512-522 and by N. Walter. (For a history of the problem, see Walter, 1-5, where the references to the works of Simon, Hody and Elter can also be found.) Aristobulus was one of the main supporters—perhaps even the most important—of the idea, taken up again by Philo of Alexandria, by various Christian authors and also by Numenius (see Clement, Strom. I, 150,4; Eusebius, Praep. ev. XI, 10,14 = Numenius, fr. 8 Des Places p. 51), of the dependence of the Greek philosophers and poets on the OT: in his work dedicated to Ptolemy Philometor he does not hesitate to affirm the existence of a Greek translation of the Hebrew books rather more ancient than that of the Septuagint (see Clement, Strom. I, 150,2 and Eusebius, Praep. ev. XIII, 12,1 = F 3a and F 3 Walter, 7-8) nor to cite, as chapter 12 of book XIII of the Praeparatio evangelica shows, a long series of poetic fragments attributed to various classical Greek authors but in reality the work of a Jewish falsifier who acc. to Schürer (595-596) should be identified with ps.-Hecataeus, the author of a writing on Abraham and cited by Clement, Strom. V, 113,1. (On the entire question concerning the transmission of these falsified verses, present in Clement, Strom. V, 107,1-133,3, in Eusebius, Praep. ev. XIII, 12,1-16 and in the writings Cohortatio ad gentes and De monarchia falsely attributed to Justin Martyr—the spurious origin of some of which was already acknowledged by A. Scheck, De fontibus Clementis Alexandrini, Augustae Vindelicorum 1889, 40-47, by L. Valckenaer, 8-10, and by A. Boeckh, Graecae tragoediae principum, Heidelberg 1808, 146-164—see Schürer, 595-603 and esp. N. Walter, 150-261.) As Walter justly noted (10-11) great importance should not be given to the description of Aristobulus as a peripatetic, present in Clement, Strom. I, 72,4 (= T2 Walter) and in Eusebius, Praep. ev. XIII, 12,1 (= F 3 Walter), despite his admiration for the peripatetic ideal of ataraxia (see Eusebius, Praep. ev. XIII, 12,10: F 5 Walter); on the presence of this theme in Aristobulus see M. Pohlenz, Klemens von Alexandreia und sein hellenisches Christentum: NAWG 1943, 141, n. 1, and Walter, 11, n. 2.

In Philo of Alexandria, who lived toward the end of the 1st c. BC and the 1st half of the 1st c. AD, Hellenistic Jewish philosophy reached its highest expression. In his writings, which seek to be a "philosophical" interpretation of the books of the OT, the synthesis between Jewish religion and Greek thought seems perfect: the allegorical interpretation of the Scripture, seeking to reveal what for Philo is its more hidden and truer meaning, different from the literal, is conducted on the base of the Greek philosophy of the late Hellenistic period, characterized by a would-be cultural syncretism which is found later in the so-called Middle Platonism of the first two centuries AD and in Neoplatonism. The thought of Philo, in fact, receives and melts together into a single coherent system—which would have great influence on the Alexandrian and Cappadocian Fathers—different elements coming from Neo-Pythagoreanism, peripatetism and esp. from Platonism and Stoicism. From Neo-Pythagoreanism comes the speculations on the numbers six, seven, ten and on the monad (Clement, Strom. 1,72,4: II, 46,17 designates Philo as πυθαγόρειος). Of peripatetic origin is the doctrine of virtue as the just mean. The veneration for Plato and for the formula ὁμοίωσις θεῷ κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν (Theatetus 176b); the accentuation of the transcendence of God; the adoption of the Platonic ideas considered not only as models of sensible objects and as κόσμος νοητός but also as thoughts of God contained in his mind; the tendency—present in De opificio mundi—to interpret the origin of the world not as a true and proper creatio ex nihilo but rather as the result of the intervention of the divine intelligence, imposing order, forms and qualities on preexisting matter, which was originally absolutely formless; the tripartition of the human soul; the doctrine of the virtue as a "harmony" of the soul; the celebration of contemplative life; and the use of terms from the mystery cults in the designation of the highest awareness of God are all characteristic elements of the Platonic tradition of the first two centuries AD. The concept of the λόγος understood as a divine principle diffused in all the universe and as a supreme law (νόμος) of nature is of clear Stoic derivation. Equally of Stoic origin is his idea of the universe as a well-ordered state, of which human beings are citizens. The doctrine of the λόγος as a summation of the ideas identical with the δυνάμεις which are spread everywhere reveals a syncretism of Platonism and Stoicism. Of Stoic origin finally is the division of the soul into seven parts, the definitions of the four cardinal virtues, the doctrine of the nature and origin of the passions—dating back to Posidonius—and the theme—this too present in Posidonius—of their control through reason which acts as pilot and chariot and the ideal of ἀπάθεια, taken from the oldest Stoicism. All these elements of Philonian ethics are found in the syncretistic Platonism of the first two centuries AD, while the adoption of the double ethical state, whose two steps are represented by μετριοπάθεια and by ἀπάθεια (the latter practically identified with ὁμοίωσις θεῷ) would become one of the fundamental characteristics of Neoplatonic ethics. (All the Philonian doctrines mentioned here are treated thoroughly in S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, where their relationships with Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism are also demonstrated.)

In the 4 Maccabees, composed in the 1st c. AD (see Schürer, 526), we find clear Stoic elements in the themes of the control and regulation of the passions on the part of reason, of the ὀρθός λόγος, of wisdom (σοφία) understood as the science of human and divine things and of their causes, of the law as education, of the four cardinal virtues and of the passions (1,13-35; 2,1-3,5). The propensity for the simple moderation of the passions and the explicit exclusion of their total destruction show that the author is under the influence not of the earlier Stoicism but the "middle" Stoicism of Panaetius and of Posidonius.

L.C. Valckenaer, Diatriba de Aristobulo Iudaeo, philosopho peripatetico Alexandrino, Lugd. Bat. 1806; A. Boeckh, Graecae tragoediae principum Aeschyli, Sophoclis, Euripidis, num ea quae supersunt genuina omnia sint, Heidelberg 1808; A.F. Daehne, Geschichtliche Darstellung der jüdisch-alexandrinischen Religionsphilosophie, Halle 1834; A. Scheck, De fontibus Clementis Alexandrini, Augustae Vindelic, 1889; E. Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi III, Leipzig 1909; P. Wendland, Die hellenistisch-römische Kultur in ihren Beziehungen zu Judentum und Christentum, Tübingen 1912; C. Bigg, The Christian Platonists of Alexandria, Oxford [2]1913; K. Praechter, in F. Überweg, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, Berlin 1926, I, 569-578; H.A. Wolfson, Philo, Cambridge, MA 1947; N. Walter, Der Thoraausleger Aristobulos, TU 86, Berlin 1964; U. Früchtel, Die kosmologischen Vorstellungen bei Philo von Alexandrien, Leiden 1968; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971; M. Hengel, Judentum und Hellenismus: Studien zu ihrer Begegnung unter besonderer Berücksichtigung Palästinas bis zur Mitte des 2. Jh. v. Chr., Tübingen 1966; Id., Juden, Griechen und Barbaren: Aspekte der Hellenisierung des Judentums in vorchristlichen Zeit, Stuttgart 1976; Id., Giudaismo ed Ellenismo, Brescia 2001; M. Black (ed.), The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), 3 vols., Edinburgh 1973–1987; A-M. Denis (ed.), Introduction à la littérature religieuse Judéo-Hellénistique, 2 vols., Turnhout 2000; A. Magris, La Filosofia ellenistica. Scuole, dottrine ed interazioni col mondo giudaico, Brescia 2001.

S. Lilla

HELVIDIUS (d. before 383). Perhaps a Roman layman, disciple of the *Arian Auxentius of Milan. According to *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 32), he disputed with the monk Carterius (the name is uncertain), who seems to have written an apology for the monastic life in which he referred to Mary's perpetual virginity. Helvidius replied with a work in which he tried to maintain that Mary had other children after Jesus. We know of Helvidius's work through *Jerome's refutation of it in Adversus Helvidium de perpetua virginitate b. Mariae, composed ca. 383. Both Jerome and Gennadius stress, among other things, the stylistic mediocrity of Helvidius's work.

F. Cavallera, Saint Jérôme. Sa vie et son œuvre, Louvain-Paris 1922, I, 94-100; G. Jouassard, La personnalité d'Helvidius: Mél. Saunier, Lyon 1944, 139-156; G. Rocca, *L'*Adversus Helvidium di San Girolamo nel contesto della letteratura ascetico-mariana del secolo IV, Bern 1998, 55-69.

S. Zincone

HEMORRHAGING WOMAN (iconography). The scene of the healing of the woman with a hemorrhage (Mt 9:20-22; Mk 5:25-34; Lk 8:43-48), which alludes to the profound sentiment of faith felt by Christians toward Christ's thaumaturgical divinity, is often confused, in figurative art, with that of the Canaanite woman (Mt 15:22-28; Mk 7:24-30), because of the similar attitude of the two women. In fact, in accordance with the biblical episode—of which iconography ordinarily depicts the key moment—the hemorrhaging woman is only portrayed when, bowing or kneeling, she touches the hem of Christ's garment and is healed. This scene can be recognized in a painting of the cemetery of Praetextatus (Wp 20), dated to the 3rd c. and thought to be the earliest example; it also appears five times at Marcellino e Pietro (Wp 1; 130; 99, 1; WMM, 815; A. Ferrua, Una nuova, 61). Various examples are found on Roman *sarcophagi from the time of Constantine (Ws 39, 1; 123, 2) until the 5th c. (Milan, S. Celso, Ws 243, 5); at Civita Castellana (Ws 143, 3); in Gaul and in Spain. The miracle of the hemorrhaging woman is also in the ivory chapel of Brescia (6th c.) and on the Pesaro pyx. It is thought that the prototype for the latter depiction is a bronze group described by Eusebius (HE 7, 18), preserved in the city of Paneas (Caesarea Philippi), where the miracle occurred. Some depictions thought to be of this scene are not (e.g., sarcophagus of St. Engracia = Bovini, Sarc., n. 48, and a mosaic in S. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna [Volbach - Hirmer, 90]), since the kneeling woman has her hands folded and does not touch Christ's cloak.

DACL VI, 2200-2209; EC V, 316-317; LCI I, 312-314; G.P. Kirsch, Cripte dipinte del cimitero dei SS. Pietro e Marcellino: RivAC 7 (1930) 210; Benoit, Sarc., nn. 2, 39, 45, 53; Bovini, Sarc., nn. 3, 29, 30 (dubious); A. Ferrua, Una nuova regione della catacomba dei SS. Marcellino e Pietro: RivAC 46 (1970) 7ff.; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Märtyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973, 309, 313, 367, 369; M. Perraymond, Il miracolo dell'emorroissa nell'arte paleocristiana, in Atti della V Settimana di Studi "Sangue e Antropologia. Riti e Culto," Rome 1984, 1719-1728; Id., L'emorroissa e la cananea nell'arte paleocristiana: Bessarione 5 (1986) 147-174; C. Stella, Scheda n. 5b. li, in var. aus., Milano capitale dell'Impero Romano 286-402 d.C., Milan 1990; C. Ravara, Scheda n. 107, in A. Donati (ed.), Dalla terra alle genti. La diffusione del cristianesimo nei primi secoli, Milan 1996; J. Dresken-Weiland, Repertorium der christlichantiken Sarcophage - II, Mainz am Rhein 1998, nn. 124, 250, 4; M. Perraymond, Emorroissa (s.v.), in F. Bisconti (ed.), Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000, 171-173.

M. Perraymond

HENANA of Adiabene (d. ca. 610). Native of the province of *Adiabene, as is indicated by the epithet which accompanies his name, *Henana studied in the school of *Nisibis, in the time of *Abraham of Beth Rabban (509–569), had as his master someone named Moses and then became professor himself. After reactions provoked by some of his expressions with regard to *christology, he was made to leave the city for a period of time by the bishop Paul. But he returned fairly quickly after the death of Abraham, since in 572 he became superior of the school. Henana lived until about 610. In christology, he was accused of supporting the doctrine of one hypostasis and two natures, though the few fragments which have come down to us do not sustain this accusation. In exegesis, he may have distanced himself from *Theodore of Mopsuestia in favor of the exegetical method of *John Chrysostom. In the liturgy, he is said to have had various hymns in the liturgical office suppressed (probably of *Narsai), because they were too imbued with *Nestorianism; but this is perhaps a polemical stereotype. Such tendencies and opinions provoked, in the long run, violent reactions from the official hierarchy, which was Nestorian, in particular from the catholicoi *Isho'yahb III (585), Sabrisho' (596) and Gregory I (605). Nevertheless, Sabrisho', in the course of his catholicosate (596–604), after an unfavorable first reaction, defended Henana against his fiercest enemies. This caused a revolution within the school, which a large number of students are said to have abandoned in protest. With the intention of restoring the school to its former prestige, Henana established new statutes and had them proclaimed by the bishop of Nisibis, Simeon (580).

According to 'Abdisho', Henana produced a large number of writings: commentaries on a number of OT books (Genesis, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, the Minor Prophets), commentaries on the gospel of Mark and on the letters of Paul; an explanation of the creed, of the mysteries (sacraments), of the solemnity of the Hosannas (Palm Sunday), of the feast of Golden Friday (Friday within the octave of Pentecost, when the miracle was read of St. Peter and the lame man at the Beautiful Gate: Acts 3:1-11), of the Rogations (the fasting of the Ninevites), of the finding of the holy cross; a homily on the Sunday of the Hosannas.

Of all these works, only the treatise of Golden Friday and on the Rogations remain complete (A. Scher PO 7, 7-10, 53-87), and a few fragments of commentary on the NT, preserved in the works of Isho'dad of Merv (or of Hedatta). In the Nestorian tradition, in particular from *Babai, he was accused of being an *Origenist, although little can be concluded about the truth of this accusation.

'Abdīšo', Cat. lib. syr. 69 (Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis III, 1, Rome 1725, 81-84); Henana d'Adiabène, Deux traités sur le Vendredi d'or et les Rogations, in Traités d'Išaï le Docteur et de Hnana d'Adiabène, A. Scher (ed.), PO 7/1, Paris 1911, 53-82 (with Fr. tr.); Labourt 215-217, 269-280; Duval 348-349; Baumstark 127; Chabot 58-59; Ortiz de Urbina 168-169; A. Vööbus, The Statutes of the School of Nisibis, 1962, 91-105; A. Quacquarelli (ed.), Complementi interdisciplinari di patrologia, Rome 1989, 577f.; P. Maniyattu, Feast of the "Pure Gold": A Study on the Theological Significance of the Feast of the "Friday Gold" Based on Henana of Adiabene's Commentary: Christian Orient 16 (1995) 64-73; Patrologia V, 475-6; LTK3 4, 1420; LACL3 318-9.

J.-M. Sauget

HENANISHO (7th c.). A native of *Adiabene, he first studied at the famous theological school of *Nisibis with his brother Isho'yahb; both then became monks of the Great Convent on Mt. *Izla, founded by *Abraham of Kashkar in the 2nd half of the 6th c. After the customary journey to Jerusalem and among the Egyptian monasteries (Scetes), he abandoned the Great Convent and withdrew to the convent of Beth 'Abe, where he worked with catholicos *Isho'yahb III (ca. 650–657/658) on a revision of the Nestorian Hudra (divine office).

Author of a volume of philosophical definitions and of treatises on lexicography, Henanisho is known esp. for the celebrated Paradise of the Fathers, which he composed at the request of Catholicos George (658–680). It preserves in a Syriac translation *Palladius's Historia Lausiaca, *Rufinus of Aquileia's Historia monachorum in Aegypto (here wrongly attributed to Jerome), a systematic collection of Apophthegmata Patrum and various other minor collections of ascetic-monastic literature. The importance of this work resides not only in its being a Syriac witness to the great monastic works of the Greek tradition but also in the knowledge it gives us of some Syro-Eastern monastic works (*Abraham of Nathpar).

Duval 143-145, 253, 295, 371; Baumstark 201-203; Chabot 100-101; Ortiz de Urbina 149-150. Edition of the material relative to the Historia lausiaca: Les formes syriaques de la matière de l'Histoire lausiaque, ed. R. Draguet, CSCO 389, 398 (text), 390, 399 (tr.), Louvain 1978. On the importance of this text and on its various recensions, see C.C. Chahine, Le témoignage de Thomas de Margâ sur les extraits d'Abraham Nethprâïâ dans le livre du Paradis de 'Nânîšo': Augustinianum 40 (2000) 439-460.

J.-M. Sauget

HENOTICON. From the Greek Ἑνωτικόν ("unitive"). The edict of union promulgated in 482 under *Zeno in order to sanction in the empire, and in particular in *Egypt, *Libya and the *Pentapolis, the union between the *monophysites and the orthodox. Probably redacted by *Acacius patriarch of Constantinople and *Peter Mongus patriarch of *Alexandria between 471 and 489, the document referred to the Nicene Creed as the only definition of the faith, condemned *Nestorius and *Eutyches without entering into the question of the number of "natures" in Christ, exalted the memory of *Cyril and repudiated the Council of *Chalcedon (451) and the contribution that *Leo had given it. Universally accepted in the East and rejected by Rome, in 489 the Henoticon led to the *Acacian Schism.

Evagrio, Hist. Eccl. 3,14, PG 86, 2620-2625; E. Schwartz, Codex Vaticanus gr. 1431: Eine antichalkedonische Sammlung aus der Zeit Kaiser Zenos: ABAW 32/6 (1927) 52-54; S. Salaville, L'Affaire de l'hénotique ou le premier schisme byzantin au Ve siècle: Échos d'Oriènt 18 (1918) 225-266; 19 (1920) 49-68; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus: Glauben der Kirche 2/1 (1986) 279-358; E. Dovere, L'enotico di Zenone Isaurico: SDHI 54 (1988) 170-190; The Reign of Heraclius (610-641): Crisis and Confrontation, ed. G.I. Reinink - B.H. Stolte, Leuven 2002.

P. Marone

HERACLAS of Alexandria (d. ca. 247). Brother of Plutarch, to whom *Origen was close at the time of his martyrdom (Eus., HE 6, 3-4). Heraclas frequented the school of the "teacher of philosophical sciences" (HE 6, 19, 13), *Ammonius Saccas, five years before Origen. He then became a disciple of Origen, who took him on as collaborator and entrusted him with the preliminary lessons for beginners, reserving the more advanced pupils for himself (HE 6, 15). But, in the light of later events, perhaps *Eusebius's information should be read less naively; i.e., this arrangement may have in some way been forced on Origen by *Demetrius. A priest before Origen, Heraclas always wore the philosopher's cloak and kept up an interest in philosophy (HE 6, 19, 14). *Julius Africanus in his Chronology attests Heraclas's great reputation as an intellectual. Later he showed ill will toward Origen and, when he succeeded Demetrius, maintained the measures taken against Origen until, acc. to *Photius (Interr. Decem. 9: PG 104, 1219-1232), he forced him to leave Thmuis, where Origen had taken refuge. His episcopate lasted 16 years, from 232 to ca. 247.

A. Harnack, Die Überlieferung . . . , Leipzig 1893, 232.

H. Crouzel

HERACLEON (2nd c.). A disciple of *Valentinus, he belonged with Ptolemy to the great heresiarch's Italian school. Fragments of his Commentary on the Gospel of John are handed down by *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. IV, 71; Eclogae proph. 25, 1) and *Origen (In Iohannem, esp. book XIII). At the center of Heracleon's doctrine is the Valentinian myth of the fallen spirit which, through Christ, becomes aware of its own origin. It is this myth that Heracleon tries to find in John's gospel through his *allegorical exegesis, which turns essentially on the figures of John the Baptist, the Samaritan woman and the centurion of Capernaum. Some scholars (e.g., H.Ch. Puech, G. Quispel) are also inclined to attribute to Heracleon the work in the Jung Codex (NHC I, 5) known as Tractatus tripartitus.

A.E. Brooke, The Fragments of Heracleon, Cambridge 1891; W. Völker, Quellen zur Geschichte der christlichen Gnosis, Tübingen 1932, 62-86; M. Simonetti, Testi gnostici cristiani, Bari 1970, 137-169; W. Foerster, Von Valentin zu Herakleon, Giessen 1928; J. Mouson, Jean Baptiste dans les fragments d'Héracléon: EThL 30 (1954) 301-322; A. Orbe, En los albores de la exégesis joannea, Est. Valent. II, Rome 1955; Id., Los primeros herejes ante la persecución, Est. Valent. V, Rome 1956; E.H. Pagels, The Johannine Gospel in Gnostic Exegesis: Heracleon's Commentary on John, Nashville 1972; D. Devoti, L'antropologia di Eracleone attraverso la figura del Battista: Atti Acc. of the Sc. di Torino, vol. 107 (1972-73) 709-56; C. Blanc, Le Commentaire d'Héracléon sur Jean 4 et 8: Augustinianum 15 (1975) 81-124; D. Devoti, Antropologia e storia della salvezza in Eracleone: Memorie Acc. of the Sc. di Torino, serie V, vol. 2 (1978) 1-83; D.M. Scholer, Bibliographia gnostica, Leiden 1971 and successive Supplementa, ed. by Scholer and published annually in the journal Novum Testamentum; J.-M. Poffet, Méthode exégétique de Héracléon et d'Origène, Fribourg 1985; H. Strutwolf, Gnosis als System, Göttingen 1993, 114-125; A. Castellano, Exégesis de Orígenes y de Heracleón a los testimonios del Bautista (Anales de la Facultad de Teologia/ Pontificia Universidad Católica de Chile 49,1), Santiago de Chile 1998; J. Holzhausen, Die Seelenlehre des Gnostiker Herakleon, in Psyche-Seele-anima: Festschrift für Karin Alt zum 7. Mai 1998, Stuttgart 1998, 279-300.

C. Gianotto

HERACLIAN of Chalcedon (6th c.). Presbyter and syncellus of the "Great Church" (Hagia Sophia, Constantinople), Heraclian, member of two Byzantine embassies to Rome (in 520 and 535) and of an orthodox (*dyophysite) commission which held a discussion with *Severian *monophysites in 532, seems to be identified with Heraclian, metropolitan of *Chalcedon (after 4 June 536), who dedicated a christological work (ample fragments in Doctrina Patrum) to *Soteric of Caesarea in Cappadocia and who was succeeded (before 5 May 553) by Constantine. *Maximus the Confessor cites a brief passage of his work Against the Manichees, which is mentioned by *Photius (Bibl., cod. 85).

CPG 6800-6801; PG 91, 125 CD; Fr. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum de incarnatione Verbi, Münster West [2]1981, 42-43, 134, 207-208, 216-217; E. Honigmann, Patristic Studies (ST 173), Vatican City 1953, 205-216; Beck, 372; L. Magi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII c.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 68, 90, 92, 118; Grillmeier 2/2, 248-251, 324; Patrologia V, 144-145.

D. Stiernon

HERACLIDAS (or Heraclides) of Nyssa (5th c.). According to Honigmann's hypothesis, Heraclidas was the author of recensio B (or "metaphrastic text") of the Historia Lausiaca, whose primitive version, written by *Palladius ca. 418–419, has been handed down, acc. to Butler, in the MSS of family G. Compared to recensio G, the "metaphrastic text" (also 5th c.) is fuller, partly modified and results from a fusion of Palladius's work with another hagiographical text, the Historia Monachorum* (CPG 5620). Heraclidas is described by the codices as bishop of *Cappadocia and in Latin versions as "the hermit" or "the Alexandrian" or even (but the chronology belies this) "St. Anthony's disciple." In the past his name was at times understood as a pseudonym of Palladius, at times identified with the last bishop of *Ephesus. Honigmann supposes that Heraclidas could be that bishop of *Nyssa whom *Photius mentions (Bibl., cod. 52 = PG 103, 89) as the author of two letters against the *Messalian heretics, and whose episcopate can be dated between 431 and 440 (Bardenhewer 189). Heraclidas was certainly an admirer of *Evagrius and was not opposed to *Origenism, as some passages of recensio B of the Historia Lausiaca which do not appear in recensio G confirm. Honigmann also attributes to him the anonymous Vita Olympiadis (BHG 1374-1375), recently published by Malingrey: in fact, this work contains chronological references that take us back to Heraclidas's lifetime, and, being the result of a fusion between some elements present in the primitive text of the Historia Lausiaca and another work of Palladius, the Dial. de vita S. Ioann. Chrysost. (BHG 870), it seems to fit the literary activity of our author, who rewrote hagiographical texts in the metaphrastic manner. Despite the fact that all the codices of family A of the Historia Lausiaca mention Heraclidas, our present state of knowledge does not allow us to attribute to him with any certainty this further recensio of the work, also handed down under the title Paradisus Heraclidis.

CPG 6039-6040; C. Butler, The Lausiac History of Palladius, 2 vols., Cambridge 1898-1904; H. Delehaye, Vita Sanctae Olympiadis et Narratio Sergiae de eiusdem translatione: AB 15 (1896) 400-423; 16 (1897) 44-51; A. Malingrey, Jean Chrysostome. Lettres à Olympias. Vie anonyme d'Olympias, SC 13 bis, Paris 1968; E. Honigmann, Heraclidas of Nyssa (about 440 A.D.), ST 173, Rome 1953, 104-122; Patrologia V, 154-155.

A. Labate

HERACLIDES of Cyprus. One of the 15 bishops of Cyprus at the end of the 4th c. to whom *Theophilus patriarch of Alexandria wrote a synodal letter concerning *Origen's condemnation, ca. 400 (Jerome, Ep. 92). We know nothing of his episcopal see or his life.

G. Hill, A History of Cyprus 1, Cambridge 1972, 251.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

HERACLITUS. The first of six writers—"ancient, orthodox and of virtuous zeal"—mentioned by *Eusebius (HE 5, 27; cf. Jerome, Vir. ill. 46). It is only a hypothesis that his lost work On the Apostle was an antignostic commentary on Paul's epistles. The dates given by Eusebius, 180–210, also seem uncertain.

W. Bauer, Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei, Tübingen 21964, 150-153; 160-161.

S. Samulowitz

HERACLIUS (575–641). Byzantine emperor (610–11 February 641), born in 575, the son of Heraclius exarch of Carthage. By agreement with his father he overthrew the emperor Phocas, hated for his regime of terror, and founded, with his wife Eudoxia, a dynasty that remained stable for a century. He was engaged for some time in the project of transferring the capital to Carthage, in consideration of the complete insecurity of the Balkan peninsula, threatened by Slavs and Avars and by the advance of the Persians in Syria, Palestine and Egypt. Heraclius courageously promoted radical reforms: acc. to a theory (not universally accepted) of G. Ostrogorsky (Geschichte des byzantinischen Staates, Munich ³1963, 80-82), the most substantial of these were the setting up of military and administrative territories (themes) in Asia Minor, the institution of defensive military citadels garrisoned by stratiotoi (i.e., peasants enrolled in the army), the simultaneous reduction of mercenary troops and finally the reorganization of the financial administration. As in a crusade, the emperor put himself at the head of the army, which was trained by new methods. In 626 he freed *Constantinople, thanks to the Byzantine naval victory against the Avars; in 628 he defeated the Persian empire after six years of alternating fortune in war. In 630 Jerusalem was conquered. But Heraclius failed to stem the advance of the Arabs, favored by the separatist aspirations of the *monophysite population of Hither Asia: in 636 the Byzantines were beaten at Yarmuk in Syria; in 638 Jerusalem fell again; in 639/640 Armenia was occupied and the invasion of Egypt began. Beyond this military activity, in religious matters Heraclius made renewed efforts to lead the monophysite churches of Syria and Egypt back to union of the church with the empire. Timely help in this seemed to be offered by *monoenergism, held by the patriarch *Sergius of Constantinople (610–638), which recognized in Christ a single divine-human energy. *Cyrus of Fasi, consenting to Sergius's formula and for this named patriarch of Alexandria (631) by the emperor, promoted the reunification of the Theodosians of Egypt with the imperial church; the emperor also directed efforts to the monophysites of Armenia and Syria to facilitate their reunification with the same. But this doctrine of monoenergism was rejected by the monk Sophronius, later patriarch of Jerusalem, so that in 638 Heraclius published the Ekthesis, a document composed by Sergius, in which he set aside the doctrine of the one energy and affirmed that of monothelitism, which was accepted unanimously by the Eastern bishops, while at Rome it appeared gravely problematic. Heraclius's grandson, the emperor *Constans II, retracted the Ekthesis in 648 and banned any discussion of one or two energies or one or two wills in Christ. In Heraclius's time Latin was deprived of the dignity of being the official language, and the empire was completely Grecized.

A.N. Stratos, Τὸ Βυζάντιον στὸν ζ' αἰῶνα, vols. 1-3, Athens 1965-1969; K. Bihlmeyer - H. Tuechle, Storia della Chiesa, 1, Brescia 1989, 355-358; H. Jedin, Storia della Chiesa, III, Milan 1983, 45-48; The Reign of Heraclius (610-641): Crisis and Confrontation, ed. by G.I. Reinink - B.H. Stolte, Louvain 2002.

J. IRMSCHER - C. DELL'OSSO

HERACLIUS of Hippo (d. after 430). Deacon, then presbyter, of the church of *Hippo, known as the builder of the Memoria S. Stephani in that city and as *Augustine's successor-designate in 426; he also organized the conference-debate between Augustine and the Manichee Maximinus in 428. He appears in Augustine (Ep. 213, CSEL 47, 372-379; Sermo 356, 7, PL 39, 1577) and in the Collatio cum Maximino (PL 42, 709). We have two orations by him (PL 39, 1717-1786). We do not know if he actually succeeded Augustine.

DGHE 15, 662-663; PCBE 1, 356-358; P.-P. Verbraken, Les deux sermons du prêtre Eraclius d'Hippone: RBen 71 (1961) 3-21.

A. DI BERARDINO

HERACLIUS the Roman (d. after 308). The only evidence of Heraclius is in an epigram of Pope *Damasus (PL 6, 27A; ICUR IV, 9515; Diehl n. 963; Ferrua, n. 18; 18[1]; 18[2]) in honor of Pope *Eusebius in the catacomb of *Callistus. With the help of an inscription of a mere 8 verses, we can partially reconstruct the situation at Rome after the exile and death of Pope *Marcellus, exiled by the tyrannus *Maxentius (Ferrua n. 40) because of strong disapproval in the Roman community. After his departure, the community continued to be divided into opposing factions. Some months after his death Eusebius was elected (perhaps in 308), opposed regarding penitential discipline by a certain Heraclius. Damasus writes: Heraclius vetuit lapsos peccata dolere (Ferrua n. 18, v. 1), i.e., he headed the faction of those who had *apostatized during *Diocletian's persecution and now, with the return of external peace, wanted an immediate reconciliation and full reintegration into ecclesial communion without an adequate *penance. Eusebius demanded a penitential period. The division between the two factions must have been very severe, and included fratricidal clashes (Ferrua n. 18). Civil unrest must have been quite serious, since the emperor Maxentius exiled both Eusebius and Heraclius. Eusebius was sent to Syracuse, in Sicily, and died there the same year; all record of Heraclius was lost with his exile. Nothing in Damasus suggests that Heraclius was an antipope; he may simply have been an influential priest or deacon in the Roman community and thus in a position to lead the opposition.

Liber pontificalis, ed. L. Duchesne, 1, 164-167; G.B. De Rossi, Roma sotterranea, Rome 1870, II 201-208; I. Corsini, I Lapsi e la deportazione in Sicilia di papa Eusebio, Rome 1886; A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, 129-134 (Eusebius); 181 (Marcellus); see s.v. Eusebio papa: EPapi 1, 316.

A. DI BERARDINO

HERESIOLOGISTS. These are Christian authors who dedicated some of their works to listing, describing and refuting the various heresies of past and present. The first great heresy against which the church found itself fighting was that known as "*gnosticism" (a somewhat vague term among ancient authors, used to designate very diverse phenomena). The earliest heresiological works were therefore mainly antignostic works, which proposed to unmask the errors of the sectarians and oppose them with the right doctrine derived from the teaching of the apostles and their successors the bishops. The first we know of is *Justin (ca. mid-2nd c.), author of a Σύνταγμα κατὰ πασῶν τῶν γεγενημένων αἱρέσεων, now lost, of which Justin himself tells us in another of his works (1 Apol. 26, 5), and a Πρὸς Μαρκίωνα σύνταγμα, also lost, which is cited by *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. IV, 6, 2; cf. also V, 26, 2) and by *Eusebius (HE 4,11,8-9; 4,18,9). Roughly his contemporary is *Hegesippus, author of a work in five books entitled Ὑπομνήματα, now lost (though some fragments are preserved in Eusebius; see HE 4,8,2), in which he presents the results of his journeys and research aimed at finding the authentic teaching of the apostles; the information collected in book V concerns mainly the gnostic heresy. But by far the most important heresiologist of the 2nd c. is Irenaeus of Lyons, author of an Ἔλεγχος καὶ ἀνατροπὴ τῆς ψευδονύμου γνώσεως (also known under the title Adversus haereses), in five books, which we possess entirely only in an old and very literal Latin translation, along with some fragments of the Greek original. The work is in two parts: the first (book I) describes the gnostic heresy; the second (books II-V) refutes it. Irenaeus brings together very detailed information esp. on the doctrine of the *Valentinian schools, information which constitutes an irreplaceable source for the history of the earliest gnosticism. *Hippolytus of Rome (early 3rd c.) is the author of two very important heresiological works. The first, titled Πρὸς πάσας τὰς αἱρέσεις (known also as Syntagma), now lost (but reconstructable, acc. to some scholars, based on the evidence of later heresiologists), is mentioned by Eusebius (HE 6,22), *Jerome (De vir. ill. 61) and *Photius (Bibl., cod. 121); it listed 32 heresies, and exercised a significant influence on the later heresiological tradition. The second, which survives incomplete, is titled Κατὰ πασῶν αἱρέσεων ἔλεγχος (also cited as Refutatio omnium haeresium or Philosophumena). Following in Irenaeus's footsteps, the author seeks to demonstrate the non-Christian character of the heresies; his treatment comprises two parts: in the first (books I-IV, of which II and III are lost), he treats of the various systems of pagan thought; in the second (books V-IX) he expounds the heretical doctrines of 33 gnostic sects, relating each to a pagan system discussed in the first part. Book X, which concludes the work, includes, in addition to a summary of what precedes it, a synthetic exposition of the true doctrine. Among Latin authors, *Tertullian made an important contribution to the heresiological tradition. The author of various polemical works (e.g., Adversus Marcionem; Adversus Hermogenem; Adversus Valentinianos), he also wrote a treatise entitled De praescriptione haereticorum, in which he proposed to definitively refute all the heretics by using the technical argument of the praescriptio, taken from Roman law. To this work is added a a spurious catalog of 32 heresies, titled Adversus omnes haereses (chs. 46-53)—attributed by some authors to Pope *Zephyrinus—which is usually considered a simple summary of Hippolytus's Syntagma.

The works of the older hereisologists reflect a doctrinal situation that was still quite fluid; but as the contents of doctrine were specified and articulated in a more complex way (thanks to the contribution of conciliar definitions and a continually developing theological reflection), the refutation of heresies required ever greater technical preparation and specialization, and was left to polemicists and controversialists. Later heresiologists (4th–8th c.) therefore limited themselves to presenting lists and summary descriptions of the heresies, from the origins to their own time. These works, which depend very closely on the writings of previous heresiologists, show increasingly less originality and are valuable mainly for their final parts, those dedicated to contemporary heresies which do not figure in the works of their predecessors. At the end of these lists is usually added a synthetic presentation of orthodox faith. *Epiphanius of Salamis (4th c.) is the author of the Πανάριον ("medicine chest," cited also as Haereses), whose title is explained by the author's intention to offer an antidote to those bitten by the serpent of heresy. In it he describes 80 heresies (of which the first 20 are from the pre-Christian period), drawing, for the older parts, on Justin, Irenaeus and Hippolytus. The number 80 was probably suggested by the 80 concubines of Song of Songs 6:8. A summary of this work was later published with the title Ἀνακεφαλαίωσις (Recapitulatio) and was used by *Augustine. *Theodoret of Cyrrhus wrote a Αἱρετικῆς κακομυθίας ἐπιτομή (Haereticorum fabularum compendium), in five books, in which he presents a brief description of all the heresies, from *Simon Magus to *Nestorius and *Eutyches (books I-IV), and a synthetic summary of the orthodox teaching of the church (book V). *Filaster of Brescia (late 4th c.) was the author of a Diversarum haereseon liber, in which he listed and described 156 heresies. The tendency, already manifest in previous heresiologists, to artificially inflate the number of heresies, probably to better articulate their details and stress their danger to faith, becomes particularly evident in Filaster.

Augustine too, in 428–429, wrote a De haeresibus in which, comparing Epiphanius and Filaster with each other, he enumerates and presents 88 heresies, from Simon Magus to *Pelagius and *Celestius; the work remained uncompleted by the second part, which was to have addressed how to recognize and so to avoid heresy (see De haer., proem.). Closely dependent on Augustine's treatment was book I of the anonymous work known under the title of Praedestinatus,* which lists 90 heresies, adding more or less false and fantastic information. To the last centuries of the patristic era belong the Breviarium causae Nestorianorum et Eutychianorum of the Carthaginian deacon *Liberatus (mid-6th c.), a brief history of the heresies up to 553, and *John of Damascus's De haeresibus (late 7th c.). The latter is the second part of a trilogy titled Πηγὴ Γνώσεως and is based, for the first 80 chapters, mainly on Epiphanius's Ἀνακεφαλαίωσις, and for chs. 80-100, on Theodoret of Cyrrhus's work; only for the last three heresies (chs. 101-103) does there seem to be an original account, probably added by another hand. The heresiological tradition knew further developments even after the end of the patristic era, both in the West and in the Byzantine world.

F. Oehler, Corpus haeresiologicum, 3 vols., Berlin 1856-61; A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, urkundlich dargestellt, Leipzig 1884 (facs. repr., Hildesheim 1963); K. Rahner, Häresiengeschichte: LTK V, 8-11. The Biblical Canons, ed. J.-M. Auwers - H.J. De Jonge (Bibliotheca Ephemeridum theologicarum Lovaniensium 163), Louvain 2003.

C. Gianotto

HERESY – HERETIC. From the Greek αἵρεσις, which may derive from the middle αἱρέομαι ("to take") and αἱρέω ("to choose"). In Hellenistic Greek

"heresy" indicated the object of intellectual choice and of lifestyle—i.e., a doctrine or a school, as it was for the philosophical schools which, in Philo, Josephus and the LXX, indicate the various sects or currents existing in Judaism. In the latter the term also had a pejorative sense—perhaps meaning one who departed from the teaching of the rabbinic tradition—and was used by the Jews concerning Christians, considered "heretics" in the sense of those who had deviated from Judaism. The Jews, in turn, with their various sects (Pharisees, Sadducees, etc.), were considered "heretics" by Christians (Mt 16:6-12), meaning those who deviated from the true religion. "Heresies" and "schisms" are spoken of in the community of Corinth (1 Cor 11:18-19), and "heresies" in Gal 5:20 and 2 Pet 2:1. While it is difficult to specify the limits of the two terms, heresy connoted a deviation from the doctrine believed by the community and from its way of life, thus incorporating from the Jews the meaning of "heterodoxy." In the Greek world the terminology denoted only a choice among the various philosophical schools, without implying any judgment on it; it is in this sense that we must read passages in *Ignatius of Antioch (Trall. 6, 11), *Justin (1 Apol. 26, 8; Dial. 17, 1; 35, 3; 51, 2; 108, 2), *Hermas (Simil. 9, 23, 5), *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 66, 44 and 1, 19, 91). In pre-Nicene Christian authors, heresy meant a personal choice that includes novelty: with respect to the teaching of the gospel for Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 3, 12, 11; PG 7, 905), and with respect to the doctrine of the apostles for *Tertullian (De praescriptione). Since it is a deviation from the regula fidei and from the discipline of the Teacher, it must be judged a novelty in belief (Tert., Praescr. 6, 2 and 42, 8). In this context, in antiquity novitas became a technical term for indicating heresy (Greg. Naz., Oratio XL, 42 on the Trinity; Aug., Nupt. conc. 2, 12, 25; Retract. 11, 33 on Pelagianism; Vinc. Ler., Comm. 1, 28).

In relation to schism, heresy was distinguished from it, but schism itself was seen as infected with heresy (Jerome, Ep. Tit. 3, 10-11) or as leading to it (Aug., Civ. Dei 18, 51; Ep. 93, 11,46; C. Cresconium 2, 7, 9), so much so that heretics and schismatics were put on the same level (Cypr., Ep. 69 and 70 on the Novatianists). In 1934 W. Bauer proposed the understanding of heresy as an original datum of Christianity from which orthodoxy emerged: among the various readings of Christianity, one prevailed and became defined as orthodox, though originally it was on a level with the others. The limits of such a reading of primitive Christianity are two: it applies to the Christian evidence the category of heresy then in use in the philosophies (i.e., as a possible choice in the search for truth); and it thinks of the orthodoxy/heresy dialectic as two aspects of the truth that are not just distinguishable but also capable of real separation. In Christianity the orthodoxy/heresy dialectic was different. To the original data of Jesus of Nazareth (dicta et facta Iesu) was given, as a guaranteed reading, the one possible reading of the direct witnesses, accepted as such in the community (apostles/disciples). Orthodoxy was attested on this line; outside of this track—later technically called "apostolic"—and excluded from it was heresy, which therefore was not defined except in relation to orthodoxy. The normative rule of this dialectic, on the common basis of sticking to what the apostles had received from Jesus, was beginning to be specified around points of reference: confessions of faith, rules of faith, creeds, authoritative decisions by leaders of the communities, i.e., bishops alone or meeting in synods (councils). Heresy, seen by some in antiquity as the fruit of an ambiguous cultural mediation with the philosophies of the time (e.g., in the Latin church this was the view of *Hippolytus and Tertullian), in more attentive spirits was also seen as useful for better understanding and deepening the datum of the Christian faith (e.g., the Cappadocian fathers for the Greek church and Augustine of Hippo for the Latin church), i.e., its "functionality" with respect to orthodoxy (Orig., C. Celsum 2, 27; 3, 12-13; 5, 61; Clem. Alex., Strom. 7, 15, 89; Aug., Civ. Dei 16, 2, 1; 22, 24, 3). Regarding the determination of what constituted heresy, Augustine himself, to *Quodvultdeus, who had requested a manual of heresies for pastoral use (Ep. 221-224), reflected on the difficulty of defining it (Ep. 222, 2) and therefore of always being able to identify it. There was the danger of calling opinions heretical that were not so (Ep. 222, 2).

Despite these concerns, from the start there were readings of Christianity that were considered heretical, or unorthodox (Just., Syntagma [lost]; Hipp., Refutatio omnium haeresiarum; ps.-Tertull., Adversus omnes haereses: CSEL 47, 213-226; Anon., Anacephaleosis; Epiph., Panarion [after 375–376]; Filaster, Diversarum haereseon liber [380–390]; ps.-Jerome, Indiculus de haeresibus [before 428]; Aug., De haeresibus [428–429]; Arnobius, Praedestinatus [after 430]). From the 5th c. on, such manuals had the pastoral purpose of making heresies known, providing responses to them, and offering help in the face of new ones. In the Latin church, after Tertullian's De praescriptione, which showed how one became a heretic, Augustine proposed to write book II of De haer. on the question quid facit haereticum? but never wrote it.

In early Christian authors, heresy denoted not just an error on the logical level of faith but also a group that adheres to such an error. The heretic—placed by Paul among those who, in a Christian sense, were affected by a vice (1 Cor 11:18-19)—indicated one who had not made a right choice. This was the opposite of what it had meant for the Greeks; i.e., one who had made a right choice of a philosophy that for him constitutes the doctrinal rule regarding a people's customs, institutions and basic sensibilities (Sextus Emp., Pyrrhon hypotyp. 1, 16; ps.-Plato, Defin. 412a). The Christian heretic connoted a choice made outside the community's code of life: a private judgment that took no account of the community's judgment (the ecclesia in its catholicity) was considered biased (= heretic) and therefore not Catholic. Heretics were therefore indicated generically as "enemies of the faith" (Ambr., In ps. 118[119], 13, 6), connoting an adherence contrary to the faith of all. In this they were distinguished from schismatics, who connoted not so much a choice adhered to as a break or division in the community. If they came to be equated, this was because both heresy and schism threatened the unity of the Christian community. Augustine, who in 397 had asked Jerome for a list of heresies (Ep. 40, 6,9), distinguished between error and heresy: "If I regret something that is written [he said regarding Jerome], I retract it whether in the writings of a friend or in my own writings; but, for a Catholic, it is one thing to err in some truth, and another to establish or to hold the heresy of a great error" (O. imp. 4, 89). In qualifying a Christian as a heretic, Augustine required a bad will and obstinate adherence to the error, which later becomes evident when there is a clear knowledge of the regula fidei (De pecc. orig. 29, 34; De bapt. c. Donatistas 4, 16,23; De gest. Pel. 6, 18; De anima et eius orig. 3, 15,23). He thus did not think those born into heresy should be considered heretics, since their opinion "is not the fruit of their bold presumption, but of the inheritance they have received" (Ep. 43, 1): Haereticus est, ut mea fert opinio, qui alicuius temporalis commodi et maxime gloriae principatusque sui gratia falsas ac novas opiniones vel gignit vel sequitur (De utilit. credendi 1).

In relation to the Christian community, the understanding of heretic underwent a true evolution from Tertullian to Augustine. In Tertullian the heretic is allowed no appellatio fraternitatis, since "the heretic is no longer considered a Christian" (Praescr. 16, 2). They are equated, religiously, with the pagan and the Jew since, by their heresy, they have removed themselves from the vital Christian vehicle that is the apostolic link. The heretic is a corrupted Christian (Praescr. 12 and 13; 23, 5), though he or she can wholly recover through the church's correptio (Praescr. 12, 1 and 16, 2). *Cyprian sees heretics as those who, having lost their Christianity, lose also their possibility of salvation, because they put themselves outside of the church's unity (De unitate, 4; Ep. 55, 24). For Cyprian, to be able to return to the church the heretic, like the schismatic, needs to be rebaptized, a position rejected by Pope *Stephen (Ep. 74, 1-2, among the epistles of Cypr.). Augustine explores, in the context of the *Donatist polemic in *Africa, the fact that all the baptized, thanks to one and the same spiritual birth, are brothers and sisters, though they may live in a situation of separation (De baptismo c. Donatistas 1, 5,10; 6, cc. 30-34).

If, on the level of sacramental theology, the unity of all the baptized—and thus also of the heretic—as fratres was accepted thanks to Augustine, after the Constantinian change the heretic came to be considered a non-Christian on the social level (in the edict of 3 August 379, it is said of the Donatists: cum nec christiani quidem habeantur, CTh XVI, 5, 5) and so liable, from the point of view of public religion, to the penalties of praescriptio laid down for the crime of superstitio. The position of heretics increasingly acquired a civil connotation, sacramental penitential correptio being also now a fact of public church order. The heretic was no longer an internal matter for the Christian community, pertaining to the spiritual sphere and to freedom of religious conscience. Augustine's Ep. 93, of 407–408, to the Donatist bishop Vincent, is considered the substantial historical document of the post-Constantinian church's attitude to the heretic: he is a Christian dissident on whom even civil punishment may be inflicted. This was not to be considered purely a punishment, however, but a medicine of reform, and it could only be imposed after adequate instruction. This position matured in the context of the consciousness that any discussion regarding the Christian religion found its proper forum in the church, as *Ambrose said about the absurdity of discussing de fide in consistorio ("in heretical circles") rather than where it is prescribed (i.e., in ecclesia, Ep. 75, 17). The first heretic executed for his religious convictions has been wrongly named as *Priscillian (killed by the usurper *Maxentius in 385). In ancient times a heretic was publicly considered such after exclusion from ecclesial communion for a certain period of time, then ratified by official excommunication (Synod of Constantinople of 382, can. 6: Joannou 111, 50-51).

F. Oehler, Corpus haeresiologicum, Berlin 1856-1861; J. De Guibert, La notion d'hérésie chez s. Augustin: BLE 21 (1920) 369-382; W. Bauer, Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten

Christentum, Tübingen 1934 (²1964; Eng. tr. Philadelphia 1971); H. Pétré, Haeresis, schisma, et leurs synonymes latins: REL 15 (1937) 316-319; D. Balter (ed.), Schism, Heresy and Religious Protest, Cambridge 1972; F. Winkelmann, Grosskirche und Haeresien in der Spätantike: Forschungen und Fortschritte 41 (1967) 245; L. Kolakowski, s.v. Eresia: Enciclopedia Einaudi, Turin 1978, V, 611-635; M. Simon, From Greek hairesis to Christian Heresy, in Early Christian Literature and the Classical Intellectual Tradition, Th. hist. 53, Paris 1979, 101-116; J. McCluxe, Handbooks Against Heresy in the West, from the Late Fourth to the Late Sixth Centuries: JTS n.s. 30 (1979) 186-197; A. Benoit, Irénée et l'hérésie. Les conceptions hérésiologiques de l'évêque de Lyon: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 55-67; M. Girardi, Notizie di eresia, scisma e parasinagoga in Basilio di Cesarea: VetChr 17 (1980) 49-77; V. Grossi, L'iter della comunione ecclesiale nelle comunità di Tertulliano-Cipriano-Agostino, in Regno come Comunione, Turin 1980, 59-100; R.S. Cole Turner, Anti-Heretical Issues and the Debate over Galatians 2,11-14 in the Letters of St. Augustine to St. Jerome: Augustinian Studies 11 (1980) 155-166; Rivista Augustinianum 25 (1985/3) (wholly dedicated to "heresy and heresiology"); A. Le Bolluec, La notion d'hérésie dans la litterature grecque II-III siècles, I-II, Paris 1985; G. Barone-Adesi, Eresie "sociali" ed inquisizione Teodosiana, in Atti dell'Accademia Romanistica Costantiniana (VI Convegno internazionale), Rome 1986, 119-166; G. Puglisi, Giustizia criminale e persecuzioni antieretiche: Priscilliano e Ursino, Ambrogio e Damaso: SicGymn 43 (1990) 91ff.

V. Grossi

HERETICAL MONUMENTS. At the level of monuments, evidence of the many heretical sects which developed in the heart of early Christianity is generally scarce and, on the whole, ill-known. Among the various reasons for this phenomenon, the main one is the uninterrupted continuity of the Catholic Church, which from time to time destroyed, appropriated or even transformed monuments previously belonging to heretical sects (esp., of course, as far as applies to the official sphere), such that it does not seem accidental that a certain amount of evidence of the heterodox output has been preserved by small objects for essentially private use, and by inscriptions. Moreover, the difficulty of identifying heretical monuments has been underestimated—at least for certain sects, such as the *Arians—due to the nonexistence of patterns or ground plans of their own, rigorously distinct from orthodox ones. Indeed, if we were not informed by narrative sources of the Arian origin of some Theodorician monuments of Ravenna—e.g., the basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo or the Arian baptistery (S. Maria in Cosmedin)—there would be nothing to indicate that they were Arian buildings or distinguish them from orthodox ones. Another equally important reason is the substantial paucity and fragmentary nature of studies on the subject, which—save some rare exceptions—besides making generally scanty contributions to the solution of the problem by hasty and superficial conclusions, have at times even helped to further confuse the matter.

Among heretical monuments we must first list inscriptions, found in fair number all over the orbis christianus antiquus and belonging to more or less all the sects. Among the many examples we will mention the acrostic epigraph of Flavia Sophe (Φλαβία Σόφη), found at Rome, *gnostic in content; that of Bassa (Βάσσα), *Manichean, found at Salona (Bull. di archeol. e storia Dalmata [1906] 118), and the *Novatianist one of Melanippus and Doxe (Μελανίππη and Δόζη) from Asia Minor (MAMA I, 174). Numerous *Montanist inscriptions come from Phrygia, Rome and Africa, which has also yielded some *Donatist epigraphical texts. Also from Asia Minor are at least two inscriptions belonging to the saccophorae or apotactae (MAMA I, 171 and 173); other epigraphs of various provenance, though of declared heterodox content, are not attributable to specific sects. Finally, nothing explicit of this sort seems to have survived related to the Arian heresy.

Numerous evidence of work of a heretical nature—mainly from gnostic contexts—is provided, as mentioned, by various minute objects (gems, amulets etc.), in which the name Yahweh is variously interwoven and combined with those of Ἰαῶ, Ἄβρασαχ, Solomon etc., and with complex symbols only partly solved. Yet, on account of their ambiguous variety—ranging from the properly religious sphere to that more generally or vaguely magical—and in the continuing insufficiency and difficulty of studies, even an uncertain attribution of the greater part of these objects to specific heretical sects remains as problematic as ever.

Important evidence of church buildings—in time reconsecrated to Catholic worship thus ensuring their survival—remain for the Arian sect. At Rome, the churches of S. Agata dei Goti, built by Ricimer in ca. 470, and S. Severino in Merulana, recorded only by a passage of *Gregory the Great (Ep. III, 19), are well known. To these it seems we must add, acc. to a recent hypothesis supported by good arguments, the vanished oratory on the "Monte della Giustizia," demolished at the end of the 19th c. (Testini, RivAC [1968] 219ff.). At Ravenna remain the old Arian cathedral with adjacent baptistery, and the basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo, subsequently dedicated to St. Martin of Tours. Suggestions have been put forward, with more or less solid arguments, for various other basilicas such as S. Giovanni Maggiore at Naples, S. Eusebio at Pavia, S. Giovanni Battista at Cividale, S. Lorenzo Maggiore at Milan, the anonymous church with mosaic floor found on the Rotter estate at Monastero (Aquileia), that, with baptistery, sited in the Piazza della Vittoria at Grado, the basilica of the S cemetery at Manastirine (Salona), and others.

Finally, we must consider hypogea. Even in the recent past, many of these were attributed to heretical sects or groups, but in fact only two, both at Rome, show heterodox characteristics for sure: the hypogeum of the Aurelii, on Viale Manzoni, in which were laid the followers of a sect difficult to specify, but characterized by a mixed doctrine of Christian and pagan elements (1st half of 3rd c.), and that of Vibia, on the Via Appia (3rd–4th c.), belonging to followers of the cult of Bacchus Sabazius. To these we must probably add that of Trebius Justus and another, anonymous, found more recently under the Schneider house, also on the Via Appia.

For the individual monuments considered, see bibl. under place names in this work. For the problem in general, H. Leclercq, in DACL, s.v. Abraxas, Anges, Arianisme, Conciles, Gemmes, Gnosticisme, Hérésies, Manichéisme, Montanisme, Tertullien etc.; C. Cecchelli, Monumenti cristiano-eretici di Roma, Rome 1944 (with bibl.). For inscriptions: F. Grossi Gondi, Trattato di epigrafia cristiana latina e greca del mondo romano occidentale, Rome 1920, 454ff.; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Rome 1958, 524ff. (see also the updated bibl., ed. C. Carletti, facs. repr., Bari 1980, 825); F. Decret, L'Afrique manichéenne (IVe-Ve siècles): étude historique et doctrinale, Paris 1978; W. Tabbernee, Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia: Epigraphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism, Macon 1997. For amulets: C. Bonner, Studies in Magical Amulets, Chiefly Graeco-Egyptian, Ann Arbor 1950; A.A. Barb, in EAA, III, Rome 1960, 971ff., s.v. Gnostiche gemme (with bibl.). For Arianism: E. Demougeot, Y eut-il une forme arienne de l'art paléochretienne, in Atti VI Cong. Intern. Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1965, 491-519; R. Giordani, Probabili echi della crisi ariana in alcune figurazioni paleocristiane: RivAC 54 (1978) 229ff. (with bibl.) For hypogea: P. Testini, Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri cristiani in Roma, Bologna 1966, 142ff. and passim; A. Ferrua, La polemica antiariana nei monumenti paleocristiani, Vatican City 1991.

R. Giordani

HERMAS, SHEPHERD of (2nd c.). As it appears today, this book contains three great parts: the Visions, the Mandates and the Similitudes (or Parables): it is the work of a compiler who brought together and retouched two pre-2nd-c. books, of which one (corresponding to Visions I-IV) was the work of a certain Hermas and the other (Vision V, Mandates and Similitudes) anonymous. Both works seem to have had Hebrew sources. The first part (Visions I-IV) presents itself as half autobiography, half fantasy: an old woman (symbol of the church) appears to Hermas, assures him of the gravity of the sins for which he reproaches himself (Vision I), and entrusts him with a mission: he must make known the text of a book she gives him, which announces a day of pardon for Christians who have sinned after baptism, on condition that they repent (Vision II). In Vision III, Hermas sees a tower built with every kind of stone, some beautiful, others crumbling; the old woman explains that this is an image of the church, comprising in itself saints and repentant sinners; he must hasten to do penance since, once the tower is built, it will be too late. Then Hermas sees a monster approaching; a girl (in whom he recognizes the rejuvenated church) tells him it is the symbol of the great trial that is to come (Vision IV). In Vision V, the Shepherd appears and orders Hermas to write down his Mandates and Similitudes. The Mandates announce the 12 commandments toward God and neighbor: (1) faith in God the creator; (2) charity, simplicity; (3) love of truth; (4) chastity, marriage, second marriage; (5) patience and anger; (6) the two ways; (7) fear of God, but not of the devil; (8) actions to abstain from; good works to practice; (9) prayer; (10) sadness and joy; (11) true and false prophets; (12) wicked desires. The Similitudes appear as examples that serve to emphasize doctrinal or moral points. The Shepherd explains in turn to Hermas the parable of the elm and the vine, figure of the rich and the poor man: the elm supports the vine, which in turn adorns the elm (Sim. I); of the dry and green trees, symbols of sinners and the just (Sim. III-IV); of the vineyard, the master and the zealous slave (Sim. V); of the two shepherds, one representing the angel of pleasure, the other that of penitence (Sim. VI-VII). In Similitudes VIII-IX the church again appears under two symbols, the tree and the tower. The last Similitude concludes the work: Hermas must do penance and persevere, and teach salvation to others; until the tower is completed, it is time to do penance. This book, which was presented as a revelation, exercised great influence. Among other things, it contributed to the idea that sins committed after baptism could be forgiven, but only once—a limit maintained in the following centuries for public penance. The text found at Sinai in 1978 will lead to a greater knowledge of the text of the Shepherd, as will the Ethiopic version of the work.

CPG 1052; GCS 48; SC 53; DTC 6, 2268-2288; S. Giet, Hermas et les Pasteurs, Paris 1962; G.F. Snyder, The Shepherd of Hermas, Camden 1968; I. Reiling, Hermas and Christian Prophecy: A Study of the Eleventh Mandate, Leiden 1973; L. Cyril, La christologie pneumatique de la Ve Parabole du "Pasteur" d'Hermas: RHR 184 (1973) 25-48; A. Hilhorst, Sémitismes et latinismes dans le Pasteur d'Hermas, Nijmegen 1976; S. Folgado Flórez, Teoria eclesiale en el Pastor de Hermas, El Escorial 1979; Ph. Henne, Hermas en Égypte: la tradition manuscrite et l'unité rédactionnelle du Pasteur: CrSt 11 (1990) 237-256; H.O. Maier, The Social Setting of the Ministry as Reflected in the Writings of Hermas, Clement and Ignatius, Waterloo, ON 1991; Der Hirt des Hermas, tr. and comm. N. Brox, Göttingen 1991; Papyrus Bodmer XXXVIII: Erma, Il Pastore (Ia-IIIa visione), ed. with intr. & critical comm. by A. Carlini, Cologny-Geneva 1991; Ph. Henne, L'unité du Pasteur d'Hermas: tradition et rédaction, Paris 1992; Il Pastore di Erma: versione Palatina con testo a fronte, crit. ed., with It. trans. and comm, by A. Vezzoni, Florence 1994; E. Dekkers, Les traductions latines du "Pasteur" d'Hermas: Euphrosyne 22 (1994) 13-26; C. Haas, Die Pneumatologie des Hirten des Hermas: ANRW 2, 27, 1, 552-586; R. Joly, Le milieu complexe du Pasteur d'Hermas: ANRW 2, 27, 1, 524-551; Hermas, El Pastor, introd., Sp. tr. and notes by J.J. Ayán Calvo, Madrid 1995; G. Lusini, Nouvelles recherches sur le texte du "Pasteur" d'Hermas: Apocrypha 12 (2001) 79-97.

P. NAUTIN

HERMENEGILD, martyr (d. 585). Son of Leovigild, the last *Arian *Visigothic king of *Toledo, and older brother of *Recared. In 579 Hermenegild married a Catholic, Ingunda, daughter of Sigebert, king of the Franks. Through the influence of Bishop *Leander of Seville, Hermenegild became a Catholic. He put himself at the head of the nobility, discontented with his father's despotism, and allied himself with the *Byzantines. When Seville fell into Leovigild's hands, Hermenegild was sent to *Tarragona and executed (585). *Gregory the Great made him a martyr, since he had refused Communion from an Arian bishop (Dial. 3,31; Greg. Tours, Hist. Franc. 5,38). The Spanish sources, however, speak only of the revolt, and not of Hermenegild's conversion (*Jn. Bicl., Chron.; *Isid. Sev., Hist. Goth. 49). His feast is 13 April in the historical martyrologies, 30 October in the Synax. Eccl. CP.

BHL 3850; BS 5, 33-47; LCI 6, 508-510; PLRE 3A, 449-450; B. Saitta, Un momento di disgregazione nel regno visigoto di Spagna. La rivolta di Ermenegildo: Quaderni catanesi di studi classici and medievali 1 (1979) 81-134; B. De Gaiffier, Hispana et Lusitana: AB 89 (1980) 157-158; M. Reyof thet, La royauté dans la littérature latine de Sidoine Apollinaire à Isidore de Séville, Rome 1981, 481-485.

V. SAXER - S. HEID

HERMETICISM. "Hermetic literature" is a sizeable corpus of writings of the Hellenistic era that were held to be revealed by the god Hermes. This god, who, in the allegories of esp. *Stoic myth, was interpreted as the λόγος (see, e.g., Annaeus Cornutus, Compendium theologiae Graecae, ch. 16, from the time of Nero), during the Hellenistic period was identified—since he was the inventor of writing and lord of speech—with the Egyptian god Thoth and thus also became the guarantor of the antiquity of the Egyptian wisdom tradition, which was widely esteemed and compared, if not preferred, to that of Greece (e.g., by the Egyptian historical Stoic allegorist Chaeremon of Alexandria, also of the Neronian period). Probably from the 3rd c. BC, writings of an occult nature, esp. astrological, which must have constituted a much larger corpus than the one that has reached us, began to circulate under the name Hermes Trismegistus ("thrice very great," hyperbole to show his exceptional power). Among the astrological writings is the Liber Hermetis Trismegisti (the text of which is preserved in a Latin MS of the British Museum, Harleianus 3731, ed. W. Gundel, Neue astrologische Texte des Hermes Trismegistus: ABAW n.s. 12, 1936), which deals with astrology, esp. its theory of the decans, and whose oldest parts, acc. to Festugière (Révélation, I, 72ff., 112ff.), go back to the time of the Ptolemies. Its doctrine of the contemporary rising of the stars was studied by W. Hübner, Die Paranatellonten im Liber Hermetis, ZWG 59 (1975) 387-414. The Liber is a typical example of a popular type of Hermeticism, which includes those Hermetic works that reflect a "popular" religiosity: works on astrology, magic, magical medicine and botany, and alchemy. They qualify as Hermetic not because the share a particular doctrine or system of thought but simply by the attribution of their content to Hermes Trismegistus. Research has recently focused esp. on popular Hermeticism, linked to magic, and to the Hermiticism-astrology link (e.g., M. Waegeman, Amulet and Alphabet: Magical Amulets in the First Book of Cyranides, Amsterdam 1987; W. Hübner, Uranoscopus: der verstirnte Sterngucker: RhM 133 [1990] 264-274; Hermes Trismegistus, De triginta sex decanis, ed. CETEDOC, Turnhout 1994; M. Ullmann, Das Schlangebuch des Hermes Trismegistos, Ger. tr., Wiesbaden 1994; W. Hübner, Grade und Gradbezirke der Tierkreiseichen: der anonyme Traktat "De stellis fixis, in quibus gradibus oriuntur signorum," Stuttgart 1995). Hermeticism linked to alchemy has also been studied: Hermès Trismégiste, La Table d'émeraude et sa tradition alchimique, préf. D. Kahn, Paris 1994; A. Faivre, The Eternal Hermes: From Greek God to Alchemical Magus, Grand Rapids, MI 1995.

Learned or philosophical Hermeticism, on the other hand, includes, besides a series of evidence and fragments left by the Fathers, three groups of writings: the Corpus Hermeticum (in Greek); the Latin translation, called Asclepius, of a lost Greek original, the Logos teleios or Perfect Discourse; some 30 extracts preserved in Stobaeus's Anthologium (ca. AD 500), of unequal length and value (some very short): the best known and most important for length, literary form and doctrinal content is the Korē Kosmou, translated as "pupil"—or, less probably, "girl"—"of the world" (the former rendering is also preferred by H. Jackson, Kore Kosmou. Isis, Pupil of the Eye of the World, Chronique d'Égypte 61, 121 [1986] 116-135, and by the It. tr. Ermete Trismegisto. La pupilla del mondo, tr. and comm. by C. Poltronieri, intr. by G. Filoramo, Venice 1994). The fundamental edition of all this material remains Hermès Trismégiste, I-II, Corpus Hermeticum, Asclepius, text by A.D. Nock, tr. by A.J. Festugière, Paris ²1960; III-IV: Fragments extraits de Stobée. Fragments divers, text and tr. by A.J. Festugière for Stobaeus, text by A.D. Nock and tr. by A.J. Festugière for the fragments, Paris 1954; the It. tr. of all four volumes is by I. Ramelli, Milan 2004 (Festugière's tr. is included in Hermès Trismégiste, Les trois révélations, afterward by A. Verse, Paris 1998). The relevant classical study is that of A.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, I, L'astrologie et les sciences occultes, Paris 1944; Paris ²1981; II, Le dieu cosmique, Paris 1949; III, Les doctrines de l'âme, Paris 1953; IV, Le Dieu inconnu et la gnose, Paris 1954, followed up by Id., Hermétisme et mystique païenne, Paris 1967, It. tr. Ermetismo e mistica pagana, Genoa 1991. To the texts edited and studied by Nock and by Festugière should be added a Hermetic treatise found in Codex VI of *Nag Hammadi, the De Ogdoade et Enneade: also in the same codex is a version in Coptic of the final prayer of the Asclepius. Important studies are M. von Krause - P. Labib (eds.), Gnostische und Hermetische Schriften aus Codex II und VI, Glückstadt 1971; P. Mahé, Le sens et la composition da traité hermétique "L'ogdoade et l'ennéade" conservé dans le Codex VI de Nag Hammadi: RSR 48 (1974) 54-65; K.W. Tröger, On Investigating the Hermetic Documents Contained in NHG VI, in R. McL. Wilson (ed.), Nag Hammadi and Gnosis, Leiden 1978, 117-121; J.P. Mahé, Hermès en Haute-Égypte. Les textes hermétiques de Nag Hammadi et leurs parallèles grecs et latins, I-II, Québec 1978-82; Id., La voie d'immortalité à la lumière des Hermetica de Nag Hammadi et de découvertes plus récentes: VC 45 (1991) 347-375; C. de Santis, Gli scritti ermetici del VI codice di Nag-Hammadi: SMSR 11 (1987) 57-65; A. Camplani, Alcune note sul testo del VI codice di Nag-Hammadi: Augustinianum 26 (1986) 349-368; Id., Scritti ermetici in copto: l'Ogdoade e l'Enneade, Preghiera di ringraziamento, frammento del Discorso perfetto, intr. tr. note, Brescia 2000; H.G. Bethge - U.U. Müller - U.K. Plisch, Bericht über Editionen von koptischen Texten und Publikationen von Hilfsmittel: ZAC 3, 2 (1999) 184-201. A Coptic fragment of the Lógos téleios has also been found, studied by J.P. Mahé, Le fragment du "Discours parfait" dans la bibliothèque de Nag-Hammadi, in Colloque international sur les textes de Nag Hammadi 1978, ed. B. Barc, Québec-Louvain-la-Neuve 1981, 304-327; cf. Id., Le "Discours parfait" d'après l'"Asclépius" latin, ibid. 405-434.

The 17 treatises of the Corpus Hermeticum have significant differences among them, both formally and doctrinally. Firstly, they are addressed to different persons. Treatises IIA (of which we have only the title), IV, V, VIII, X, XII, XIII are addressed by Hermes to his son and disciple Tat; II, VI, IX, XIV by Hermes to his disciple Asclepius; I and XI are addressed by the Nous or Supreme Intellect to Hermes. XVI is a letter of Asclepius to a third disciple, Ammon; XVII is a fragment of a dialogue between Tat and an unnamed king, perhaps Ammon; finally XVIII, which betrays only a few suggestions of Hermeticism, is a *panegyric to the emperors, perhaps *Diocletian and his colleagues. The treatises of the Corpus also differ in form and literary genre: II, IV-VI and VIII-XIII are treatises of instruction in which a sage teaches his pupils (never more than three), either responding to their questions or in long monologues. XIV and XVI are also treatises of instruction, but in letter form. III is a cosmogonic fragment, influenced by the Genesis account (on gnostic OT exegesis: G. Filoramo - C. Gianotto, L'interpretazione gnostica dell'AT: Augustinianum 22 [1982] 53-74). VII is an example of popular preaching on salvific themes. Finally I, titled Poimandres, the most famous and important of the Hermetic treatises, is an aretalogy and describes a theophany, that of the Supreme Intellect, developing a broad cosmogonic framework (the cosmogony in the Corpus Hermeticum is investigated by J.P. Mahé, La création dans les "Hermetica," RecAug 21 [1986] 3-53). Nous appears in a vision to the disciple Hermes and shows him the genesis of the spiritual and sensible worlds, strictly distinguished, and the emanation from the supreme God of two sons, Logos and Demiurgos, and finally that of Anthropos, the celestial First Man who, falling prisoner to the allurements of Physis ("Nature"), from it generates the first seven androgynous earthly men. The vision is meanwhile transformed into a dialogue which concludes in a new vision, in which is revealed to Hermes the destiny of the souls of the elect. At the end the disciple tells how he had begun to preach to humanity the revelation of salvation. The treatise ends with a solemn hymn of thanksgiving to God, analyzed in D.J.M. Whitehouse's dissertation, The Hymns of the Corpus Hermeticum, Harvard Univ., Cambridge, MA 1985, summ. in DA 46 (1986) 2231A. This treatise—not without Jewish influences, as demonstrated by, e.g., M. Philonenko, Le "Poimandrès" et la liturgie juive, in Les syncrétismes dans les religions de l'antiquité, eds. F. Dunand - P. Lévêque, Leiden 1975, 204-211; Id., Une utilisation du "Shema" dans le "Poimandrès": RHPhR 59 (1979) 369-372—has been the object of important studies, including R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, Stuttgart 1966 (repr.); E. Haenchen, Aufbau und Theologie des "Poimandres": ZThK 53 (1956) 149-191; Y. Shibatu, The Place of Cosmogony in "Poimandres": JCS 28 (1980) 77-87; B.A. Pearson, Jewish Elements in Corpus Hermeticum I ("Poimandres"), in Studies in Gnosticism and Hellenistic Religions, eds. R. van de Broek - M.J. Vermaseren, Leiden 1981, 336-348; R.A. Segal, The "Poimandres" as Myth: Scholarly Theory and Gnostic Meaning, Amsterdam-Berlin 1986; J. Buechli, Der Poimandres, ein paganisiertes Evangelium, Tübingen 1987; J. Holzhausen, Natur und Gottes Wille im hermetischen Traktat "Poimandres": Hermes 120 (1992) 483-489; P. Kingsley, Poimandres: JWI 56 (1993) 1-24; J. Holzhausen, Der Mythos vom Menschen im hellenistischen Ägypten: eine Studien zum Poimandres (= CH 1.), zu Valentin und dem gnostichen Mythos, Theophaneia 33, Bodenheim 1994, with extensive bibl. on 234-262; H.M. Jackson, A New Proposal for the Origin of the Hermetic God Poimandres: ZPE 128 (1999) 95-106 and J. Peste, The Poimandres Group in the Corpus Hermeticum, Göteborg 2002, and was translated by P. Scarpi, Venice 1987, and D. Tiedemann - M. Vollmer, Marburg 1990. Its importance is in the myth it narrates, in which theology, cosmogony and anthropogony are coherently interwoven; in the soteriological doctrine that Hermes is entrusted to preach at the end; and in the disciple's experience of knowledge (gnosis) and divinization. This is also true for treatise XIII (investigated by W.C. Grese, Corpus Hermeticum XIII and Early Christian Literature, Diss. Claremont, CA 1977, summ. DA 38 [1977] 2195A-96A) and for De Ogdoade et Enneade, both of which also narrate an experience of spiritual regeneration, though without a mythological framework like that of Poimandres. The other treatises of the Corpus Hermeticum confine themselves either to developing a dogma of a particular school (II, V, VI, VIII, IX) or presenting a synthesis of Hermetic topics (X, XI, XII, XVI, Asclepius).

The treatises of the Corpus also differ among themselves doctrinally. In some treatises, e.g., V, the world is penetrated by the deity to the point of identification with it, in a perspective that tends toward immanentism. The kosmos is therefore beautiful and ordered, acc. to the meaning itself of the Greek term, and participates in the divine goodness: thus, only through contemplation of the world—the living god—can one reach the invisible God. In other treatises, e.g., I, IV, VII, XIII and the Coptic writing, a dualistic and pessimistic perspective emerges in which the created world and generation are considered the fullness of evil (similarly, in the Korē Kosmou incarnation of souls is considered a punishment): in this case, this world is not the work of the first God, who is absolutely transcendent, but is created by a second god or Demiurge. In these pessimistic works there emerges a restricted sense of Hermeticism as a gnostic-type doctrine of salvation, which relates these writings to gnostic currents of the 2nd–3rd c. AD. But it is also possible to speak of Hermeticism in a more general sense, meaning that basic element, not strictly doctrinal in nature, which unites the two strands, optimistic and pessimistic, pantheistic and dualistic, traceable in the writings of the Corpus Hermeticum: it is a particular vision of the world, a certain attitude in which pietas, faith, has priority over the intellect, becoming its spiritual guide. Deum novit qui colit (inverting Seneca's famous formula colit qui novit, and anticipating St. Augustine's credo ut intelligam): he only knows God truly who submits the aporiae of the intellect to the certainty of faith, who joins pietas with gnosis (eusebeia meta gnōseōs). This accounts for the special atmosphere of many Hermetic treatises, immersed in a rarified aura of meditation which invites and often concludes with prayer—starting with the splendid hymn that concludes the Poimandres, aimed at stimulating, not only knowledge of God (gnosis), but also moral and spiritual elevation. Recently some important studies have been dedicated to the relationship between gnosticism and Hermeticism, in primis those of G. Sfameni Gasparro, La gnosi ermetica come iniziazione e mistero: SMSR 36 (1965) 46-61; Id., Gnostica et Hermetica, Rome 1982, but also G. van Moorsel, Die Symbolsprache in der hermetische Gnosis: Symbolon 1 (1960) 128-137; K.W. Tröger, Die hermetische Gnosis, in id. (ed.), Gnosis und Neues Testament, Berlin 1973, 97-119; Id., Mysterienglaube und Gnosis in Corpus Hermeticum XIII, Berlin 1971; P.A. Carozzi, Gnose et sotériologie dans la "Korē Kosmou" hermétique, in Gnosticisme et monde hellénistique, eds. J. Ries - Y. Janssens - J.M. Sevrin, Louvain 1982, 61-78; F. Daumas, Le fonds égyptien de l'hermétisme, ibid. 3-25; J.P. Mahé, Générations antédiluviennes et chute des éons dans l'hermétisme et dans la gnose, in Knowledge of God in the Graeco-Roman World, eds. R. van den Broek - T. Baarda - J. Mansfeld, Leiden 1988, 160-177; L. Kákosy, Survivals of Ancient Egypt . . . Egyptian Influence on Gnosticism and Hermetism, in Studia in honorem L.

Fóti, Budapest 1989, 263-287; J. Bregman, Synesius, the Hermetica und Gnosis, in Neoplatonism and Gnosticism, ed. R.T. Wallis - J. Bregman, Albany 1992, 85-98; R. Van den Broek - C. van Herrtum, From "Poimandres" to Böhme. Gnosis, Hermetism and the Christian Tradition, Amsterdam 2000.

Also related is the study of the presence of Hermeticism in Coptic texts, on which we have already provided bibliographical notes, and the discourse on the link between Hermeticism and Egyptian culture, from the genesis itself of the Corpus Hermeticum to later influences (e.g., W. Schmitt-Biggemann, Isis und Osiris in Athanasius Kirchers "Oedipus Aegyptiacus": ARG 3 [2001] 67-88): P. Darchain, L'authenticité de l'inspiration égyptienne dans le Corpus Hermeticum: RHR 161 (1962) 175-198; Id., La doctrine hermétiste et l'influence de la religion égyptienne, summ. in RHR 163 (1963) 126-127; E. Iversen, Egyptian and Hermetic Doctrine, Copenhagen 1984; G. Fowden, The Egyptian Hermes, Cambridge 1986; N. Makris, Hermès Trismégiste et l'Égypte: EPh (1987) 169-178; L. Fóti, Hermès Trismégiste et la mythologie égyptienne, in Studia in honorem L. Fóti, Budapest 1989, 9-27; B.A. Pearson, Gnosticism, Judaism and Egyptian Christianity, Minneapolis 1990; Th. McAllister Scott, Egyptian Elements in Hermetic Literature, Harvard Univ., Cambridge, MA 1991, summ. DA 53 (1991/2) 955A; J.G. Griffiths, Possible Egyptian Elements in Tractate XIII of the Corpus Hermeticum, in Aspekte spätägyptischer Kultur: Festschrift Winter, ed. M.M.J. Zeidler et al., Mainz 1994, 97-102; J.P. Mahé, Preliminary Remarks on the Demotic Book of Thoth and the Greek Hermetica: VC 50 (1996) 353-363; E. Oréal, "Noir parfait," un Joe de mots de l'égyptien au grec: REG 111 (1998) 551-565, in relation to the mention of the "Perfect Black" in the Korē Kosmou.

Besides studies on the Coptic texts, a particular group of studies on the reception of Hermeticism is linked to the Hermetic texts of the Armenian tradition, including M.G. de Durand, Un traité hermétique conservé en arménien: RHR 190 (1976) 55-72; J.P. Mahé, Les "Définitions" d'Hermès Trismégiste à Asclepius (tr. de l'arménien): RSR 50 (1976) 193-214; J.P. Mahé, Stobaei Hermetica XIX, 1 et les "Définitions hermétiques" arméniennes: REG 94 (1981) 523-525; J. Paramelle - J.P. Mahé, Nouveaux parallèles grecs aux définitions hermétiques arméniennes: REArm 22 (1990-91) 115-134. Hermeticism also reached the Arabic world: A.F.L. Beeston, An Arabic Hermetic Manuscript: BLR 7 (1962) 11-23; A. Bausani, Il "Kitab 'Ard Miftah an-Nujum" attribuito a Hermes. Prima traduzione araba di un testo astrologico?: MAL 27 (1983) 81-141. Among other things, this gives an idea of the vastness of the spread of Hermeticism, not only geographically, but also through time and between cultures.

Recently a particular object of study has been Christian Hermeticism and the Latin translations of Hermetic works, with their spread in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. On Latin Hermeticism up to the Renaissance are C. Moreschini, Dall'"Asclepius" al "Crater Hermetis." Studi sull'Ermetismo latino tardo-antico e rinascimentale, Biblioteca di Studi Antichi 47, Pisa 1985; Id., Per una storia dell'Ermetismo latino, II, in Le trasformazioni della cultura nella tarda antichità. Atti del convegno tenuto a Catania, Università degli Studi, 27 sett.-2 ott. 1982, Coll. Storia 19, Rome 1985, 529-543. A series is dedicated to Hermetica in Latin: Hermes Latinus (e.g., vol. IV 1, eds. S. Feraboli - S. Matton, Turnhout 1994), and a series to medieval Hermetic works, Hermetica Mediaevalia, in which was recently published the important systematic bibliography of P. Lucentini - V. Perrone - A. Sannino, I testi e i codici di Ermete nel Medioevo, Florence 2001. The history of Hermeticism through the centuries can be found in the miscellany Présence de l'Hermétisme, Paris 1988.

The reception of Hermeticism in patristics—Greek, Latin, but also Syriac (as in the case of *Bardesanes, studied by H.J.W. Drijvers, Bardaisan of Edessa and the Hermetica, in Id., East of Antioch, London 1984, no. XI)—has at different times been the object of study; among the most important studies are G. Sfameni Gasparro, L'Ermetismo nelle testimonianze dei Padri: RSLR 7 (1971) 215-251 and StudPatr 11 (1972) 58-64; A. González Blanco, El problema de la ciencia en el Bajo Imperio. San Juan Crisóstomo y el Hermetismo: HAnt 8 (1978) 201-214; L. Sturlese, Saints et magiciens. Albert le Grand en face d'Hermès Trismégiste: ArchPhilos 43 (1980) 615-634; W.C. Greese, Corpus Hermeticum XII and Early Christian Literature, Leiden 1979; J. Pépin, Grégoire de Nazianze, lecteur de la littérature hermétique: VChr 36 (1982) 251-260; W.C.H. Frend, Pythagoreanism and Hermetism in Augustine's "Hidden Years": SP 21 (1989) 251-260; S. Lilla, Le fonti di una sezione dell'omelia "De fide" di S. Basilio Magno: Augustinianum 30 (1990) 5-19; R. Van den Broek, Hermes and Christ: Pagan Witnesses to the Truth of Christianity, in id. - C. van Herrtum, From "Poimandres" to Böhme, Amsterdam 2000, 115-144; C. Moreschini, Storia dell'Ermetismo cristiano, Brescia 2000, along with P. Arfé, Cristianesimo ed Ermetismo, in N. del Gatto (ed.), Corso di perfezionamento in Storia del Cristianesimo Antico, Naples 1999, 134-144. The Krater has also been studied by M.P. Nilsson, Krater: HTR 51 (1958) 53-58; H. and R. Kahane - A. Pi-etrangeli, The Krater and the Grail: Hermetic Sources of the Parzival, Urbana 1965. Hermeticism has had an effect even in the modern period, studied, e.g., in R.S. Westman - J.E. Mc Guire, Hermeticism and the Scientific Revolution, Los Angeles 1977; Hermeticism and the Renaissance, eds. I. Merkel - G. Debus Allen, Washington 1988; Das Ende des Hermetismus: historische Kritik und neue Naturphilosophie in der Spätrenaissance, ed. M. Mulsow, Tübingen 2002 (Religion und Aufklärung 9).

Within the Corpus Hermeticum, specific attention has been dedicated to the Asclepius and its popularity. The treatise, whose codices and editions are indicated by H. Dannenfeld, Hermetica philosophica, in Catalogus translationum et commentariorum, I, Washington, DC 1960, 145-147, with the Addenda et corrigenda of P.O. Kristeller, ibid. II, ibid. 1971, 423, has had some translations made and been commented upon after that of Festugière, such as the English edition of B.P. Copenhaver, Cambridge 1992, and the Dutch edition of G. Quispel, Amsterdam 1997. The most important recent studies on this treatise are: J. Schwartz, Note sur la Petite Apocalypse de l'Asclepius: RHPhR 62 (1982) 165-169; D.N. Wigtil, Incorrect Apocalyptic: The Hermetic Asclepius as an Improvement on the Greek Original, in ANRW, II, 17, 4, Berlin-New York 1984, 2282-2297; M. Bertolini, Sul lessico filosofico dell'Asclepius: ASNP 15 (1985) 151-209; J.S. Gersh, Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism: The Latin Tradition, I-II, Notre Dame, IN 1986, I, 329-387; A.M. Mazzanti, L'uomo methorios da Filone all'Asclepius: SMSR 12 (1988) 61-89; M. Philonenko, O vitae vera vita (Asclepius 41): RHPhR 68 (1988) 429-433; S. Gersh, Theological Doctrines in the Latin Asclepius, in Neoplatonism and Gnosticism, eds. R.T. Wallis - J. Bregman, Albany 1992, 129-166; V. Hunink, Apuleius and the Asclepius: VChr 50, 3 (1996) 288-308; M. Horsfall Scotti, The Asclepius: VChr 54, 3 (2000) 396-416; U. Luft, Asclepius: Acta Ant. Ac. Hung. 41 (2001) 323-329. There are also studies on the Asclepius in its Coptic and Eastern versions, such as those of J. Doresse, Hermès et la gnose. À propos de l'Asclepius copte: NT 1 (1956) 54-69, of P.A. Carozzi, Hoc lumine salvati tuo (Asclepius 41), in Perennitas. Studi Asclepius Brelich, Rome 1980, 115-138, which compares the final prayer of the Asclepius with the Greek and Coptic versions and some Christian liturgical prayers, and of M. van Esbroeck, L'apport des versions orientales pour la compréhension de l'Asclepius dans les "Philosophica" d'Apulée, in L'eredità classica nelle lingue orientali, eds. M. Pavan - U. Cozzoli, Rome 1986, 27-35; and on its popularity in the patristic and mediaeval periods, such as those of P. Siniscalco, Ermete Trismegisto . . . La fortuna di un passo ermetico (Asclepius 8) nell'interpretazione di scrittori cristiani: AOT 101 (1966-67) 83-117, of J.P. Mahé, Note sur l'Asclepius à l'époque de Lactance, in Lactance et son temps, eds. J. Fontaine - M. Perrin, Paris 1978, 295 and that, which also resulted in an edition, of P. Lucentini, Il commentario all'Asclepius del Vat. Ottob. Lat. 811, in Filosofia e cultura. Per E. Garin, eds. M. Ciliberto - C. Vasoli, Rome 1991, 39-59; Id., L'Asclepius ermetico nel secolo XII, in From Athens to Chartres, ed. by H.J. Westra, Leiden 1992, 397-420; Id., Glosae super Trismegistum. Un commento medievale dell'Asclepius ermetico, in appendix the codices of the Asclepius: Anales de Historia antigua 62 (1995) 189-293.

Other editions and translations: S. Arai - Y. Shibatu, ed. and tr., Corpus Hermeticum, Tokyo 1980; A. Rossell, Kore Kosmu. Traducció: Anuari de Filologia Barcelona 10 (1984) 39-63; Hermes Trismegistus, pater philosophorum: textgeschiedenis van het Corpus Hermeticum: tentoonstelling in de Bibliotheca Philosophica Hermetica, Amsterdam 1990-1991; C. Moreschini (ed.), Apulei Opera, III, Stuttgart-Leipzig 1991, 39-86; Corpus Hermeticum, ed. R. Van den Broek - G. Quispel (intr. tr. comm.), Amsterdam 1996; Tratados del Corpus Hermeticum, intr. tr. notes by J. García Font, Barcelona 1997; Das Corpus Hermeticum deutsch, eds. C. Colpe - J. Holzhausen, tr. and intr. J. Holzhausen, Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt 1997; Das Corpus Hermeticum einschliesslich der Fragmente des Stobaeus, tr. K.G. Eckart; ed. F. Siegert, Münster 1999; Textos herméticos, intr. tr. and notes X. Renau Nebot, Madrid 1999; Hermetis Trismegisti Astrologica et divinatoria, ed. G. Bos, Turnhout 2001.

Studies (not cited above): G. van Moorsel, The Mysteries of Hermes Trismegistos, Utrecht 1955; G. Zuntz, Notes on the Corpus Hermeticum: HTR 49 (1956) 73-78; D. Georgi - J. Strugnell, Concordance to the Corpus Hermeticum I. The "Poimandres," Cambridge, MA 1971; A. González Blanco, Misticismo y escatología en el Corpus Hermeticum: Cuadernos de filologia clásica 5 (1973) 313-360; J.F. Horman, The Text of the Hermetic Literature and the Tendencies of Its Major Collections, Hammond 1974; H. Hornik, The Philosophical "Hermetica," AOT 109 (1975) 343-392; J. Schwartz, La "Koré Kosmou" et Lucien, in Le monde grec. À C. Préaux, eds. J. Bingen - G. Cambier - G. Nachtergael, Brussels 1975, 223-233; D. Kaimakis, Die Kyraniden, Meisenheim 1976; L. Delatte - S. Govaerts - J. Denooz, Index du Corpus Hermeticum, Rome 1977; G. Filoramo, Le religioni di salvezza nel mondo antico, II, Turin 1979; F. di Carlo, Letteratura e ideologia dell'Ermetismo, Foggia 1981; H. Wingler, Der Symbolbegriff des Neuplatonismus und sein Nachleben in der Hermetik, in Beiträge zu Symbol, ed. M. Lurker, Baden-Baden 1982, 207-215; A. González Blanco, Hermetism: A Bibliographical Approach, in ANRW, II, 17, 4, Berlin-New York 1984, 2240-2281; J.P. Mahé, Fragments hermétiques dans les Pap. Vindob. Gr. 29456 r° et 29828 r°, in Mémorial Festugière, eds. E. Lucchesi - H.D. Saffrey, Geneva 1984, 51-64; F. Bonardel, L'hermétisme, Paris 1985; S. Focardi, Anthropos ed eros nell'ideologia religiosa tardo-antica: SMSR 9 (1985) 43-71; G.

Luck, Two Predictions of the End of Paganism: Euphrosyne 14 (1986) 153-156; H.J. Sheppard - A. Kehl - R. McL. Wilson, s.v. Hermetik: RAC 14, 780-807; A. Borgia, Unità, unicità, totalità di Dio nell'Ermetismo antico: SMSR 13 (1989) 197-211; S. Giversen, Hermetic Communities, in Rethinking Religion, ed. J.P. Sørensen, Copenhagen 1989, 49-54; J.P. Mahé, Paraphrase de Sem et Corpus Hermeticum, in Études Coptes III, Louvain-Paris 1989, 115-127; H.D. Betz, The Delphic Maxim gnôthi sautón in Hermetic Interpretation, in Gesammelte Aufsätze, I, Tübingen 1990, 91-111; A.M. Mazzanti, L'uomo nella cultura religiosa del tardo-antico, Bologna 1990; G. Luck, The Doctrine of Salvation in the Hermetic Writings: Second Century 8 (1991) 31-41; M. Philonenko, La "Korè Kosmou" et les "Paraboles" d'Hénoch, in Hellenismos, ed. S. Saïd, Leiden 1991, 119-124; R. Valantasis, Spiritual Guides of the Third Century, Minneapolis 1991; R. Turcan, Ammien Marcellin et l'hermétisme, in De Tertullien aux Mozarabes, I, Paris 1992, 403-410; B.H. Stricker, Het Corpus Hermeticum, Amsterdam 1993; P.A. Carozzi, Praeparatio Hermetica, in International Association for the History of Religions. Congress Rome 1990, Rome 1994; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Chaos e dualismo: la dialettica chaos - kosmos nell'ermetismo e nel manicheismo: Cassiodorus 1 (1995) 11-28; R. Liedtke, Die Hermetik, Paderborn 1996; F.A. Janssen, Ad fontes - On the Bibliotheca Philosophica Hermetica: Quaerendo 27 (1997) 251-279; G. Löhr, Verherrlichung Gottes durch Philosophie, Tübingen 1997; A.M. Mazzanti, Gli uomini, dèi mortali, Bologna 1998; var. aus., The Way of Hermes, London 1999; A. Camplani, Procedimenti magico-alchemici e discorso filosofico ermetico, in Il tardoantico alle soglie del Duemila, ed. G. Lanata, Pisa 2000, 73-98; U. Luft, Statuas dicis . . . : Acta Ant. Ac. Hung. 40 (2000) 283-310; C. Moreschini, Origini e autenticità dell'Ermetismo: AION 22 (2000) 327-357; D. Porreca, Hermes Trismegistus: Archives d'histoire doctrinale 67 (2000) 143-158; V. Rebrik, Hermetik und jüdische Überlieferung, in Internationales Josephus-Kolloquium Farhus 1999, ed. J.U. Kalms, Münster 2000, 298-301; A. Ribi, Zeitenwende, Bern-Frankfurt a.M. 2001.

G. Filoramo - I. Ramelli

HERMIAS, apologist. Christian author, perhaps 3rd c., of a work titled Mockery of the Pagan Philosophers (Διασυρμὸς τῶν ἔξω φιλοσόφων; Irrisio philosophorum qui extra sunt): a polemical libellus of 10 chapters which, often sarcastically, lays bare the contradictions into which the pagan philosophers fall who take on the great themes of thought: God, the world, the soul, nature, the spirit. It is hard to establish with certainty when the work was composed; the terminus post quem is a brief reference to *Tatian. Many critics assign it to the 3rd c., almost at the close of primitive Greek apologetic. Its MS tradition is quite rich, but, apart from the 10th-c. codex Patmius 202, recent.

PG 6, 1169-1180; H. Diels, Doxographi graeci, Berlin ²1929, 651ff.; Ger. tr. A. di Pauli: BKVI 14, Kempten 1913; It. tr. E.A. Rizzo, Leghorn 1931 (with comm.); Fr. tr. R. Hanson - D. Joussot, SC 388, Paris 1993 (with bibl. on 91-94); A. di Pauli, Die Irrisio des Hermias, Paderborn 1907; L. Alfonsi, Ermia filosofo, Brescia 1947; J.F. Kindstrand, The Date and Character of Hermias' Irrisio: VChr 34 (1980) 341-357; R. Bauckham, The Fall of Angels as the Sources of Philosophy in Hermias and Clement of Alexandria: VChr 39 (1985) 313-380; J.H. Waszink: RAC 14, 808-815.

P. Siniscalco

HERMOGENES, bishop (5th c.). Bishop of Rhinocorura (Farma), city of Augustamnica Prima in E Egypt, near the border with Palestina Salutaris. He took part in the Council of *Ephesus in 431 (Mansi 6,874) as a supporter of *Cyril of Alexandria. He was sent with Lampetius to Rome by the Cyrillian bishops to obtain Pope *Celestine's support. Pope Celestine died (27 July 432) shortly before their arrival, but they attended the ordination of his successor, *Sixtus III (31 July 432), who through them responded to the Eastern bishops and encouraged Cyril in his fight against *Nestorius and his doctrines (Sixtus, Ep. 1: PL 50, 583). Of Hermogenes we have only one letter, written together with three other bishops, in which they lament the abuses committed in the context of the christological battles of the time. Hermogenes had contact with *Isidore of Pelusium, who addressed some letters to him (e.g., 1215 and 1253: SC 422, Paris 1997).

CPG 6445; PG 84, 745-746; ACO I,4, 159 (Collectio Casinensis, n. 219); ACO IV,3,2, 218; Mansi 6,874; M. Le Quien, OC, Paris 1974, 2,542 (repr. 1958); DCB 3,4, n. 7; DHGE 24,117; G. Fedalto, Hierarchia Ecclesiastica Orientalis, Padua 1988, II 606.

A. Di Berardino

HERMOGENES, heretic (late 2nd–early 3rd c.). A painter by profession, he relocated from his native *Syria to *Carthage. *Theophilus of Antioch wrote a first treatise against him, now lost, but widely used by subsequent refuters. Tertullian wrote Contra Hermogenem, our main source of knowledge, and De censu animae (lost) on Hermogenes's theories on the origin of the *soul. Orthodox on the unicity of God and *christology, Hermogenes shows himself to be influenced by Greek philosophy when he affirms the eternity and preexistence of the matter from which God molded and ordered the world. Hence *evil does not derive from God but from uncreated matter. The soul also derives from matter and not from the breath of God.

A. Orbe, Hacia la primera teología de la procesión del Verbo, Estudios Valentinianos, I, Rome 1958, 270-280; F. Chapot, L'hérésie d'Hermogène, Fragments et commentaire: RecAug 30 (1997) 2-111.

E. Prinzivalli

HEROD (iconography). Depiction of Herod is rare in Christian iconography of the first centuries because of the unpopularity of episodes relating to the period before and after Jesus' death and to the tendency not to reproduce scenes linked in any way to the Passion. Thus Herod and the slaughter of the innocents are completely absent from the repertoire of paintings in the Roman catacombs and appear on very few *sarcophagi, each of which must be considered quite unique in its kind. For this reason it is hard to establish a precise iconographical type characterizing Herod, apart from the standard depiction of the military leader. In the Todi sarcophagus (Ws II, pl. LXXIII, 1), e.g., Herod appears standing, bareheaded, dressed in chlamys and breastplate, scepter in left hand, right hand in gesture of adlocutio. He is shown flanked by two soldiers and turning to the right toward the three *magi—i.e., at the moment of receiving the news of the birth of the new Rex Iudaeorum. The moment of the massacre is shown on a sarcophagus in the crypt of S. Massimino (Ws II, pl. XXXIX, 2): Herod enthroned, right hand in the usual gesture of adlocutio; in front, two soldiers holding babies. A female figure, certainly a mother, is part of the scene. While we could cite some other sculptural examples ascribable to the 4th c., the outstanding depiction is certainly the mosaic ordered by *Sixtus III (432–440) for the triumphal arch of S. Maria Maggiore, Rome, where Herod has given the order for the massacre and the mothers still clutch the babies in their arms. The scene reappears in later monuments from the 9th to the 12th c.

LCI 2, 247-248; Wp; WMM II, 771ff.; Nestori; B. Brenk, Die frühchristlichen Mosaiken in S. Maria Maggiore zu Roma, Wiesbaden 1975.

U. Broccoli

HESYCHASM. Hesychia or quiet, outer and esp. inner repose, eliminates passions and worries, not work or pastoral responsibility, though at times it tries to keep the latter at a distance. It is one of the aims of monastic renunciation, a condition of prayer. The motif, attested at the end of the 4th c. in Egypt and Cappadocia, grows in importance in Palestine and Sinai (*Dorotheus, *John Climacus). For the legislator *Justinian, hesychast is synonymous with *anchorite. Within Byzantine monasticism, hesychasm characterizes the tendency of Symeon the New Theologian, then of Gregory Palamas and, later, of the medieval Philokalia. The West has an analogous contemplative ideal, but less distinct from solitude and from the techniques of recollection.

I. Hausherr, Hésychasme et Prière, Rome 1966; DSp 4, Erémitisme en Orient (C. Lianine), VII, Hésychasme (P. Adnès); TRE 15, 282-289.

J. Gribomont

HESYCHIUS of Alexandria, exegete (3rd–4th c.). *Jerome alone gives us a profile of Hesychius (praef. in. Paral.; praef. in. Evv.; adv. Ruf. 2,27): he is said to have lived at Alexandria ca. 300 and made revisions of the LXX and the NT: this data is much debated since it is difficult, though not impossible, to identify traces of such an intervention in the MS tradition. The Decretum Gelasianum (5,3,9) mentions the NT revision as evangelia quae falsavit Hesychius and declares it apocryphal. Hesychius cannot be identified with the bishop and martyr of the same name who died during *Diocletian's persecution (Eus., HE 8,13,7), nor with one of the bishops that protested against *Meletius (PG 10, 1565-1568).

F.G. Kenyon, Hesychius and the Text of the New Testament, in Mémorial Lagrange, Paris 1940, 245-250; S. Jellicoe, The Hesychian Recension Reconsidered: JBL 82 (1963) 409-418; A. Vaccari, The Hesychian Recension of the Septuagint: Bibl. 46 (1965) 60-66; G. Dorival (ed.), La Bible grecque des Septante, Paris 1988, 172.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

HESYCHIUS of Alexandria, lexicographer (5th- or 6th-c.). Pagan author who left us the largest lexicon of the Byzantine era that we possess, though it is transmitted in a single 15th-c. MS. The lexicon lists and explains rare or difficult Greek terms. His most important elements were taken from Diogenianus of Heraclea (2nd c.), including his precise alphabetical scheme, and from Apollonius the Sophist (1st c.). The lexicon was interpolated many times and expanded with Homeric glosses and articles taken from Cyril's glossary (early 8th c.). Later and less important are the interpolations from the Onomastica sacra.

K. Latte, Hesychii Alexandrini Lexicon 1-2, Kopenhagen 1953 and 1966; H. Erbse: ByZ 48 (1955) 130-138; ByZ 61 (1968) 71-77; B. Marzullo, La "coppia contigua" in Esichio: Quad. Ist. Filol. Class. Univ. Cagliari 3 (1968) 70-87; H. Hunger, Die hochsprachliche-profane Literatur der Byzantiner 2, Munich 1978, 35-39.

S. Samulowitz

HESYCHIUS of Castabala. Bishop of Castabala in *Cilicia Secunda, participated at the Council of *Ephesus (431), siding with *John of Antioch and other bishops of the Eastern dioceses. We have two letters of which Hesychius was one of the subscribers: the first is addressed to the church of Hierapolis and seeks a disassociation from the theological positions of the Cyrillian faction; the second is addressed to John of Antioch and reaffirms the fidelity of Hesychius and other bishops to John. Also surviving is a letter sent by Hesychius to *Meletius bishop of Mopsuestia (PG 84, 770-771).

CPG 6447; DCB 3, 9s.

K. den Biesen

HESYCHIUS of Jerusalem (5th c.). We have little information on the life of this famous priest and exegete. *Theophanes (Chron. 83) tells us that Hesychius was in Jerusalem in 412; *Cyril of Scythopolis (Vita Euthymii 16,26) calls him "teacher of the church," "theologian" and "light in the distance." According to Pelagius (In defensione trium capitulorum 2,2) he was a pupil of *Eutyches and wrote against the Council of *Chalcedon, but it is improbable that this information is accurate. According to *Basil's Menologion (PG 117, 373), Hesychius commented on the whole Bible, generally adopting the Alexandrian method of *allegorical exegesis. His theology is all based on the Bible; he mistrusts philosophy. His *christology is anti-*Nestorian but does not adopt the terminology of *Cyril of Alexandria. He spoke clearly about the propagation of original sin, ecclesiastical penitence and Mary's perfect purity. Of his many works there remain: Com. in Lev. (Latin version), Com. in Job (24 homilies in Armenian version), Epit. Proph., Capita XII proph., Interpretatio in proph. min. (unpublished), Collectio difficultatum et solutionum, De tit. Psalm. (handed down under Athanasius's name), Com. brevis Psalm., Com. magnus Psalm. (handed down under Chrysostom), Com. in Odas. His 21 festal homilies are important for our knowledge of the liturgy and feasts at Jerusalem in the 5th c., and give us an idea of the brilliance of his style. Uncertain is his authorship of *panegryics on all of the martyrs and on John the Baptist, whereas the homilies on Luke, Longinus and Palm Sunday are inauthentic.

CPG 6550-6596; BS 5, 88-89; M. Aubineau, Hesychius redivivus: Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie 27 (1980) 253-270; K. Jüssen, Die dogmatischen Anschauungen des Hesychius, 1-2, Münster 1931-1934; R. Mennes, Hesychius van Jerusalem, Gent 1971; H. Savon, Les Homélies festales d'H.: RHR 197 (1980) 429-450.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

HESYCHIUS of Miletus (6th c.). Also called by his title Illoustrios. Son of the advocate Hesychius and of Philosophia, he flourished in the 2nd half of the 6th c., after the reign of *Justinian (527–565), of whom he speaks. He wrote three works. The Roman and General History (Photius, Bibl., cod. 69), called Chronicon (Χρονικὴ ἱστορία) in *Suidas's lexicon, is a universal history from the reign of King Belus of Assyria to that of Anastasius I. Its six parts end respectively at the Trojan War, the foundation of Rome, the end of the Roman monarchy, Julius Caesar, the foundation of Constantinople and the death of *Anastasius I (AD 518). Though lost, some fragments survive; the most important—very long, perhaps an epitome—illustrates the earliest events of Byzantium up to *Constantine the Great: contained under the title Patria Constantinopolis in the Heidelberg MS Paradoxogr. Pal. 398, its first part concurs with George Codinus's Πάτρια. A second historical work is completely lost: a continuation of the first work acc. to *Photius (cod. cit.), it comprised the history of the reign of *Justin I (518–527) and the first years of *Justinian: dealing with contemporary events, it had a different character. Upset over the death of his son John, Hesychius broke off the work. A third work is important for our knowledge of Greek literature: Nomenclator (Onomatologus) or Index of Persons Illustrious in Studies, also lost. It brought together biographies of famous writers of the Greek world, organized by literary genre (poets, philosophers, historians, orators and sophists, grammarians and teachers, writers of various kinds) and classified in chronological order. The lives followed a well-defined and common model. The work, mainly philological and archaeological in character, did not include Christian authors, perhaps because Hesychius was a pagan, or perhaps because of his sources, about which we are uncertain. Between 827 and 857 a summary was made (widely used by Photius and Suidas) in which the chronological order was integrated with the alphabetical, and biographies of Christian authors were added, for which the anonymous compiler used Jerome's De viris illustribus. The work A Biographical Dictionary of Learned Men formerly attributed to Hesychius is a compilation of Diogenes Laertius and Suidas, made in the 11th or 12th c.

Hesychii Milesii opuscula duo quae supersunt, ed. J.K. Orelli, Leipzig 1820; C. Müller, FHG IV, Paris 1851, 143-177; Hesychii Milesii Onomatologi quae supersunt cum prolegomenis, ed. J. Flach, Leipzig 1882 (cf. P. Pulch: Philol. Anzeiger ed. Leutsch 12 [1882] 519-526); T. Preger, Scriptores originum Constantinopolitanarum, Leipzig 1901, 1-18; F. Jacoby, F. Gr. Hist. n. 390 (3-38); Krumbacher, 323-325; H. Schultz, Hesychios: PWK 8, 2 (1913) 1322-1327; Schmid, Geschichte: HAW VII, 2, 2, 1039-1041; M.E.

Colonna, Gli storici bizantini dal IV secolo al XV secolo, I, Naples 1956, 60-61; G. Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, I, 471; F. Dölger, Hesychios v. Milet: LTK² V, 309-310; Quasten I, 4; S. Impellizzeri, La letteratura bizantina, Milan 1975, 242-243; Altaner, 236; W. Spoerri, Hesychios: KLP 2 (1979) 1121-1122; Scriptores originum Constantinopolitanarum, 1: Hesychii Illustrii Origines Constantinopolitae . . ., ed. Th. Preger, Leipzig 1989.

A. Labate

HESYCHIUS of Salona (4th–5th c.). Appointed bishop of Salona (Split) in 405. We know his exchange of letters with *John Chrysostom and Pope *Zosimus. Following an eclipse of the sun (19 July 418) and the appearance of a comet, Hesychius wrote to *Augustine asking for clarification of Daniel's prophecy of the 70 weeks and the end of time. Hesychius's letter, lost, can be reconstructed from Augustine's reply (Ep. 197), which refers to Jerome's interpretation and makes clear that the end of the world is unknown but will come after the proclamation of the gospel to all peoples. In his reply to Augustine, Hesychius expresses doubts about Jerome's explanation and holds the Lord's coming to be imminent, from the signs of the times foretold in Scripture. Augustine replied with Epistle 199, titled De fine saeculi (cf. Civ. Dei XX, 5, 4).

DCB 3, 8-9; J.J. Wilkes, Dalmatia, London 1969, 430-431; Storia del Cristianesimo 2, 534.

G. Pilara

HESYCHIUS the Sinaite (7th c.?). The name of the priest Hesychius has escaped oblivion thanks only to his Spiritual florilegium, transmitted under the title Two Centuries on Sobriety and Virtue (Paris [1]1563: PG 93, 1479-1544). This name also appeared, for the first time, in another florilegium composed only in the third quarter of the 13th c., that of the hieromonk Mark. Since the Centuries use the works of *John Climacus and *Maximus the Confessor, we conclude that Hesychius was later than them and therefore not before the 1st half of the 7th c.—but he could have been even later. According to part of the MS tradition, Hesychius was *hegumen of the monastery of the Burning Bush on Mt. Sinai. A short recension of the Centuries exists, with 24 chapters arranged in alphabetical order. This short form groups together some chapters of the Centuries but in fact only gives half the work. The problem of the dependence or relationship between these two recensions has not yet been finally resolved. The central teaching of the Centuries is the absolute necessity for any spiritual life of the practice of sobriety (or vigilance, lucidity), equivalent to Greek νῆψις, the one thing capable of progressively freeing the soul from its various passions and leading it, through purification and the union of divine silence, to permanent contact with God. The essential elements of this teaching can be found in other spiritual teachers, but what seems truly original in Hesychius's work is the important, absolutely indispensable place given to Jesus Christ in all our relations with God.

CPG 7862; long recension: PG 93, 1479-1544; Venice 1782, I, 127-152; Athens 1957, I, 141-173; short recension: M. Waegeman, Les 24 chapitres "De temperantia et virtute" d'Hésychius le Sinaïte. Édition critique: SE 19 (1977) 195-285; G.E.H. Palmer - P. Sherrard - K. Ware, The Philokalia: The Complete Text Compiled by St Nikodimos of the Holy Mountain and St Makarios of Corinth, I, London-Boston 1979, 162-198 [Eng. tr. of the long recension]; J. Kirchmeyer, Hésychius le Sinaïte et ses Centuries, in Le Millénaire du Mont Athos 963-1963, I, Chevetogne 1963, 319-329; M. Waegeman, La structure primitive du traité "De temperantia et virtute" d'Hésychius le Sinaïte: deux centuries ou un acrostiche alphabétique?: Byzantion 44 (1974) 467-478; DSp 7,10.

J.-M. Sauget

HETOIMASIA

I. Meaning and ceremonial - II. Basic attributes - III. Typology of figurative representations.

I. Meaning and ceremonial (Th. von Bogyay, 1960, 1971, 1972). The term hetoimasia (ἡ ἑτοιμασία) indicates in iconography the representation of the divine throne, modeled on the pagan representation of the adoratio of the sovereign, in which the throne appears with the royal insignia placed on the cushion. The image of the "empty throne" as symbol of the invisible divine presence was already present in Eastern and Mediterranean cultures. The ritual considerably influenced Roman ceremonial during the Theodosian era and, when Christians wanted to portray Christ's victory over *death, it inspired representations of Christus Basileus, enriching them with symbols that give it a dual interpretation: (1) divine presence, one or triune; (2) triumph over death and certainty of the second *parousia or return of Christ as Judge. Two prior facts made possible the assumption of the symbol of the pagan-imperial throne and its transformation into a Christian symbol: (1) the presence in the Bible itself of the celestial vision as a reflection of court ceremonial, in which the throne had a prominent place; (2) even before the time of *Constantine, the liturgy, esp. in Syria-Palestine, under the influence of the court ritual used in the epiphanies of Eastern divine royalty, had developed the ceremonial of the throne as defined in hetoimasia.

II. Basic attributes (Quarles van Ufford, 1971; Franke, 1972). Christian iconography drew on pagan iconography in the image of the solium regale, jeweled and footstooled, enriched by a purple cushion and a cloth laid on the cushion, interpreted as sudarium Christi. But the divine significance of the new representation also made use of various symbolic attributes: the insignia of victory, such as the jeweled cross, symbol of the Son of Man triumphant over death; the diadem or crown; the symbols of the four evangelists; the scroll of the seven seals; the lamb and the dove (the Logos, later the Holy Spirit). In this way the *eschatological-apocalyptic meaning of the representation—triumph over death—becomes obvious, to which would later be added the *soteriological sense of the expectation of Christ's return as Judge of the world in the Secundus Adventus. This aspect of judgment is translated in the classical Byzantine iconography of hetoimasia by placing the book of the gospel (no longer that of the Apocalypse) on the throne, to signify the invisible presence of Christ the Judge.

III. Typology of figurative representations. 1. Rome and Ravenna (bibl. in Testini, 1976). At Rome, in the oldest surviving apse mosaic, that of S. Pudenziana, the theandric image appears enthroned as magister et rex among the 12 apostles, in a heavenly court that we may imagine as the heavenly Jerusalem; on high the jeweled cross, trophy of victory over death and iudicii signum, is flanked by the symbolic figures of the four evangelists. Almost coeval with the Roman apse, the lost mosaic composition of the apse of *Paulinus of Nola's basilica at Fondi, which he describes, unfortunately vaguely, in one of his poems, seems to have shown, between the dove and the Agnus Dei, a seat, perhaps by itself, with a cross cloaked in purple (see most recently, J. Engelmann, Zu den Apsis Tituli des Paulinus von Nola: JbAC 17 [1974] 21ff.). But a new statement of the cross-throne relationship is achieved in the mosaic image at the summit of the triumphal arch of S. Maria Maggiore (432–440): cheering witnesses Peter and Paul with the symbols of the four evangelists above; a clipeus containing a jeweled throne adorned with cloak and diadem laid on the cushion; below, on a footstool, the scroll of the seven seals; in front, as if suspended, a jeweled cross. This representation clearly brings together the motif of the parousia and that of the Expositio Evangelii, a direct echo of its recent institution at the Council of *Ephesus, which appears in the mosaic panel of the register of the martyrs in St. George's, *Thessalonica, and in a bronze relief on the central door of Hagia Sophia, *Constantinople. The mosaic depiction that occupies four lunettes in the chapel of S. Matrona in the church of S. Prisco at S. Maria Capua Vetere (late 5th–early 6th c.) shows a jeweled throne with a cushion on which lies the scroll of the seven seals; for the first time, a dove with nimbus perches on the back of the throne; the bull and the eagle, two of the symbols of the evangelists, stand one at each side, while the other two, the man and the lion, are in the opposite lunette. Opposite the entrance is depicted the nimbused Christ with the apocalyptic letters Α and Ω, while in the lunette above the entrance, acc. to a 17th-c. drawing, was a jeweled cross placed on Mount Paradise with 12 doves beside it, a translated image of the apostolic college. Almost contemporary with the mosaic of S. Maria Maggiore, the Samagher ivory casket (ca. 440), now in the Venice Archaeological Museum, shows on the front a representation of the throne, unfortunately damaged where the object on the cushion, probably a cross, would have been. Beside the Lamb on Mount Paradise at the foot of the throne, appear two groups of three apostles, framed by palms, which in a certain way foreshadow the representation of the throne sedes Dei et Agni, later developed, e.g., in the mosaic of the church of SS. Cosma e Damiano (526–530), *Rome. Here, in the clipeus, the jeweled throne is associated with the Lamb, on which lies a cross, and on the footstool, a scroll; beside the throne, the symbols of the evangelists have been replaced by candelabra.

At *Ravenna, the earliest example of hetoimasia is in the mosaic that decorates the dome of the Orthodox baptistery (430–450), divided into three registers: in the central clipeus, Christ's *baptism; in the second, 12 apostles with martyrs' crowns, as in the pagan ceremony of aurum coronarium; in the third, four altars flanked by two seats with diadem and four cross-bearing thrones with purple cloth and a gospel, which evoke the Expositio Evangelii in the council chamber. In the Arian baptistery (early 6th c.), the mosaic decoration of the dome, also divided into three zones, has at the center Christ's baptism in the Jordan; in the intermediate band, the Twelve bringing crowns to the jeweled throne, ideally positioned in the center with purple cushion and jeweled cross. Two monuments important for their uniqueness come from the first half of the 5th c.: the Tusculum sarcophagus now at Frascati, and a relief at Berlin. The former, most recently assigned to the 5th c. in the years after the Council of Ephesus (Testini, 1976), shows on the front, in the central frame, an undecorated seat on which lies a cloth which holds a cylindrical object (a cushion? the scroll of the law?); above the seat, but completely detached, is a crown with a six-rayed christogram. Lacking the more qualified elements of a hetoimasia, the depiction simply evokes the Expositio Evangelii. The second monument, a relief preserved at Berlin and published by Brandenburg (Ein frühchristliches Relief in Berlin: MDAI(R) 79 [1972] 136ff.), who dates it ca. 400 (but, acc. to Testini, well into the 5th c.), shows a seat ornamented with precious stones, with a cushion bearing royal insignia onto which a dove descends; below, two animals raise their heads toward the throne. Though its difference from the Tusculum sarcophagus is evident, the uniqueness of the iconographical model, not to be identified with a hetoimasia, is clear.

2. Byzantium. For the Eastern area, among the examples of major interest we must mention a 5th-c. Coptic fabric with a depiction of a throne inside a crown or diadem; in the background is a construction of curtained columns, the whole completed by the presence at the sides of two girls. A completely particular variant occurs on a 4th-c. ivory pyx now in the Cleveland Museum of Art, where some would see the representation of a chalice on the alignment seat-codex-cross, while Testini sees it as a flattened dove. In the second quarter of the 7th c., the apse mosaic of Zromi in Georgia shows a hetoimasia still following the ancient pattern: the apostles pay homage to Christus Basileus; below him, what must have been a scene of hetoimasia in a medallion, of which survive part of the throne and a fragment of luminous circle which must have surrounded a hypothetical cross placed on it. Still to the first half of the 7th c. belongs the fresco decoration of the church of S. Maria di Castelseprio (G.P. Bognetti - G. Chierici - A. De Capitani D'Arzago, Santa Maria di Castelseprio, Milan 1948). In the socle of the apse remains part of a throne; above it is an open gospel book. The throne is in line with the image of Christ Pantocrator in the upper register and corresponds to the place actually occupied by the episcopal throne (Walter, 1970). Castelseprio substantially documents the further evolution of the celebration of the Expositio Evangelii, joined to the hetoimasia, which would survive in middle and late Byzantine art (see the contributions cited in the bibl., esp. those of von Bogyay).

RMA 8, 2172ff.; Th. von Bogyay, Zur Geschichte der Hetoimasia, in Akten des XI. Int. Byzantinistenkongresses, Munich 1960, 58ff.; RBK II, 1189-1202, s.v. Hetoimasia; LCI IV, 305ff, s.v. Thron; A. Grabar, L'empereur dans l'art byzantin, Paris 1936; F. van der Meer, Maiestas Domini. Théophanies de l'Apocalypse dans l'art chrétien, Vatican City 1938; V. Quarles van Ufford, Bemerkungen über den eschatologischen Sinn der Hetoimasia in der frühchristlichen Kunst: BVAB 46 (1971) 193ff.; P. Franke, Marginalien zum Problem der Hetoimasie: ByzZ 65 (1972) 375ff.; P. Testini, Il sarcofago del Tuscolo ora in S. Maria in Vivario a Frascati: RivAC 52 (1976) 65ff.; Chr. Walter, Iconographie des conciles dans la tradition byzantine, Paris 1970; G. Hellemo, Adventus Domini. The Eschatological Thought in the 4th Century. Apses and Catechesis, Leiden 1989; L. Beschi, I rilievi ravennati dei "troni": Felix Ravenna 127/130 (1984–1985) 37-80; R. Wisskirchen, Mosaikprogramm v. S. Prassede in Rome Ikonographie und Ikonologie, Münster 1990; Id., Zum Gerichtsaspekt im Apsismosaik von S. Pudenziana/ Rom: JbAC 41 (1998) 178-192.

L. Ungaro Testini

HEXAEMERON. This term indicates the work of the six days of creation acc. to the account in Gen 1. In this sense the adjective ἑξαήμερος occurs in *Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. 3, 5), while as a feminine noun the term appears in *Philo (Leg. alleg. II, 12) and later in *Theophilus of Antioch (Autol. II, 12), *Hippolytus (Dan. 2, 27, 8) and *Methodius of Olympus (Symp. 7, 5). The commentaries of *Origen and *Hippolytus on the Hexaemeron have been lost; *Jerome mentions these respectively in Ep. 84, 7 and Vir. ill. 61. *Basil's commentary (9 homilies) and that of *Ambrose (9 sermons, largely dependent on Basil's) have been preserved. Also notable, from the mid-7th c., is George of Pisidia's Hexaemeron, in nearly two thousand iambic trimeters.

DTC 6, 2325-2354; LTK² 5, 315; RAC 14, 1250-1269. M. Naldini (ed.), Basilio di Cesarea. Sulla Genesi (Omelie sull'Esamerone), Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, Milan 1990, XXXIIff.

S. Zincone

HEXAPLA. Monumental edition of the OT, accomplished little by little by *Origen, who collected in six columns (in some cases four or eight), word for word, the Hebrew text (with a transcription in Greek script); the Greek versions by the Jews Aquila and Symmachus, exponents of the rabbinic traditions; the Septuagint, the traditional Christian text, a product of Alexandrian Judaism; and other less important translations or recensions. The work was obviously difficult to reproduce; the original, preserved in the library of Caesarea, was used by *Eusebius, *Jerome and others. It was edited by F. Field, Origenis hexaplorum . . . fragmenta, Oxford 1875, from citations which differ greatly in authority. A 9th–10th-c. copy, rewritten, preserves some psalms, with an exegetical catena*; it is reproduced and transcribed by G. Mercati, Psalterii Hexapli Reliquiae, Vatican City 1958. The so-called Hexaplar Septuagint is an Origenian edition of the LXX corrected from the Hebrew, with the addition, asterisked, of the missing elements, borrowed from Symmachus, and with the insertion of obeli before the elements proper to the Greek text; it was partly translated by Jerome, and wholly into Syriac (Syro-Hexapla) with divergent marginal readings drawn from other translators. The hexaplar evidence is of greatest importance for the criticism and interpretation of the OT. On recent work see P. Nautin, Origène, Paris 1977 (which rejects various ancient evidence, e.g., for the presence of the Hebrew original); M. Caloz, Étude sur la LXX origénienne du psautier, Fribourg (S.) 1978.

CPG 1500; CPG/S 1500-1501; M. Harl - O. Munnich - G. Dorival, La Bible grecque des Septante. Du judaïsme hellénistique au christianisme ancien, Paris 1988; G. Dorival, Esapla, in Origene: Dizionario, Rome 2000, 138-141.

J. Gribomont

HIERACAS of Leontopolis (3rd–4th c.). This ascetic was one of the founders of monastic life in Egypt at the end of the 3rd and the beginning of the 4th c. *Epiphanius (Pan. 67,1) praises his virtue and knowledge. As he was followed by many disciples, he soon found himself in conflict with the institutional church represented by Bishop *Peter of Alexandria, who accused him of sharing *Origen's ideas on the preexistence of souls and the resurrection in a spiritual body. Many fragments which have come down to us under the name of Peter clearly refer to Hieracas. Two of these are extracts from the Easter letter of 306. Hieracas was the author of Greek and Coptic writings in which he explained Scripture and also composed some canticles (Pan. 67,3).

P. Nautin, École Pratique des Hautes Études, V[e] section, Annuaire, t. 84 (1975-76) 312-314; E. Prinzivalli, Magister ecclesiae: il dibattito su Origene fra III e IV secolo, Rome 2002.

P. Nautin

HIEROCLES SOSSIANUS (d. after 307). Vir Perfectissimus and governor of *Palmyra ca. 297 (CIL III 1,133). He was auctor et consiliarius of the *persecution in 303 (Lact., De Mort. Pers., 16,2 and Div. Inst. V, 2,12), perhaps as vicarius of the East if, having become ex Vicario Praeside(m), he prosecuted the martyr *Donatus (303) (De Mor. Pers. 16,4). He was praeses in Bithynia until ca. 310, when he led the persecution as praefectus of Egypt (Epiph., Pan. 68,1,4-5, Eus., De Mart. Pal. 5,2-3, and papyri Cair. Isid. 69, Oxy. XLIII, 3120 and P. Berol. Inv. 21654).

Despite the doubts of Hägg, an anti-Christian work must be attributed to Hierocles, the Φιλαλήθης (Eus., Adv. Hier. 1-2), written ca. 312 (Bardy, Borzì) or ca. 303 (Barnes, Forrat). This work is lost but can be reconstructed from allusions to it in *Eusebius and *Lactantius. The accusations against Christianity were traditional, but the negation of Christ's divinity was original, with a comparison of his miracles with those of *Apollonius of Tyana related by Philostratus. Hierocles argues that if these do not attest to the divinity of Apollonius, neither do Christ's miracles prove his divine nature. Further, he considered *Peter and *Paul untrustworthy and uncultured compared to Damis, Maximus of Aegae and Philostratus (Div. Inst. V, 2,17); he opposed the conduct of Christ and Apollonius before the tribunal which judged them, and accused Christ of theft against the Jews (Div. Inst. V, 3,4).

CIL III 1,133; Epiphanius, Panarion 68,1,4-5; L. Duchesne, De Macario Magnete et scriptis eius, Paris 1877, 19; PWK VIII (2) 1395; G. Bardy, SC 53, 35-36; H. Maehler, Zur Amtszeit des Präfekten Sossianus Hierokles: Collectanes Papyrologica, Festschriften H.C. Youtie, II, Bonn 1976, 527-533; T. Barnes, Sossianus Hierocles and the Antecedents of the "Great Persecution": HSPh 80 (1976) 242 f.; Id., Constantine and Eusebius, Cambridge 1981, 165; M. Forrat, SC 333, 11-20; RAC 15 (1991) 103-109; T. Hägg, Hierocles the Lover of Truth and Eusebius the Sophist: SO 67 (1992) 138-150; E. De Palma Digeser, Porphyry, Julian, or Hierokles?: The Anonymous Hellene in Makarios Magnes' "Apokritikos": JRS n.s. 53/2 (2002) 466-502; S. Borzì, Sulla datazione del Contra Hieroclem di Eusebio di Cesarea. Una proposta: Salesianum 65 (2003) 149-160.

S. Borzì

HIEROTHEUS. Ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite presents Hierotheus as his teacher. In Div. Nom. 3,2 he is praised as superior to all other Christian sages after the *apostles and is depicted as attending the blessed Virgin's funeral. In Div. Nom. 2,9-10 and 4,15–17 two excerpts of Hierotheus's works are quoted. In the first the reference is to his Elements of Theology (Θεολογικαὶ στοιχειώσεις)—a pendant to the lost Outlines of Theology (Θεολογικαὶ ὑποτυπώσεις) by ps.-Dionysius—and in the second to his Hymns on Love, or Ἐρωτικοὶ ὕμνοι. It has been suggested that these are in fact works stemming from the school of *Edessa, or in any case from a *Syriac milieu, toward the end of the 5th c. It is also possible that these works of Hierotheus did not have an autonomous existence but are due to ps.-Dionysius himself. The portrait of Hierotheus that emerges is that of a sublime theologian and a mystic, παθῶν τὰ θεῖα, whose writings are δεύτερα λόγια, like a "second Scripture." The first excerpt treats the Christ-Logos, who maintains the harmony of the parts and the whole, being above both the parts and the whole, in terms that resemble *Clement's and *Origen's theology. The second expounds the gradation of love, whose different forms and powers are reduced to unity: the *Neoplatonic motif culminates in the Christian principle of God-ἀγάπη. Love is a uniting force that moves all, from the Good to the last of beings and from the last of beings to the Good. In a catalog of Constantinople MSS (A. Possevini, Apparatus Sacer, Coloniae Agrippinae 1608, II, 46) there even appears a confusion between Hierotheus and ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite. Indeed, the latter affirms (Div. Nom. 3,2-3) that his works are but explications of Hierotheus's "synoptic" teaching, directed to the initiated.

Perczel has forcefully argued that the Corpus Areopagiticum is deeply influenced by Origen, esp. his Περὶ Ἀρχῶν and his commentary on John (Le Pseudo-Denys, lecteur d'Origène, in Origeniana VII, 673-710; Pseudo-Dionysius and the Platonic Theology, in Proclus et la théologie platonicienne, ed. A.P. Segonds-C. Steel, Leuven 2000, 491-532: 516-519; God as Monad and Henad: Dionysius the Areopagite and the Περὶ Ἀρχῶν, in Origeniana VIII, ed. L. Perrone, Leuven 2003, 1193-1209), and his tradition, esp. Evagrianism (Une théologie de lumière, REA 45 [1999] 79-120; Pseudo Dionysius and Palestinian Origenism, in The Sabaite Heritage in the Orthodox Church, ed. J. Patrich, Louvain 2001, 261-282). Therefore, Origen's writings are called "theology" in the Corpus Areopagiticum, and Origen himself "theologian" (Théologiens et magiciens dans le Corpus dionysien, Adamantius 7 [2001] 54-75).

In this light, it is no accident that the monk Stephen Bar Sudhaile (ca. 480–ca. 543), a follower of Origen and Evagrius and a supporter of the doctrine of apokatastasis, wrote a treatise on this subject in five memre, in Syriac, and titled it Book of the Holy Hierotheus on the Hidden Mysteries of the House of God. That Sudhaile was the author of this book was already known to Cyriacus of Antioch (8th c., quoted by Barhebraeus, Nomocanon, VII 9), to John of Dara (also 8th c.) in On the Resurrection of Human Bodies (IV 21), and to Barhebraeus himself in his Mnarat Qudshe and Ecclesiastical History (222 Abbeloos-Lamy), who also attests that many thought that the book was written by "the holy Hierotheus, the master of the holy Dionysius."

The Book, extant only in Syriac (MS. British Museum, Add. [Rich] 7189), pretends to have been written by Hierotheus, a disciple of St. Paul and teacher of Dionysius the Areopagite, to a disciple, addressed as "my child" or "my friend." A preface speaks of a supposed translation from Greek into Syriac, which should probably be seen as part of the literary fiction. Right from the beginning, the recommendation to keep the Book secret and not to divulge it among uninitiated people characterizes this work as esoteric. The author claims to have experienced more than once the mystical union with the supreme Good. Here, Sudhaile explains the nature of the Good and the ascent of the mind toward it, stating that "all rational essences glorify and love the Essence from which they were separated." For it is from the primordial Essence that the spiritual and material universe proceeded.

In the Book, Sudhaile embraces the idea of the eventual end of punishments in the next world, whose function is thought to be purifying rather than retributive. In line with *Gregory of Nyssa's view, the final restoration will include even the demons and the devil, whose redemption is minutely described in the Book, in a chapter titled On the Repentance of Those Below. Just like Origen and Gregory of Nyssa, Sudhaile found the main scriptural pillar for this doctrine in 1 Cor 15:28: in the end God will be "all in all," τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσι. He even seems to have thought that all creatures will share God's substance in the end (and it is an Origenism of this sort, an exaggeration and systematization of Evagrianism, that seems to have been condemned in Constantinople in AD 553: see Pinggéra). Indeed, he depicted the spiritual resurrection, the mind's victory over the powers of evil—which is described as "not-being," as in Origen and Gregory of Nyssa—and its union with the Christ-Logos, also depicted as the "Great Intellect" (ܗܘܢܐ ܪܒܐ), and then—once Christ has handed the kingdom to the Father, acc. to 1 Cor 15:24-28—with the Spirit and the Father. At this point, all distinct existence will pass away, and only the Arch-Good will remain, from which the universal Essence (Syr. ܐܘܣܝܐ = Gr. οὐσία) and all individual existences had proceeded, by which all is sustained, and to which all beings tend. "No being will perish or be destroyed, but all will return and be sanctified and united" to the supreme Good. Even beyond ܚܕܝܘܬܐ or "unity" (which was the culmination of Origen's escalation of image-likeness-unity), the Book posits "mingling" (ܚܒܝܟܘܬܐ), where any duality between lover and beloved, glorifier and glorified, will vanish. Thus God "will be all in all." *Manichean elements have been pointed out in the Book, but the whole system of the Book is very far from positing evil as an antithetical principle equal to the Good. The metaphysical line is that of Origen, even if exaggerated, not that of *gnosticism and Manicheism.

*Philoxenus of Mabbug, in his Letter to Abraham and Orestes, who lived at Edessa, describes Sudhaile's thought as similar to that of *Isaac of Nineveh (First Part 28,202-205): the six days are this world, the seventh is the rest in She'ol, and the first day of the new week (Sunday) is the anastasis-apokatastasis.

Philoxenus was also concerned that Sudhaile's doctrine might render Christ's suffering and death superfluous—even though the apokatastasis in Origen is far from making them superfluous, but is rather based on them—and thought that his conception of the final consubstantiality of all with God was impious, also because it even entailed the eventual reabsorption of the three persons of the Trinity in one and the same Essence, from which the first divine emanation proceeded at the beginning.

For these ideas, Sudhaile had to leave Edessa and flee to *Palestine, near or in *Jerusalem, where the monastic environment was more favorable to Origenian thought. It is uncertain whether he returned to Edessa later, where Barhebraeus locates his floruit around AD 542 in his ecclesiastical history (215 Abbeloos-Lamy). On the same account, Sudhaile was also attacked by *Jacob of Sarug, who wrote a letter to him insisting on the eternity of punishment and on the parallel between "life everlasting" and "hell/fire everlasting" (in the Bible, the adjective is αἰώνιος, which does not mean "eternal, everlasting"; this is the meaning of ἀΐδιος, and only life is called ἀΐδιος in the Bible and in many Greek fathers, never death or punishment: see *eternity).

While Frothingham directly identified Hierotheus with Sudhaile and regarded the latter as the master of the author of the Corpus Areopagiticum, Louth thinks that Sudhaile's Book of Hierotheus is later than the Corpus Areopagiticum, which Sudhaile knew and by which he was inspired (also in the choice of names from the apostolic era for pseudonymity).

A confession of faith ascribed to Hierotheus and contained in an Arabic MS (Arab. Vatic. 409 f. 397) also displays elements of pantheism and mysticism that are to be found in Sudhaile's Book. A detailed commentary of the Book, which is extant, was authored by Theodosius of Antioch (9th c.), and Barhebraeus wrote an abridgment of it, to which he attached a commentary mainly derived from that of Theodosius. He joined the sections of the Book that deal with the beginning and the end; of course, *protology and *eschatology were closely related in the Origen tradition.

Perczel (The Earliest Syriac Reception) has recently suggested that Stephen Bar Sudhaile is the "brother Mor Stephen," who is mentioned in *Sergius of Resh'ayna's introduction to his Syriac translation of the Corpus Dionysianum (a translation that, acc. to Perczel, is much closer to the original Greek than the Greek textus receptus available to us now and ultimately based on the edition of *John of Scythopolis); Sergius wishes him to enjoy the apokatastasis. If this identification is correct, Stephen helped Sergius in his translation, which would also explain the shared vocabulary between this translation and the Book of Hierotheus. The Origenism of the Book of Hierotheus and of the introduction and translation of the Corpus Dionysianum by Sergius make it all the more likely that ps.-Dionysius himself belonged to an Origenian milieu.

Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, I, 303; II, 30-33; 290-291; A. Mai, Spicilegium Romanum, III, 704–707; A.L. Frothingham, Stephen Bar-Sudaili and the Book of Hierotheus, Leiden 1886; The Book of the Holy Hierotheus Ascribed to Stephen Bar-Sudhaile (c. 500 A.D.), ed. F.S. Marsh, London 1927, Amsterdam 1979 reprint; A. Vööbus, Discovery of New Manuscript Sources for the Book of Hierotheos: Very Important Finds for Syrian Mysticism, RSO 49 (1975) 185-189; T. Jansma, Philoxenus' Letter to Abraham and Orestes Concerning Stephen bar Sudaili, LM 87 (1984) 79-86; D. Bundy, The Book of the Holy Hierotheos and Manichaeism, Augustinianum 26 (1986) 273-279; A. Louth, Denys the Areopagite, London 1989, esp. 63-4, 69-70, and 78-98; K. Pinggéra, Das Descensus-ad-inferos-Motiv im "Buch des Heiligen Hierotheus," in Zu Geschichte, Theologie, Liturgie und Gegenwartslage der syrischen Kirchen, eds. M. Tamcke - A. Heinz, Münster 2000, 181-194; Id., All-Erlösung und All-Einheit. Studien zum "Buch des heiligen Hierotheus" und seiner Rezeption in der syrisch-orthodoxen Theologie, Würzburg-Wiesbaden 2002; J. Dillon - S. K. Wear, Dionysius the Areopagite and the Neoplatonist Tradition, Aldershot 2007; E.D. Perl, Theophany, Albany 2007; K. Pinggéra, Die Bildwelt im Buch des heiligen Hierotheus—ein philosophischer Mythos?, in Mystik—Metapher—Bild, ed. M. Tamcke, Göttingen 2008, 29-42; Rethinking Dionysius the Areopagite, ed. S. Coakley - Ch.M. Stang, Malden, MA 2009 (with my review in RBL 2009), esp. I. Perczel: The Earliest Syriac Reception of Dionysius, 27-42; I. Ramelli, Apocatastasi, Milan 2009, ch. 2.

I. Ramelli

HILARIANUS, Quintus Julius (4th c.). The scarce information that we have concerning Quintus Julius Hilarianus comes entirely from his works, since he is almost unknown to all other literary sources. The first work that comes to us with his name is titled De ratione Paschae et mensis and was completed in die isto III Nonarum Martiarum post consulatum Arcadii IV et Honorii III (5 March 397). The second is titled De Cursu Temporum and was completed in consulatu Caesarii et Attici die IX Kalendas Aprilis (24 March 397). The De ratione Paschae deals with ecclesiastical computations and discusses problems connected with the determination of the date of Easter acc. to the path of the moon, though it does not contain any paschal table. From a cultural-historical point of view, it is worth observing that he follows the chronology of the Passion acc. to the Evangelist *John, affirming that Christ was immolated as the true paschal lamb luna XIV, VIII Kal. Aprilis (cf. De ratione Pasch. 5; 15). The De cursu temporum (or also De mundi duratione) seeks to determine the duration of the world on the basis of scriptural data and without the help of useless profane science. He believes in the millenarian cosmic week and in millenarism: Christ died halfway through the sixth millennium, and between his death and the end of the world there are only 470 years, and therefore, from the time when he writes in 397, there are still 101 years until the coming of Christ (see De cursu temp. 17). The seventh day of the cosmic week marks the advent of the millenarian reign of Christ with the righteous on the earth, which will be followed by the universal judgment, the total destruction of the earth and the heavens, and the coming of the celestial Jerusalem.

In greater detail, in the 19 pages (ed. Frick) of the De cursu temporum, Hilarianus, keeping in mind the book of Genesis, recalls that creation took place in six days and that on the seventh day God rested; but thinking as well of Psalm 90 (89):4, cited in 2 Pet 3:8, he also recalls that before God a thousand years are as one day. Therefore, it seems logical to him that men will live on earth for six thousand years (i.e., six cosmic days), and when the seventh millennium begins (i.e., the seventh cosmic day of divine rest), the just will rise and for a thousand years they will live the dies septimus et sabbatus aeternus, while the wicked will live cum poena. At the end of the seventh cosmic day will occur the second resurrection and the definitive triumph of God and the good.

This conception is the fruit of minute calculations, worthy of the best patristic numerological tradition. From the creation of Adam to the flood there are 2,257 years; from the creation of the world to the liberation of the Hebrews from the slavery of Egypt, 3,699 years; from the creation of the world to the anointing of Saul as king, 4,300 years; from the creation of the world to the beginning of the Babylonian captivity, 4,814 years; from the creation of the world to the death of Jesus, 5,530 years (i.e., Jesus died in the sixteenth year of Tiberius). Thus, from the death of Jesus to the completion of 6,000 years, only 470 years remain, of which 369 have already passed and therefore 101 remain in order to complete 6,000 years. One cannot deny that Hilarianus Christianizes the pagan cycles of return (nostoi): "Socrates will again be condemned; he will again drink the hemlock," with the Christian typology of biblical figures: as Abraham and his descendants lived 470 years before being able to enter the Promised Land, so the followers of Christ will have to wait 470 years before the seventh millennium begins. For Hilarianus, the Bible contains all past history—res gestae—and all prophecy for the future—res quae gerentur.

It is difficult to deduce the ecclesiastical environment of Hilarianus from the linguistic and cultural data of the two works. Some elements might refer either to Proconsular Africa or to Gaul. An African origin might have a greater foundation if he could be identified with the recipient of the small work De ratione Paschali of the African bookkeeper *Agriustia. Yet even his name appears with the alternation Hilarianus/Hilarius.

CPL 2279, 2280; PL 13, 1097-1114; CPPM III/A 905; C. Frick, Chronica minora, I, Leipzig 1892, 153-174; H. Gelzer in Sextus Julius Africanus und die Byzantinische Chronographie, II, 1, Leipzig 1880-1898, 121-129; U. Moricca, Storia della letteratura latina cristiana, II/2, Turin 1928, 1143-1144; P. de Labriolle, Histoire de la littérature latine chrétienne, I, París [3]1947, 437-438; E. Peterson, s.v.: EC 6 (1951) col. 1613; I. Lana, Q. Giulio Ilariano e il problema della storiografia latina cristiana nel IV secolo: 123 (1995) 73-89; I. Lana, Q. Giulio Ilariano e il problema della storiografia latina cristiana del IV secolo: Arachnion. A Journal of Ancient Literature and History on the Web, nr. 3 - <www.cisi.unito.it/arachne/num3/ilana.html>.

V. Loi - B. Amata

HILARION of Gaza (291–371). Palestinian monk about whom nothing is known except the Vita written by *Jerome (PL 23, 29-64) before 396, whose historical truth is difficult to assess. While a student in *Alexandria he is supposed to have converted and become close to Saint *Anthony, whose temptations and asceticism he afterward copied near Maiuma. Disciples joined him in 329; he sought solitude in 360 in Egypt, Libya, Sicily and Dalmatia, and in the end died in Cyprus. Feast 21 October.

A.A.R. Bastiaensen, Vite dei Santi, IV, Rome 1975, 72-142; N. Adkin, Jerome, "Vita Hilarionis" 11, 13: "multis retro circensibus": Past/Present 54 (1999) 192-197.

J. Gribomont

HILARUS, pope (461–468). A native of Sardinia, when still a deacon he was sent together with other legates by *Leo the Great to the Council of *Ephesus in 449 (latrocinium Ephesinum), where he protested the condemnation of *Flavian of Constantinople and afterward, together with his companions, left the council. His behavior was highly praised by Leo (Ep. 44: PL 54, 827; cf. Prosp. Aq., Chron. ad an. 449: PL 51, 601-2; Theodrt., Ep. 116 and 118). In 455–456 he was appointed archdeacon and thus became a close associate of the pope. In this capacity, he wrote to Victor of Limoges to consult him on the date of the celebration of Easter (Thiel 2 and 3, 130f.). When on 19 November 461 he was elected successor of Leo, he retained his policy and spirit, both with the Eastern and Western churches. His surviving writings are the address to the Roman council of 465 (Mansi 7, 959f.) and some letters—many have been lost—regarding various interventions in *Gaul and *Spain. With respect to Gaul he had confidence in *Leontius of Arles. He assigned him to oversee church discipline and resolve any possible difficulties. The letters sent to Spain deal with the bishops of the province of *Tarragona and their behavior. For these reasons, the Liber pontificalis rightly said of him that "he strengthened the power and primacy of the Holy Catholic and Apostolic See" (I, 242). It also records various works carried out by Hilarus in the Lateran and St. Lawrence Outside the Walls, monasteries built, and furnishings purchased for the various basilicas. Inscriptions attest to his construction work (Diehl 977-980; 1782). He died 29 February 468, but his feast is on the 28th since 468 was a leap year. He was buried in the basilica of St. Lawrence.

CPL 1662-3; PL 58, 12-32; PLS 3, 379-381; 441-443; Thiel 126-170; DTC 6, 2385-2388; Hfl-Lecl 2, 566-621; BS 7, 737-758; F. Di Capua, Il ritmo nelle lettere dei Papi… III/2: Da Ilaro a Ormisda, Rome 1946; Patrologia IV, 123-4; Epapi I, 442-447.

A. Di Berardino

HILARY (4th–5th c.). A Christian of Syracuse, before July 415 he sent a letter to *Augustine (in Aug., Ep. 156), in which he asks for explanations of certain topics dealt with by preachers in Sicily; Augustine responded to him (Ep. 157), refuting the *Pelagian doctrines contained in this preaching.

We might hypothesize the identification of Hilary with someone of the same name who in 428–429 writes to Augustine (Ep. 226) asking him about certain questions raised by the semi-Pelagians at *Marseille and in other places in *Gaul. This Hilary is certainly a layman (see Ep. 226,9) and had been in *Hippo before going to Gaul (see Ep. 226,10). At the same time as Hilary, *Prosper of Aquitaine sent a similar request to Augustine (among Augustine's letters: Ep. 225). Augustine responded immediately with De praedestinatione sanctorum.

Aug., Ep. 156; 226; PCBE 2/1, 986-7; CPL 262; DCB 3, 75-76.

E. Malaspina

HILARY, poet (5th c.). A native of *Gaul but must be clearly distinguished from the similarly named bishops of *Poitiers and *Arles. We know nothing of him except that he probably lived in the mid-5th c. He may be the author of two or three hexameter poems, which, both in tradition and by scholars, have been variously attributed, in particular to *Hilary of Poitiers. These poems are: In Genesim ad Leonem Papam, 198 verses concerning creation, the fall and the universal flood (CPPM 2, 2160); the De Evangelio on the birth of Christ and the visit of the magi (CPPM 2, 2162); he is probably also author of The De martyrio Macchabaeorum, of which there are two recensions (CPPM 2161; 2603; 2630).

CPL 1427; PL 50, 1275-1287 (In Genesium, De martyrio M.). The three works are found in CSEL 23, 1, 231-274. Studies: CSEL 23, XXVIII-XXIX; REAug 24 (1978) 365, n. 146; G. Gallo, Uno scritto filopelagiano: Aevum 51 (1977) 333-348; DHGE 24, 449-50; D. Kartschoke, Bibeldichtung, Munich 1975, 38-9; LACL 332.

A. Hamman

HILARY of Arles (ca. 401–449). He was born ca. 401 of a noble family (Genn., Vir. ill. 70) connected with the consular family of *Bishop Honoratus of Arles, as he himself affirms (Sermo de vita Honorati 4,8-11, Cavallin 51; 36,8-9, 75). The most widespread source—but not always trustworthy because of its extreme idealization of him—is a Vita Hilarii, probably written by a certain *Honoratus of Marseille around 475 (Cavallin). An anonymous biography of Bishop *Lupus of Troyes speaks of a sister of Hilary, Pimeniola, who was married to Lupus, and leads us to believe that Hilary, like Lupus, was a native of Belgic Gaul (Vita Lupi 1). After having been quite given to the world in his youth, he was converted by Honoratus to the ascetical life and conducted to *Lérins not before 420 (Pricoco, L'isola dei santi, 38). He remained on the island a few years, withdrawing a first time in order to follow Honoratus, called to the episcopal see of Arles, and then definitively in 430 or 431, when he himself was elected bishop of that diocese.

As bishop he immediately attained a position of preeminence in the Gallic church. He presided over the Councils of *Riez (439), *Orange (441) and *Vaison. He took part in harsh disputes, even with *Leo I, over the primacy of Arles. He remained faithful to his ascetic habits, not disdaining even manual labor (Vita Hilarii 11; Genn., Vir ill. 70; CIL XII, 949b). He died in 449 (Chron. Gall.a. 452, 134; Leo M., Ep. 40; PL 54, 815A) or shortly after (Gennadius), 48 years old (Vita Hilarii 24,2-3, Cavallin 100). Gennadius states that he wrote parva; the biographer attributes to him homilies, verses, a symboli explicatio and a large number of letters (Vita Hilarii 14,25f.). Recently the Carmen de providentia has been defended as his (PL 51, 617-638). Hilary is certainly the author of the Sermo de vita Honorati, a discourse which he delivered ca. 431 on the anniversary of the death of Honoratus, and which he probably rewrote in an elaborate form, with a good knowledge of the precepts of rhetoric and biography.

BHL I, 579, n. 3882; CPL 500-509; PL 50, 1249-1292; Vita sanctorum Honorati et Hilarii, ed. S. Cavallin, Lund 1952; Vie de Saint Honorat, SC 235, Paris 1977; A.C. Cooper-Marsdin, The History of the Islands of Lerins, Cambridge 1913, 185-191; M. Schanz, Gesch. d. röm. Litter., IV, 1, Munich 1920, 528-9; B. Kolon, Die Vita S. Hilarii Arelatensis. Eine eidographische Studie, Paderborn 1925; K.F. Stroheker, Der senatorische Adel im spätantiken Gallien, Tübingen 1948, n. 193, 182-3; L. Cristiani, Lérins et ses Fondateurs, S. Wandrille 1946; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, II, Paris [2]1966, 244-250; G. Langgärtner, Die Gallienpolitik der Päpste, Bonn 1964; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Munich 1965, 50-1; S. Pricoco, Modelli di santità a Lerino. L'ideale ascetico nel "Sermo de vita Honorati" di Ilario di Arles: SiculorumGymn. 27 (1974) 54-88; S. Gallo, Uno scritto filo-pelagiano attribuibile a Ilario di Arles: Aevum 5l (1977) 333-348; Honorat de Marseille, La Vie d'Hilaire d'Arles. Intr., Fr. tr. and notes by P-A. Jacob, SC 404, Paris 1995; S. Pricoco, L'isola dei santi. Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico, Rome 1978; F.E. Consolino, Ascesi e mondanità nella Gallia tardoantica, Naples 1979, 51-61; Patrologia IV, 510-511; R. Nouailhat, Saints et Patrons. Les premiers moines de Lérins, Paris 1988; R. Numberg, Askese als sozialer Impuls. Monastische-asketische Spiritualität als Wurzel und Triebleder sozialer Ideen und Aktivitaten der Kirche in Sudgallien im 5. Jahrhundert, Bonn 1988; C.M. Kasper, Theologie und Askese. Die Spiritualität des Inselmönchtums von Lérins im Sudgallien im 5. Jahrhundert, Münster 1991.

S. Pricoco

HILARY of Poitiers (beginning of 4th c.–ca. 367).
I. Life - II. Works

I. Life. The little that we know about Hilary's life we gather from his writings, as *Jerome did (Vir. ill. 100). His birth is placed by conjecture at the beginning of the 4th c. and his election as bishop of *Poitiers, around 350. The attempt has been made to find in the prologue of the De Trinitate his itinerarium ad Deum, beginning in paganism; but these are probably just loci communes. We find him for the first time in Béziers in 356 attempting to oppose the activity of the *Arians in *Gaul; he was deposed together with Rodanius of Toulouse and sent into exile in *Phrygia. There Hilary came to know the works of *Origen, which deeply influenced his spirituality and exegesis. Moreover, through contact with the *homoiousians, the anti-Arians and also the anti-Nicenes, he deepened his knowledge of the Arian controversy and became convinced that it was necessary to be on guard not only against the danger of Arianism but also the opposite error of *Sabellianism, and that it was possible to profess an orthodox trinitarian theology even without basing it on the Nicene homoousios, which was in some respects ambiguous. Consequently, Hilary, above all in the De synodis, worked to reunite in one common front the anti-Arians of the West, who were Nicenes, and those of the East, who were anti-Nicenes. Enjoying a certain liberty of movement in his exile, he participated in the Council of *Seleucia (359) in the ranks of the homoiousians. In *Constantinople he attempted, without success, to have a public debate with *Saturninus of Arles, a defender of Arianism from Gaul, who had been a participant in the Council of *Rimini and was in Constantinople. Hilary was permitted to enter Gaul once again, but without being reintegrated into the episcopate. But Gaul had at this point already passed over to the authority of *Julian (361), and thus Hilary, enjoying complete freedom of movement, led the anti-Arian reaction, which culminated in the Council of *Paris (361). There he brought about the victory of a doctrinal position compatible with both homoousian and homoiousian theology and had moderate measures adopted with regard to the many who were forced to subscribe in Rimini to the Arian formula. We find Hilary again in 364 in *Milan, together with *Eusebius of Vercelli, attempting to expel the Arian bishop *Auxentius without success. Jerome dates his death to 367 (Chron. s.a.).

II. Works. The greater part of Hilary's literary activity was connected with the Arian controversy, but he also devoted himself to scriptural *exegesis. Containing doctrinal content is the De trinitate in 12 books (Jerome knew of this work as Adversus arianos libri; others, as De fide), which was written entirely during Hilary's exile (356–360)—the opposition to Sabellianism, evident already in the first books and foreign to the Western world, excludes the possibility that these books were written before going into exile, while the final chapters (XII, 55-56), on the Holy Spirit, discuss a topic that was known in the West only later. The first book is introductory and was added after the rest of the work had already been written. Books II-III, which treat the Arian controversy in a global manner, were conceived of as a work complete in itself; only later when Hilary had already begun to compose another anti-Arian work, were those books fused with this other work, constituting the initial part. This second part began with a confutation of the profession of faith which Arius had sent to *Alexander, and treated above all the relation of unity/distinction of the Father and the Son on the basis of passages of the OT (above all, the theophanies in Genesis) and the NT. In the final structure of the work, resulting from the fusion of the two writings, these themes occupy books IV-VII. Books VIII-XII treat in detail some of the principal scriptural passages involved in the debate (e.g., 1 Cor 15:28; Pr 8:22) from which the Arians deduced the inferiority in nature of the Son.

Hilary avails himself of his knowledge of *Tertullian, *Novatian and, above all, homoiousian theology, but reelaborates their thought with great originality. He affirms the unity in nature and the distinction in person of the Father and of the Son. He conceives such unity as total compenetration of the one within the other, such that they differ only by their relation of origin: the Father has really generated the Son without losing anything belonging to his nature, and the Son has received and contains in himself everything belonging to the Father, whom he is equal to in operatio, virtus, potestas, gloria, vita. In order to distance himself from the Arians, who proposed the passion of Christ as a proof of his imperfect divinity, Hilary affirms the real but celestial body of Christ, capable of experiencing the passions but not pain (Trin. X,18,23). He is less interested in the Holy Spirit, who was less discussed at that time. He tends to consider the Spirit as a gift, a divine force, rather than as a person. In the final chapters of the work (XII, 55-56) he excludes the possibility that the Spirit is a creature, as Arians and pneumatomachoi* held.

In the first months of 359, in preparation for the Council of Rimini, Hilary wrote the De synodis for the bishops of Gaul but also addressed himself to the anti-Arians of the East. In the first part, he examines the formulas of faith published from 341 to 357, resolutely condemns only the last, the blasphemia Sirmiensis, as it was openly Arian, and gives a benevolent interpretation to the others, seeking to demonstrate their compatibility with Western theology. In the second part, he compares the terms homoousios and homoiousios, interpreting the second as equal acc. to substance. He shows that both terms can be taken in an orthodox or a heterodox sense. He therefore invites Western supporters of the one term and Eastern supporters of the other to seek a common understanding beyond the differences merely of words and not of meaning. The rigorist *Lucifer of Cagliari criticized this work as being too open toward anti-Nicene Eastern theology, and Hilary had to defend himself in an apology, passages of which have been published at the foot of the page in the De synodis (Smulders recently brought to light two others). It is true that Hilary tries to minimize the doctrinal differences between Westerners and Easterners in order to favor an understanding, but the work taken as a whole demonstrates perfect awareness of the complex situation of the East and a rare capacity to view the situation in its essential points, without being led astray by additions and marginal aspects. In the West, this is almost the only case in which such a quality can be found.

Other works of Hilary dedicated to the controversy are interesting above all from a polemical and historical point of view. The so-called Liber I ad Constantium consists of two texts: a letter sent by the Western bishops of the Council of *Serdica (343) which invites *Constantius to stop the persecutions against those in favor of the Nicene Creed; and a narrative text in which Hilary tells of the irregularities of the Council of *Milan; this text was written before his exile (356). In the Liber II ad Constantium, written in 359 in Constantinople, he asks the emperor to consent to a debate between himself and the Arian Saturninus of Arles and not to approve the formulation of faith of Rimini. When he saw that his attempts were vain and that Constantius was determined in his support of the Arians, Hilary wrote a violent little work, Liber contra Constantium, in which he is considered worse than the most cruel persecutors of the past, *Nero, *Decius and *Maximian, because he was not an open enemy of the church, but a subtle oppressor. Jerome (Vir. ill. 100) says that it was written after the death of Constantius, but from the content it is clear that the author is still in exile and therefore Constantius is still alive. The Contra Auxentium, directed to the Catholic bishops, is a report on the unsuccessful attempt of Hilary and *Eusebius to act against the Arian bishop of Milan (364). It documents the shrewd reaction of Auxentius to the action of his adversaries and his attachment to the faith of Rimini. The Fragmenta historica is a collection of documents relating to the Arian controversy, published for the first time in 1598 (PL 10) and republished by Feder in 1916 (CSEL 65) on the basis of a larger number of MSS, with a new order and title (Collectanea antiariana Parisina). The first part (which contains the Liber I ad Constantium as well) unites documents relating to the Council of Serdica and to the following years, with ample commentary by Hilary. The second part is composed of documents relating to the Council of Rimini, to which are added letters of Pope *Liberius. The third part contains documents after 359 up to 366. It is thought that this documentation was taken by Hilary from the lost Liber adversus Valentem et Ursacium, historiam Ariminensis et Seleuciensis synodi continens, which Jerome speaks of—an unknown person is said to have removed from the Liber the documentation prior to the end of the 4th c. Some documents may not have been gathered by Hilary but rather added later: the letter of *Eusebius of Vercelli to *Gregory of Elvira is a forgery of the *Luciferians (Frag. A II); the documents relating to *Valens, *Ursacius and *Germinius (A III; B V.VI) date to 366 and were likely not inserted by Hilary, who died in 367. As a whole, the work is of fundamental importance for knowledge of the entire central phase—the most complex—of the Arian controversy.

Hilary's exegetical activity began even before his exile, with the Commentary on Matthew, a rather small work which explains the principal facts recounted in that gospel in the form of an opus continuum, which does not present any trace of previous homiletic elaboration, as is the case for the other exegetical works of Hilary. The author prefers the *allegorical method, which makes clear, beyond the literal meaning, the spiritual significance. This spiritual meaning, developing points already present in the literal text, interprets the actions and words of Jesus in light of the consequences which flow from them, and Hilary perceives in them the prefiguration of the hostility of the Jews toward the church at its beginning, the abolition of the old economy, the preaching of the message to the pagans. The work presents us with a still imperfect trinitarian doctrine and traces of anthropological materialism (corporality of the soul). In the East, in contact with the work of Origen, Hilary was converted to *Platonic spiritualism, as is demonstrated by his Commentary on the Psalms, written probably during exile. The interpretation of just over fifty psalms has come down to us. The work was certainly larger, but we do not know if Hilary commented on the entire Psalter; even Jerome only knew of the work as incomplete. He states that it was derived from Origin's Commentary on the Psalms. A comparison is difficult because there are only a few passages remaining of Origen's work, even if some are long passages. It is, however, undeniable that Hilary, without lacking personal contributions, e.g., regarding trinitarian problems, nevertheless held close to the model from which he borrowed his principal theme: the Psalms prefigure the early life of Christ, from his birth to his resurrection and exaltation. The same hermeneutic principle, of interpreting the OT in relation to Christ and the church, is applied in the brief De mysteriis, which interprets a few famous episodes taken above all from Genesis and Exodus in a typically *Alexandrian manner. This work, probably dating to after his exile, was published in 1887 on the basis of a MS of Arezzo. This MS contains three hymns as well, the only ones remaining from the Liber hymnorum which Jerome mentions (loc. cit.). The three hymns, which have come to us more or less incomplete, treat different themes (Ante saecula is trinitarian, Fefellit saevam baptismal [?], Adae carnis christological) in strophes composed of various lyrical meters (asclepiadean, glyconic, iambic, trochaic) and in intricate form, in accord with the classicist canons for Latin poetry of the period. Hilary wrote them in order to give his faithful a doctrinal culture, and in doing so was the first in the Latin-speaking Christian world; but Jerome observes that the innovation did not have favorable results. Another hymn, Hymnum dicat, which has come down to us by another path, and which exalts Christ's work of redemption in trochaic meter, must not be considered authentic for reasons of language and style, even if its authenticity has at times been defended. Certainly spurious are two other hymns and a letter Ad Abram filium. Of the works known to Jerome, the following have been lost: beyond the Liber contra Valentem et Ursacium and a large part of the Liber hymnorum, the Liber ad praefectum Sallustium sive contra Dioscorum, and the Tractatus in Iob, derived from Origen, of which we know only scarce fragments, indirectly.

H.Ch. Brennecke, Hilarius v. Poitiers: TRE 15, 315-322; BBKL 2,835-840; M. Durst, Hilarius: LTK³ 5, 100-102; RAC 15 (1991) 139-167; Hilary of Poitiers, St.: ODC (1997) 769-770; M. Durst, Hilarius von Poitiers: LACL (1998) 293-296.

Editions and Translations: CPL 427-472; PL 9-10; PLS 1, 241-286; CSEL 22 (Com. Ps.), 65 (Myst., Frag. Hist., Hymns); SC 19bis (Myst.), 254.258 (Com.Mt.); CCL 62 (Trin.); Hilaire de Poitiers, Contre Costance, intr., crit. text, Fr. tr. with notes and index by André Rocher, Paris 1987 (SC 334); M. Milhau, In Matth., Paris 1988 (SC 344 and 347); P. Smulders (ed.), Hilary of Poitiers' Preface to His Opus Historicum, Leiden 1995; J. Doignon, ChrSL 61, 1997; L.R. Wickham (ed.), Hilary of Poitiers: Conflicts of Conscience and Law in the Fourth-Century Church: Against Valens and Ursacius: The Extant Fragments, Together with his Letter to the Emperor Constantius, Eng. tr. with intr. and notes, from the edition by A. Feder in CSEL 65 (1916) 41-205, Liverpool 1997; Hilaire de Poitiers, La Trinité, crit. text by P. Smulders; intr. by M. Figura and J. Doignon; tr. by G.M. de Durand, Ch. Morel and G. Pelland; notes by G. Pelland, Paris 1999-2001 (SC 443, 448, 462); Sancti Hilarii Pictaviensis episcopi Tractatus super psalmos; In Psalmum CXVIII, ed. J. Doignon; with R. Demeulenaere, Turnhout 2002.

Studies: Patrologia II, 36-38 (bibl.); P. Smulders, La doctrine trinitaire de s. Hilaire de Poitiers, Rome 1944; C.F.A. Borchardt, Hilary of Poitiers' Role in the Arian Struggle, Den Haag 1966; E.R. Labande (ed.), Hilaire et son temps. Actes du Colloque de Poitiers, 29 septembre - 3 octobre 1968, à l'occasion du XVI[e] centenaire de la mort de saint Hilaire, Paris 1969; J. Doignon, Hilaire de Poitiers avant l'exil, Paris 1971; L.F. Ladaria, El Espíritu santo en San Hilario de Poitiers, Madrid 1977; P. Smulders, Two Passages of Hilary's Apologetica Responsa Rediscovered: Bijdragen 39 (1978) 234-243; L. Longobardo, Il linguaggio negativo della trascendenza di Dio in Ilario di Poitiers, Naples 1982; H.C. Brennecke, Hilarius von Poitiers und die Bischofsopposition gegen Konstantius II.: Untersuchungen zur dritten Phase des Arianischen Streites (337–361), Berlin-New York 1984; J. Doignon, Quatre formules énigmatiques dans l'exégèse d'Hilaire de Poitiers: VChr 38 (1984) 371-394; M. Figura, Das Kirchenverständnis des Hilarius von Poitiers, Freiburg-Basel-

Vienna 1984; L. Brésard, Hilaire de Poitiers et le mystère de la naissance: BLE 86 (1985) 83-100; J. Doignon, Hilaire de Poitiers "Kirchenpolitiker"? À propos d'un ouvrage récent: RHE 80 (1985) 441-454; J. Fontaine, Les origines de l'hymnodie chrétienne latine d'Hilaire de Poitiers à Ambroise de Milan: La MaisonD 161 (1985) 33-74; L.F. Ladaria, "Dispensatio" en S. Hilario de Poitiers: Gregorianum 66 (1985) 429-455; M. Canévet, Le schéma de conversion dans le prologue du "De Trinitate" d'Hilaire de Poitiers et le livre VII des "Confessions" d'Augustin Problématique d'un temps: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 165-174; J. Doignon, Scepticisme, lassitude et conversion chez Hilaire de Poitiers: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 175-184; M. Durst, Die Eschatologie des Hilarius von Poitiers: ein Beitrag zur Dogmengeschichte des vierten Jahrhunderts, Bonn 1987; J. Doignon, Du nouveau dans l'exploration de l'oeuvre d'Hilaire de Poitiers (1983-1988). Recension critique de six ouvrages: REAug 34 (1988) 93-105; J. Doignon, Un témoignage inédit des "Tractatus super Psalmos" d'Hilaire de Poitiers contre l'hymnodie païenne: RBen 99 (1989) 35-40; L.F. Ladaria, La cristología de Hilario de Poitiers, Rome 1989; J. Doignon, Hilaire de Poitiers face à la mystique origénienne de la purification par l'amour: REAug 36 (1990) 217-224; J. Doignon, Sur la "descente" du Christ en ce monde chez Hilaire de Poitiers: RHR 207 (1990) 65-75; J. Doignon, Un cri d'alarme d'Hilaire de Poitiers sur la situation de l'Eglise à son retour d'exil: RHE 85 (1990) 281-290; J. Doignon, Hilaire de Poitiers témoin latin le plus ancien d'un texte rare du logion "Matthieu" 10,38: RBen 101 (1991) 28-31; G. Pelland, "Gloriam ex conspectu gloriae" (Hilaire, "Tr. ps." 118, heth, 8): Gregorianum 72 (1991) 757-763; D.H. Williams, A Reassessment of the Early Career and Exile of Hilary of Poitiers: JEH 42 (1991) 202-217; J. Doignon, L'Incarnation: la vraie visée du Ps 44,8 sur l'onction du Christ chez Hilaire de Poitiers: RTL 23 (1992) 172-177; M. Milhau, Différentes versions de titres ou de versets de psaumes rapportées par Hilaire de Poitiers "Tractatus super Psalmos": RBen 102 (1992) 24-43; T.D. Barnes, Hilary on His Exile: VChr 46 (1992) 129-140; T.D. Barnes, The Capitulation of Liberius and Hilary of Poitier: Phoenix 46 (1992) 256-265; D.H. Williams, The Anti-Arian Campaigns of Hilary of Poitiers and the "Liber Contra Auxentium": ChHist 61 (1992) 7-22; J. Doignon, La connexion du spirituel et du charnel dans la méthodologie exégétique d'Hilaire de Poitiers. À propos d'un texte malmené d'"In psalmum" 1,17: VetChr 30 (1993) 259-266; J. Doignon, Touches origéniennes dans l'enseignement d'Hilaire de Poitiers sur Romains 7,23: RSR 67 (1993) 53-59; J. Doignon, La chair du Christ comme dépouille triomphale. Une lecture de "Col." 2,15 par Hilaire de Poitiers: RSR 68 (1994) 447-452; P.C. Burns, Hilary of Poitiers' Road to Béziers: Politics or Religion?: JECS 2 (1994) 273-289; G. Vaccari, La teologia della assunzione in Ilario di Poitiers: uno studio sui termini "adsumere" e "adsumptio," Rome 1994; J. Doignon, Un terme difficile de "Col." 2,9 éclairé par Hilaire de Poitiers: "corporaliter": RBen 105 (1995) 5-8; J. Doignon, Hilaire sur "Matth." 18,3: la "simplicité des enfants" ou un programme fragile pour croyants: RSR 70 (1996) 307-312; M. Durst, Nizäa als "autoritative Tradition" bei Hilarius: Stimuli. Festschrift f. E. Dassmann, Münster 1996, 406-422; D. Bertrand, L'impassibilité du Christ selon Hilaire de Poitiers, "De Trinitate" X: Augustinianum 35 (1997) 349-357; Y.-M. Duval, L'extirpation de l'arianisme en Italie du Nord et en Occident: Rimini (359/60) et Aquilée (381), Hilaire de Poitiers (367/8) et Ambroise de Milan (397), Aldershot 1998; L.F. Ladaria, L'Esprit Saint chez Hilaire de Poitiers: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 69 (1998) 14-21; K. Madigan, On the High-Medieval Reception of Hilary of Poitiers's Anti-"Arian" Opinion: A Case Study of Discontinuity in Christian Thought: Journal of Religion 78 (1998) 213-229.

M. Simonetti

HILARY the Luciferian (4th c.). A deacon in Rome, he supported the position that it was necessary to rebaptize *Arians who had converted to the Catholic Church. According to the information *Jerome gives in the Altercatio Luciferani et Orthodoxi 27, he wrote libelli on the subject; when the Altercatio was composed, probably during Jerome's stay in *Antioch between 377 and 379, Hilary had already died. According to others, who place the composition of the Altercatio in *Rome in 382, Hilary died that year. Some identify him with *Ambrosiaster.

F. Cavallera, Saint Jérôme. Sa vie et son oeuvre, Louvain-Paris 1922, v.I, 56-57.

S. Zincone

HIMERIUS of Prusa (4th c.). Sophist, native of Prusa in *Bithynia in the early 4th c., son of the rhetorician Aminia, active mainly in *Athens, except for a period in *Antioch, when he was the guest of the emperor *Julian. He had distinguished pupils attend his Athenian school of rhetoric, such as *Basil of Caesarea and *Gregory of Nazianzus. His speeches were partly written for the occasion, partly made up as rhetorical exercises. Himerius was in strong competition with *Prohaeresius; he abandoned Athens for this reason and returned only after the death of his opponent. From his wife, who was also descended from philosophers and orators, he had a son, Rufinus, a promising orator who died young, and a daughter. We possess the titles of more than 70 speeches by Himerius, which partially survive complete, partially in fragments. They are valuable, as they often cite passages of classical lyric verse directly (Alcaeus, Sappho, Anacreon) and other poets which would otherwise be lost. He lived well into his seventies.

EI 18, 881-882; PWK 8, 2, 1622-1635; Himerii Orationes, ed. Colonna, Rome 1951: PLRE I, 436; H. Völker, Himerios, Reden und Fragmente: Einführung, Übersetzung und Kommentar, Wiesbaden 2003.

M. Perraymond

HIMERIUS (Eumerius, Comerius) of Tarragona (4th c.). Bishop of *Tarragona. Around 384, with a letter that is now lost, he addressed Pope *Damasus, posing diverse questions dealing with discipline: how to behave toward *Arian groups, issues involving celibacy and so on. Pope *Siricius responded to this letter after 385, with a decretal (see Isid., Vir. ill. 3), which is preserved in the Iberian collection of canons. What Himerius asked the pope has not been preserved, but it is possible to sketch out the content from the decretal sent by Siricius, which gives these rules on how to receive heretics into the church, on the baptism of the Arians, on the time and manner of baptism, and also laws on penitence, on the celibacy of monks and priests, on the age of ordination, and on the administering of penance. Siricius also ordered that the 14 chapters of the decretal be brought to the attention of the remaining bishops of *Spain, the bishops of *Carthage and *Baetica, as well as those in *Lusitania and *Gaul.

PL 13, 1131-1147; 56, 554-562; 84, 629-628; A.C. Vega, El Primado romano y la Iglesia española en los siete primeros siglos, El Escorial 1941, 31-38; J. Fernández Alonso, La cura pastoral en la España romanovisigoda, Rome 1955; B. Botte, Les origines de la Noël et de l'Epiphanie, Abbaye du Mont-César 1962, 49-50. M. Sotomayor, Historia de la Iglesia en España, I, Madrid 1979, 303 f.; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 50-53.

M. Díaz y Díaz

HIMYARITES, Book of the. These fragments, edited and translated by A. Moberg, The Book of the Himyarites, Lund 1924, narrate the martyrdom of Himyarite Christians in 523. A Yemenite tribe, the Himyarites (Gr. Homēritai, mentioned by Pliny the Elder and by the Periplus Maris Erythraei) dominated Arabia until 525, prospering through trade. Among the last Himyarite kings were Jews and Christians; the last, Yusuf As'ar (Ar. Dhu Nuwas), a Jew, persecuted the Christians, burned their churches and fought against the *Ethiopians of *Aksum; Sabaean money was coined which humiliated the Christians. In 523 the Christians of Najran, led by *Aretas, were besieged by Yusuf, conquered through deception and massacred. According to the Syrian *Simeon of Beth Arsham (Assemani, BO I, 364, via eyewitnesses) 2,000 Christians were burned in the church; others were later killed because they refused to deny "Christ and his Cross"; among the 4,000 martyrs were the matron Ruma and her daughters. Many perished in pits filled with fire, among whom were another Christian woman and her son. Aretas and 340 followers, killed by the king, were considered martyrs by the Greek, Latin and Russian churches. The Aksumite king Kaleb, exhorted by Constantinople, defeated Yusuf ca. 525. The events of Najran are narrated in the Book of the Himyarites; the relations with other texts on the persecutions of the Himyarite Christians in the 6th c., such as the Martyrium Arethae, have been studied: Shahîd notes interesting convergences with ch. 117 of the Ethiopian Kebra Nagast, in which the anti-Judaism is parallel to that of the Book, where Yusuf is a "crucifier," as the Jews (zaqope), e.g., are in the 4th–6th c. Syrian apocryphal Doctrina Addai or Acta Maris. In both, the Christian Kaleb is seen as a liberator and as pious; he and Yusuf took names of biblical heroes.

S. Smith, Events in Arabia in the 6th Cent. A.D.: BSOAS 16 (1954) 425-468; J. Ryckmans, La persécution des chrétiens himyarites au VI^e^ siècle, Istanbul 1956; P. Boneschi, Le Martyrium Arethae et les monnaies sabéennes: RStOr 39 (1964) 117-124; E. Budge, History of Ethiopia, Oosterhout 1966, 261-262; I. Shahîd, The Martyrs of Najrân, Brussels 1971; P. Devos, Quelques aspects de la nouvelle letter . . . de Siméon de Bêth-Arshâm, in IV Congr. Int. di Studi Etiopici, I, Rome 1974, 107-116; M. van Esbroeck, L'Éthiopie à l'époque de Justinien: S. Arethas de Negran, in ibid., 117-139; J. Harmatta, The Struggle for the Possession of South Arabia Between Aksum and the Sasanians, in ibid., 95-106; J. Trimingham, Christianity Among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, London 1979, 287-307; I. Shahîd, Byzantium in South Arabia: DOP 33 (1979) 25-94; L. Van Rompay, The Martyrs of Najran: Orientalia Lovan. Analecta 13 (1982) 301-309; S. Brock - S. Harvey, Holy Women of the Syrian Orient, Berkeley, CA 1987, 100-121; J. Ryckmans, Les rapports de dépendance entre les récits hagiographiques relatifs à la persécution des Himyarites: Muséon 100 (1987) 297-305; A. Dihle, L'ambassade de Théophile l'Indien, in L'Arabie préislamique et son environnement historique et culturel, ed. T. Fahd, Leiden 1989, 461-468; W. Müller, Himyar: RAC 15 (1989) 303-331; I. Shahîd, The Martyrs of Najran: Further Reflections: Muséon 103 (1990) 151-153; T. Mackintosh-Smith, Yemen, Woodstock 2000, 41-43; C. Dognini - I. Ramelli, Gli Apostoli in India, Milan 2001, cap. VII.

I. Ramelli

HIMYARITES, martyrs. The kingdom of Himyar (Himyarites, in Gr. Homēritai), the capital of which was Zafar, 130 km (80.8 mi) SW of today's Sanaa, occupied the S region of the Arabian Peninsula, the territory called Arabia Felix, and corresponds to today's Yemen. It was a land rich in incense, myrrh and other spices which were important in the Roman Empire for religious and funeral ceremonies, and therefore a large amount of such spices were purchased. In addition, merchants traveled through the Red Sea for the sake of business with India. The emperor *Constantius (338–361) sent Theophilos the Indian to the land of the Himyarites on a mission to obtain the construction of churches in Zafar, where there were therefore already Christians. Around 518, in order to relieve himself from the Christian Ethiopian protectorate, which was allied with the Roman Empire, King Yusuf As'ar Yathar (known as Dhu Nuwas and by other names as well), whose religion was Jewish, began to persecute Christians throughout his kingdom, not only at Zafar, the capital, but also in Hadhramaut, where there were various martyrs, and in the coastal cities. On the political level, this persecution reflects the struggles between the Roman Empire (together with Ethiopia and Ghassanids) and the Persian Empire (and the Lakhmids). In Zafar, the members of an Ethiopian Christian garrison, though having received a guarantee of safe conduct, were killed with their priest Ababut; the church, with 280 faithful who had taken refuge there, was burned. There was a strong Christian presence in the N, in the city of Najran (Nagran or Nadjran). Since Yusuf realized the impossibility of conquering it, he then swore he would give full amnesty if the inhabitants surrendered. Convinced that they would not be able to resist for long, on the advice of their leader Abdullah ibn Kaab (Arethas, Harith), they surrendered. *Arethas was killed with 300 Christians; the church of Najran, filled with Christians—about 2,000—was burned; among those inside were many women. In the oasis of Najran the number martyred is said to have been 4,252 (other sources give a larger number); among the martyrs were also clerics of other regions. Many women, who for various reasons were saved, hurried in search of a voluntary martyrdom and offered themselves freely to their persecutors. Two letters of the bishop *Simeon of Beth Arsham (Syria) inform us in detail about the events; and various other ancient sources, among which is the fragmentary Book of the Himyarites, narrate the savageries carried out in that persecution. Their martyrdom is also recorded in the Qur'an (Sura 85, 4f.). When the news reached *Constantinople, the emperor pressed the Kaleb Ella Asheba (later S. Elesbaan) of Ethiopia to intervene with the help of the Byzantine fleet. In 525 this intervention put an end to the Himyarite kingdom, and the churches of Zafar and Najran were rebuilt.

AASS Octobris 10 (1986) 721-759 (martyrdom of Aretas; the text circulated in various Eastern languages); I. Guidi, La lettera di Simeone vescovo di Beth-Arsham sopra "I martiri omeriti": Atti della R. Acc. dei Lincei III.7 (1881) 471-515; A. Moberg, The Book of the Himyarites, Lund 1924; S. Smith, Events in Arabia in the 6th Century A.D.: BSOAS 16 (London: University of London, 1954) 425-468; J. Ryckmans, La persécution des chrétiens himyarites au sixième siècle, Istanbul 1956; J. Ryckmans, Le christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique, in L'Oriente cristiano nella storia della civiltà, Rome 1964, 413-454; I. Shahîd, The Martyrs of Najrân: New Documents, Brussels 1971; P. Devos, Quelques aspects de la nouvelle lettre, récemment découverte, de Siméon de Bêth-Aršâm sur les martyrs Himyarites, in IV Congr. int. di Studi Etiopici, Rome 1974, I, 107-116; M. van Esbroeck, L'Éthiopie à l'époque de Justinien: S. Arethas de Negran et S. Athanase de Clysma, in ibid., 117-139; J. Harmatta, The Struggle for the Possession of South Arabia Between Aksum and the Sasanians, in ibid., 95-106; I. Shahîd, Byzantium in South Arabia: DOP 33 (1979) 25-94; J. Spencer Trimingham, Christianity Among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times, London-New York 1979, 287-307; L. Van Rompay, The Martyrs of Najran: Some Remarks on the Nature of the Sources: Orientalia Lovan. Analecta 13 (1982) 301-309; J. Ryckmans, Les rapports de dépendance entre les récits hagiographiques relatifs à la persécution des Himyarites: Muséon 100 (1987) 297-305; S.P. Brock - S.A. Harvey, Holy Women of the Syrian Orient, Berkeley, CA 1987 (ch. 4: Women 'Martyrs of Najran'); W.W. Müller, Himyar: RAC 15 (1989) 303-331; A. Dihle, L'ambassade de Théophile l'Indien réexaminée, in L'Arabie préislamique et son environnement historique et culturel, ed. T. Fahd, Leiden 1989, 461-468; G. Fernández, The Evangelizing Mission of Theophilus "The Indian" and the Ecclesiastical Policy of Constantius II: Klio 71 (1998) 361-366; I. Shahîd, The Martyrs of Najran: Further Reflections: Muséon 103 (1990) 151-153; M. Piccirillo, L'Arabia cristiana, Milan 2002, 20-25; I. Shahîd, The Martyresses of Najran, in Aegyptus Christiana. Mélanges d'hagiographie égyptienne et orientale dédiés à la mémoire du P. Paul Devos, bollandiste, curauerunt U. Zanetti - E. Lucchesi, Geneva 2004, 123-133.

A. Di Berardino

HIPPO

I. The city - II. Councils.

I. The city. Hippo Regius, under French occupation, called Bona; today called Annaba. It was founded by the Phoenicians, a second residence of the Numidian kings (the name derives, perhaps, from this to distinguish it from Hippo Diarrhytus), a municipality and then a Roman colony under Caesar and Augustus. Excavations have brought to light an important forum, a temple, a theater, baths, villas, harbor settlements. Its port had commercial relations with Ostia. The territory of the civitas was vast, and its confines reached to 20 km (12.4 mi) from the city in the direction of Cirta, 40 km (24.9 mi) in the direction of Thabraca and Calama, 60 km (37.3 mi) in the direction Fussala (a city which has not been identified, but doubtless to the S). The city was conquered by the *Vandals in 431, retaken by the *Byzantines in 533; it fell under Arab domination between the 7th and 8th c.

Christian origins and first bishops. We do not know how Christianity arrived in Hippo. The first known bishop, whose name was Theogenes, participated in the Council of *Carthage of 256 (Sent. ep. 14). We must identify him with the Theogenes who is celebrated 26 January in the Mart. hier. and with the martyr of whom *Augustine speaks several times (Serm. 273,7; Mai 158,2 and perhaps Lambot 2?). If so, he died a martyr 26 January 259. Another group of 20 martyrs possibly fell victim to *Diocletian's persecution. They are mentioned several times by Augustine (Serm. 148, 257, 325, 326; Morin 2,3; Civ. Dei 22,8,10): the bishop Fidentius figures prominently among these, along with two women, Valeriana and Victoria. The date of martyrdom seems to be 15 November 304. In contrast, another saint was not a martyr: Leontius, who established the basilica of the same name, where his memorial was celebrated (4 May) with a funeral banquet. Augustine knew of him as the bishop of Hippo in ancient times. We do not know when he lived or when he died (Aug., Ep. 29; Serm. 252,4; 260; 262; Conc. Hippon. 427).

Hippo at the time of Augustine. Augustine's predecessor at the cathedral of Hippo was named Valerius: a Greek by birth, not well-versed in Latin, he had Augustine join him as a priest in 392 (in this capacity Augustine participated and preached at the Council of Hippo in 393), then as coadjutor in ca. 395. Valerius must have died shortly thereafter, because Augustine participated in the Council of Carthage in 397 as bishop in charge. Thanks to him we know the religious situation of the city at the beginning of his episcopate. It was so dominated by the *Donatists that they were able to starve the Catholics by putting pressure on the bakers. Augustine, however, succeeded in reversing the situation. His work reveals to us the existence of a half-dozen urban and suburban shrines and of a few others in the diocese. The cathedral was the basilica Pacis or Maior, where the council of 393 was held, and where Augustine preached many of his sermons (Conc. Hippon. 393; Serm. 258, 325, 326). The basilica Leontiana, named for its founder, Leontius, is mentioned several times in his writings (Ep. 29; Serm. 252, 260, 262; Conc. Hippon. 427). To that one must add the funerary chapels of St. Theogenes, the 20 martyrs, the 8 martyrs (see above). In 424–425, at his own expense, he had the deacon *Heraclius construct a memoria destined to guard the relics of St. *Stephen, which he acquired a little before from *Evodius the bishop of Uzalis (Aug., Serm. 317-24, Wilmart 12,5; Serm. 79 and 94; Ep. 212; Civ. Dei 22,8,18-19,23). Other shrines were marked in the diocese: at Fussala (Guelf. 32), of Sts. *Gervasius and Protasius in the villa Victoriana at Argentarium, at Audurus, Gippi, Hasna, Mutugenna and Thiava. Augustine designated Heraclius as his successor, but we do not know if he actually succeeded him or not.

Hippo after Augustine. Even if *Possidius says that the episcopal see continued to be occupied during the Vandal occupation, not a single name has come down to us after Augustine. According to the Thronos alexandrinus the city maintained an ecclesiastical organization in the 8th c., and until the end of the 9th c., acc. to the testimony of Leo the Wise.

DACL 6, 2483-2531; Cath 5, 76163; LTK[2] 5, 376-378; EAA 2, 132-134; E. Mareil, Hippone la Royale, Alger 1954; Id., Monuments chrétiens d'Hippone, Paris 1958; O. Perler, L'église principale et les autres sanctuaires chrétiens d'Hippone la Royale d'après les textes de saint Augustin: REAug 1 (1955) 299-343; Id., La découverte des monuments chrétiens d'Hippone: Rev. d'Hist. eccl. suisse (Zeit. f. schw. Kirch.) 54 (1960) 177-188; H.I. Marrou, La basilique chrétienne d'Hippone d'après les dernières fouilles: REAug 6 (1960) 109-154; M. Pizzica, Possidio e la caduta di Ippona: Romanobarbarica 7 (1982-1983) 181-199; S. Lancel, Études sur la Numidie d'Hippone au temps de saint Augustin. Recherches de topographie ecclésiastique: MEFRA 96 (1984) 1085-1113; I. Gui - N. Duval - J.-P. Caillet, Basiliques chrétiennes d'Afrique du Nord, Paris 1992, I, 346-349; W. Gessel, Die Stadt des Aurelius Augustinus: Augustiniana 40 (1990) 73-94; N. Duval, Hippo Regius: RAC 15, 442-466; M. de Vos, Documentation archéologique à Hippone (Hippo Regius), in Augustinus Afer, ed. by P.-Y. Fux - J.-M. Roessli - O. Wermelinger, Fribourg 2003, 401-411.

V. Saxer

II. Councils. The first plenary council of the African provinces (Proconsular, Numidia, Byzacena, Mauretania, Tripolitania), was held at Hippo 8 October 393 with *Aurelius of Carthage presiding, in the secretarium of the basilica Pacis. Augustine, who had been ordained a priest two years earlier, was sent to give the opening discourse (which he would revisit later, creating the treatise De fide et symbolo). From the acts of this council there exist only some fragments (Munier, Cinq canons inédits), but their substance passed into the Compendium of Hippo (Breviarium Hipponense), a collection of 37 disciplinary canons, composed by the bishops of *Byzacena in 397 and approved by the Council of Carthage 28 August of the same year. This collection constitutes an essential document of African legislation in its golden era. The greater part of the arrangements regards the status of clerics and the requirements for ordination, which could be conferred upon those older than 25 years, duly prepared (can. 1-2). Candidates had to have led all their family members to the Catholic religion, i.e., to have converted them away from the *Donatists (can. 17). All the duties of clerics of every rank were recalled, particularly as regards chastity (can. 16, 18, 24) and residency (can. 35); they were forbidden from commerce and from loaning at interest (can. 15, 22), from entering taverns, unless they were traveling (can. 26). Very rigorous norms defined the administration of justice (can. 6-9); severe penalties were levied against clerics who deserted the ecclesiastical tribunals (can. 10). The bishops were asked to respect the rights of their colleagues (can. 19) and not to carry out illicit ordinations (can. 19). They were prohibited from making voyages overseas, unless the primate had given his consent (can. 27).

The council, then, issued other canons, intended to regulate liturgical life and rites. At the altar, prayers had to be directed to the Father (can. 21).

The Eucharist required only bread and wine (can. 23). The rule regarding the eucharistic fast was defined. There was a prohibition against giving the Eucharist to catechumens (can. 3) and to the dead (can. 4); against administering baptism to the deceased (can. 4) and against administering it in articulo mortis too easily (can. 32). The power of priests was also defined regarding administration of penance (can. 30), the consecration of virgins and the preparation of sacred chrism (can. 34). Various measures were adopted to protect the virtue of consecrated virgins (can. 31) and of widows (can. 24). Banquets were prohibited in churches, save for motives of hospitality (can. 29). The council showed itself most vigilant toward the sons of clerics, so that their conduct would not tarnish the reputation of the church's dignitaries (can. 11-14).

To assure the observance of all these norms, the fathers of Hippo decided on an annual celebration of a general council of the provinces of Africa, each of which had to be represented by three delegates (can. 5), granting that Tripolitania would only send one, due to the distance.

This council took only one measure regarding the Donatists: clerics who reentered the Catholic Church would remain in their order, if they had not been rebaptized and if they had brought their faithful with them back to orthodoxy (can. 37).

Finally, it should be mentioned that the Council of Hippo defined the canon of the sacred books of the OT and NT (can. 36), which it then decided to submit to the approval of the churches across the sea (*Rome, *Milan).

Thirty-four years after the first plenary council of Africa, over which *Aurelius presided, still at Hippo, 24 September 427, the last of this series was celebrated: CCL 149, 250. The decisions of the previous councils were reread, particularly those of 419 and of 421, and were solemnly confirmed and inserted into the Register of Carthage, after having been revised hardly at all.

CCL 149, 248-253; Hfl-Lecl II, 1303-1308; Palazzini 1, 195-197; G. Bardy, Conciles d'Hippone au temps de saint Augustin: Augustiniana 5 (1955) 441-458; Ch. Munier, Cinq canons du concile d'Hippone du 8 octobre 393: RDC 18 (1968) 16-29; Id., La tradition manuscrite de l'Abrégé d'Hippone et le canon des Écritures des églises africaines: SE 21 (1972/73) 43-55; B. Neunheuser, "Cum altari adsistitur semper ad Patre dirigatur oratio." Der Canon 21 de Konzils von Hippo 393, seine Bedeutung und Nachwirkung: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 105-119; J.E. Merdinger, Rome and the African Church in the Time of Augustine, New Haven, CT 1997; S. Lancel, Saint Augustin, Paris 1999, 229-231; J.-A. Sabw Kanyang, Episcopus et plebs, l'évêque et la communauté ecclésiale dans les conciles africains (345-525), Bern 2000.

Ch. Munier

HIPPOLYTUS (ca. 170–ca. 235)

I. The Hippolytan question - II. Writings attributed to Hippolytus and to the author of the Elenchos - III. Exegesis and doctrine.

I. The Hippolytan question. In HE 6,20,2, *Eusebius of Caesarea describes Hippolytus, mentioned together with *Beryllus the bishop of Bostra and *Gaius priest of Rome, as head of a church (καὶ αὐτὸς προεστὼς ἐκκλησίας), and in 6,22 he adds that Hippolytus had composed many commentaries, naming seven which were known to him and mentioning in particular a writing on Easter in which a paschal canon of sixteen years had been proposed, calculated up to the first year (επὶ τὸ πρῶτον ἔτος) of the emperor *Alexander Severus. This information was largely confirmed by *Jerome (Vir. ill. 61), who furthermore gives a richer list of Hippolytan writings, mostly exegetical. Between these two sources chronologically is the Catalogus liberianus, contained in the so-called Chronography of 354*, which notes in the year 235 the exile to Sardinia of the bishop of Rome Pontianus and of the priest Hippolytus, while the Depositio martyrum—this too found in the Chronography—records Ypoliti in Tiburtina et Pontiani in Callisti as 13 August. Some years later *Damasus placed in the cemetery named for Hippolytus, on the Via Tiburtina, one of his epigrams (n. 37 Ihm) in which it is said that the priest Hippolytus at first had passed to the heresy of Novatus (= *Novatian) but, when persecution came, returned to the Catholic Church and confessed his faith with blood. *Apollinaris of Laodicea, around the end of the 4th c., since he describes the writer Hippolytus as bishop of Rome, attests that in the East the fusion with the writer Hippolytus, of Greek speech and unknown origin, had already occurred; this fusion is confirmed also by other Eastern sources and was known also to Jerome, while the number of works transmitted under Hippolytus's name grew. In the West, in contrast, the hagiographic tradition of the martyr Hippolytus, largely legendary and having influenced a hymn of the Peristephanon of *Prudentius, partially joined the martyr with the mythic Hippolytus, son of Theseus, but was unaware of any literary activity. As time went on, while there were no mentions in the West, in the East we encounter the information of *Photius (cod. 121) on the Syntagma of Hippolytus, as much as can be gathered of his Capita contra Gaium from the Commentary on the Apocalypse of Dionysus bar Salibi (12th c.), and the catalog of Hippolytan writings edited by the Nestorian Ebedjesu (14th c.). The latter two writings are in *Syriac. Around the middle of the 16th c. a statue was discovered at Rome which was identified as that of Hippolytus. In 1553 the humanist Pirro Ligorio wrote that the statue had been found in very poor condition between the Via Nomentana and the Via Tiburtina, not far from Castro Pretorio; later he specified that the statue had been found among the ruins of a church dedicated to S. Hippolytus. Of the figure, seated on a throne, little was left, since almost all of the section of the body above the girdle had been lost. On the two sides of the throne, to the left of the viewer, had been inscribed the dates of the beginning of the paschal period for a cycle of 16 years, starting from the first year of the reign of Alexander Severus, repeated for seven cycles and including 112 years; on the opposite side the dates of the Easter Sunday for these 112 years. On the rear right post of the throne the titles of certain works had been inscribed. The indications of paschal chronology inscribed on the sides of the throne were immediately identified with those Eusebius had mentioned concerning Hippolytus, overlooking the fact that in Eusebius the sixteen years finish with the first year of Alexander Severus, while on the throne they begin with the first year of his reign, and Pirro Ligorio had the statue restored on the basis of this identification. It is currently situated at the entrance of the Vatican Library. Therefore, the literary heritage of the writer Hippolytus, who as we have said was identified in the East with the homonymous Roman martyr, was enriched with the works whose titles were inscribed on the post of the throne.

In 1851 the English scholar E. Miller published under the name of *Origen a work of *heresiological content, in ten books, with the second and third missing, which had been discovered a few years before in a codex of Mount Athos, today Paris suppl. gr. 464, under the title Φιλοσοφούμενα ἤ Κατὰ πασῶν αἱρέσεων ἔλεγχος (= El). It was quickly realized, based on the information contained in this work, that it could not be assigned to Origen because it was easy to recognize as the work of a Roman author, an enemy of Popes *Zephyrinus and *Callistus. D. Jacobi was the first to propose recognizing in him Hippolytus, bishop of Portus. In 1853 Döllinger published the monograph destined to mark a fundamental step in the complex itinerary of the Hippolytan question. Putting together—and forcing somewhat—all the data available, Döllinger joined into a single person Hippolytus the writer in Greek, the homonymous Roman martyr and the Roman author of the El: there resulted a prolific writer, mostly of exegetical works, a representative at Rome, in the initial years of the 3rd c., of the doctrine of the Logos and, for this reason, an adversary, not only of *Sabellius, heir of the radical *monarchianism of *Noetus of Smyrna, but also of Popes Zephyrinus and Callistus, who were also of monarchian sympathies. Expelled from communion with the Catholic Church of Rome, Hippolytus put himself at the head of his own small community. Arrested as a Christian in 235 together with Pope *Pontianus and sent to Sardinia, he died there. Later Pope *Fabian had the bodies of Hippolytus and Pontianus returned to Rome, and that of Hippolytus was later buried definitively in a cemetery along the Via Tiburtina. This person was considered the author, not only of all the writings, only partially extant, which the tradition attributed to Hippolytus, but also of the El and of all the works inscribed on the statue. Of the latter Against the Greeks and Against Plato and also On the Universe (Περὶ τοῦ παντός) were identified with the Περὶ τῆς παντὸς οὐσίας to which the author of the El refers as his own writing and of which some large fragments have been recognized, transmitted under the name of Josephus (Flavius) or Iosipos. Despite some opposition, this reconstruction was rapidly accepted among scholars and was enriched in 1910 by E. Schwartz, who proposed identifying with the The Apostolic Tradition on Charisms, marked on the statue, a work of liturgical and disciplinary character which has not reached us directly but which can be hypothesized and reconstructed on the basis of various liturgical works in different languages (Greek, Latin, Eastern languages), among which the Egyptian Canons of Hippolytus and the well-known Apostolic Constitutions, which through the large traits which they show in common prove that they all used this otherwise lost work. This hypothesis was also quickly accepted and completed the literary physiognomy of Hippolytus of Rome, a lettered schismatic and martyr.

Until the end of World War II this reconstruction was placed in doubt only in a negligible manner, but in 1947 the French scholar P. Nautin criticized it radically. The principal points of his criticisms were (1) doctrinal differences between the El and the Contra Noetum (= CN) known to be from Hippolytus, esp. concerning the Holy Spirit; (2) contradictions between the chronological dates contained in the works ascribed to Hippolytus; (3) psychological incompatibility of Hippolytus, an author of anti-Roman spirit, entirely devoted to the study of Scripture and the life of the church and hesitant to speak of himself, with the author of the El, very open to Greek philosophy, which he nevertheless condemned, and very prone to speaking about and promoting himself. Nautin proposed attributing to Hippolytus the writings which are extant or at least known under his name, while the writings written on the statue, with the addition of the El not mentioned there, should be attributed to a Roman author, to whom he gave the name Iosipos (Josipe), deducing this from the attributions of the Περὶ τοῦ παντός. This hypothesis immediately encountered very stiff opposition (Bardy, Botte, Richard, Capelle), centered esp. on the otherwise unknown Iosipos, and was set aside, despite the repeated replies of Nautin to his adversaries. But some of the arguments he proposed are clearly of important weight. Nor did the hypothesis of J.M. Hanssens, who proposed (1959) seeing in Hippolytus an Egyptian established at Rome, distinct from the homonymous martyr and still active in 351, have any noteworthy success. In 1976 the epigraphist M. Guarducci, in the course of research on an entirely different subject, while examining the statue which had been reconstructed as Hippolytus, reached the conclusion that originally it had been a feminine statue, and this conclusion was strengthened by later investigations. The woman to whom the statute had originally been dedicated was identified by Guarducci as the Epicurean philosopher Themista of Lampsacus. This shocking discovery provoked a series of questions and raised doubts about the widely spread reconstruction of Hippolytus of Rome. A series of studies, which took this as a starting point, resulted in various hypotheses, all of them critical of that reconstruction: Loi-Simonetti proposed distinguishing two Hippolytuses, one Eastern, author of the exegetical writings which have reached us under his name, and one Roman, author of the writings marked on the statue; A. Brent considered Hippolytus an Eastern writer who, having come to Rome, became part of the schismatic community of the author of the El, and after the death of the leader reconciled this community with the Catholic Church in Rome. In the meantime some special studies (Metzger, Markschies) reopened the discussion of the Schwartz hypothesis on the Apostolic Tradition and demolished the reconstruction of the work which Dom Botte had published.

The question is still very controversial, but certain points seem now to be solidly founded. (1) CN was written before the El. (2) The Hippolytus author of the CN must be kept distinct from the Roman author of the El; he was an Eastern writer, in all likelihood Asiatic, active between the end of the 2nd c. and the early years of the 3rd c., to whom belong, beyond the CN, some exegetical writings which have reached us, David and Goliath, Commentary on Daniel, Christ and Antichrist, Commentary on the Song of Songs, Blessings of Isaac and Jacob and Moses. To the Roman author of the El, active in the 1st decades of the 3rd c., should be assigned, beyond the El, the Περὶ τοῦ παντός and a Συναγωγὴ χρόνων which reached us anonymously, perhaps to be identified with the Chronicles inscribed on the statue. (3) Furthermore, the author of the El definitely knew some writings of Hippolytus: it cannot therefore be excluded, even if it appears improbable, that he knew him personally. (4) As for the Apostolic Tradition, whose few surviving fragments in Greek bear the title Διατάξεις τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων, if it ever existed as an independent work, it is not known when or where it was composed, and therefore it should be excluded from the discussions concerning the Hippolytan question. (5) Nothing authorizes us to believe that the titles of the works carved on the right rear post of the statue must be attributed to a single author. Among the questions which still remain under discussion, first of all the difficulty should be recognized of verifying the accuracy of the attributions of writings which are attested as belonging to Hippolytus but which have reached us only in a few fragments or sometimes only by title. The role played by the Roman martyr Hippolytus in the whole affair remains very cloudy, and it seems he must be considered a third person, distinct from the other two.

II. Writings attributed to Hippolytus and the author of the Elenchos. As mentioned above, besides the CN, five writings of exegetical character have been transmitted under the name of Hippolytus and have reached us in various languages. David and Goliath, in *Georgian translation, is a sermon which interprets the famous episode recounted in 1 Kgs 17, taking the two figures as prefigurations of Christ and the devil, with an interweaving of literal and *allegorical interpretations. Christ and Antichrist, preserved in Greek and Eastern translations, presents abundant scriptural documentation intended to demonstrate that at the end of time the Antichrist will reproduce negatively the works of Christ, deceiving the faithful. The Commentary on Daniel, unfinished in the Greek version and complete in a paleo-Slavic translation, interprets some episodes of the book of Daniel, among them that of *Susanna, presented as a figure of the church, with an *exegesis of mostly christological content, but interested in chronological calculations concerning the end of the world. The Commentary on the Song of Songs, in Georgian translation, interprets the Song from the beginning to 3:8, in an allegorical interpretation which takes the two lovers as prefigurations of Christ and the church. The Blessings of Isaac and Jacob, in the Greek original and in *Armenian and Georgian translation, and the Blessings of Moses, in Armenian and Georgian translation, perhaps were originally part of a broad exegetical initiative, including also the Blessings of Balaam, now lost, aimed at interpreting passages of particular prophetic importance from the first books of the OT. The Blessings of Isaac and Jacob, erroneously attributed to *Irenaeus by the Greek text, interpret Gen 37, 27, 49; the Blessings of Moses interprets Dt 33. The interpretation is allegorical with systematically and exclusively christological interest. From the Blessings of Jacob we have, through the exegetical catenae*, numerous Greek fragments which offer a christological interpretation of Gen 49 similar to that of the complete treatise but notably different in the details; they present an altogether more evolved type of exegesis. The Contra Noetum (CN), rather than the last part of the lost Syntagma against 32 heresies known to Photius, as many scholars have proposed, should be considered because of its evident internal characteristics a homiletic text of doctrinal content in which Hippolytus explains and refutes in detail the radical monarchian doctrine of Noetus of Smyrna and expounds his own, within the tradition of the Logos doctrine.

To the Roman writer hostile to Zephyrinus and Callistus whom we prefer to name simply the author of the El, without excluding that he too might have been called Hippolytus, besides the El, the two other writings mentioned above should also be attributed. The El (Κατὰ πασῶν αἱρέσεων), in ten books, of which the second and third are missing, transmitted under Origen's name, is a *heresiological work planned on the concept that heresies should be considered as the distorted results of the influence of Greek philosophy on Christian doctrine, so that each heresy, before being described, with frequent citations from heretical writings which we know only from this valuable source, is connected with a specific philosophical school: the *gnosis of *Valentinus with *Plato, that of *Basilides with *Aristotle, the *monarchianism of *Noetus with Heraclitus, and so on. In describing the latter doctrine, the author of the El gives us much information of a historical character on the doctrinal controversy in Rome in the 1st decades of the 3rd c., with particular attention to his personal battle with *Sabellius, *Zephyrinus and above all Callistus. We gather that, when he wrote this work, Callistus was already dead; therefore, the El should be dated after 222. In this writing the author refers to three other of his works. One, also of heresiological content, has vanished completely; another, Περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντὸς οὐσίας, which has been identified with the work of an almost identical title marked on the statue, has been lost as a complete work but there remain some fragments transmitted, under the name of Joseph (Flavius) and of Iosipos, by *Photius and *John Philoponus, and a very long one contained in the Sacra Parallela of *John of Damascus. The work dealt with philosophical questions, in particular with the creation of the world and of humanity, concluding with the last judgment and the renewal of the world. A third writing, in which the author of the El says that he dealt with the 72 peoples enumerated in Gen 10, has been identified with a Συναγωγὴ χρόνων καὶ εντῶν ἀπὸ κτίσεως κόσμου ἕως τῆς ἐνεστώσης ἡμέρας, transmitted anonymously, partially in Greek, entirely in Latin and Armenian translation, which has in turn been identified with the Chronicles whose title is marked on the statue. The content consists of a biblical chronology, which closes the age of the world at 6,000 years, just as in the Commentary on Daniel of Hippolytus and in *Julius Africanus, and is updated to 235, the year of the killing of *Alexander Severus; in the chronological framework are inserted information and notions esp. of a geographic character.

To these works, which are extant entirely or in part, even if often in translation, must be added certain other writings, many titles and various fragments of which have reached us under the name of Hippolytus. For the writings which have reached us intact but which cannot be attributed to Hippolytus, see *Hippolytus (pseudo), immediately following. As for the titles and fragments, we will mention esp. the titles which are found in Eusebius and in Jerome. In the former, beyond the paschal canon mentioned above, one reads (HE 6,22): On the Hexaemeron, On That Which Follows the Hexameron, Against Marcion, On the Canticle, On Parts of Ezekiel, On Easter, Against All the Heresies. Of these writings, beyond the paschal canon inscribed on the statue, only the On the Canticle has reached us. Jerome (Vir. ill. 61), beyond the titles gathered from Eusebius, knows many others. Here is his list: In Hexaemeron et in Exodum, In Canticum canticorum, In Genesim et in Zachariam, De Psalmis et in Isaiam, De Daniele, De Apocalypsi, De Proverbiis, De Ecclesiaste, De Saul et Pytonissa, Contra Marcionem, De Pascha, Adversus omnes haereses et prosomilian de laude domini salvatoris, in qua praesente Origene se loqui in ecclesia significat. Furthermore, in the preface of his Commentary on Matthew Jerome asserts that he knows a homonymous commentary of Hippolytus, and in Ep. 36,16 reports as deriving from the martyr Hippolytus an interpretation of Gen 27 different from that which we read in the Blessings of Isaac and Jacob of Hippolytus. To these titles must be added the Capitula adversus Gaium, cited in the list of Hippolytan writings by Ebedjesu, many fragments of which have reached us in Syriac translation, various writings from which *Theodoret cut out some passages, including them in the *florilegium attached to the Eranistes: On the Two Thieves, On Elcana and Anna, On the Great Ode, On the Beginning of Isaiah, On Psalm XXIII etc., a Syntagma against 32 heresies known by *Photius, and still other titles and fragments. That is to say, from Eusebius on, the number of writings attributed to Hippolytus increases progressively, while nothing more is known concerning the author than what Eusebius already knew. This all seems suspect, and only with difficulty could all these attributions be considered valid. We gather that around the end of the 4th and beginning of the 5th c. the name and work of Hippolytus enjoyed, in certain Eastern areas, great success, through which he was identified with the Roman martyr and was made into bishop of Rome or of Portus or also of Bostra (Arabia). This success has been explained (Prinzivalli) by pointing out the value of being able to use, in those areas, an exegetical figure crowned both by antiquity and by martyrdom, to oppose the prestige of *Origen, without, however, excluding that to strengthen the fame of Hippolytus occasional recourse had been made to the Alexandrian himself: in this sense the mention of Origen at the beginning of the sermon De laude domini salvatoris mentioned by Jerome should be understood. The difficulty of orientation among this great number of works derives from knowing only their titles and some fragments, i.e., too little to be able to judge concretely. We would not therefore have any hesitation in attributing with strong likelihood to Hippolytus the significant series of fragments on the Proverbs edited by Richard. In contrast, the attribution to him of the Capitula adversus Gaium, maintained recently by Prinzivalli and denied by Brent, appears less certain.

Let us add for compleness the titles engraved on the right post of the statue formerly considered as Hippolytus, even if—as we have pointed out above—we are not at all certain that these titles belong to a single author, rather than more than one, perhaps members of the small schismatic community constituted and directed by the author of the El: On the Psalms, On the Ventriloquist, In Defense of the Gospel of John and the Apocalypse, The Apostolic Tradition on the Charisms, Chronicles, Against the Greeks and Against Plato or also On the Universe, Protrepticum to Severina, Demonstration of the Time of Easter According to the Table, Odes on All the Scripture, On God and the Resurrection of the Flesh, On the Good and Whence Evil Comes. Some of these titles are new in the context of the question with which we are now occupied, others not so: the Against the Greeks etc. we have said to be identified with likelihood with the Περὶ τοῦ παντός of the author of the El, and so likewise, but with much greater uncertainty, of the Chronicles with respect to the Συναγωγὴ χρόνων also by the author of the El. The title On the Ventriloquist recalls that on the Pythonessa cited by Jerome. The writing In Defense of the Gospel of John and the Apocalypse has been identified with the Capitula adversus Gaium. The Demonstration of the Time of Easter According to the Table recalls the writing on Easter of Hippolytus and the paschal canon inscribed on the sides of the throne of the statue. In this matter, however, the discrepancy should not be underestimated between Eusebius and Jerome on the one hand, who state that the canon reached to the first year of Alexander Severus, and on the other the indication of the calculation on the statue, which begins at the first year of that emperor. This discrepancy, which is not a minor matter, could be clarified by hypothesizing that it is the result of an update of the calculation, which repeated in cycles of sixteen years, in order to render it more immediately useful for the members of the community of the author of the El, active precisely during the reign of Alexander Severus. In fact, once it has been demonstrated that the statue was not originally of Hippolytus and its celebratory intent therefore vanishing, which would have been, furthermore, abnormal in a Christian environment of that era, the presence of the paschal calculation on the sides of the throne can be understood as motivated by straightforward practical reasons: given the well-documented difficulty, for the Christians of the first centuries, in fixing exactly, year by year, the date of Easter, this calculation served to bring together on this point the members of the community to which the statue belonged, who must have been those of the community of the author of the El. According to this line of thinking, the titles of the writings marked on the rear post of the statue could have been the titles of writings by various authors which this community possessed.

III. Exegesis and doctrine. 1.1. The exegetical writings of Hippolytus, all dedicated to books of the OT, are the first which are known to have been written from within Catholic Christian circles, while in *gnostic environments *Heracleon's commentary to the gospel of John preceded them by several decades. The pioneering character explains certain deficiencies and approximations, above all in the philological dimension of the exegesis and the relationship between literal and allegorical interpretation. As for the formal typology, these offer a certain variety: David and Goliath has a homiletic character and has been transmitted to us as a homily; some typical characteristics of the homiletic genre are found in the commentaries on Daniel and the Song of Songs, and given that their dimensions exceed that of a single sermon, they should be considered the result of a development of an organic series of sermons. As for the commentaries on the Blessings of Isaac and Jacob and the Blessings of Moses, on the other hand, every element which might suggest an originally homiletic use appears absent from the execution of the interpretation of the biblical text, broken, just as for Daniel and for the Song, into sections of various lengths, so that this, which is the most ambitious exegetical performance of Hippolytus, seems to have been dictated without having been preached beforehand. The same can be said for Christ and Antichrist, which is a proper treatise. Also the hermeneutical ratio applied by Hippolytus in the interpretation of the OT Scriptures offers a certain variety in regard to the relationship between literal explanation and *allegorical interpretation and, given the impossibility of establishing a relative chronology among them except for the priority of Christ and Antichrist to the Commentary on Daniel, we are not in a position to interpret this variety as the result of some gradual evolution of that ratio. In David and Goliath the basic typological interpretation, David = Christ, Goliath = the devil, is not developed systematically in detail, so that overall the interpretation of the biblical text appears to be largely of the literal type. In the Commentary on Daniel letter and allegory intersect differently: in addition to the chronological calculations intended to fix the date of the end of the world, we should note the interpretation through which Susanna represents a typos of the church and the two elders who attack her represent Jews and pagans. In the commentaries on the Song and on the Blessings the interpretation is exclusively allegorical: in that on the Song the two lovers are taken as signifying Christ and the church, a transposition of the Jewish interpretation which took them as symbols of Yahweh and Israel, and this symbolism is developed in a systematic way in the interpretation of the details; the same systematic procedure can be seen in the allegorical interpretation of the Blessings, which is also here of an entirely christological and ecclesiological content and develops thoroughly the theme of the enmity of the Jews toward the Christian community.

1.2. The doctrinal position of Hippolytus can be gathered above all from the Contra Noetum (CN), to which can be added certain passages of the commentaries. *Noetus, founder of so-called modalist monarchianism, had intended to react to the divisive tendency which he noticed in the Logos doctrine, proposed by Justin, *Athenagoras and others, accenting the traditional monotheism which the Christian church had inherited from Judaism. His syllogism goes as follows: God is one: Christ is God: therefore, he is the one God. The identification of God the Father with Christ resulted from this, in the sense that it was really the Father who suffered on the cross in the person of Christ (*patripassianism). After the detailed refutation of this doctrine Hippolytus added, in the second part of CN, his interpretation of the doctrinal controversy, in the sense that he adhered to the doctrine of the Logos, by then traditional in Asia, and developed it in an original way. Of that doctrine, which distinguished the Son, divine Logos, as an entity distinct from God the Father, generated from the latter for the purpose of the creation and governance of the world, he derived from his predecessors the affirmation of two distinct moments in the relationship between God and his Logos: one in which the latter is immanent in the former as impersonal thought, wisdom, potency, will; another in which he is generated as a personally distinct divine entity (10,1-4). Although generated and distinct from the Father before time, the Logos can only be defined Son proleptically, because he becomes perfect Son only when he incarnates (4,10; 10,4; 15,6-7; 16,3-7). In this accentuation of the significance of the *incarnation, understood as absolutely real and with all the limitations of the divinity which it brought (17,5; 18,1-2), we should probably see a stand against gnostic *docetism. If on the one hand Hippolytus points out against Noetus the distinction between the Father, who sends, and the Son, who is sent (4,11; 7,7; 12,2 etc.), on the other he must counter the accusation, raised against supporters of the doctrine of the Logos, of affirming two gods (14,2). In fact, he, despite affirming loudly and often the divinity of Christ Logos, defines him as other (ἕτερος) than the Father (11,1). He affirms along this line that whoever professes one God must not eliminate the οἰκονομία, through which God articulates into two, the Father and the Logos Son (3,4; 4,5.7.8 etc.). To better characterize the distinction he was the first to use the term πρόσωπον ("exterior aspect, dramatic mask, person"), adding, however, that their δύναμις is one (7,1; 8,2; 14,3). I.e., the unity of God is affirmed on a dynamic base, unity of will and operation, as Athenagoras had already done and in a little while *Origen would confirm: in this order of ideas the interpenetration between God the Father and the Logos on the operative level is conceived by Hippolytus as complete, totalizing, in which the Logos is the will and potency of the Father (8,3; 10,1.3; 14,4.5; 4,11; 11,1.4 etc.).

Another important doctrinal novelty of CN is the space made for the Holy Spirit in the intertrinitarian economy. Actually, in the doctrine of the Logos the intradivine relationship tends to exhaust itself in the relationship between God and the Logos, which takes on all the mediation between God and the world: before Hippolytus, only Athenagoras had made some timid mentions of the Holy Spirit in relation to the Father and the Son. Hippolytus, respecting the traditional profession of faith in the Father, in the Son and in the Holy Spirit, decisively accentuated the presence of the latter next to the other two, even if with imperfect coherence and harmony: to the πρόσωπα of the Father and the Son is added, as a third οἰκονομία, the grace (χάρις) of the Holy Spirit (14,2) and, with a reference to the baptismal formula of Mt 28:19, it is emphasized that the perfect adoration of God is only possible affirming Father, Son and Holy Spirit (14,7-8). The doctrinal reflection of Hippolytus also shows an important *eschatological dimension. The tension in this matter, always strong in the first three centuries of Christianity, was expressed in Asia esp. in *millenarist expectations, which just around the time of Hippolytus had had, in that region, a notable revival, perhaps following the *Montanist crisis. In the chronological calculations of the Commentary on Daniel Hippolytus reacts to the obvious risks of a social nature, apparent in this climate of tensions, clarifying that, the total duration of the world being 6,000 years, given that Christ was born 5,500 years after Adam, the end was still far off. But in this commentary Hippolytus reveals an ardently anti-Roman animus and here, but esp. in the treatise on the Antichrist, accentuates the meaning of this sinister eschatological figure, so he does present some typical traits of millenarist expectation. However, an explicit reference to the millennial reign of Christ, which constituted the ideological center of authentic millenarism, is missing in his writings, at least in those which have reached us, and in the final passage of the Blessings of Moses the beautiful description which he gives of the creation, renewed in a definitive way after the last judgment, takes up some typical elements of the traditional representation of the millennial reign of Christ on earth. Therefore, if on the one hand he avoids speaking about the millennium, on the other he projects it, with its burning, materialistic colors, onto the final and eternal repose of the just; and in the description he also oscillates between naive traits of hedonistic enjoyment, a typical millenarist inheritance, and the appeal to a more spiritual conception of the final condition of the just. As the exponent of an Asiatic culture then on the decline, Hippolytus feels the need to abandon certain positions of a materialist type, which appeared by then outdated in the light of the results of the controversies raised by the Montanist crisis, but he is not able to propose truly new alternative solutions and remains halfway, in an uncertain and ambiguous position between conservation and innovation.

2. The author of the El also adhered to the doctrine of the Logos, represented a little before him by Hippolytus, from whom—as we have pointed out above—he knew some writings, and he defended this doctrine at Rome against *Sabellius, who had inherited the radical *monarchianism of Noetus, and against the Popes *Zephyrinus and *Callistus, they too of substantially monarchian leanings and adversaries of the Logos doctrine. In the last part of El he proposed the monotheistic profession of a first and sole God creator and lord of all things, enlarging it, however, in a binary sense when he affirmed that this God, reflecting on himself, generated the Logos (never defined as son but as πρωτότοκος and πρωτόγονος παῖς [10,33,1.2.11]); the latter, having in himself the ideas first thought by the Father, effected the paternal design concerning the creation of all things, including humanity as the synthesis of all the substances. The Logos reacted to the sin of humanity with his pedagogical action, which developed through the work of the law and the prophets, and finally with the incarnation (10,33,1-13). It is the typical scheme of the Logos doctrine, from Justin on, including the double moment in the God-Logos relationship, as we pointed out in CN. In an antidivisive sense the author of El points out that the Logos, although generated, does not separate from the Father but remains within him. The Logos's divinity, derived from the generation of the Logos from the Father, is nonetheless mentioned very sparingly. His subordination to the Father is, however, emphasized forcefully: only the Father is defined as κύριος (10,32,1). But the doctrine of the author of El is characterized perhaps more by the silences than the explicit affirmations. The most important is the complete silence concerning the Holy Spirit and the divine spirit in general. This silence is meaningful inasmuch as first Hippolytus in CN and then *Tertullian in Adversus Praxean had spoken extensively of divine spirit in general and the Holy Spirit in particular. In contrast, the author of El speaks of spirit (πνεῦμα) only in the context of the creation, making it one of the traditional four elements of material reality, rather than the more common air (10,32,2). In this silence an intentional reserve can be identified both toward the ample emphasis on the Holy Spirit in Montanist environments, esp. in the Montanist Tertullian of the Adversus Praxean, and toward Callistus, bitter adversary of our author: Callistus had organized his profession of faith on the concept of πνεῦμα understood as divine substance, taken—as by Tertullian—in a *Stoic sense, i.e., materialist, within which the Father and the Son are identified. Faced with these different approaches to the concept of divine spirit, by Hippolytus and Tertullian on the one hand and by Callistus on the other, the author of El preferred not to take a position, completely renouncing any mention of spirit in reference to the divinity. We can see the same attitude concerning technical terminology. We have seen Hippolytus make use of πρόσωπον to characterize the individuality of Father and Son in the reciprocal relationship, and with the same meaning Tertullian had transposed πρόσωπον into persona; but Callistus had spoken in a monarchian sense of a single πρόσωπον of the Father and Son; therefore, the author of El preferred not to compromise himself, renouncing the use of the term, just as he avoided clarifying in what way God and his Logos, clearly distinct from each other since one generated the other, could constitute one God. Essentially, he seems to be walled into a defensive position, suggested by the results of the polemic with Sabellius and Callistus: explicit as to the general concept of the Logos doctrine but without pronouncing on the details about which there had been disputes.

While Hippolytus had been above all an exegete, the author of El was as open to philosophy as he was indifferent to the interpretation of the Scriptures. The citations which are found in the El are almost entirely not adduced by him but from the many and disparate heretical sources of which he had made use. In his other writings, also, the Scripture seems to be almost concealed. Perhaps this disparity compared with Hippolytus might, at least in part, depend on the fact that, in the 3rd c., in some churches in the East it was customary to hold community meetings during the week dedicated to the systematic study of Scripture, esp. the OT, while this practice is not attested, at this time, in the West. The interest of this author for the eschatological theme is concentrated in the final page of the Περὶ τοῦ παντός, but his description of the final felicity of the just seems to proceed from cosmological rather than *soteriological interest. However, what he himself recounts concerning his conflict with Callistus reveals strong interests of moral and disciplinary character. In fact, his detachment from the Roman Catholic community was motivated, beyond the dissent of a doctrinal character, by his ascetic and disciplinary rigor, which incited him to remove the sinner from the community, while Callistus—as he reproached him—was much more generous in readmission. At the basis of the disciplinary conflict between the two there was a different conception of the church. The church of Callistus is a community which seeks to open its arms as wide as possible in the intention of offering to all, even to the one who is struggling with his own conscience, a chance of recovery, even at the cost of accepting the tares along with the good grain: as the gospel parable states (Mt 13:24-30), the recovery will only be at the final judgment, because only God can evaluate the sincerity of the repentance of the sinner (El 9,12,22-23). In contrast, the church of the author of El is an elitist and aristocratic conception, understood as the community of a few perfect elect. On the doctrinal side, this demand is revealed in the affirmation of the christological doctrine of the Logos, which the openness to the influence of Greek philosophy characterized as a cultured doctrine, at least in its origins, and therefore destined naturaliter for a selected and restricted audience. On the disciplinary side a great moral rigidity corresponds with a consequent lack of understanding for the weaknesses of the neighbor and the refusal of postbaptismal penance. The openness on the cultural level was opposed to closure on the disciplinary level, and both of the opposed tendencies contributed to isolate a community structure which was restricted and entirely closed in on itself.

CPG 1, 1871-1924; PG 10, 584-952; C. Scholten, Hippolytos II (von Rom): RAC 15, 492-551; I. von Döllinger, Hippolytus und Callistus oder die römische Kirche in der ersten Hälfte des dritten Jahrhunderts, mit Rucksicht auf die Schriften und Abhandlungen der Herrn Bunsen, Wordsworth, Baur und Gieseler, Regensburg 1853; E. Schwartz, Über die pseudoapostolischen Kirchenordnungen, Strasbourg 1910; Id., Zwei Predigten Hippolyts, SBAW 1936, 3; A. Donini, Ippolito di Roma, Rome 1925; P. Nautin, Hippolyte et Josipe. Contribution à l'histoire de la littérature chrétienne du troisième siècle, Paris 1947; Id., Hippolyte, Contre les hérésies. Fragment, Paris 1949; Id., La controverse sur l'auteur de l'"Elenchos": RHE 47 (1952) 5-43; Id., Le dossier d'Hippolyte et de Méliton dans les florilèges dogmatiques et chez les historiens modernes, Paris 1953; J.M. Hanssens, La liturgie d'Hippolyte. Ses documents. Son titulaire. Ses origines et son caractère, Rome [2]1965; J.M. Hanssens, Hippolyte de Rome fut-il novatianiste? Essai d'une biographie: Archivum historiae pontificiae 3 (1965) 7-29; Ricerche su Ippolito, Rome 1977 (V. Loi - M. Guarducci - E. Follieri - P. Testini - C. Curti - P. Meloni - M. Simonetti - J. Frickel); M.S. Troiani, Alcuni aspetti della dottrina dello Spirito santo in Ippolito: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 615-632; A. Zani, La cristologia d'Ippolito, Brescia 1984; Ippolito, L'Anticristo (De Antichristo), text and It. tr. by E. Norelli, Florence 1987; J. Frickel, Das Dunkel um Hippolyt von Rom. Ein Lösungsversuch: die Schriften Elenchos und Contra Noetum, Graz 1988; Nuove ricerche su Ippolito, Rome 1989 (P. Testini - J. Frickel - V. Saxer - M. Guarducci - M. Simonetti - E. Follieri - S.J. Voicu); M. Guarducci, San Pietro e Sant'Ippolito: storia di statue famose in Vaticano, Rome 1991; J. Mansfeld, Heresiography in Context: Hippolytus' Elenchos as a Source for Greek Philosophy, Leiden 1992; I. Mueller, Heterodoxy and Doxography in Hippolytus' Refutation of All Heresies: ANRW II, 36, 6, 4309-4374; C. Osborne, Sources of Significance in Hippolytus' Account of Greek Philosophy: Apeiron 27 (1994) 225-242; A. Brent, Hippolytus and the Roman Church in the Third Century, Leiden 1995; A. Whealey, Hippolytus' Lost De universo and De resurrectione*: Some New Hypotheses*: VChr 50 (1996) 244-256; M. Simonetti, Una nuova ipotesi su Ippolito: Augustinianum 36 (1996) 393-414; J. Frickel, Hippolyt von Rom: als Prediger verkannt, in Stimuli: Festschrift für Ernst Dassmann, Münster 1996, 129-140; K. Alt, Hippolytos als Referent Platonischer Lehren: JbAC 40 (1997) 78-105; R.E. Heine, The Christology of Callistus: JTS 49 (1998) 56-91; W. Kinzig - C. Markschies - V. Markus, Tauffragen und Bekenntnis: Studien zur sogenannten "Traditio Apostolica," zu den "Interrogationes de fide" und zum "Römischen Glaubensbekenntnis," Berlin 1999; E. Norelli, Alcuni termini della "Confutazione di tutte le eresie" ("Elenchos") e il progetto dell'opera, in Lingua e teologia nel cristianesimo greco, ed. C. Moreschini - G. Menestrina, Brescia 1999, 95-123; G. Uríbarri Bilbao, La emergencia de la trinidad inmanente: Hipólito y Tertuliano, Madrid 1999; Hippolyt, Kommentar zu Daniel, ed. G.N. Bonwetsch, vols. 2, rev. ed., M. Richard, Berlin 2000; M. Simonetti, Ippolito, Contro Noeto, Bologna 2000; A. Stewart-Sykes, Hippolytus, On the Apostolic Tradition, New York 2001; J.A. Cerrato, Hippolytus Between East and West. The Commentaries and the Provenance of the Corpus, Oxford 2002.

M. Simonetti

HIPPOLYTUS (pseudo). Among the works handed down to us and which have arrived wholly intact and under the name of Hippolytus, but which cannot be attributed to him, three are of particular interest for their inherent traits: the homily known as In sanctum Pascha (IsP), the Homily on the Psalms (HPs) and the Contra Beronem et Heliconem (CB).

1. The homily In sanctum Pascha (IsP) has been passed down to us by various MSS under the name of *John Chrysostom, but also by a *palimpsest of Grottaferrata under the name of Hippolytus. The work was attributed to Hippolytus by Ch. Martin in 1926, while P. Nautin dates it to the middle of the 4th c., considering it to have been inspired by the On Easter of Hippolytus. Its exact situation has been determined by R. Cantalamessa, who placed it in connection with the paschal homily of *Melito of Sardis, found on a papyrus and published in 1936. The IsP, in fact, like the homily of Melito, belongs to the genre of Asiatic paschal homilies from the Quartodeciman observance. In the *Quartodeciman paschal liturgy there was a reading of Exodus 12, in which the institution of the Hebrew paschal feast is recounted—the work of Moses. The homily which followed the narration would transport the feast into a Christian sphere, recognizing in the Hebrew Passover the prefiguration of the Christian Passover: Christ is the true paschal lamb, who, with his sacrificial death, liberated the true Israel, i.e., the Christian people, from servitude in Egypt, i.e., from sin, and introduced them into the true Promised Land. In addition to this common theme the two homilies are related by their stylistic figures, for both were composed in an Asiatic rhythmic prose, very studied in its alternation of more or less rhetorically elaborate passages and, in the case of the first, characterized by a fixed play with the harmony of brief cola connected among themselves by anaphora, alliteration, rhyme and other rhetorical figures. If the entirety of the Quartodeciman paschal celebration was of Jewish imprint, this refined formal elaboration draws influence from the rhetorical norms of the Second Sophistic.

In this common context, IsP is marked, with respect to Melito's homily, by a greater attention to the detailed correspondence of the rite of the slaughter of the paschal lamb with the passion of Christ: the period during which the lamb is guarded (Ex 12:6) prefigures Christ's hours in prison before the high priest; the sacrifice of the lamb, which takes place in the evening, makes precise the hour in which Christ was put to death, and so forth. The homily places the relationship between the two Passovers into a larger context, centered on the Pauline Adam-Christ contrast, and the reason for the passion seen as a new creation superior to the original, which had been affected byAdam's sin. This last concept arose from two traditional themes: that of the cosmic dimension of Christ's cross, which is extended with his arms to the entire universe, and that of the recurrence, in springtime, both of the creation of the world and of the redeeming passion. Some doctrinal features of IsP present an archaic physiognomy: *binitarianism, pneumatic christology. All things considered, this homily should not be dated beyond the end of the 3rd c.

2. The Homily on the Psalms (HPs) has come down to us in the original Greek via the catenae, while in *Syriac translation it bears the name Hippolytus. The author, who is polemicizing against the error of a new heresy (1), initially explains in what sense all 150 Psalms of the Psalter must be attributed to David (2-8); then he goes on to demonstrate the validity of the titles which complete the Psalms as epigraphs, giving to many of these—by an *allegorical technique—a christological and ecclesial interpretation (9-17); he concludes with two brief allusions to Psalms 1 and 2, without epigraphs, of which the first is referred to the nativity, the second to the passion of Christ (18-20). P. Nautin, to whom we owe the critical edition of HPs (1953), in the context of his hypothesis on Hippolytus-Iosipos (see *Hippolytus), attributed it to Hippolytus based on a series of verbal comparisons. M.J. Rondeau and V. Loi, however, attribute the homily to the author of the Elenchos, while A. Brent has hypothesized that there was a third author who belonged to the same Roman society as the author of the Elenchos and Hippolytus. As for the adversary against whom the HPs fights, one thinks of the *gnostics, the *adoptionists, and the partisans of the Roman presbyter *Gaius. The comparisons used to attribute the homily either to Hippolytus or to the author of the Elenchos are not very significant, while a series of arguments suggests a later date for this text. In fact, the exegetical technique which HPs emphasizes appears to be more developed than that of Hippolytus, who is hardly gifted on a philological level. For example, while Hippolytus affirms, in David and Goliath 5, that David personally composed all the psalms, in HPs the Davidic authorship is explained in a more sophisticated manner: the psalms are divided between David and other authors (Asaph, Idithun, other temple cantors), but the whole Psalter is assigned to him because "he was the cause of all these things: he chose the cantors, and since he was the cause, he is considered worthy of this honor, so that all that the cantors said should be accredited to David" (ch. 7). Given that in the area around Antioch, as well as in the West, the entire Psalter was attributed to David, while in the area near *Alexandria *Origen and *Eusebius preferred to split the psalms between David and other authors, the solution proposed in HPs appears to be a compromise between *Antiochenes and Alexandrians, and that brings it to a much later date than Hippolytus. Nautin has identified correctly the heresy against which the author of HPs battles as the affirmation that the titles of the psalms were not original and were not valid. Today, after the first part of the Commentary on the Psalms of *Diodore of Tarsus (CCG 6) was published in 1980 by M.J. Olivier, we are able to give a name to the adversary of the author of the HPs: Diodorus (CCG 6) actually observes that, as the Psalms were dispersed during the Babylonian exile, they were put back in order by chance, after the return from exile, during the time of Ezra, so that—in large part—erroneous titles resulted. Even without wishing to identify Diodorus precisely as adversary of the author of HPs, he should be placed in this polemical context and in this time period, which takes us to the end of the 4th c. The author of the homily, as we mentioned above, proposed a solution of compromise between Antiochenes and Alexandrians, and he might have been located in the Syro-Palestine region. The attribution, at least partial, of the homily to Hippolytus is explained by the intention of guaranteeing the exegetical teaching of Origen—while the polemic of the Antiochenes raged against him—concerning the validity of the titles of the Psalms, by a renowned and independent exegete.

3. The original Greek of the Contra Beronem et Heliconem has been handed down to us, under the name of Hippolytus, from the Doctrina patrum, a christological *florilegium of anti-*monophysite tendencies, composed during the 2nd half of the 7th c. The text is autonomous, while the Latin translation, a work of Anastasius the Librarian (9th c.), was inserted into a series of documents relative to the *monothelite controversy; more specifically, it is part of a dossier of documents placed together a long time prior, at the time of the controversy and little after the death of three illustrious victims of the reaction by the imperial authority to the antimonothelite opposition: *Maximus the Confessor, *Anastasius disciple of Maximus and *Anastasius the Apocrisarius. In one document of the dossier, Anastasius the Apocrisarius, in a letter to the monk *Theodosius of Gangra, writes that he is including a kontakion containing eight testimonies of St. Hippolytus, bishop of the port of Rome and Martyr of Christ, in favor of the doctrine which affirms two natures and two operations of Christ and condemns whoever professes one operation and one nature. That is in fact the content of the eight passages, of varying—sometimes notably—length, in which he battles against Beron, who is described as already adhering to the gnostic teaching of *Valentinus, who himself is otherwise unknown, and of his companions, who contend that the flesh which the Logos assumed would have worked the same deeds as the divinity (ταυτουργὸν τῇ θεότητι), thus confusing the two natures and operations of Christ.

Evidently this piece of writing cannot be attributed to Hippolytus and must be considered as one of the many falsifications composed in the context of the monophysite crisis by both parties in the conflict: this work was from the *dyophysite and dyothelite side. The eight texts, which Anastasius the Apocrisarius said he selected from a larger work, are closely connected to one another and seem to be a work complete in itself. Given this and other evident inaccuracies in the account of the Apocrisarius, one might wish to see him as the author of this falsification: however, a strong argument against this possibility is the doctrinal content of the text, which forces one to place it in the first part of this controversy, that of the *monoenergites, while the Apocrisarius was active in the second phase of the controversy, that of the monothelites. Actually, Patriarch *Sergius of Constantinople, in order to seek a compromise solution to resolve the contrast between dyophysites and monophysites, had begun at first to cautiously spread a doctrinal formula which insisted upon the concept of a single operation (ἐνέργεια) of Christ in which the divine and human nature converged. Only after the intervention of Pope *Honorius (634), who sought to favor the concept of will rather than that of energeia, Sergius passed from the one operation (monoenergism) to the one will (monothelitism) of Christ incarnate, and in the Ekthesis* published by the emperor *Heraclius in 638, the concept of one will was placed alongside that of one operation and became prevalent. Returning to CB, there is a battle in this text only against monoenergism, without antimonothelite implications, so that the falsified works must be situated chronologically sometime before 638.

From a doctrinal point of view, it should be emphasized that the unquestionable attitude at the base of CB, dyophysite and therefore antimonophysite and antimonoenergite, is presented by avoiding—in an almost systematic manner—the parallel placement of the divine and human action of Christ, as the antimonoenergite and antimonothelite leaders *Sophronius of Jerusalem and Maximus the Confessor were wont to do, and as, even earlier, we read in Leo's Tomus ad Flavianum. The author of CB actually prefers to emphasize that the Logos effected divinely, through his flesh, that which was proper to the divinity (PG 90, 179C), as the characteristics of each nature remained unaltered, distinct one from the other. In this manner the unknown author interprets the dyophysite doctrine, insisting much more upon the unity of the subject than in the distinction of the natures, in the spirit of Cyril, such that his interpretation ends up being much more unitive than those of Maximus and Sophronius. For this reason CB can be considered an expression of a dyophysite tendency, to be sure, and therefore antimonoenergite, beyond being simply antimonophysite, but formulated in a cautious and subtle manner, which contrasts with the explicit clarity of the radical dyophysites: a tendency we might describe as moderate, and as such destined to remain marginalized faced with the prevalence of contrasting radical tendencies, just as the CB has remained marginalized in the field of modern research on the monophysite controversy in general and of the monoenergite in particular.

CPG 1, 1882-1916; 2, 4611; P. Nautin, Homélies Pascales, I. Une omélie monarchique sur la Pâque, SC 27, Paris 1950 (ed. and Fr. tr.); Id., Le dossier d'Hippolyte et de Méliton dans les florilèges dogmatiques et chez les historiens modernes, Paris 1953, 99-17; 161-183; C.Q. Reijners, The Terminology of the Holy Cross in Early Christian Literature, Nijmegen 1965; R. Cantalamessa, L'omelia "In s. Pascha" dello Pseudo-Ippolito di Roma. Ricerche sulla teologia dell'Asia Minore nella seconda metà del II secolo, Milan 1967; M. Simonetti, Un falso Ippolito nella polemica monotelita: Vetera Christianorum 24 (1987) 113-146; G. Visonà, Pseudo Ippolito, In sanctum Pascha. Studio edizione commento, Milan 1988; M. Simonetti, Ippolito, Contro Noeto, Bologna 2000, 140-146; Pseudo-Hippolyt, Zum heiligen Pascha: das Zeugnis einer frühchristlichen Osterfeier aus der Zeit zwischen dem zweiten und vierten Jahrhundert = In sanctum Pascha, tr., intro, comm. S. Hausammann, Schliern 2000.

M. Simonetti

HIPPOLYTUS of Bostra (3rd–4th c.?). A very obscure personage, named in the anti-*Chalcedon collection Sigillum fidei (Knik Hawatoj) (7th–8th c.) as the author of a list of questions on the *Trinity, which is contained in the collection. At the origin of this name there may be a misunderstanding of *Eusebius's report (HE 6, 20), which, following *Beryllus of Bostra, names a certain Hippolytus, "who was also bishop of another church," generally identified with the *Hippolytus (of Rome) by Eusebius (HE 6, 22). Whatever his origin may be, the name Hippolytus of Bostra had a certain notoriety in the East, esp. in *Armenian texts. Dionysius bar Salibi knew of him (CSCO, Scr. syri 18-20, 1, ed. I. Sedlacek). L.M. Froidevaux identified an anti-Nicene nucleus inside the list of questions On the Most Holy Trinity, and, accepting the attribution to Hippolytus of Bostra and placing him at the end of the 3rd c., reconstructed a hypothetical biography for him. The figure of Hippolytus of Bostra is one of numerous proofs of the confusion surrounding the name of *Hippolytus in antiquity.

L.-M. Froidevaux, Les Questions et Réponses sur la Sainte Trinité attribuées à Hippolyte, évêque de Bostra: RecSR 50 (1962) 32-73 (with text and Fr. tr.); Ch. Renoux, Hippolyte de Bostra? Le dossier du Galata 54: Muséon 92 (1979) 133-158; DHGE 24, 637-8.

E. Prinzivalli

HISPANIC LITURGY

I. Name, origins and evolutionary factors - II. The liturgical schools - III. Liturgical books.

I. Name, origins and evolutionary factors. The Hispanic liturgy, which has also been named "Mozarabic" and "Visigothic," was the autochthonous liturgy which developed in *Spain, in a clearly defined way, starting from the 6th c., and which remained vigorous until its suppression, which took place during the pontificate of Gregory VII (1073–1085). At the time of its full flowering, when, i.e., the kingdom of the Visigoths reached its maximum extension (7th c.), the Hispanic rite was celebrated in the entire Iberian Peninsula and in that region of *Gaul which was called Gallia Narbonese, in the area of the E Pyrenees.

The name Mozarab, created by the Arabs, probably between the 10th and 11th c., to indicate a small community of subjects, cannot in fact indicate a rite which, since it was already elaborated during the 5th–7th c. by the efforts of various metropolitan sees, is actually a product of the cultural flowering of the Hispanic churches of the Visigothic period.

Therefore it should be said that the name "Visigothic rite" is more accurate, at least as to historical precision. The rite spread beyond the Pyrenees to the farthest reaches of the kingdom of the Visigoths and attained its greatest development during their period of splendor. But it should not be forgotten that the Hispanic rite, like the *Gallican rite and together with it, developed on the basis of a liturgical heritage older than the invasion of the Visigoths; that the authors of the ispanica liturgia, except for *Ildefonsus of Toledo (d. 667), did not belong to the ethnic group of the *Visigoths, but were Hispanic-Romans rooted and trained in a profoundly Latin culture, despite local linguistic and literary peculiarities; and that, the Visigothic kingdom being until the year 589 officially *Arian, the nascent liturgy of Spain was built precisely as a great and continual confession of the Catholic faith before the provocations and persecutions of the Arian Visigoths. It is also necessary to keep in mind that, after the fall of the Visigothic kingdom and during the Arabic occupation of Spain, liturgical creativity was not completely stopped, even if it was less intense and of lower literary-doctrinal quality. We believe, however, that not even the adjective "Visigothic" is applicable to the rite we are describing, except, at most, as an indication of the historical period which saw and in a certain sense favored its greatest splendor. The Gallican liturgy and the Hispanic were born together, they began their self-affirmation by basing themselves on the same foundation—the liturgical heritage deriving above all from Latin Africa—and they arose due to the same historical phenomenon: the growth at Rome of the "libelli," an example of a liturgical creativity which was abundant but as yet free from any pretense of codification.

Among the documents of the liturgia ispanica the diptychs of the Mass have been preserved, which were possibly written in the course of the 3rd c. and which form the major representative of this traditional liturgical heritage, based on which the first variable texts of the eucharistic prayer have been composed. Of the venerable diptychs contained in the Missale Mixtum of Cisneros, we find resonances, both in the letters of *Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258), and in the Acts of the martyrdom of St. *Fructuosus of Tarragona (d. 258), killed, like Cyprian, during the persecution of *Valerian.

The example of the Roman euchological school, of which some texts reached SW *Gaul and NE Spain toward the end of the 5th c.—as they had reached *Milan a little earlier—excited that creative emulation which apparently gave rise to both rites. The churches of Spain and of Gaul accepted from the Roman experiment the principle of the variability of the texts for the Eucharist. The positive effect of the great Roman innovation, the unusual fact that also the "preface" became a euchological piece which was variable in every celebration, inspired the new Hispanic-Gallican system to make variable also the two parts of the eucharistic prayer which included the account of the institution.

But neither the Gallican rite nor the Hispanic rite renounced thereby a scheme of the Mass which was indubitably the fundamental element of their ancient liturgical heritage. Thus they preserved the diptyches or common prayer and the kiss of peace between the liturgy of the word and the preface; around these elements they composed a whole series of variable pieces, in connection with the preface, the post sanctus and the post pridie. While, acc. to the Roman system, series of texts were produced which were isolated from each other—the two collects, the super oblata, the preface, the postcommunio and the super popolum—which were meant to be distributed throughout various points of the Mass, from the beginning of the celebration to the benediction of dismissal. The series of Hispanic-Gallican variable texts accumulated in the central part of the Mass (at least it was this way at first), corresponding to the role which the Eastern anaphoras play.

Between the individual variable pieces remained short fixed formulas, which served as a link from one variable piece to another. These linking formulas were nothing other than the remains of the ancient eucharistic prayers which belonged to the traditional liturgical heritage which we have mentioned.

The experience of this system, with which it was possible to create innumerable variations on the same theme and which at the same time succeeded in giving a sense of compactness to the entire euchological complex, marked the character and the style of the Hispanic rite. It must also be acknowledged that, in this, the authors of the liturgia ispanica succeeded in guiding their own rite along a path of evolution which was much longer and more coherent than the authors of the Gallican rite had done. Without this experience of the euchological system for the composition of the Mass, the rich, harmonic and refined composition of the Officium, which the Hispanic rite gradually reached, would have been inconceivable. The same can be said of the composition of its Liber ordinum (pontifical-ritual).

It turns out that, in the successive formation of the Hispanic rite, the liturgical schools of three great metropolitan churches took part: Tarragona, see of the province of the same name; *Seville, see of the province *Baetica in the S; and finally *Toledo, capital of the Visigothic kingdom. It is possible that also Cartagena, see of the *Carthaginensis, and *Mérida, see of *Lusitania, also offered their contribution; but there is insufficient documentation on this point to either affirm or deny it. It is also possible that *Narbonne, too, see of Gallia Narbonensis, had a part; at least as a point of transition for the liturgical exchanges between Provence, the most active center of the Gallican rite, and Tarraconensis. The Narbonensis was furthermore the natural passageway toward Italy, and more specifically toward Milan. The only Iberian see which certainly remained outside of the work of forming the Hispanic rite was *Braga, metropolis of the Bracarense.

The great geographical extension of the area in which the Hispanic rite later developed is the primary point which helps explain its richness, beyond having a larger period of time to produce texts and chants, before it reached the phase of compiling its liturgical books: it is in fact a period of time which goes at least from the beginning of the 6th c. to the end of the 7th.

But there is still another important factor to consider. The period of greatest creative activity of the Hispanic rite took place chronologically later than in the other rites. For this reason, its authors were able to evaluate the liturgy with greater maturity of reflection.

A clear exponent of such an awareness of the value of the liturgy is the De ecclesiasticis officiis of *Isidore, the first treatise on liturgy, in which, together with the information gathered from local experiences, mention is made of the liturgical customs of other churches: Africa and Milan in an explicit way. Complementary to the Isidorian treatise are the valuable liturgical canons of the 4th Council of Toledo (633), composed by the same Isidore. The decrees concerning the celebration of Christian worship are no longer abstract regulations; every time there is a reasoned explanation which is often based on reflection on the historical and theological data of the liturgy. At this point the liturgy has already become theological-pastoral material. Worthy of study, for the same reason, is can. 1 of the 10th Council of Toledo (656), which institutes the feast of St. Mary on 18 December. It is probable that the author of this conciliar canon was Ildefonsus, who was at that time abbot of the monastery Agaliense dedicated to Sts. *Cosmas and Damian, close to Toledo, but who would later be archbishop of Toledo and author of many important liturgical texts.

II. The liturgical schools.
The school of Tarragona. For documented proof of the existence of a liturgical school in the see of Tarragona we must wait until the middle of the 7th c. *Eugenius archbishop of Toledo (646–657) wrote to archbishop Protasius of Tarragona, sending him the prayers for the office of St. Hippolytus, which Eugenius himself had composed at the request of Protasius; but at the same time he excuses himself for not having composed the votive Mass with which he had been charged, because he did not believe he could make anything better than what had been produced in Tarragona itself. However, the see and ecclesiastical province of Tarragona had occupied themselves with liturgy much earlier. Three of the councils of the region which took place during the 1st half of the 6th c., in which bishops of other metropolitan sees participated (Cartagena and Mérida), dealt with liturgical questions: Tarragona (516), can. 7; Gerona (517), can. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 10; Barcelona (540), can. 1, 2 and 5. In these councils particular attention was given to the organization of the Office, both for the structures of the morning Office, at that time in evolution, and for the way and care with which ecclesial prayer of the hours should be carried out (Tarragona, can. 7, Gerona can. 10, Barcelona can. 1, 2 and 5).

The school of Seville. The contribution of the province of Baetica to the formation of the Hispanic rite can be largely attributed to the two great Spanish figures of this period: *Leander (ca. 540–600), monk, and later bishop in the metropolitan see of Seville, and *Isidore (636), younger brother of Leander and his successor in the same Sevillan see. But it should be presumed that, before Leander and after Isidore, the Baetic school carried out positive activity in the institution of the local rite. Seville was, as it seems, the most important center of Roman-

Hispanic culture, and remained so until the fall of the Visigothic kingdom.

In his De viris illustribus, Isidore speaks of the liturgical work carried out by Leander. According to him, Leander composed songs for the liturgy of the word in the Mass and repertory of psalmic collects, published on two occasions. We believe we can identify, via internal criteria, the collects composed by Leander with those which have been gathered in the edition of the Liber orationum psalmographus.

The only liturgical text formally attributed to Isidore is the blessing of the lamp and wax for the paschal vigil, which initially made up a single text. But it is certain that his liturgical production, esp. eucologic, was copious. Nonetheless, not a few texts of Isidore have survived, both in the manuale and in the festive orational for the Office, and perhaps also in the Liber ordinum. We have already discussed the De ecclesiasticis officiis, an important work also for clarifying certain obscure points of the peculiarities of the Hispanic rite.

After the death of Isidore, the Sevillan liturgical school reentered anonymity. At this time began the most brilliant period of the school of Toledo. It should, however, be maintained that the liturgical work of the see of Seville did not die out with the disappearance of its two first and great figures of antiquity.

The province of Braga. The NW province of the Iberian Peninsula—the present Galicia, with part of N Portugal—had become the kingdom of the Suebians, rivals of the Visigoths, but also of Arian religion. The first mention which we have of a preoccupation with liturgy in the church of Braga is the letter of Pope *Vigilius, written in the year 538, in response to the archbishop *Profuturus of Braga. The two principal questions of Profuturus for Vigilius were, first, whether the eucharistic prayer at Rome was composed of variable texts, and, second, whether baptism was given at Rome with a single immersion. The response of Vigilius is not only the first historical document which testifies to the existence of a fixed Roman canon, but it also allows us to emphasize that the two questions to which he responds are indirectly indicative of the new practice which was spreading through the Catholic churches of the Visigothic kingdom, and that, confronted with this, the Catholics of the kingdom of the Suebians turned to Rome in order to prevent themselves from being pulled along by the liturgical evolution which was taking place within the kingdom of the Visigoths.

We do not know to what degree the orientation of Braga toward the Roman liturgy was inspired by the greatest figure of the Bragan church of this period: St. *Martin, the apostle of the Suebians (ca. 515–580), who participated in the Council of Braga in 561. The second part of this council is dedicated to liturgical and disciplinary decrees. After having affirmed the necessity of unifying the celebrations within the Bragan ecclesiastical province (can. 1, 2), the council imposed as a rule the observance of the indications of Vigilius concerning the celebration of the Mass (can. 4) and the administration of baptism (can. 5).

Another sign of the Romanization of the Bragan province can be seen in can. 12, which prohibits the use of texts of poetic composition. This certainly refers to the hymns of the Office, which were already being used in Gaul and in Visigothic Spain and which had perhaps entered the Bragan province through the exchange of texts for the monastic office. In fact, can. 1, calling for liturgical uniformity, refuses certain unspecified elements coming from monastic uses.

The 4th Council of Toledo and its school. This city, capital of the kingdom of the Visigoths, became, through their wish, also the metropolitan see of the province of Carthaginensis, despite the protests of the metropolitans of Cartagena.

The first proof of Toledo as capital must have been the interprovincial council of the year 633. This was also the most flourishing cultural period of the Visigoths, in the civil and administrative field, which coincided with the reign of *Sisebut (612–621), and with the presence and the effective direction of Isidore at the head of the same council. Isidore, in the last years of his life, was by then well-known to everyone as the most erudite man of his time. The council produced 15 canons dedicated to the liturgy, the principal goal of which was to give a certain compactness to the local peculiarities through which the churches of Spain distinguished themselves as much in the way of celebrating the Eucharist, divine Office and the liturgical year, as in the way of administering the sacraments.

It seems apparent that this was a formal attempt to unify the liturgy in all its particulars. But closely examining the texts of the canons, one sees that the council always remained with questions of principle and left open the possibility of observing these principles, with the distinction between the metropolitan sees in realizing the celebrations remaining firm. It is certain that the conciliar Fathers, in that moment, were entirely aware of possessing their own rite, different from those of the churches of other countries. In this sense it can very well be said that the 4th Council of Toledo constitutes the greatest act of affirmation of the Hispanic rite.

Furthermore, the city of Toledo developed a liturgical school, particularly through the efforts of three archbishops: *Eugenius II (646–657), *Ildefonsus (657–667), *Julian (679–690); three representative names of a school which was very productive, esp. from the middle of the 7th c. However, the largest part of the liturgical work of Toledo and its region has remained, as in the other cases, anonymous.

With the invasion of the Arabs, arriving from N Africa, which began in the year 711, the kingdom of the Visigoths fell. The occupation was rapid. In the year 719 it already extended to nearly the entire peninsula; the Arabs failed to penetrate only some mountainous zones of Cantabria and the W Pyrenees. In the Marca Hispanica the Roman-Frankish rite was soon introduced through the influence of the Benedictine monasteries, which were founded there as signs of the avant-garde of the liberation. But the ancient liturgy was preserved, not only in the Christian kingdoms of Castille and León, but in the kingdom of Navarre and also among the Christian communities who lived under the Arab yoke.

III. Liturgical books. The sources of the liturgia ispanica are the liturgical books, which can only approximately be compared to the Roman books or those of other Western liturgies. For this reason, the substitution of particular names by which they were classified in antiquity with those names attributed to liturgical books of other rites is not recommended. The precision of the historical nomenclature of liturgical books is an indispensable premise for dealing fundamentally with the formularies which are contained there and with the specific function for which they were destined.

As in all other rites, the Hispanic liturgical formularies had circulated for a long time from one church to another in little pamphlets or libelli, before they were redacted into liturgical books proper. The exchange of libelli between the various euchological schools of the peninsula was the only path for approaching a more or less unified liturgy within the larger Catholic Church of the kingdom of the Visigoths. The most active liturgical schools were familiar with, not only the texts of the other Hispanic metropolitan sees, but also the libelli coming from Gaul and Italy (Milan, Rome and Benevento).

The most archaic type of libellus* was that which included repertories of texts of the same genre: antiphons, responsories, festival orations for the Office, euchological texts for the eucharistic celebration, etc. From the organized collection of these homogenous libelli derived the simple liturgical books, not complete, such as the liber manualis (or manuale) and the liber orationum festivus. The first, analogous to the Roman liber sacramentorum, contains the euchological texts for the eucharistic celebration, following the order of the liturgical year. The name manuale might indicate that this was originally a small book, derived from a primitive collection of eucharistic prayers; this was later integrated into the liber misticus. Of the liber manualis (or manuale) there is a single codex extant (Biblioteca Capitular di Toledo 35.3), of which Férotin published the text, making use at the same time of the misticus, the codices of which are numerous. The liber orationum festivus contains the euchological texts for the festive cathedral Office. In the context of a donation of liturgical books to the monastery of Sahagún (960) there is a clear distinction between the festive orational and another orational which bears the name psalmographus or psalmogravus (*see Liber orationum psalmographus). The adjective festivus must be interpreted in a very wide sense; i.e., this orational reproduces the euchological texts composed expressly for the times and feasts of the liturgical year. The festive orational, due to its absolute Hispanic uniqueness, cannot be compared to any other liturgical book of the other rites. It was conceived and elaborated to order a type of material which was richer and more complex than any other rite. Its compilation presupposes a parallel codification of the antiphonary, at least for the part of the antiphonary which reproduces the chants of the Office. Of the orational there are only two codices, of which one—the most ancient among Hispanic liturgical codices, probably copied at Tarragona before the year 731—is preserved in the Biblioteca Capitolare of Verona.

The antiphonarium includes the chants for the festive cathedral Office and for the eucharistic celebration. The only complete example of a pure antiphonary which is extant—codex 8 of the Archivo Capitular of the cathedral of León, of the 10th c.—has been considered the most valuable jewel of the MS tradition of liturgical music, as much for its form as for its content. It is the result of a very complex work of compilation, a splendid synthesis of a long chain of other partial or provisional compilations which preceded it; for this reason it is the work of a great master in the art of ordering systematically liturgical books, who had to continually harmonize two codifications as different and intricate as that of the chants for the Mass and that of the chants for the festival cathedral Office. The author has the merit of having gathered in the appendices (fol. 247-306) extremely varied repertories of chants for the Mass, for the cathedral Office and even for the monastic Office, which could not be arranged within the divisions by day and by time.

The liber commicus usually offered, ordered throughout the liturgical year, the three readings of the eucharistic celebration: prophetic, apostolic and evangelical. The name commicus is probably a derivation from comes, the name of an analogous Roman book; nevertheless, in the context of the Hispanic rite, the word, altered orthographically (commicus), takes on a new etymology: St. Julian of Toledo has it derive from comma and says that it should be called commatus, i.e., the book which collects passages.

As we have seen, for the festival cathedral Office two complementary liturgical books had been structured: the antiphonary and the festival orational. But for its celebration, other repertories were necessary for the canticles of the OT from the morning Office, the hymns for the evening and morning prayer, and the fixed psalms. Separate copies of the psalter and the liber canticorum exist, but there was a fairly widespread tendency to group into a single volume—in una forma, as the ancient catalogs say—the psalter, the book of canticles and the hymnal (psalterium–liber canticorum–liber hymnorum).

The passionarium orders the "passions" and other accounts, such as those of the discovery of the relics of the cross, following the calendar of the liturgical feasts and is conceived and ordered for the celebrations of the morning Office and of the eucharistic celebration. The liber sermonum contained the patristic sermons which were read after the gospel; this should not be confused with the *homiliaries, which come from the Roman-Frankish environment, ordered acc. to the Roman calendar, of which many copies were made in Spain during the 10th and 11th c.

In the ancient catalogs a liber precum—probably a libellus—is named, which cannot be identified. There were two types of liber ordinum: one called minor or sacerdotalis, which corresponded to the rituale, and the other maior or episcopalis, which practically corresponded to the pontificale. Its codification was prior to that of the Roman-Germanic pontifical, which had its predecessor, not by chance, precisely in the Hispanic liber ordinum. In the edition of Férotin, made on the basis of three MSS, it is necessary to distinguish three different parts: (1) the ritual-pontifical proper; (2) the full compilation of the celebrations of the Paschal Triduum; (3) the appendix with a series of votive Masses, almost always of a devotional character.

Beyond the simple liturgical books there existed libelli mixti, where chants and euchological texts, formularies for the Office and for the Mass, were put together. The pamphlet in this case contained the texts necessary for the celebration of a certain feast; it began with the antiphons, the hymn and the oration for the Vespers, then the entire Matins Office followed, and finally the texts for the eucharistic celebration. This type of libelli prepared the formation of the most important of the Hispanic libri plenari, the liber misticus, which gave day by day the Office and the Mass following the calendar. The adjective misticus is, in this case, derived from mistus, Hispanicized form of mixtus ("mixed, composed"). Although keeping in mind that this type of full compilation was reached for practical reasons, we must admit that it reveals a very interesting conception of the liturgical day: the ecclesial praise and the Eucharist constituted a "celebration" without rupture of continuity.

The liber horarum was another plenary book, which gathered the formularies for the celebration of the monastic Office.

Editions: Díaz, 155f.; Liber commicus: G. Morin, Maredsous 1893; J. Pérez de Urbel - J. González y Ruiz-Zorrilla, Madrid 1950–1955; Liber manualis (Liber Mozarabicus sacramentorum): M. Férotin, Paris 1912; Antiphonariam: L. Brou - J. Vives, Barcelona-Madrid 1959; Liber orationum festivus: J. Vives - J. Claveras, Barcelona 1946; Liber misticus: PL 85; J. Janini, Toledo 1982; Liber ordinum: M. Férotin, Paris 1904; Liber Missarum: J. Janini, Toledo 1982-1983.

Studies: DACL 12, 390-491; G. Prado, Manual de liturgia hispano visigótica o mozárabe, Madrid 1927; Id., Historia del rito mozárabe y toledano, Silos 1928; J.F. Rivera Recio, La controversia adopcionista del s. VIII y la ortodoxia de la liturgia mozárabe: EphLit 47 (1933) 506-536; A. Baumstark, Orientalisches in altspanischer Liturgie: OC 10 (1936) 1-37; J.F. Rivera Recio, Gregorio VII y la liturgia mozárabe: Revista Española de Teología 1 (1942) 3-33; F. Pérez, San Gregorio VII y la liturgia española: Liturgia (Silos) 3 (1948) 105-113, 323-330; L. Brou, Liturgie mozarabe ou liturgie hispanique?: EphLit 63 (1949) 66-70; Id., Bulletin de liturgie mozarabe: Hispania Sacra 2 (1949) 459-484; J. Pinell, Boletín de liturgia hispanovisigótica: Hispania Sacra 6 (1956) 405-428; Ch. Munier, L'Ordo "De celebrando concilio" visigothique. Ses remaniements jusqu'au X s.: RSR 37 (1963) 250-271; J.M. Mona, Suplemento 1949-1964 al "Bulletin de liturgie mozarabe" de L. Brou, in Estudios sobre la Liturgia Mozárabe, Toledo 1965, 22-31; Id., Bibliografia general. Ediciones de textos, trabajos y repertorios, ibid., 165-187; J. Pinell, La liturgia hispánica. Valor documental de sus textos para la historia de la teología, RHCE II, 29-68; Id., Liturgia Hispánica. Historia. Fuentes para su estudio. El Ordo Catedral. El año litúrgico. El oficio monástico. Sacramentos y sacramentales. Características generales del rito hispanico: DHEE 2, 1303-1320; J.M. Mora, Nuevo boletín de liturgia hispánica antigua: Hispania Sacra 26 (1973) 209-237; J. Aldazébal, La liturgia hispánica, in A. Fliche - V. Martin, Historia de la Iglesia, V: El nacimiento de Europa, Valencia 1974, 633-661; A. Ferreiro, The Visigoths in Gaul and Spain A.D. 418-711: A Bibliography, Leiden 1988; G. Ramis, La liturgia exequial en el rito hispano-mozárabe, Rome 1996; J. Pinell, Liturgia hispánica, Barcelona 1998; G. Ramis, La iniciación cristiana en la liturgia hispánica, Bilbao 2001.

J. Pinell

HISPERICA FAMINA. The title of this text means "Western language." The text has come to us in various, slightly different redactions and was composed in Ireland or in Wales in the 6th c. It represents the prototype of that kind of writing that was affected and obscure and which therefore took the name of hisperism. It is composed not in verse but in rhythmic prose with brief phrases. Their tendency is toward *Hermeticism, and this renders it difficult to understand the meaning of the text: the author praises the particular type of language which he is using, and perhaps in order to demonstrate its expressive qualities, he develops a series of themes: De Caelo, De Mari, De Igne, etc. It has been suggested that these are scholastic exercises of monks in this particular species of language which reminds one of certain passages of the grammarian *Virgilius Maro and of Adelmus.

CPL 1137 (bibl.) ed. Jenkinson, Cambridge 1908; E. Coccia, La cultura irlandese precarolingia. Miracolo o mito?: StudMed 8 (1967) 323-327; M. Herren, The Hisperica Famina (Studies and Texts 85), Toronto 1987, 94-103; W. Sayers, Images of Enchantment in the "Hisperica Famina" and Vernacular Irish Texts: Études Celtiques 27 (1990) 221-234; Ch.D. Wright, The Three "Victories" of the Wind: A Hibernism in the "Hisperica Famina": Ériu 41 (1990) 13-25; Patrologia IV, 478-479.

M. Simonetti

HISTORIA ACEPHALA. The title of a succinct story of the events on the life of *Athanasius, written by a cleric in *Alexandria around the end of the 4th c. Since the beginning has been lost, it starts with the events of 342. It contains the account of the last three exiles of Athanasius, of the installation of the intruder *George the Cappadocian and of the failed attempt of *Lucius. This work, which also informs us sporadically about *Paul of Constantinople, is valuable for the precision of its dates and chronology, taken from the archives of the patriarchate of Alexandria, which contained the principal events in chronological order. We possess the work only in a Latin translation passed down in the Cod. Veronese LX (58) of the 7th c., together with other documents of the so-called Collectio Theodosii Diaconi.

Histoire acéphale et Index syriaque des Lettres festales d'Athanase d'Alexandrie, intr., critical text, trans., notes by M. Annick, Paris 1985 (SC 317).

M. Simonetti

HISTORIA AUGUSTA. An "imperial history" or a history of the emperors from *Hadrian to Numerian. Thus, it extends from 117 to 284 (with an intermediary lacuna from 244 to 253). The work is a collection of short biographies, redacted by six authors, whose character is difficult to determine: Spartianus, Volcacius, Gallicanus, Julius Capitolinus, Aelius Lampridius, Trebellius Pollio and Flavius Vopiscus. The work, one part of which is dedicated to *Diocletian and another to *Constantine, has again recently been at the center of discussions regarding its chronology (in the first years of *Theodosius, 392–395, or in the first of *Honorius; after 405 or around 420), its sources (the work consciously looks to the great models of the past; scholars have indicated in particular an impressive series of authors which inspire the work), and its reliability as a historical document (ever more called into question: it is argued that it mixes truth with falsity—not invented falsity, but transposed from one point and one plane of reality to another, esp. in the last biographies). Also difficult to determine is the attitude of the work toward religion: According to some, it expresses a tendency which cannot be recognized; acc. to others, a propagan tendency aiming at a request for tolerance; acc. to others, it manifests hostility toward Christians, so much so that it appears as a Historia adversus Christianos. In Spartianus (Sept. Sev. 17, 1) is found the only information in our possession relative to the prohibition on conversion to Judaism and to Christianity which *Septimus Severus is said to have imposed. The opinions of historians are also divided on the truth of this information.

The (even recent) bibliography is immense, indicated, among other places, in A. Chastagnol, Le problème de l'Histoire Auguste. État de la question, in Historia Augusta Colloquium 1963, Bonn 1963, 43-71; Id., Recherches sur l'Histoire Auguste avec un rapport sur le progrès de la H.-A. Forschung depuis 1963, Bonn 1970; P. Siniscalco, La storiografia del Tardo Antico, in La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, Rome 1981, 102f.; Scriptores Historiae Augustae, ed. H. Hohl, stereotype ed. of the 5th ed. (1971), with additions and corrections of Ch. Samberger and W. Seyfarth, vol. I, Stuttgart-Leipzig 1997; vol. II—on the 3rd ed. (1971), Stuttgart 1997; Scrittori della Historia Augusta, intr., text and It. tr. of P. Soverini, Turin 1983; in Paris, from 1992 on, the publication of the ed., Fr. tr. and commentary in the Collection de l'Université de France-Les Belles Lettres (as of 2000, 5 vols. had been published); since 1995—"Antiquitas," Reihe 4—Beiträge zur Historia Augusta Forschung—commentaries on the work have been published. Among the numerous scholarly contributions, we refer the reader to the Atti del Colloquio Patavino, Rome 1963, and above all, the series of volumes with the title: Bonner Historia-Augusta-Colloquium, originally edited by A. Alföldi and J. Straub, Bonn 1964–. Since 1991 study conventions titled "Historiae Augustae Colloquia-Nova Series," have been held, no longer in Bonn, but in various cities, and the proceedings have been published, edited by various scholars. Here it is sufficient to cite a few articles, beyond the collections mentioned above, in which Christianity is considered: J. Burian, Quasi in christianorum ecclesia (H.A., Aur. 20, 5): Zprávy Jednoty Klas-ickych Filologii, Praha 26 (1984) 14-20 (in Czech with a synthesis in German); B. Baldwin, Gregory Nazianzenus, Ammianus, scurrae and the Historia Augusta: Gymnasium 93 (1986) 178ff.; R. Turcan, Héliogabale précurseur de Constantin?: BAGB (1988) 38-52.

P. Siniscalco

HISTORIA MONACHORUM. The story of a journey to holy Egyptian Fathers, undertaken in 394 by a deacon with a group of laity, narrated to the community of the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem (*Melania and *Rufinus). The number of chapters (26) can vary in the MSS acc. to the criterion of division; they are often found mixed with those of the Lausiac History, which treats the same topic. Rufinus translated the Historia in 404, and already *Jerome attributed it to him (Ep. 133); but the translation was poorly edited. The Eastern versions still await study, which may hold surprises in store. The monastic characters enjoy a rather varied description, from 26 pages to a few lines: some are content with miracles and ascesis; others explain and exhort. Of great interest is the popular character of the stories (see *Timothy of Alexandria).

CPG 5620; A.J. Festugière, Historia monachorum in Aegypto, Brussels 1961; Id., Les moines d'Orient IV/1, Paris 1964 (the two works now united, with indexes, Brussels 1971). See also the study of R. Reitzenstein, Historia monachorum und Historia Lausiaca, Göttingen 1916; N. Russell, The Lives of the Desert Fathers: The Historia Monachorum in Aegypto (Cistercian Studies 34), London 1981; E. Schulz-Flügel, Rufinus: Historia Monachorum (Patristische Texte und Studien 34), Berlin 1990; M. Paparozzi, Inchiesta sui monaci d'Egitto, Milan 1981 (It. tr. of the Gr. text); G. Trettel, Storia di monaci, It. tr., Rome 1991; L'Histoire des moines d'Égypte; suivie de la Vie de Saint Paul le Simple, crit. ed. by M. Szkilnik, Geneva 1993; P. Cox Miller, Desert Asceticism and "The Body from Nowhere": JECS 2 (1994) 137-153; D. Woods, An Imperial Embassy in the Historia Monachorum: JTS 48 (1997) 133-136.

J. Gribomont

HISTORIA TRIPARTITA. This expression refers to a historia ecclesiastica which several Christian writers have composed using three ecclesiastical histories written earlier by *Socrates of Constantinople, *Sozomen, a native of Palestine, and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus. Works of this kind were composed by *Theodore the Lector (around 550), in 4 books and by the monk *Epiphanius Scholasticus (after 530) in 12 books; *Cassiodorus also put his hand to this latter work.

For the bibl., see *Epiphanius Scholasticus and *Theodore the Lector.

P. Siniscalco

HISTORIOGRAPHY, CHRISTIAN. Once the great *Diocletian persecution had come to an end, some works of Christian historiography became public which were destined to leave a path through the subsequent centuries. The Edict of *Galerius was issued 30 April 311, through which Christianity became a permissible religion (religio licita); *Constantine defeated *Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge 28 October 312. Precisely in that period, in all likelihood around 312, the first edition of the Historia ecclesiastica written by *Eusebius of Caesarea began to spread. A few years later, around 316, *Lactantius wrote the treatise De mortibus persecutorum. With the legal recognition of their religion, Christians immediately made themselves present in the field of historiography, setting forth models which until that point were unknown among the pagans. The African Lactantius delineated a framework, lacking any sympathy for the persecutors, which they had inexorably reached by divine wrath: he did so offering firsthand information and did not fail to treat political and social facts. In an even more conscientious and original way, Eusebius's HE desired to supply, and in fact did supply, a quantity of authentic evidence: he shaped a new approach to history, even from the methodological point of view, because he followed the new religion, which had definite demands that history must help satisfy. In history, on the one hand, God's design for human salvation is accomplished through the centuries, so it must highlight in an overall design the antiquity of the Judeo-Christian teaching (this is a task faced by the chronographies, and among the first writings of Eusebius, as is well known, a Chronicle was included); on the other hand, the writer of history also presents a model of providential history: precisely what Eusebius desired to do, taking as the object of his treatment the events of the church. Therefore, he offers episcopal lists of the most important communities; he speaks of some teachers as ecclesiastical authors; he does not neglect heretics; he treats the punishment received by the Jewish people following their treatment of Christ; he mentions some of the persecutions undergone by his coreligionists and the martyrs, and the final victory of Christianity. The apologetic and edificatory scope, therefore, is evident (the church was instituted by God in the battle against paganism until its cessation, the faithful are witnesses of this, and to be aware of this signifies not only comfort but also new strength and determination).

At the beginning of his work (see I, 1, 3-5), Eusebius observes, after having defined this project (mentioned above), in which he, for the first time, prepares to travel down a path untrodden by others. His predecessors, he writes, will only show him in brief fragments the road that "his" history must run, thus to avoid errors and dangers. In other words, he is completely convinced that his work was one that no one until that time had thought of writing. Certainly some scholars have suggested possible models that he could have drawn from, among others, those established by the historiographies of the philosophical schools and *Hellenistic-Jewish historiography, which are well represented by Flavius Josephus. Still his is a history of a new type in the object considered, in the materials gathered and, as already mentioned above, in its methodology. From here one can catch a glimpse of the profound differences between classical pagan historiography and Christian historiography: the first is established on free judgment, of which the ancient historians were proud; the second is established on the authority of Sacred *Scripture (see A. Momigliano, in The Conflict, It. trans., 102).

On the other hand, the crisis of pagan historiography, which had unsuccessfully attempted a unitary interpretation of history, because it was unable to base itself on precise pieces of information, found in Christian historiography its proper solution: faith in the sacred books in fact supplied the necessary and sufficient means to establish the truth de temporibus (see S. Mazzarino, in Il pensiero storico classico, II, 1, 472-473). And what is more, pagan historiography was commonly considered acc. to Cicero's expression as opus oratorium maxime. The work was therefore rhetorical and moralistic (hence the abundance of invented speeches and the lack of original documents). Christian historiography, on the other hand, because of the primary objectives that were pursued, set aside these characteristics, developing others, without forgetting the *tradition with its formidable authority. Moreover, establishing as its own basis a historical-salvific event concerning all of humanity, ancient Christian historiography tended to be universal, thus abandoning one of the canons of the classical Theucydian historiography, which prescribed only the treatment of contemporary history, and also overcoming the supranational and cosmopolitan tendencies of the Hellenistic or Augustan era to encompass an even broader temporal and spatial horizon: it is not simply a memory of the past, but paradoxically it extends toward the future, because it emerges from a theological vision (see B. Luiselli, in La storiografia ecclesiastica, 526-527 and passim).

The findings and the innovations presented by Eusebius's HE, to note the most significant example from the begining of the 4th c, were born from a tradition that dates back to the very origins of Christianity. Although with different characteristics, the deeds recorded in the NT were, on this line, extremely significant. They pertain to episodes or events that in the complex of the Roman Empire were local, without importance, unknown to all those except to those who participated in them. Even for the gospel writers and for the redactor of the Acts of the Apostles, they formed a history that constituted a revolutionary event for the world and which subsequently became such for each person; it provokes an interior change for each person that leads outside history, upward, toward a time without end (see E. Auerbach, Mimesis, the It. trans., 50-53). From it flows the seriousness and the utmost care for the particulars: their knowledge and their memory become decisive for the one who approaches them.

Within this perspective, both the documents pertaining to the martyrs (Acta and Passiones) and the *hagiographies would deserve their own treatment: even though beginning from a specific historical nucleus—as shown by the most ancient documents of this genre—their character as "living" texts allows for the intervention of various hands in different times, for which it turns out to be very difficult or impossible to reconstruct its primitive and historically established physiognomy.

A noteworthy contribution to Christian historiography in the 4th c. was that made by the *Chronographies, which followed one after another from the earliest times: the universal and providential vision of history, the centrality assigned to OT and NT deeds, the correlation posed between the events of the history of salvation (historia salutis) and those of secular history represent the key elements which would then be assumed by later historians in a less sparse framework and in a more extensive and complete form. Thus, alongside the chronographical direction, which would continue to be cultivated for many centuries, the historical-narrative direction took shape. The influence of Eusebius's HE, esp. in the Eastern milieu of the Greek language, was vast. *Gelasius of Caesarea (d. 395) wrote a continuation of Eusebius's work, which, acc. to some scholars, served as a model for the last two books of *Rufinus's Ecclesiastical History (the preceding 9 books reproduced Eusebius's work in Latin, although with many editorial liberties; in this way, at the beginning of the 5th c., the magnum opus of the bishop of Caesarea began to circulate in the West). Some scholars have added that not only Rufinus but also other historians such as *Gelasius of Cyzicus, *George the Monk and *Socrates drew their work from the writings of Gelasius of Caesarea. Between 434 and 439, *Philip of Side, in Pamphylia, published a Christianikē historia in 36 books and 864 parts, a work which must have presented itself as a true and proper encyclopedia drawn from the first chapters of Genesis to the year 426, i.e., the 12th year of the emperor *Theodosius II. Fragments of this work remain, some of which are important because they complete Eusebius's work with pages, e.g., pertaining to *Papias of Hierapolis. During the same years *Philostorgius's Ecclesiastical History (ca. 368–after 425) appeared in 12 books, which included the events between the beginning of the *Arian controversy (ca. 320) and 425: divided in two works, it reflects Eunomian and millennialist tendencies. The objective was clearly apologetic in favor of the more radical Arianism of *Aetius and *Eunomius, and therefore it must have preserved and preserves, for the remaining portions, Arian documents and testimonies.

Other writings of the same genre have been lost, such as the church history attributed to *Hesychius of Jerusalem (d. ca. 450), priest of *Jerusalem (with respect to this work, only a fragment pertaining to *Theodore of Mopsuestia has survived), Heliconius's Abbreviated Chronicle, Timothy of Beirut's Ecclesiastical History, the Syndicon of *Sabinus, bishop of Heraclea in *Thrace. Documents that have survived to our time include Socrates's Ecclesiastical History, which set itself forth as continuing Eusebius's work and in fact narrates, in seven books (each book corresponds to an emperor's reign), "church events," from the abdication of *Diocletian in 305 to the year 439, in which *Theodosius II assumed the consulate for the 17th time. He was very clear in his expression, well-informed, careful in chronology, even if not always correct with respect to doctrinal or disciplinary questions, in the last of which he seems to have been an extreme rigorist. He treated a crucial period of church history, which from the last Great Persecution and from the dawn of freedom extends to the full affirmation of the new religion, to the period of the tormented Arian controversy, to the bitter dispute between Egyptian monks on the images of God (does God have a human form or is he incorporeal?). And even the conflict between pagans and Christians—again violent at the end of the 4th c.—saw the likes of such important personages from Eusebius of Caesarea to *Athanasius of Alexandria, from *Basil of Caesarea to *Gregory of Nyssa, from *Gregory of Nazianzus to *John Chrysostom.

*Sozomen also composed an Ecclesiastical History between 439 and 450, including an introductory Epitome in two books (now lost), in which events were pursued from Christ until the overthrow of Licinius (323) and then from 324 (3rd consulate of Crispus and Constantine) onward. In this document he declares his own intention of wanting to continue Eusebius's work from the point where he had interrupted it (as if he wanted to redo the massive work done by Socrates, which is not cited) up to 439. In fact, the final book ends at 423, i.e., at the time of the death of *Honorius. The fruit of the archival work that led Sozomen into the libraries of the royal and ecclesiastical palaces of which he speaks is seen clearly in the information which he provides on many individuals and the events that involved them.

After him, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus in *Syria wrote an Ecclesiastical History, composed in five books around 450, that began like Sozomen's from the overthrow of Licinius and continued until 428, the year of *Theodore of Mopsuestia's death, in this way avoiding to the necessity of treating the *Nestorian controversy, in which Theodoret had actively participated. Many of the documents he cited with care were chosen with the objective of defending orthodoxy against heresy, beginning from the Arian heresy. Scholars have noted the specific concentration of the composition of many Ecclesiastical Histories in Greek toward the end of the reign of Theodosius (408–450) (see A. Momigliano, L'età del trapasso, 286ff.; an explanation was proposed in relation to the politics and the propaganda of this emperor: see L. Cracco Ruggini, Pubblicistica e storiografia bizantina, 156ff.). Only one chapter pertaining to Theodore of Mopsuestia has remained from Hesychius of Jerusalem's Ecclesiastical History (d. after 450).

After 475, Gelasius of Cyzicus compiled another Ecclesiastical History in three books pertaining to the Church of the East under Constantine, using many known preceding sources and explicitly mentioning them. Continuing on the work undertaken by a multitude of authors, *John Diacrinomenos, between 512 and 518, wrote a church history (now lost), in 10 books, which from the year 429 comes to the time of the emperor *Anastasius I (491–518). Likewise lost is the analogous work written by *Basil of Cilicia, in three books, written for the time between 450 and 540. Lost in the original Greek, but having come down to us incorporated in the universal Syriac Chronicle—from the creation to 568–569—of which books 3-6 of the 12 existing was the Ecclesiastical History written by the *monophysite *Zacharias Scholasticus (d. probably before 553). This pertains to the period from 450 to 491. Two further church histories come from the first decades of the 6th c. The first was Theodore the Lector's compilation from the writings of Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret of Cyrrhus (Historia tripartita), published in four books ca. 530; the second was the autonomous continuation, from 450 to 527, of the preceding work; only extracts of this latter work remain.

Written in Syriac was the Ecclesiastical History, in 18 books, which have been partially lost, of the monophysite author *John of Ephesus (d. 586), whose exposition begins from Julius Caesar and ends in 585. Last, another work of the same title progresses on a rigidly orthodox line, namely, that of *Evagrius Scholasticus in six books that begins from the Council of *Ephesus (431) and reaches until the 12th year of the reign of the emperor Maurice (593/594). He was the last true follower of Eusebius of Caesarea, a valuable source for the history of Christian doctrines. The impressive sequence of ecclesiastical histories in the Greek language that flourished in the 5th and 6th c., primarily on the path of Eusebius of Caesarea's work, presents a common characteristic: for despite chronological, contextual and doctrinal diversity, the perspective that the authors generally assumed was centered on the Pars Orientis. The Latin Ecclesiastical Histories were different. They possessed more balanced "ecumenical" gaps, but they offer only a few analogous works to the many that exist in the Greek language. The same was said of the writings of *Rufinus between the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c. One could mention, in the 6th c., the *Historia ecclesiastica tripartita, for which it was believed for a long time that *Cassiodorus was partially responsible, choosing from the Histories of Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret of Cyrrhus excerpta that Epiphanius Scholasticus had then translated into Latin; although it was recently maintained that Epiphanius himself read, chose and translated the Greek sources, while Cassiodorus restricted himself to "following him" in the work and adding to it a brief preface. The composition in 12 books took as a model that of Theodore the Lector and undoubtedly constituted an important point of reference for the Latin Middle Ages.

Western patristic authors preferred Chronicles over the ecclesiastical histories and another type of historical-literary composition, namely, the one pertaining to famous men, for which Jerome was a leader, with his very well-known treatise De viris illustribus. Although Eusebius, embracing the entire ecclesiastical life, desired to pass on the memory of individuals who "nobly held the governance of the most famous churches" and that of "those who in each generation through voice and writings were messengers of the divine word" (HE 1,1,1), Jerome, in 392, for the first time concentrated his attention in an exclusive manner on the most famous authors of in Christian literature who lived from the death of Christ to the end of the 4th c. His literary model was the text of Suetonius, who composed with the same title in the 1st half of the 2nd c.: but his objectives were different: alongside the historical intention, which was clearly expressed—Jerome desired that the memory of the life and works of the people that were of interest to him, among whom he would also mention pagans and heretics—one perceives the apologetic objective, bent on defending the church from the criticisms leveled against it. (See the prologue of the work.) The Christian writer faces a true and proper challenge: he maintained the wisdom and the dignity of Christian writings, which by that point had virtually achieved a secular history, in the face of the repeated accusations of pagans, who regarded such texts as rusticae and simplices—an attitude with which he wanted to interact in the face of the proclaimed superiority of pagan culture, perhaps to free himself from a critique of his work. In this respect, one cannot forget the events in which the treatise De viris illustribus was composed: years in which the emperor Theodosius's antipagan laws provoked a strong reaction from the pagan nobility, which ranged from the proclamation of Eugenius as the new Augustus, to the reopening of the pagan temples and ending with the Battle of Frigidus, which witnessed the tragic end of Eugenius himself, Arbogast and Nicomachus Flavianus the Elder.

Two criteria guided Jerome in the selection of the ecclesiastical authors considered: was the author a scriptor ecclesiasticus and a vir illustris among the Christian community, and one who bestowed to the memory of posterity some work with respect to Sacred Scripture? In other words, he attributed value to authors inasmuch as they were interpreters of the Bible; he brought attention to them inasmuch as they were exegetes of the sacred text. Moreover, he placed value on these writers in relation to the stylistic worth of the works that he mentioned. Thus he delineated 135 "portraits" or representations, dedicating the first to Simon *Peter and the last, as is known, to himself. And in his gallery, even heretics and schismatics, *Jews and a pagan (Seneca) have a place. More than 102 are Greek authors and 33 Latins, something which indicates an opening of cultural horizons and a capacity and desire to receive voices on two sides, confirming the depth of Jerome's learning and integration that he knew how to achieve between the saeculares litterae and the Sancta Scriptura.

It is commonly thought that the treatise De viris illustribus was translated into Greek by *Sophronius, Jerome's friend, who actually translated many of his writings into Greek (see De vir. ill. 134); in all likelihood, it seems that such a translation was owed to a later individual of the same name. Nonetheless, it is important to emphasize how the Greek world came to know of Jerome's writings, which were subsequently spread through a peculiar event. In fact, around the mid-9th c., *Hesychius of Jerusalem's Onomatologos (6th c. AD), which originally collected only bibliographies of pagan Greek authors, underwent a revision through which the anonymous redactor also used the treatise De viris illustribus: through this means, the work appears in the compilations of *Photius and *Suidas.

In the Latin world, a multitude of historians followed the footsteps of the learned monk, continuing and updating the plan of identifying "famous men." The first was *Gennadius of Marseille, who was still alive at the end of the 5th c., at the time of Pope *Gelasius, to whom are owed many works against the heresies and a treatise De viris illustribus, which was composed over time until 480. Included therein are 101 profiles, some of which are not authentic, but are the work of subsequent unknown authors; as far as it seems, the final chapter is also spurious, which taking its cue from the last chapter of its model contains biographical information on Gennadius himself, information that nevertheless is reliable since it was written at a time and place close to that of Gennadius. The work faithfully followed the model set by Jerome, not including writers already introduced by him. It is not surprising therefore that the two documents circulated together, beginning from the MS tradition. But the comparison brings to light distinct characteristics. Gennadius considered with greater attention the doctrinal aspects in relation to the ecclesiastical events, attributing less importance to the literary elements; he also placed great importance on the figures of the monks both Eastern (from *Pachomius to *Evagrius of Pontus) and Western (from *Martin of Tours to *John Cassian); nor did he fail to emphasize writers from Gaul, his homeland.

*Isidore (560–636), bishop of Seville, also composed a treatise titled De viris illustribus, in which he privileged by far Latin authors with respect to Greek ones and restricted his horizon, giving attention to persons of a province, in the specific case of the province of Spain. He thus listed 33 "bio-bibliographic portraits," twelve of which were Spanish and six who were his contemporaries. It seems that this first series of portraits, around the 9th–10th c., was fused with another analogous composition; from this source the so-called broadened version had its origin, which includes 46 chapters, in addition to the praefatio. The bishop of Toledo *Ildefonsus (ca. 600–665) was the author of a work bearing a title identical to the ones preceding. The objective of this work was to supplement Isidore's treatise, within a framework, however, even more restricted and with a new interest. He provided information about individuals who had lived at Toledo and had been overlooked by Isidore of Seville (of the 14, a good seven were bishops of the city; the remaining were Spanish bishops, apart from *Donatus, a monk who had come to Spain from Africa), and he places attention on the figures presented as models of moral rectitude and Christian virtue, esp. among the monks, focusing more on their eloquence, thaumaturgical powers and, therefore, on the efficacy of their pastoral action, than on their literary merits. During the Middle Ages, it suffices simply to mention the names of Sigibert of Gembloux, Honorius of Autun or the anonymous Mellicensis who, several centuries removed, continued a tradition begun by Jerome.

Mention, though brief, should be made of a testimony of exceptional value found in the East, even if in a period by that lies at the limits, or even beyond the limits, of the patristic age. I am referring to the Bibliotheca of *Photius (820–891), a polymath, a teacher at the University of *Constantinople, then head of the imperial chancellery and the patriarch of Constantinople. The work is the fruit of research into writings completed at different times and jotted down on cards; it turns out to be a very rich mine of information for Christian authors—there are 157 chapters, traditionally called "codices," that speak about them (while 122 are dedicated to secular authors). It has been observed that of the ecclesiastical literature, nearly 100 of the works among those mentioned with various titles by Photius have been lost while only 60 are extant (among the pagan literature, ancient or Byzantine, the balance is less impressive: there are more than 90 texts that are no longer extant and only 30 that have been preserved). In the 10th c., one also stumbles upon another interesting work, Lexicon of Suidas, the author of which we know nothing about. The same name also appears as a Hellenization of the barbarian form Suda, which seems to be genuine. But with respect to the name, origin and even the very meaning of the work, many hypotheses have been proposed. According to some scholars, Suidas does not designate the name of the compiler but the title of the collection. It is a collection of 30,000 grammatical, etymological, historical, biographical, literary, geographic, scientific entries, arranged in alphabetical order. We certainly find ourselves confronted by a kind of encyclopedia. Now a portion of the immense work pertains to terms of literary history; and it is a portion of exceptional importance because it allows us to know the titles of the works and the names of even less-known Greek authors who are otherwise unknown. Nevertheless, the information is not, as one can well understand, firsthand and frequently gives rise to much confusion and errors that are difficult to untangle.

Latin historiography took different routes from Greek historiography. In the first place, the ecumenical and universal approach was always alive: present in the chronographical compositions, it is present no less in those properly speaking historical narratives. One thinks of the grandiose and very rich exposition of the moments and the most important aspects of human history divided into six ages, made by *Augustine in his treatise De civitate Dei; one thinks of *Orosius's Historiae adversus paganos which began with Adam (and not from Abraham, as Eusebius of Caesarea had done in his Chronicon, to avoid the chronological difficulties created by the first chapters of Genesis) and reaches to the year AD 417, organizing the narration ideologically and structurally around the scheme of the four universal reigns, i.e., appropriating the model of the translatio imperii. With that Orosius came to value and exalt the Rome of the tempora christiana, which represented the last of the empires, the point of arrival for all ancient history. In his writings, one seems to have the theoretical premise for the institution of a renewed type of historiography, namely, that of a specifically Roman approach, which is placed alongside the universal historiography. Such seems to be the justification for the Historia Romana, now lost, of Quintus Aurelius Memmius *Symmachus, *Jordanes's Romana (in which universal history and Roman history coexist without difficulty) or later the Historia Romana of *Paul the Deacon or of Landulf the Wise (see B. Luiselli, in La storiografia ecclesiastica, 528ff.). Finally, reflecting again the tormented vicissitudes of the West in Late Antiquity and the early Middle Ages, Latin ecclesiastical historiography emphasized another important aspect; namely, the one pertaining to the Germanic peoples, who by that point were located in Romania. There was thus born a succession of works that were of enormous importance for understanding the events of that time and the centuries to come: the History of the Goths, which was composed by *Cassiodorus during the years 525 and following, whose 12 books have been irrecoverably destroyed (but are known through the abbreviated reworking of it made by Jordanes), Jordanes's Getica to be precise (551); the History of the Franks, the magnum opus of *Gregory of Tours completed in 591; the History of the Goths, Vandals and Suevi (ca. 560–636); and also the two Histories of the Longobards, one written by *Secundus of Trent (lost) and the other written by Paul the Deacon, the anonymous Origo gentis Langobardorum, until the Historia Brittorum and the Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum, the last owed to Bede. But with these works, one has exceeded the chronological bounds of the Late Antique patristic age and is now in the milieu of the early Middle Ages.

Several traditions have been followed here: the tradition of the ecclesiastical histories, literary histories and, starting from a certain period, the tradition of the histories of peoples. But by framing it in this manner one is aware that the horizon could expand even more. Our treatment began with Eusebius of Caesarea and the time in which he wrote his Ecclesiastical History. Scholars know how important the memory of Christian origins was assigned to the gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the writings of *Papias and *Hegesippus, of which Eusebius himself was a witness, how important the first outlines of Christian Chronicles were, and it would not be difficult to continue. And even for the subsequent age it is difficult to distinguish between history proper and literary history, hagiography, memories, etc. So too it is not easy to indicate among the Christian historiographers who effectively deserves the title of "historian" (see M. Quesnel, in L'historiographie de l'Église des premiers siècles, XV). These concluding observations are enough to underscore the complexity, richness and importance of Christian historiography, something which the reader will be able to better understand by making use of studies, even though limited in number, mentioned below.

The bibl. on the theme is vast. Here we shall only list a few contributions that were useful for the composition of this entry. E. Auerbach, Mimesis. Dargestellte Wirklichkeit in der abendländischen Literatur, Bern 1946; A. Momigliano, Gli Anicii e la storiografia latina del VI secolo d.C.: RAL, serie VIII, vol. 9 (1956) 279-297 (= Secondo contributo alla storia degli studi classici, Rome 1960, 231-254); S. Mazzarino, La fine del mondo antico, Milan 1959; A. Momigliano, Pagan and Christian Historiography in the Fourth Century A.D., in The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century, Oxford 1963, 79-99, It. trans. Turin [2]1971, 89-110; A.A. Cameron, Christianity and Tradition in the Historiography of the Late Empire: CQ n.s. 14 (1964) 310-328; S. Mazzarino, Il pensiero storico classico, 3 vols., Bari 1966; A. Momigliano, L'età del trapasso tra storiografia antica e storiografia medievale (325–550 d.C.), in La storiografia altomedievale, Atti del conv. 10-16 aprile 1969, Spoleto 1970, 89-118 (= Quinto contributo alla storia degli studi classici e del mondo antico, Rome 1975, 49-71); L. Cracco Ruggini, Pubblicistica e storiografia bizantina di fronte alla crisi dell'Impero romano: Athenaeum n.s. 51 (1973) 146-183; O. Giordano, Jordanes e la storiografia nel VI secolo, Bari 1973; T. Markus, Zosimus, Orosius and Their Tradition: Comparative Studies in Pagan and Christian Historiography, New York 1974; L. Cracco Ruggini, T*he Ecclesiastical History and the Pagan Historiography: Providence and Miracles*: Athenaeum n.s. 55 (1977) 107-126; Id., Universalità e campanilismo, centro e periferia, città e deserto nelle Storie Ecclesiastiche, in La storiografia ecclesiastica nella tarda antichità, Atti del conv. di Erice (3-8 dicembre 1978), Messina 1981, 159-194; B. Luiselli, Indirizzo universale e indirizzi nazionali nella storiografia latino-cristiana dei secoli V-VIII, ibid., 505-535 (the entire volume of the Acts was useful for our subject); P. Siniscalco, La storiografia nel Tardo Antico, in La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, Atti del conv. CNR, Roma 12-16 novembre 1979, Rome 1981, 99-122 (at pp. 115ff., see further bibl. pertaining to the subject treated); Id., Roma e le concezioni cristiane del tempo e della storia nei primi secoli della nostra era, in var. aus., Roma, Costantinopoli, Mosca. Da Roma alla Terza Roma, Studi I, Naples 1983, 31-62; Id., Les Péres, source pour l'histoire, in Les Péres de l'Église au XXe siècle. Histoire-Littérature-Théologie. "L'aventure des Sources Chrétiennes," Paris 1997, 17-34 (the last three articles provided immediately above are now found in P. Siniscalco, Il senso della storia. Studi sulla storiografia cristiana antica, Soveria Mannelli 2003, resp. pp. 31-59, 61-103 and 345-364, along with other studies on the topic); H. Inglebert, Les romains chrétiens face à l'histoire de Rome. Histoire, christianisme et romanités en Occident dans l'Antiquité tardive (III^{e}-V^{e}), Paris 1996; D. Mendels, The Media Revolution of Early Christianity: An Essay on Eusebius' "Ecclesiastical History," Grand Rapids, MI-Cambridge 1999; E. Carotenuto, Tradizione innovazione nella storia ecclesiastica di Eusebio di Cesarea, Bologna 2001; var. aus., L'historiographie de l'Église des premiers siècles, sous la dir. de B. Pouderon et Y.-M. Duval, Paris 2001 (the studies collected in the volume are of great significance for the topic described here); M. Sordi, Dalla storiografia classica alla storiografia cristiana, in Scritti di Storia romana, Milan 2002.

P. Siniscalco

HISTRIA (Istria, district of Constanta, in Dobrudja, on Lake Sinoe, Romania). This was the most ancient colony of the city of Miletus, in the 7th c. BC, on the banks of the Black Sea; reconstructed around the end of the 3rd c. AD, it became prosperous in the 4th c. The barbarian invasions, esp. of the *Huns, caused its decline. Later it recovered and became an episcopal seat. The city was abandoned toward the end of the 6th c. or at the beginning of the 7th. The city was inhabited by people of Greek origin, Romanized Getae and then Sarmatians, but all of Christian religion, as is clear from anthropological research done on human remains. Excavations, begun in 1914 and still in progress, esp. since 1989, have revealed a large number of buildings, among which are also the ruins of several Christian basilicas: there must have been at least four. One, in the large square, which seems to have been the episcopal seat, was one of the largest buildings of its kind in the Balkan Peninsula. The basilicas had a long history; the last was built during the period of the emperors *Anastasius and *Justinian (527–565) (a coin from the 5th c. establishes the terminus post quem), but later it was partially destroyed, at the end of the 6th c. It measured 60 m (197 ft) in length, 30 m (98.4 ft) in width in the transept, and 20 m (65.6 ft) in the nave; it had an atrium, a narthex, a transept with a large choir and an apse with annexes on the N and on the S. Numerous tombs have also been found belonging to the basilica from the years 570–600. Another basilica was situated in the SE corner of the city, next to the city wall—from which it derives its irregular shape. This basilica belongs to the last phase of construction of the city (6th–7th c.), but only three-fourths of its foundations remain. A rectangular space with an apse which is semicircular inside and pentagonal outside appears to be a hall used for worship, found in a large aristocratic dwelling (domus) of the Roman-Byzantine district (5th–6th c.), situated in the SE zone of the city; the domus could have been the residence of the bishop. The hypothesis is strengthened by the fragments of a multilobed white marble table found in the apse. A more ancient public building was also in the form of a basilica, and inside it were found gates decorated with crosses; it seems that this, too, was adapted for Christian worship. In the area to the W of the walls were found the ruins of a basilica extra muros, believed to be a cemetery basilica, which had two annexed asymmetrical areas beside the apse, probably with the function of pastophoria. Numerous pieces of architectural sculpture (capitals, columns and bases of columns, slabs, and balustrades for the gates, etc.), a little treasury of golden objects (small crosses, earrings, rings), golden and bronze buckles bearing the sign of the cross and also a large number of clay vases decorated with the sign of the cross and various different Christian symbols complete the inventory of the findings dated to the 4th–7th c.

I. Barnea, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Roumanie, Vatican City 1977; Id., Christian Art in Romania, 1, Bucarest 1979; N. Duval, Revue archéologique, 2, Paris 1980, 313f.; A. Suceveanu Alexandru, Das römische Histria, in Histria: eine Griechenstadt an der rumänischen Schwarzmeerküste, ed. P. Alexandrescu - W. Schuller, Konstanz 1990, 9-45; A. Suceveanu - M.V. Angelescu, Nouvelles données concernant Histria à l'époque romaine: Ktèma 19 (1994) 195-208.

I. Barnea

HOLY SPIRIT

I. NT and patristic pneumatology: characteristics and differences - II. The trinitarian baptismal formula of Mt 28:18-20 and reflection on it - III. Initial outlines of a theology of the Holy Spirit in the 2nd c.

between orthodoxy and heresy - IV. The development of pneumatology in the 3rd c. - V. The trinitarian formula of Nicaea and the uncertainties with respect to the Holy Spirit - VI. From Nicaea to Constantinople - VII. After the Council of Constantinople; from Augustine until the filioque controversy.

I. NT and patristic pneumatology: characteristics and differences. The theological doctrine pertaining to the Holy Spirit (pneumatology), which was developed and elaborated by the fathers of the church, is essentially based, though making extensive use of the speculative instruments from the Hellenistic world, on the pneumatological formulas of the NT. In turn, these formulas developed, with reference to the person *Jesus of Nazareth, confessed as the Christ (i.e., the Messiah of Israel who had finally come), various ideas with respect to the "Spirit of God" (ruah Yahweh) of the OT and so-called intertestamental Judaism.

In the OT, the "Spirit of God" was the one who, having descended primarily upon the kings and leaders at the moment of their *anointing (1 Sam 10:1; 16:3; see also Is 11:2ff.; Ezek 36:26-27; 37:1-14; Ps 51; etc.) then extended to the entire elect people as the promised gift for the Day of the Lord (Joel 3:1ff.). It was the Spirit who brooded over the original waters (Gen 1:2), the Spirit who was the one, acc. to Ezek 36:25, given by God, by means of a sprinkling with "clean water," that would renew the heart and the spirit of human beings. In Judaism, the Spirit of God was increasingly seen as a divine animating principle, identified with Wisdom (Wis 7:22ff.). And in the rabbinic tradition the Spirit was increasingly seen as the origin and cause of prophecy. In the dualistic vision of Qumranic Judaism, one finds a clearer formulation of the doctrine of the "two spirits," already mentioned in the OT (in the sense of "distinction of the spirits," Hos 9:7), a distinction that at Qumran and in related documents is shown as the presence of a good spirit, or spirit of the light, and one of an evil spirit, or spirit of darkness; both, however, were created by God and subject to him (I QS III, 18-19; IV, 23ff.).

Against this background and in light of reused materials already elaborated one finds the NT pneumatological statements. Two notes characterize and rule the extraordinary pneumatological richness of the NT considered on the whole: the christological character of this pneumatology and the variety of spiritual manifestations in which the community of believers in *Jesus Christ lives and is nourished. The christological pneumatology is a central theme of the presentation of the life of Jesus as narrated in the gospels and in other NT writings: from his conception "by the Holy Spirit" to his baptism with the descent of the Spirit upon him, from his miracles until his *resurrection and glorious enthronement and the sending of the disciples in the Spirit and the power of the Spirit. On the other hand, since "gifts of the spirit" (charisms) were divided in different ways among the faithful, the pneumatological manifestations within the community were felt and presented as a guarantee that God truly dwelt within it and, as a result, bore witness to its *eschatological character. Even the pneumatological manifestations within the community, then, substantially had a christological foundation in the sense that it was the spiritual power of the risen Christ who made the community that commemorates his presence in the Eucharist and in baptism, as a body of which Christ is the head. Therefore, the various dimensions of the Holy Spirit that appear in the writings of the NT, and in certain baptismal (Mt 28:19) and liturgical formulas and ways of greeting (2 Cor 13:13-14; Phil 2:1; 2 Th 2:13; 1 Pet 1:2), should be seen within this general context in order to be understood in their full import. It is from such formulas that patristic theological reflection on the *Trinity began, just as this reflection, esp. on the Holy Spirit, always favored the tendency to consider the formulas in themselves—for the reason that the various terms implied or could imply the theological-speculative points of view—rather than from the ecclesiological-charismatic point of view.

II. The trinitarian baptismal formula of Mt 28:18-19 and reflection on it. Among these various formulas, one in particular had decisive weight on the subsequent theological speculation on the Trinity and pneumatology during the patristic age, namely, that of Mt 28:18-19: "And Jesus came and said to them, 'All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.'" This was, evidently, a baptismal formula, even if not the most ancient one (normally, acc. to the NT's attestations to this practice, baptism was originally conferred through [εἰς] the name or in [ἐν] the name or on [ἐπί] the name of Jesus: Acts 2:38; 10:48; Rom 6:3; 1 Cor 1:13-15; Gal 3:27). But the formula of Mt 28:19 would become at the end of the 1st to the beginning of the 2nd c. the most current and then the only formula used in the church. The transmission of it, even only as a simple formula, which contained a reference to the Holy Spirit, then constituted the basis for the entire subsequent trinitarian speculation until the First Council of *Constantinople (381). And although until after the mid-4th c., the development of trinitarian theology would serve to define and clarify the meaning, role and reciprocal relationship between the Father and Son, the mere fact of uniting the mention of the Spirit, even without any specifics on subsequent identifications in that regard, established the basis of a proclamation of faith, for which the theological speculation found itself at a certain moment interested also, in a more precise way, in the Holy Spirit.

Regarding the development of the Fathers' theological reflection on the Holy Spirit inasmuch as the Spirit was mentioned alongside the Father and the Son, their reflection, as was said, emerged from the baptismal formula of Mt 28:19 and contributed various elements that can thus be described in the following way: (1) The idea of the inspiration of Scripture (earlier for the OT, then gradually the recognition of the New also as "Scripture"), an inspiration considered to be the work of the Holy Spirit; (2) reflection on the preexistence of Christ, which was already affirmed by *Paul (e.g., Rom 1:4: "who was declared the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead, acc. to the Spirit of holiness," and then the subsequent formula, more articulated and complex, of Col 1:15-17 and subsequently developed in Phil 2:6-11; 1 Tim 3:16; Jn 1:1-2; 1 Jn 1:1ff.) and upon which the ancient patristic tradition worked so hard and insistently (e.g., Ign., Ephes. 17,1-2; and Hermas, Sim. 5,5,2; 9,1,1); (3) faith in the indwelling of the Spirit in the faithful, following various Pauline indications (e.g., Rom 8:11; 1 Cor 6:14), which, read back into formulas of the then-current philosophy (*Stoic for him), led certain authors to maintain that, to some extent, the "spirit" (πνεῦμα) that is in the human being could be identified or at least closely connected with the divine Spirit (Ign., Ephes. 8,2; Justin, Dial 4,1; 6,2; Tatian, Orat. 12; 13; and esp., but in a very deep and original way, Iren., Adv. haer. II, 33,5; V, 6,1; V, 9,1); (4) the presence of the Holy Spirit in the church: a theme already extensively present in the writings of Paul, *Luke and *John, which was developed esp. in the letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Magn. 3,2; Ephes. 9,2; Smyrn. 13,1; Phil. intr.), taken to rigorously ascetic conclusions in so-called 2 Clement* (14,3) and in an even more radical way, in the sectarian, *encratite and rigorous *gnostic groups.

The pneumatological development in the 2nd c. was so strong, in spite of what is might seem formally, that in certain cases (e.g., evidenced in certain passages of the Shepherd of Hermas, Simil. V, 5,2; IX, 11,1) the Holy Spirit seems to be considered a superior divine entity, identified with the Son of God (understood as the Son of God preexisting ab aeterno), placed alongside God the Father, which was then inserted in the mortal flesh of Christ. In this case, too, such pneumatology ends up in a rigorous *asceticism and an appeal to preserve human flesh "uncontaminated" through its relationship with the Holy Spirit.

These pneumatological themes, interwoven and used in various ways, were extensively present in the 2nd c., although they seem to lose their importance in subsequent ages. These were, however, emphasized and widely developed with more unilateral emphases in the movements that were already originally and only subsequently marginal with respect to the perspective delineated by the Great Church. One simply has to think of *Montanism, in which one finds an entire relaunching of the NT prophetic charismatism, in forms, however, sectarian or neo-apocalyptic and millennialist (which take up again the Jewish-Christian theme of ongoing prophecy), or following the mythical development, as in various gnostic movements. Here, esp. in the *Valentinian movement, are anticipated, even if in a contradictory and confused way, pneumatological themes of great importance—such as the idea of the Holy Spirit's "procession," his consubstantiality with the Son, his personal and autonomous character in a certain sense—all themes that the theology of the Great Church would recover, opening itself in a holistic way only much later.

III. Initial outlines of a theology of the Holy Spirit in the 2nd c. between orthodoxy and heresy. With the 2nd half of the 2nd c., theological speculation was destined to prevail in the Great Church, which was increasingly indebted to expressive and conceptual Hellenistic forms, and was primarily focused on clarifying the relationship between God the Father and the Son-Logos. The objective was to simultaneously preserve Jewish-Christian monotheism (the monarchia as it was called) and the divinity of the Son-Logos (extending esp. what was said in the Prologue of *John's gospel). From this moment onward the theology of the Holy Spirit—even in the writings of the Fathers such as *Irenaeus, on the one hand, and *Clement of Alexandria, on the other, which were still very sensitive to the richness of the pneumatological themes first outlined—became strictly subordinated to the primary problem of the clarification and the definition of the relationship between the Father and the Son. And it would substantially continue in this way until after AD 350.

The conceptual schema preferably applied to explain such relationships was deduced from the Sec- ond Letter of ps.-Plato (312 E). This enigmatic passage stated: "Everything surrounds the king of all things, and everything exists for him, and all beautiful things come from him; the second things stand around the second; the third around the third." Now this text, starting at least from *Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 60,5-9; see also Athenag., Leg. 23,4), was connected to other Platonic texts (e.g., Tim. 36 B-C) and applied to Gen 1:1ff., in which one encounters the God who "says" (therefore the Word of God) and the Spirit of God who brooded over the waters: thus the ps.-Platonic formula appeared to be a useful schema to understand the existing relations between the Father (the first God), the Logos-Son (the second God) and the prophetic Spirit (the third God in order). Starting from this basis, subsequent definitions of how one must understand the Holy Spirit at times varied considerably. *Tatian called the Spirit "the servant [διάκονος] of God who suffered" (Orat. 13,3); *Athenagoras called the Spirit "the 'flowing out' [ἀπόρροια] of the Father" (Legat. 10,3-4; 24,1-2), placing it as a medium between the Father and the Son. *Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autol. II, 15) regarded the Spirit as the third divine being and identified it with the "wisdom of God" and the "spirit [breath] of his mouth" (acc. to Ps 33:6) and his complete power. Irenaeus (Demonstrat. 5) also identified the Spirit with "Wisdom," "the hand of God" in creation and destined to lead creatures to perfection.

IV. The development of pneumatology in the 3rd c. With the end of the 2nd c. to the beginning of the 3rd, while the theology that applied itself to the study of the relationship between the Father and the Son was organizing itself in a more complete and structured way, the reaffirmation of God's unicity (monarchia) was integrated and balanced by the idea of its intimate functional organization (oikonomia), and in this way the theological status of the Holy Spirit began to be better defined, even if briefly. One can see this development in the writings of such authors as *Tertullian, *Hippolytus and esp. *Origen.

In the writings of Tertullian, the Spirit, the "third name of the deity" and "third in relation to God the Father and God the Son" (Adv. Prax. 30,5), was the "vicarious power" (vicaria vis) of the Son (De praescr. haer. 13,5), the sole testimony to the unicity of God, the only one capable of explaining the intimate divine life. Father, Son and Spirit were conceived of by Tertullian in a form of special conjunction through which they were united, but they are not to be identified, because there exists between them a similar relationship to that relationship that can exist between the root, branch and fruit, or rather between the spring, river and stream, or even between the sun, the ray and the point it touches (Adv. Prax. 8,7). The trinitas (Tertullian was the first to use the term in Latin, already found in Greek as τρίας in the writings of *Theophilus of Antioch [Ad Autol. II, 15], who, however, identified the Holy Spirit with wisdom, acc. to a theology that was clearly more ancient from that point of view) was so conceived as an outflowing (decurrens) from the Father through a series of intertwining and connected shifts that did not damage the unicity of God and saved the intimate complexity (oikonomia) of the divine life.

For Hippolytus, the Logos, the second person (prosōpon) alongside the Father, rules over everything and in the Son is active in everything (C. Noet. 8), while the Spirit is that which is in everything: it is through the Holy Spirit that we believe in the Son (C. Noet. 12).

The trinitarian formulas of both Tertullian and Hippolytus therefore included the Trinity in a certain graduated way, of which the Holy Spirit is, so to speak, the final point that allows the full understanding even of the Father and the Son. But it was precisely to Origen to whom was owed the more complete and systematic formulation of this type of trinitarian theology and, therefore, of a special recognition even of the Holy Spirit. One must not forget that Origen intended to respond to various subtle theological questions which were emerging (e.g., with respect to the generated and ungenerated character of the Holy Spirit; or rather whether the Holy Spirit had his own οὐσία, substance or essence, etc.). When facing these and other problems, Origen drew on the one hand from the trinitarian formula of Mt 28:19, and on the other, he took great pains to keep in mind the theological-rational methodology that forced him to make coherent conclusions. In brief, one can say that Origen's position consisted in understanding the Trinity as somewhat concentric circles inscribed within one another, the broadest of which is represented by the Father, the only unbegotten one, who rules over all creatures; the middle circle is represented by the Son-Logos, who rules over all rational creatures (logos-reason); the smallest on the inside is the Spirit, which rules over all spiritual realities (Pneuma = spirit; De Princip., I, 5; 7). Origen's understanding of the Trinity was, as one can see, clearly graduated: but Origen's primary objective was that of clarifying the "operations internal" to the divine triad. For this reason the Holy Spirit did not turn out to be fully integrated in it (De princ. I, 2,13; 3 passim), but precisely because of the intimate richness of the intratrinitarian life, the spirit was destined, through its overflowing, to produce sanctification (De princ. praef. 3; I, 1,3; 3,4; 5; 7; II, 7,2; 11,5; IV, 3,14). Hence Origen's attention to the "operations" of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, each being a fully "intellectual *hypostasis" existing and subsisting per se (De princ. I, 1,3) coming to have a specific function in the history of salvation. Originated through the mediation of the Logos, the Spirit is, for Origen, an inferior reality in relation to the one who was its origin (De princ. I, 3,5; In Jo. 2, 10,70–12,90).

V. The trinitarian formula of Nicaea and the uncertainties with respect to the Holy Spirit. Origen's graduated formula of the Trinity immediately appeared suspect and difficult to explain, in part because of the radicalizations given to it by his followers and as a result of the strong opposition of the monarchian theologies, which were alive and well within the conservative circles of the church (who feared compromising the proclamation of divine monotheism). The accusation of *subordinationism, which certainly went beyond Origen's specific objectives, seemed to compromise the theological essence of the Son with respect to the Father; but such difficulties were also inherent to the Holy Spirit. It is true, moreover, that from the mid-3rd c. until the first decades of the 4th and even beyond, the Holy Spirit's position often appeared unclear, and even more, poorly defined. There are signs of a return toward the ancient theology that identified the Holy Spirit with the superior Christ, who descended upon the earthly Jesus, or tendencies that defined it with a superior entity of value more or less mythical such as Melchizedek, who, acc. to the epistle to the Hebrews (7:1ff), had blessed Christ (in the blessing given to Abraham) and therefore appeared superior to Christ. At other times, one finds hints of a symbolic theology identifying the Holy Spirit simply with divine grace; or even more so, rigorously following the subordinationist tendencies deduced from Origen's formula, the Holy Spirit was understood as a creative power, a "thing" (or "reality") made or having come into existence by means of the Son; therefore, the Spirit is neither God nor the Son (see also in this regard, Eus., De eccles. theol. 3,6).

The definition produced by the Council of *Nicaea's *creed (325) had something to say about the relation between the Father and the Son, thus condemning *Arius and Arianism (which would, however, survive for at least another sixty years). The creed established, nonetheless, the new basis in view of the theological essence even of the Holy Spirit, although the formula of Nicaea with respect to the latter limited itself only to proclaiming: "and [we believe] in the Holy Spirit" (COeD, pp. 5, 18-19 = καὶ εἰς τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα = et in Spiritum Sanctum). And only in a subsequent age, in the thick of the Arian controversy which, after 360, among the various movements that debated the field, a movement came to light that also undertook to debate the essence of the Holy Spirit. This properly speaking pneumatological controversy, which came about as one of the many more or less spontaneous proliferations of the then-dominant Arianism, initially manifested itself in Egypt. The first to be informed about this matter and the first to provide information about it was, yet again, *Athanasius (Epist. ad Serap. 1,1). Its subsequent development, more directly including the Holy Spirit among the controverted and disputed realities, while shedding greater light on the problem of the Trinity as a whole, was decisive for the solutions that early on emerged from the Great Church, in bringing about a greater precision with respect to the Holy Spirit. The conclusion of the pneumatological controversy took place in the First Ecumenical Council of Constantinople (381), which proclaimed the full divinity of the third person of the Trinity.

VI. From Nicaea to Constantinople. In the period between 325 to 381, various positions on pneumatology were recorded; initially, however, more ascetic, spiritual and pastoral, rather than properly speaking theological-speculative: this means that, even here, the dogmatic formula would intervene to bring theological clarity on the reality personally held within the church. Thus, e.g., in the writings of *Cyril of Jerusalem (esp. in Catecheses XVI and XVII), as well as in the writings of *Didymus the Blind (in his treatise De Spiritu Sancto, which has been lost in its original but preserved in Jerome's Latin translation), so too in the writings of other church fathers. The most systematic and organic speculation with respect to the Holy Spirit is found, however, in the writings of the major 4th-c. champions of orthodoxy, Athanasius and then the three great Cappadocian Fathers (*Basil of Caesarea, *Gregory of Nazianzus and esp. *Gregory of Nyssa). And in their writings one also finds a refutation of what had come to be called the "*pneumatomachian" heresy.

For Athanasius—in his controversies against those who interpreted the expressions of the Scriptures pertaining to the Holy Spirit in a "figurative" sense (τροπικῶς) and whom he therefore called tropici (τροπικοί)—the Holy Spirit must be understood to be within the Trinity, in the sense of an internal circular movement within it (περιχώρησις; intertrinitarian circuminsessio), and not as a "creature," as maintained by the tropici and as was then argued by *Macedonius and various pneumatomachians; the Spirit is consubstantial with the Father and the Son (*Letter to Serapion, passim). Basil also insisted, against the pneumatomachians, that the Holy Spirit is not a creature, that he is worthy of the same honor (ὁμότιμος) reserved for the Father and the Son, and that the Holy Spirit is to be placed on the same level (συντετάχθαι) as these, to be regarded along with them (to be numbered among them συναριθμεῖσθαι) and not to be regarded below them (ὑπαριθμεῖσθαι). Despite these affirmations, even Basil was accused by certain rigorous and intransigent theologians of being uncertain with respect to the divinity of the Holy Spirit: and in fact, one could note that Basil never called the Holy Spirit "God" (ὁ θεός). Further steps toward the recognition of the full divine status of the Holy Spirit were taken by Gregory of Nazianzus, who deepened the concept of intertrinitarian *perichoresis, affirming that the specific character of the Holy Spirit as that of "coming," "proceeding" (ἐκπορεύεσθαι) from the Father, being part of his substance and essence (οὐσία), just as the specific character of the Son-Logos is that of "being generate." But it was esp. in Gregory of Nyssa's controversies with *Eunomius and the *Macedonians, who accused the Cappadocian Fathers of falling into tritheism, that one reaches the clearest doctrinal resolution with respect to the Holy Spirit. Gregory of Nyssa took up a role of primary importance both through his various polemical-doctrinal writings and through the work performed at the Council of Constantinople (381). Gregory began from the operations (ἐνέργειαι) of the trinitarian persons, who are distinct but who bear witness to a sole essence (οὐσία); with respect to the Holy Spirit, it has the characteristic of being of God and of Christ, coming from the Father and being received by the Son (De Spir. Sanc. 2). Thus the Father is every power, the Son is the power of the Father and the Spirit is the spirit of the Son's power. Hence, just as it is necessary to direct supreme adoration (προσκύνησις) to the Father and the Son, so too it is necessary to do the same for the Spirit.

It was precisely in these terms that the council of 381 expressed itself, which, with respect to the Holy Spirit, mentioned it esp. in respect to the incarnation: "The Son of God . . . came down from heaven, incarnate by the Holy Spirit [σαρκωθέντα ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου] and the Virgin Mary." Thus, further on it proclaims its faith "in the Holy Spirit who is [literally: "that which is, that reality that is": this is intended to express the neuter τό with respect to the κύριον] the Lord, the Giver of life [ζωοποιόν], the one who proceeds [ἐκπορευόμενον] from the Father [ἐκ τοῦ Πατρός], the one who with the Father and the Son is worshiped [συμπροσκυνούμενον] and glorified [συνδοξαζόμενον], the one who has spoken through [διά] the prophets."

The form of the Constantinopolitan Creed with respect to the Holy Spirit was likewise established on an entire series of expressions materially deduced from the NT (in the order they appear in the creed: Mt 1:20; Lk 1:35; Acts 28:25; 2 Pet 1:21; 2 Cor 3:17-18; 1 Cor 15:45; 2 Cor 3:6; Jn 6:63; Jn 15:26; 1 Cor 2:12). Only the last two expressions "together worshiped" and "together glorified" were foreign to Sacred Scripture, but they were the fruit of various controversies against the pneumatomachian movements.

VII. After the Council of Constantinople; from Augustine until the filioque controversy. After 381, with the theological-dogmatic status of the Holy Spirit definitively fixed, pneumatology developed no further except in the sense of a primarily spiritual deepening and a deeper understanding of the contents of this very formula. This was primarily the theological contribution brought forth by the Westerners, who had expressed themselves in less abstract and schematic ways and formulas than those who generally made recourse to the writings of Greek theologians. Even before 381, *Marius Victorinus—starting from a clearly *Neoplatonist conceptual schema and taking as his point of reference the human *soul, in which being (esse), living (vivere) and understanding are given for the comprehension of the living being (intelligere) (Adv. Arian. 1,32; 62-64)—had understood the Holy Spirit as the one who in the dynamic of the divine life represents the "comprehension" of such a life, a comprehension of that divine dynamism: the Spirit is distinct from the Son as understanding is distinct from life, just as the voice is distinct from the mouth that speaks (Adv. Arian. 1,13; 3,16).

But it was *Augustine in his very organic formulation of the trinitarian question who, fully assuming as an explicative instrument the reality of the human soul, came to a formulation of the question of the Holy Spirit that has since remained classic, esp. for Western theology. Augustine begins from an irenic and incontrovertible premise, namely, the conviction that the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit are one in "substance," although distinct as "persons": with respect to the distinction, for Augustine, this essentially arises from the operations, even if they are, in effect, common to the three persons. In this regard, the Holy Spirit is for him the common gift (donum: Trin. V, 12,13; 15,16; 16,17) of the Father and the Son. This idea was established, in turn, on that typically Augustinian idea of relation (relatio), which, when referred to the *Trinity, was an instrument in overcoming the intrinsic limits to a theology like that of the Greeks who, insisting primarily on the distinction of persons, ran the risk of compromising the unity and the divine unicity. In this sense, the Holy Spirit represented for Augustine a certain "consubstantial and eternal *communion" (communio consubstantialis et aeterna: Trin. VI, 5,7) of the Spirit of the Father and the Son (Trin. XV, 27,50) who, although it can be called "friendship," is better called caritas (Trin. VI, 5,7), which is reciprocal with respect to the one or the other so as to merit the name of "love," although God-Trinity is entirely love (Trin. XV, 17,30: Spiritus proprie nuncupatur vocabulo caritatis; ibid., XV, 17,31: ipse dilectio est). For this reason, the Holy Spirit is substantially the one who gives the Trinity to humanity.

With the dogmatic formulation of 381 and, then, with Augustine's clarifications and theological interpretations, esp. for the West, patristic theology on the Holy Spirit substantially came to an end. There certainly survived in the writings of individual authors abbreviated trinitarian formulas, in which mention of the Holy Spirit is not followed either by the proper terms of the formula of Constantinople (thus in the baptismal creed of the *Coptic church from ca. 500) or by other theological-dogmatic clarifications (as in the creed contained in the 7th-c. Antiphonary of Bangor). However, with respect to the duration of more ancient formulas than that of Constantinople, it is difficult to give a definitive pronouncement since in certain cases they survived alongside the formula of 381, or rather were replaced at a certain point. Likewise, there subsequently flourished here and there reminiscences of Macedonian positions, more or less explicit and aware. One can find traces of them, e.g., in *Fulgentius of Ruspe's controversies against Fabian (see CCL 91 A, 761-873). Thus pneumatological ideas that present themselves as clearly ancient with respect to the dogmatic development of the times can be found, e.g., in the writings of the *Messalians, who attributed to the presence and action of the Holy Spirit an absolute centrality, at the expense of a balanced trinitarian theology: this was the result of a confluence in Messalianism, as in other radical spiritual movements, of extreme charismatic ideas.

As stated before, the pneumatology of the Great Church continued, on the whole, to deepen the preceding reflection on the Holy Spirit, adhering with rigor to the formula of 381, but in the specifically spiritual sense. If anything, it is where remnants or new uncertainties and perplexities with regard to the full acceptance of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed flourished that the Great Church went back to insisting, from the theological-speculative point of view, on a point destined to arouse disputes and divisions later on. This point pertained to the problem of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son in addition to the Father. This concept, which was called the "double procession," did not materially appear in the creed of 381 but was in fact peacefully accepted already before the Council of *Constantinople. It was in the controversy against *Priscillian, or, better yet, those movements that were considered Priscillianist, that, between the end of the 4th and beginning of the 7th c., there developed in *Spain through an entire series of synods held at *Toledo, there emerged the tendency to insert in the creed an explicit mention of the Holy Spirit's procession also from the Son (de Patre . . . et de Filio procedentem, then, more synthetically, Filioque). This formula, which passed over to the churches of *Gaul and was welcomed into the chanting of the creed in the imperial chapel of Aachen (Aquisgranum) at the court of Charlemagne, was initially the object of many papal reservations. It was admitted, in fact, by *Rome, that the insertion was theologically well-grounded, but its explicit insertion into the creed was discouraged numerous times. But the insertion of the Filioque, also heavily supported through political pressures as well as through theological reasons, provoked strong reactions from the Greeks, first in the disagreement that arose between Latin and Greek monks from the monastery of St. *Saba, then within the *Byzantine Empire in the 9th c. with *Photius's controversy against the Latin church and the schism connected to the name of the patriarch of *Constantinople.

1. In general: πνεῦμα, πνευματικός: TWNT 6, 330-450 (TDNT 6, 332-451); RAC 9, 490-503; DTC 5, 676-829; number 9 of "Les quatre fleuves" dedicated to the Holy Spirit (contributions by Cazelles, A. Jaubert, F. Bolgiani, Fr. Rondeau . . .), Paris 1979; DSp 4, 1246-1283; Augustinianum 20/3 (1980) 429-686 (with bibl.); L. Dattrino - G. Di Nola, Lo Spirito Santo nella testimonianza dei Padri e degli scrittori cristiani (I-V sec.), Rome 1999 (with historical-theological introduction and anthology of patristic texts); B. Studer, La foi en l'Esprit Saint dans l'Église ancienne: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 10 (1998) 2-14; C. Granado, Spirito Santo, in Letteratura patristica, ed. A. Di Berardino, G. Fedalto, M. Simonetti, Cinisello Balsamo 2007, 1116-1134 (with bibl.). For the OT: H.B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church, London 1912; H. Leisegang, Pneuma Hagion, Leipzig 1922; F. Büchsel, Der Geist Gottes im NT, Gütersloh 1926; P. van Imschoot, L'action de l'Esprit de Jahvé dans l'AT: RSPh 23 (1934) 553-587; Id., L'Esprit de Jahvé source de vie dans l'AT: RBi 44 (1935) 481-501; Id., L'Esprit de Jahvé et l'Alliance Nouvelle dans l'AT: Eph. Theol. Lov. 22 (1936) 201-226;

G.L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought, London 1936; Fr. Rüsche, Das Seelenpneuma. Seine Entwicklung von der Hauchseele zur Geistseele, Paderborn 1939; G. Verbeke, L'evolution de la doctrine du Pneuma du Stoïcisme à St. Augustin, Paris-Louvain 1945; H.J. Kraemer, Der Ursprung des Geistesmetaphysik, Amsterdam 1964; B. Studer, La ricezione della pneumatologia biblica nella Chiesa antica, in Spirito, Eschaton e Storia, ed. N. Ciola, Rome 1998, 19-33; J. Fernández Lago, El Espíritu santo en el mundo de la Biblia, Santiago de Compostela 1998; J. Elowsky, We Believe in the Holy Spirit, Ancient Christian Doctrine 4, Downers Grove, IL 2009.

2. For the NT and the early church: J. Lebreton, Histoire du dogme de la Trinité, Paris 1927-28, 2 vols.; S. Hirsch, Die Vorstellung von einem weiblichen Pneuma Hagion, Berlin 1927; M. Goguel, Pneumatisme et eschatologie dans le Christianisme primitif: RHR 132 (1946) 124-169; 133 (1947-48) 103-161; C.K. Barret, The Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition, London 1947; G. Kretschmar, Studien zur frühchristlichen Trinitätstheologie, Tübingen 1955; H. Opitz, Ursprünge frühkatholischen Pneumatologie, Berlin 1960; W.-D. Hauschild, Gottes Geist und der Mensch. Studien zur frühchristlichen Pneumatologie, Munich 1972; G. Ferraro, Lo Spirito e Cristo nel vangelo di Giovanni, Brescia 1984; M. Lubomirski, Il ruolo dello Spirito Santo nel passaggio dall'uomo vecchio all'uomo nuovo secondo San Paolo, Diss. Pontificia Università Gregoriana, Rome 1988.

3. On 2nd-c. pneumatology: K. Adam, Die Lehre vom hl. Geiste bei Hermas und Tertullian: ThQ 88 (1906) 36-61; A. d'Alès, La doctrine de l'Esprit en St. Irénée: RecSR 14 (1924) 497-538; P. Nautin, Je crois à l'Esprit Saint dans la sainte Église pour la résurrection de la chair, Paris 1947; Th. Rüsch, Die Entestehung der Lehre vom hl. Geist bei Ignatius von Antiochien, Theophilus von Antiochien, Irenaeus, Zürich 1952; H. Karpp, Schrift und Geist bei Tertullian, Gütersloh 1955; W. Bender, Die Lehre über den hl. Geist bei Tertullian, Munich 1961; A. Orbe, Estudios Valentinianos, IV. La teología del Espíritu Santo, Rome 1966; J.P. Martin, El Espíritu Santo en los orígenes del Cristianismo. Estudio sobre I Clemente, Ignacio, II Clemente y Justino Mártir, Zürich 1971; A. Meis Wörmer, La fórmula de fe "creo en el Espíritu santo" en el siglo II: su formación y significado, Santiago de Chile 1980; M. Balwierz, The Holy Spirit and the Church as a Subject of Evangelization According to St. Irenaeus, Warsaw 1985.

4. The development of pneumatology in the 3rd c.: a topic that has not been sufficiently explored. It is essential to consult the general works (e.g., Prestige, op. cit.) or the thematic studies (e.g., Kretschmar, Rüsch). For a general overview, see F. Bolgiani in the cit. n. 9 of "Les quatre fleuves." On Origen: F. Cocchini, Lo Spirito santo e le Scritture in Origene: Parola Spirito e Vita 38 (1999) 211-220.

5. From Nicaea to Costantinople: C.R.B. Shapland, The Letters of St. Athanasius Concerning the Holy Spirit, London 1951; H. Dörrie, De Spiritu Sancto. Der Beitrag des Basilius zum Abschluss des trinitarischen Dogmas, Göttingen 1956; M. Simonetti, Studi sull'Arianesimo, Rome 1965; A.M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein Symbol, Göttingen 1965; W. Jaeger, Gregor von Nyssa's Lehre vom heil. Geist, ed. H. Dörrie, Leyden 1966; W.-D. Hauschild, Die Pneumatomachen, Hamburg 1967; G.L. Dossetti, Il Simbolo di Nicea e di Costantinopoli, Rome 1967; A. Laminski, Der heil. Geist als Geist Christi und Geist der Gläubigen, Leipzig 1969; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; M.A.G. Haykin, The Spirit of God: The Exegesis of 1 and 2 Corinthians in the Pneumatomachian Controversy of the Fourth Century, Leiden 1994; J.-R. Pouchet, La réception du Traité de S. Basile sur le Saint-Esprit: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 69 (1998) 22-31; K. Demoen, Metaphor and the Ancient Trinitarian Debate: Analogical Language in the Theological Orations of Gregory Nazianzen, in Faith and Fiction. Interdisciplinary Studies on the Interplay Between Metaphor and Religion, eds. B. Biebuyck - R. Dirven - J. Ries, Frankfurt-Bern-Paris-New York 1998, 137-153; M.-O. Boulnois, Du Père par le Fils dans l'Esprit: une approche du paradoxe trinitaire chez Cyrille d'Aléxandrie: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 76 (1999) 33-44.

6. After 381: H.B. Swete, On the History of the Procession of the Holy Spirit, London 1876; M. Schmaus, Die psychologische Trinitätslehre des hl. Augustins, Munich 1927; F. Cavallera, La doctrine de St. Augustin sur l'Esprit Saint à propos du "De Trinitate": RecTh 2 (1930) 365-387; 3 (1931) 5-19; J.B. Wolf, Commentationes in S. Cyrilli Alexandrini de Spir. Sanc. doctrina, Herbipoli 1934; M. Jugie, De processione Spir. S. ex fonte Revelationis et secundum Orientales dissidentes, Rome 1936; Id., Le schisme byzantin, Paris 1941; U. Kury, Die Bedeutung des Filioque-Streites für den Gottesbegriff der abendländischen und der morgenländischen Kirche: Inter. Kirch. Zeitsch. 33 (1943) 1-19; E. Candal, Il Filioque nei Concili di Toledo e L'aggiunta del Filioque al Simbolo, in var. aus., Incontro ai fratelli separati di Oriente, Rome 1945, 217-229, 231-245; P. Galtier, Le Saint Esprit en nous d'après les Pères Grecs, Rome 1946; F. Leotta, La persona dello S.S. nella dottrina di S. Agostino, Rome 1948; F. Dvornik, The Photian Schism, History and Legend, Cambridge 1948; Th. Camelot, La tradition latine sur la procession du St. Esprit "a Filio" ou "ab utroque," in var. aus., Russie et Chrétienté, Paris 1950, 179-192; P. Hadot, L'image de la Trinité dans l'âme chez Victorinus et chez St. Augustin: SP 6 (1962) 409-440; Id., Marius Victorinus. Recherches sur sa vie et ses oeuvres, Paris 1972; G. Bentivegna, Effusione dello Spirito Santo e doni carismatici: la testimonianza di Sant'Agostino, Messina 1990; V. Reale, Lo Spirito Santo amore del Padre e del Figlio: alla genesi di una dottrina: la pneumatologia agostiniana fra il 387/8 e il 393, Rome 1995; S. Zañartu, El Espíritu y el Hijo en la fe de la Iglesia. Algunos alcances respecto a la controversia sobre el Filioque: Teología y Vida 40 (1999) 278-311.

F. Bolgiani

HOMER

I. In the Fathers - II. Possible influence in the NT.

I. In the Fathers. By considering the modes and forms of the reception of the Homeric poems by Christian authors, we can measure their ability to confront Greek civilization as manifested in the work of its most authoritative and prestigious representative. Homer, whose work was present and received both praise and criticism of various kinds throughout the entire experience of Greek paganism, was at the center—with his critic Plato—of the encounter of Christianity with Hellenism, in a way not unlike what had earlier occurred in relations between Hellenism and Judaism. It should be recalled that Hellenistic Judaism had, besides the tragedian Ezekiel, at least three epic poets: Philo, Theodotus and the mysterious Sosates, who flourished at Alexandria in the 1st c. B.C. (and is referred to with the revealing appellative Ebraicus Omirus only in the so-called Excerpta Latina Barbari, the early medieval Latin translation of the Chronicle of the Theosophy (P.F. Beatrice, Anonymi Monophysitae Theosophia: An Attempt at Reconstruction, Leiden, 2001, p. 104, ll. 218-219).

Homer's presence made itself felt in Christian literature, but in differing ways, from the moment in which the Greek *apologists of the 2nd c. posed the problem of the relationship between their new faith and the Greek culture in which they were raised. It is no accident that the name of Homer was invoked positively for the first time by *Justin, 1 Apol. 18,5, in support of the Christian truth of the judgment of the dead and punishment in the next world. But Justin also expressed appreciation of Socrates for having called for a ban of Homer and some other pagan poets from his republic (2 Apol. 10,6). This ambiguity characterizes in general the attitude of the Greek and Latin apologists toward Homer (see, e.g., *Minucius, Oct. 23,2; *Tertullian, Ad Nat. I, 10 and Apol. 14,4). We will not provide here a complete or systematic list of the citations of Homer in ancient Christian literature, much less of the allusions to him, which are not always easy to detect. More useful in this setting will be to indicate some privileged areas of the Christian use of the Homeric poems, making use where necessary of the ample panorama offered by Bartelink.

1. Homer is often considered, along with *Orpheus, the Sibyl, *Hystaspes, Hermes Trismegistus, as one of the "pagan" prophets of Christian revelation, esp. with regard to the two special themes of *monotheism and *eschatology. Particular importance attaches, in the context of antipolytheistic polemic, to the citation of Iliad II, 204: "The multiplicity of lords is not a good thing. Only one should be the lord" (as already in Philo, Conf. ling. 170; and then cf. *Tatian, Or. 14,1; ps.-Justin, Coh. 17; *Epiphanius, Anc. 104,3; *Cyril Alex., C. Jul. 7). For *Clement of Alexandria, Homer is an involuntary and unconscious prophet of Christian truth (Paed. I, 6,36,1) and, though representing the gods as subject to human passions, shows himself to know divine reality (Strom. V, 99-100 and V, 116-117). This line of interpretation finds confirmation in *Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autol. II, 38) and in the Cohortatio of ps.-*Justin, as well as in Justin and Clement. Here, along with the critique of polytheism (ch. 2), appreciation is expressed for the poet's testimony regarding monotheism (ch. 17 and ch. 24 with the exegesis of the Homeric "catena aurea" of Iliad VIII, 18 ff.) and on the resurrection of bodies (ch. 28).

2. The significant analogies between Homeric poetry and Christian theology, and the various impressive similarities between biblical accounts and Homeric myths, are explained with recourse to the theory that Moses lived prior to Homer (the antiquity argument), and Homer had thus copied from the books of Moses (the plagiarism or literary theft argument). As early as Justin, Moses is said to be older than the Greek writers, and the Greek philosophers and poets are said to have drawn on the prophets (1 Apol. 44,8-9 and 59,1). Justin's disciple *Tatian was the first Christian author to explicitly maintain the chronological precedence of Moses with respect to Homer, considering these two figures as the two founders, the points of reference, respectively, of barbarian wisdom and Greek civilization (Or. 31), and from this he concludes that the myths of Homer are an imitation of the Mosaic texts (Or. 41). This is an apologetic argument of Hellenistic-Jewish origin (see Aristobulus in Eusebius of Caesarea, P.E. XIII, 12,13) aimed at highlighting the antiquity, and therefore the truth, of the biblical revelation (among the numerous texts, see also Clem. Alex., Strom. I, 21 and V, 14; Origen, C. Cels. I, 18; IV, 21 and VI, 7.43). Basing his work on that of the historian Diodorus Siculus, ps.-Justin puts forward the original theory acc. to which Homer learned wisdom from Moses during his sojourn in Egypt (Coh. 9 and 28). Of course, for a pagan polemicist like *Celsus precisely the opposite was the case: the biblical tradition is later than the truth of *paganism, of which it offers only a perverse caricature.

3. The figure of Homer, taken up by the orthodox polemicists in his specific function of prophet of some fundamental Christian truths, was nonetheless rejected by the same authors as the main source of inspiration of *gnostic doctrines. The gnostics did not confine themselves to distorting the meaning of Scripture, subjecting it to a forced treatment of transposition and adaptation completely analogous to that which the authors of *centos applied to material drawn from the Homeric poems (see *Irenaeus, A.H. I, 9,4 and II, 14,2; Tertullian, Praescr. haer. 39,3-5). They corrupted the content of Scripture itself through recourse to pagan doctrines, worked out in an exemplary manner by their "prophet" Homer (see the information on the *Valentinians in Irenaeus, A.H. I, 12,2; II, 5,4; II, 14,1-2; IV, 33,3; information on Naassenes, *Sethians, Peratae and *Simonians in Philosophumena V,7,30-41; V,8,1-3; V,8,34-35; V,20,10-20; VI,15-16; VI,19,1-4; cf. Epiphanius, Haer. XXI,3,3). These accusations find explicit confirmation in The Exegesis on the Soul (NHC II, 6), whose author, to illustrate the condition of the *soul fallen into the world, refers to two citations of the Odyssey regarding the exile of Ulysses on Calypso's island and of Helen at Troy. Notoriously, in Simonian gnosis Helen was the name of the divine Ennoia.

4. Beyond their irreconcilable theological differences, what orthodox and gnostic authors have in common in their handling of the Homeric material is recourse to *allegorical exegesis, an inheritance of the Hellenistic culture from which all without distinction drew inspiration, each in his own way. Already the pagan philosophers of the imperial age (*Stoics, Neo-Pythagoreans and *Neoplatonists) sought authoritative confirmation of their ideas in the work of the wise Homer (see, e.g., the Homeric Problems of Heraclitus, Cornutus's Compendium of Greek Theology, the interpretations of *Numenius of Apamea, ps.-Plutarch's treatise On Homer, and *Porphyry's commentaries on the Styx and on the Cave of the Nymphs, besides the Homeric Questions). Christians of Hellenistic formation also sought out the hidden meanings of the Homeric poems, of course rereading them in the light of Christian symbolism and of the corresponding biblical images.

The Odyssey presents some privileged cases of this Christian exegesis: (a) moly, the herb given by Hermes to Ulysses to render him invulnerable to Circe's deceits, now is the gospel message that Christ, the true Hermes, gives for the acquisition of gnosis and the person's divinization (Clem. Alex., Strom. VII,16,95,1-3), and it is the instrument which makes it possible for intelligence to overcome the animal condition (Boethius, Cons. IV,3 Metrum); (b) the willow—"destroyer of the fruit"—is in its turn a symbol of chastity (*Methodius, Symp. IV,3). But it is esp. the episode of the Sirens and of Ulysses tied to the mast of the ship which moved the Christian writers to a long series of reinterpretations and variations on the theme, of dense theological and spiritual meaning. Clement of Alexandria first sees in the Sirens, not only an image of habits and pleasure (Protr. XII,12,118,1-4), but also of the risks inherent for the Christian in secular culture (Strom. I,10,48,6; VI,11,89,1; cf. ps.-Justin, Coh. 36,3; Basil, Leg. lib. gent. 4; Boethius, Cons. I,1). For the Philosophumena the Sirens represent the temptation to heresy (VII,13,1-3). Intentionally rejecting the Homeric model, Methodius declares in his turn to not want to listen, bound, to the deadly song of the Sirens, which he opposes to the chorus of the prophets and apostles and to the divine mysteries, knowledge of which is the source of salvation (Lib. arb. I,1-4). The reading of the Sirens in a "moral" key, which identifies them with worldly enjoyments and sensual pleasures, takes its place, from the 4th c., alongside that regarding heresy. The figure of Ulysses/Odysseus too is subjected to diverse reinterpretations acc. to the context. These exegetical developments are documented in texts of *Ambrose (De fide III, 1,4-5; Exp. Luc. IV,2,3; Expl. Ps. 43, 75), *Jerome (Ep. 22,18,2; 54,13,1; 117,6,4; In Os. II, praef.; In Ier. III, praef. etc.), *Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 16,7; 23,30), *Maximus of Turin (Hom. 37), *Synesius (Ep. 142).

Less well known is the fact that the Iliad too was subjected to allegorical reinterpretation by Christian authors. *Origen's great familiarity with the Homeric poems is due to his youthful activity as a grammarian (*Eus., HE 6,2-3). Certainly the reading of Homer was a regular practice at the school of Caesarea, where all of the philosophers (except the atheists) and the Greek poets were studied (*Greg. Thaum., Panegyric to Origen 13). The Neoplatonist *Proclus (In Timaeum 20) has transmitted the vivid memory of a teaching of Origen (not the nonexistent pagan Origen, but the sole Christian Origen) on the sublime language of the Homeric poetry, and of the critical reaction of his disciple Porphyry, whose commentary on the Timaeus was in all likelihood the direct source of Proclus's information. For Origen, despite the inevitable moral and religious errors (C. Cels. IV,36; VII,54), Homer unquestionably remains a poet to be admired (IV,91), the best of the poets (VII,6). Origen in fact maintained—seemingly the first among the Christians to do so—the legitimacy and necessity of the allegorical exegesis of the Iliad and of the accounts regarding the Trojan War (C. Cels. I,42). He was moved, very probably in the lost Stromata, to interpret boldly, but with absolute coherence, the figures of Achilles and Hector as types of Christ and the devil respectively. As Proclus relates Porphyry's criticism of Origen regarding the Homeric style, similarly *Didymus the Blind's Commentary on Ecclesiastes 9,10 cd, which we have in a papyrus of Tura (III, 279,2–281,24), reports Porphyry's scathing criticism of Origen's allegorical interpretation of the battles of Achilles and Hector (in the Origeniana Sexta, I have proposed to restore to Origen this exegesis, which was previously mistakenly attributed to Porphyry himself). We have here a concrete example of that type of application of pagan allegorical method to biblical doctrines that aroused so much indignation in Porphyry (see Eus., HE 6,19,8). After Origen, one finds a similar "christological" exegesis of Achilles (but without the corresponding "diabolical" interpretation of Hector) in *Constantine's discourse Oratio ad Sanctos 20,8-9.

The work of A. Carlini (SCO 46, 1996, 385-394) and A. Linguiti (CPF I, 1, Florence 1999, 623-629), both maintainers of the traditional interpretation which attributes to Porphyry this paradoxical "allegory," not only do not propose any integration of the lacuna of the papyrus, but there conclusions are also seriously compromised by the inexplicable silence on all of these sources that instead converge in indicating Origen's authorship of the exegesis as reported by Didymus.

5. An important aspect of the influence exercised by Hellenistic Homeric philology on the techniques of Christian biblical hermeneutics is the transposition of the principle of exegesis that is immanent within the text, acc. to which Homer is explained by Homer (Homeron ex Homerou saphenizein: cf. Porphyry, Quaest. hom. su Z 201). In the Christian context the principle of the autohermeneutic of the biblical text was applied in an explicit and conscious way beginning with Clement (Strom. VII, 16,96) and Origen (Princ. IV, 2,4; Comm. in Ps. 1 in Philoc. II, 3), with the aim of illustrating obscure points of Scripture by recourse to other passages that were clear, thus overcoming its apparent contradictions and absurdities, esp. in polemic with heretics. Scripture is thus explained with Scripture.

6. One remains more or less skeptical of the attempt, which was not devoid of acute observations, made by MacDonald to interpret the apocryphal Acts of Andrew as an intentional Christian rewriting of the Odyssey, which aims to transmythologize the Homeric conception of the world into the Christian myth contained in the gospel and to propose a new series of alternative values (cf. the version of D. Dawson in International Journal of the Classical Tradition 2 [1995/96] 131-134). It is always difficult to verify and evaluate the importance of the literary and ideological impact of the Homeric poems in the absence of explicit citations or sufficiently clear allusions.

What is certain is that Homer has left ample traces of himself in the numerous literary reminisces present in the 4th-6th-c. Fathers (esp. Greek, but also Latin). And it could not be otherwise, if one considers that the reading of the Homeric poems was an obligatory subject of study at the grammar schools, which were attended by young Christians (even in Roman Africa: see Aug., Conf. I, 14 and 16). Precisely because of the awareness of the importance that the Homeric poems, along with the rest of pagan Greek literary production, had for scholastic education even among Christians, the emperor *Julian decided to exclude Christian teachers from teaching with the famous edict of 362 (see esp. his Epist. 55), which in reaction led to a comprehensive rethinking of the value of Homer for Christians and of the possible ways in which his work could be used. *Basil does not hesitate to recommend Homer's poetry, defending it in a hymn to virtue (Leg. lib. gent. 5), giving authoritative indication of the path to be followed.

Homer is amply present in the epic paraphrases of the biblical books such as the Paraphrases of the Psalms attributed to *Apollinaris of Laodicea, the Paraphrases of the Gospel of John attributed to *Nonnus of Panopolis (as well as, obviously, in his "pagan" poem Dionysiaka), the paraphrases of the Octateuch, Zechariah and Daniel of the empress *Eudoxia (author also of a paraphrase of the Life of *Cyprian of Antioch: see Photius, Bibl. cod. 183 and 184). But, besides its recovery in the epic paraphrases, the Homeric material is also widely found esp. in those new creations which were the Homeric Centos* of biblical theme (Homerokentra-Homerocentones). Jerome is the first to mention the Christian Homeric centos, without naming names, and of course to express his lively opposition to a literary genre which in his view subjected the Word of God to an intolerable forcing of the text (Ep. 53,7). The pioneering collection of Homeric centos by the mysterious bishop Patricius nonetheless had great success in the Byzantine world, thanks also to the famous reworking of them by the empress Eudoxia. Nonetheless much ecdotic and exegetical work remains to be done so as to untie the very complex knots of an extremely problematic MS tradition, and to articulate the proper literary and theological placement of these works.

V. Buchheit, Homer bei Methodios von Olympos: RhM 99 (1956) 17-36; H. Rahner, Griechische Mythen in christlicher Deutung, Zürich 1957; J. Golega, Der homerische Psalter. Studien über die dem Apolinarios von Laodicaea zugeschriebene Psalmenparaphrase (SPB 6), Ettal 1960; J. Daniélou, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux II^e et III^e siècles, Paris 1961; H. Rahner, Symbole der Kirche, Salzburg 1964, 239-271; R.L. Wilken, The Homeric Cento in Irenaeus, "Adversus Haereses" I,9,4: VChr 21 (1967) 25-33; G. Glockmann, Homer in der frühchristlichen Literatur bis Justinus (TU 105), Berlin 1968; N. Zeegers Van der Vorst, Les citations des poètes grecs chez les apologistes chrétiens du II^e siècle, Louvain 1972; J. Dummer, Epiphanius von Constantia und Homer: Philologus 119 (1975) 84-91; M. Scopello, Les citations d'Homère dans le traité de "L'exégèse de l'âme," in M. Krause (ed.), Gnosis and Gnosticism, NHS 8, Leiden 1977, 3-13; G.J.M. Bartelink, Homère dans les œuvres de Théodoret de Cyr: Orpheus n.s. 2 (1981) 6-28; S.J.D. Cohen, Sosates the Jewish Homer: HTR 74 (1981) 391-396; A. Le Boulluec, Exégèse et polémique antignostique chez Irénée et Clément d'Alexandrie: l'exemple du centon, in E.A. Livingstone (ed.), StPatr 17/2, Oxford 1982, 707-713; J. Pépin, The Platonic and Christian Ulysses, in D.J. O'Meara (ed.), Neoplatonism and Christian Thought, Albany 1982, 3-18 and 234-239; G.J.M. Bartelink, Homer in den Werken des Kyrillos von Alexandrien: WS NF 17 (1983) 62-68; R. Lamberton, Homer the Theologian. Neoplatonist Allegorical Reading and the Growth of the Epic Tradition (The Transformation of the Classical Heritage 9), Berkeley-Los Angeles-

London 1986; B. Neuschäfer, Origenes als Philologe, SBA 18/1-2, Basel 1987; J. Pépin, La tradition de l'allégorie de Philon d'Alexandrie à Dante, Paris 1987; A.J. Droge, Homer or Moses? Early Christian Interpretations of the History of Culture, HUTh 26, Tübingen 1989; P.F. Beatrice, Porphyry's Judgment on Origen, in R.J. Daly (ed.), Origeniana Quinta, BETL 105, Louvain 1992, 351-367; F. Siegert, Homerinterpretation - Tora-Unterweisung - Bibelauslegung. Vom Ursprung der patristischen Hermeneutik, in E.A. Livingstone (ed.), StPatr 25, Louvain 1993, 159-171; G.J.M. Bartelink, Homer: RAC 16 (1994) 116-147; N. Hopkinson, Nonnus and Homer, in Id. (ed.), Studies in the "Dionysiaca" of Nonnus, Cambridge 1994, 9-42; D.R. MacDonald, Christianizing Homer. The Odyssey, Plato, and the Acts of Andrew, New York-Oxford 1994; Chr. Riedweg, Ps.-Justin (Markell von Ankyra?). Ad Graecos de vera religione (bisher "Cohortatio ad Graecos"), SBA 25/1-2, Basel 1994; P.F. Beatrice, Didyme l'Aveugle et la tradition de l'allégorie, in G. Dorival - A. Le Boulluec (eds.), Origeniana Sexta. Origène et la Bible, BETL 118, Louvain 1995, 579-590; S. Ackermann, Christliche Apologetik und heidnische Philosophie im Streit um das Alte Testament, SBB 36, Stuttgart 1997; R. Klein, Die Bedeutung von Basilius' Schrift "ad adolescentes" für die Erhaltung der heidnisch-griechischen Literatur: RQ 92 (1997) 162-176; P.F. Beatrice, Diodore de Sicile chez les Apologistes, in B. Pouderon - J. Doré (eds.), Les Apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, Théol. Hist. 105, Paris 1998, 219-235; H. Chadwick, Antike Schriftauslegung. Pagane und christliche Allegorese. Activa und Passiva im antiken Umgang mit der Bibel, Hans Lietzmann Vorlesungen 3, Berlin-New York 1998; N. Pace, Il canto delle Sirene in Ambrogio, Gerolamo e altri Padri della Chiesa, in L.F. Pizzolato - M. Rizzi (ed.), Nec timeo mori. Atti del Congr. Int. di studi ambrosiani nel XVI centenario della morte di Sant'Ambrogio, SPMed 21, Milan 1998, 673-695; A.-L. Rey, Patricius, Eudocie, Optimus, Côme de Jérusalem. Centons homériques (Homerocentra), SC 437, Paris 1998 (bibl.); M.D. Usher, Homeric Stitchings. The Homeric Centos of the Empress Eudocia, Lanham-Boulder-New York-Oxford 1998; Id., Homerocentones Eudociae Augustae, Stuttgart and Leipzig 1999.

P.F. Beatrice

II. Possible influence in the NT. Recently it has been proposed that traces of influence of Homer can be found even in the NT, and esp. in the gospels (in particular in those of Mk and Lk) and in the Acts of the Apostles. The main supporter of this thesis is Dennis MacDonald, who also proposed (in his Christianizing Homer) that the apocryphal Acts of Andrew could be seen as a Christianization of Homer. This hypothesis is grounded in the availability of Homer's text to NT authors, who, like their readers, probably learned to write Greek upon Homer; students were normally invited to paraphrase Homer at school. In The Homeric Epics and the Gospel of Mark, MacDonald argued that Mark constitutes a deliberate inversion of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, which transforms Homer's heroic values, proposing Jesus as a new hero. Mark emulated stories in both Homer and the OT, in order to present Jesus as more compassionate, powerful, noble and inured to suffering than Odysseus was for Homer. But also parallels with the Iliad are detected, e.g., between Mark's account of Jesus' crucifixion and Homer's account of the death of Hector, and between Mark's account of the burial of Jesus and Homer's account of that of Hector. As for the Acts of Andrew, MacDonald sees them as a transformative rewriting of the Odyssey in the light of Plato's denunciations of Homer, substituting the vices depicted by the poet with Christian virtues. At the end of these Acts, *Andrew is described as a kind of Christianized Socrates. Scholars have either enthusiastically accepted MacDonald's thesis, esp. in respect to the gospels, or rejected it.

D. MacDonald, Christianizing Homer: The Odyssey, Plato, and the Acts of Andrew, Oxford 1994; Id., The Homeric Epics and the Gospel of Mark, New Haven, 2000; Id., Does the New Testament Imitate Homer? Four Cases from the Acts of the Apostles, 2003; M. Mitchell, Homer in the New Testament? Journal of Religion 83,2 (2003) 244-261.

I. Ramelli

HOMERIC CENTOS (poetry). A literary genre consisting in the reuse of verses or half verses taken from the Iliad or the Odyssey which, sewn then together in a clever way by skilled poets and with minimal intervention on their part acc. to the epic model, recounts the chief events in the history of the NT, with a few brief mentions of the story of the creation of the world and original *sin. There are five redactions of the Homeric *centos, the first two of which are long and the other three brief. More specifically, the first, which contains 2,354 verses, was the fruit of the revision of a preexistent cento written by a certain presbyter Patricius, a revision completed by *Eudoxia, the wife of *Theodosius II (5th c.). The second—despite the fact that codex Paris. suppl. gr. 388, considers it a summary and attributes it to Patricius, Eudoxia, the philosopher Optimus and Cosmas of *Jerusalem—should preferably be seen as anonymous (Rey is of a different opinion). This redaction derives from the first with the addition of more than 700 original Homeric verses; it contains 1,957 vv., but the artistic skill is far inferior. The brief redactions a, b and g, each with about 600-700 verses, are epitomes and were intended exclusively for scholastic use. Only until a few decades ago did scholars hold the Homeric centos in contempt, showing little, if any, interest. The centos have recently undergone a significant reevaluation with regard to their textual criticism and exegesis. Recent studies have allowed scholars to verify that, esp. in the first redaction, the selection of Homeric verses was never haphazard but was governed by a significant amount of attention given to the intertextual relationship with the two chief models, Homer and the gospels, and the arrangements established were often the fruit of an almost philological expertise. Moreover, apocryphal texts and patristic reflection in the Greek language had an influence on the Homeric centos. It was therefore a courtly literary genre, which aimed, however, at scholastic ends or merely entertainment (divertissement), among the highest expressions of the reception of classical texts in Late Antiquity and esp. of the fusion of the imaginary *pagan with Christian revelation.

Complete Edition: R. Schembra (ed.), Homerocentones, Turnhout 2007. Partial editions: A. Ludwich (ed.), Eudociae Augustae . . . carminum Graecorum reliquiae, Leipzig 1897 (a little less than 400 verses of the second redaction); A.-L. Rey (ed.), Patricius, Eudocia, Optimus, Côme de Jérusalem. Centons Homériques, Paris 1998 (II red.); M.D. Usher (ed.), Homerocentones Eudociae Augustae, Stuttgart - Leipzig 1999 (I red.). Commentaries: R. Schembra, La prima redazione dei centoni omerici. Traduzione e commento, Alessandria 2006; Id., La seconda redazione dei centoni omerici. Traduzione e commento, Alessandria 2007. For a thorough bibliography, see the complete edition and the commentaries.

R. Schembra

HOMILIARY

I. In general - II. Liturgical homiliaries - III. Greek and Eastern homiliaries.

I. In general. A homiliary is a collection of patristic *homilies, arranged acc. to the course of the *liturgical year: it is thus a liturgical book. Its essential purpose is worship. So the homiliary must not be confused with the sermonarius (which groups together Sermones or moralizing, edifying or *parenetic addresses) or the legendarius (an anthology of *hagiographical texts). Obviously this distinction is not always rigorously observed. Often the collections have a heterogeneous appearance, so that the liturgical book is often transformed into a "homiliary-legendary" or a "sermonary-homiliary." Furthermore, besides homilies properly so-called, these collections also accepted extracts from biblical commentaries and, more rarely, scriptural texts.

Their purpose, *catechetical and didactic before becoming devotional (as happened in the Carolingian era for a well-defined category of homiliary), was to explain the choice of texts to be proclaimed in a liturgical context. In most cases, the homiletic repertoire had a practical function: with the sacramentary and the biblical lectionary, the homiliary was the first prompt-book for preachers, making up for their deficiencies or easing their task. In referring to the works of the church fathers, the homiliary attests a particular moment in the history of dogma: it was the typical representative of the traditional exegesis expressed in the homeliae Patrum. The homiliary was thus a *florilegium that performed several functions: in modern times these would be specified in manuals, such as the enchiridion asceticum, enchiridion patristicum, manuale praedicatorum etc.

In both West and East, the homiliary depended on scriptural (lectionaries, systematic gospel commentaries), liturgical (which provided its general framework) and esp. patristic collections. We must always distinguish, alongside liturgical homilies, exegetical or dogmatic works in the form of homilies and homiletical florilegia not explicitly intended for worship. Finally, fragments of patristic homilies are found in the catenae* and in conciliar and synodal acts (which are for the most part legal documents).

Obviously the homiliary depended on liturgical circumstances and reflected the order of the liturgical cycle at a precise date and for a local church, often yet to be identified. After the Carolingian "renaissance," it would be imposed on the Western church as part of the liturgical reform promoted by Charlemagne and Louis the Pius. But the Carolingian homiliary itself (whose most notable example is the collection of *Paul the Deacon) was modified by the churches that adopted it, partly because of the development of the sanctoral cycle; describing the liturgical homiliaries, therefore, is a complex undertaking, certainly not made easier by the taste for centonization! Later some religious orders (Cluny, Cîteaux, Chartreuse) adopted their own homiliary: this step was in line with the ecclesial mentality created by the Gregorian reform.

Alongside the liturgical homiliaries, some church fathers (or their disciples or admirers) arranged their own homilies acc. to a liturgical pattern: the texts were selected acc. to specific purposes: spiritual, catechetical etc., in such a way as to constitute a complete cycle of the office of preaching, officium praedicationis, sometimes aimed at specific categories of hearers. These collections, fictitious or occasional, tell us something of the Fathers' oratorical activity, but are not compilations methodically organized in dependence on the Ordines Romani (starting with the 6th-c. Ordo XIV and the various 8th-c. Ordines XIII), which would influence the main liturgical homiliaries.

II. Liturgical homiliaries. These comprise two groups. 1. Office homiliaries. The custom of reading a homily during the liturgical hour of readings (Matins) is attested from the 6th c. These homiliaries show a structure adapted to that end. They are known by the name of their copyist or compiler (e.g., Hagimund, Alan of Farfa, Paul the Deacon), their place of origin (St. Peter's) or the location of the MS (Wolfenbüttel, Toledo, Vienna etc.). These collections are the basis of an arrangement which remained in force until the reform of the Roman breviary promoted by Vatican II.

2. Mass homiliaries. The ancient episcopal privilege of preaching was extended to priests, esp. in *Gaul, from the 4th c. To forestall their lack of competence, some bishops (e.g., *Faustus of Riez, late 5th c.; *Caesarius of Arles, d. 542) composed florilegia of homiletic texts, which priests then read at the parish mass. A list of such compilations suggests the intense effort at that time by the pastors: *Gaudentius of Brescia (d. ca. 410), *Maximinus the Arian (d. early 5th c.), *Hilary of Arles (d. 449), *Salvian of Marseille (mid-5th c.), *Victor of Cartenna (5th c.), *Valerian of Cimiez (d. 455/460), *Museus of Marseille (d. ca. 461), *Avitus of Vienne (d. ca. 518), *Sedatus of Nîmes (d. early 6th c.), ps.-Germanus of Paris (6th c.), *Bede the Venerable (d. 735), Burchard of Würzburg (d. ca. 754), Florus of Lyons (d. ca. 860) etc.

With a relative abundance of texts and despite the limited selection of patristic authors (e.g., a prevalence of Augustinian texts), the homiliaries made their contribution to the emergence of a Christian culture. For several centuries they were the main instruments of knowledge of the church fathers: in the absence of libraries, many clerics, monks, nuns and laymen came in contact with patristic thought and the theology of the church through the liturgical homiliary. Much of the spirituality of the early Middle Ages felt the consequences of this. Only in the later Middle Ages were nonpatristic liturgical homiliaries compiled; the oldest homiliary of this kind written in a national language (Germanic) seems to belong to the Tyrolese canon Conrad: dated 1170, it is dedicated to the plebeis et popularibus presbyteris.

H. Barré - R. Grégoire, s.v. Homéliaires: DSp 7, 597-617 (with bibl.); R. Grégoire, Les homéliaires du moyen âge. Inventaire et analyse des manuscrits, Rerum ecclesiasticarum documenta, Fontes, VI, Rome 1966; Id., Homéliaires liturgiques médiévaux. Analyse de manuscrits, Spoleto 1981; H. Barré, Les homéliaires carolingiens de l'école d'Auxerre, ST 225, Vatican City 1962.

R. Grégoire

III. Greek and Eastern homiliaries. While it can designate any collection of homilies, the term homiliary is applied in general to the collections which follow, wholly or in part, the order of the liturgical year. In the terminology created by A. Ehrhard for Byzantine homiletics, Homiliar ("homiliary") designates collections which concern the moveable parts of the year (from the period before Lent to the Sunday after Pentecost), in contrast to the Panegyrika ("*panegyrics") collections for the fixed feasts. But historically it is more appropriate to distinguish between hagiographical collections (perhaps already existing in the 5th c.) and festive homiliaries, which made their appearance presumably in the 6th c. The Greek MS tradition, which only exceptionally goes back before the 9th c., often attests collections of mixed type.

Festive homiliaries are completely lacking in the Coptic and Ethiopic area. In the other Eastern languages, onto a nucleus translated from Greek, either directly (into Syriac, Arabic, Armenian čaṙentir) or indirectly (in part from Armenian into Georgian mravaltʿavi; sometimes from Syriac to Arabic), are grafted texts of local provenance and adaptations due to the needs of the individual liturgical calendars.

The area of Greek and Eastern homiletic collections still awaits systematic study.

DSp 7, 597-618; A. Ehrhard, Überlieferung und Bestand der hagiographischen and homiletischen Literatur der griechischen Kirche . . . , TU 50-52, Leipzig-Berlin 1936-1952; M. van Esbroeck, Les plus anciens homéliaires géorgiens . . . , Louvain-la-Neuve 1975; H. Hennephof, Byzantinische Homiliare und die byzantinische Geschichte, in Actes du XIVe Congrès international des Études Byzantines, Bucarest, September 1971. II, Bucharest 1975, 113-120; J.-M. Sauget, Littératures et manuscrits des chrétientés syriaques et arabes, Studi e texts 389, Vatican City 1998; M. van Esbroeck - U. Zanetti, Le manuscrit Érévan 993. Inventaire des pièces: REArm n.s. 12 (1977) 123-167; U. Zanetti, Homélies copto-arabes pour la Semaine Sainte: Augustinianum 23 (1983) 517-522; M. van Esbroeck, Description du répertoire de l'homéliaire de Muš (Maténadaran 7729): REArm n.s. 18 (1984) 273-280; A. Olivar, La predicación cristiana antigua, Barcelona 1991.

S.J. Voicu

HOMILY. In the patristic age, it is not easy to establish precise boundaries between the different genres of sacred eloquence; indeed, we meet words which cover technical concepts before designating a more limited meaning: such is the case of tractatus, homilia, sermo. The tractatus is a development, an exposition, a "treatise": it refers to a work methodically written and edited, with a didactic purpose. Homilia and sermo describe an oratorical composition, a piece intended to be proclaimed. These two genres of eloquence are distinct from spiritual conversation, conlatio or colloquium, which have an ascetic and mystical flavor. At a semantic and philological level, these distinctions must not be generalized, nor rigidly established. Even in *Augustine, the nuances of terminology are a sign of this uncertainty: the tractatus is sometimes aimed at a popular, not particularly erudite audience, hence the denomination populares tractatus. The liber, or book, however, is a composition intended for a class of public or an individual reader who is well-educated and capable of grasping immediately the essence of the work. In the Latin Christian world, from the 4th c., sermo refers to any kind of preaching, whether catechesis in the strict sense, exegetical interpretation, *parenetic admonishment, circumstantial religious address or explanation of a rite. Praedicare is a technical term which, in the Christian world, would be confined to liturgical use. We also meet the address, allocutio; the discourse, dictio; the debate, disputatio; the lecture, oratio (a term which later took on the meaning of invocation, supplication); the laudatory discourse, sermo panegyricus. In the majority of cases, the point of contact between these different concepts is the use of Sacred Scripture. The homily was a liturgical act which took place during a sacred celebration; its written text transmits the essential thought (in some cases through the work of stenographers). In the patristic age and until the spread of printing, preaching enjoyed a privileged importance, in an age when written texts circulated slowly. Evangelization took place almost exclusively through preaching, i.e., the biblical homily, which was not normally aimed at solving problems of scriptural *exegesis. That role belonged to the libri glossarum, whose best-known example, from the Carolingian era, is the Glossarium Ansileubi, probably compiled in the monastery of Corbie. These anthologies fulfilled the function of modern encyclopedias.

Alongside patristic commentaries, preachers had at their disposal collections of extracts, two main categories of which are known. The first corresponds to the *homiliary-type, whose sermons are arranged acc. to the liturgical cycle (temporal and sanctoral); the second is either alphabetical or follows a list of topics (virtues, vices and other spiritual topics). To this group belong works like the Liber scintillarum of Defensor of Ligugé (7th c.) and the numerous collections of Sententiae*, which are really anthologies of dicta, testimonia, auctoritates, excerpta, etc. of the church fathers and other writers, ecclesiastical or otherwise.

If we abstract from the homilies recorded in the NT, including the interpretations of parables given by Christ himself, what stands out is the undoubted presence of a regular homiletic preaching from the first Christian generations. Toward the mid 2nd c., *Justin's 1 Apology describes the Sunday assembly, in which city-dwellers and those from the countryside met together to listen to the reading of prophetic and apostolic texts; then, the president of the assembly gave an admonitio and an adhortatio: the former interpreted the sacred text; the latter proposed some concrete applications.

The baptismal ritual of the Ordo Romanus XI (2nd half 6th c., or early 7th) provides for a homily after the proclamation of the gospel by the deacon. This was a normal pastoral procedure; patristic commentaries and sermons were also read. The Rule of St. *Benedict (1st half of 6th c.) and the Ordines romani attest it. Thus, e.g., reads the Ordo Romanus XIII (1st half of 8th c.): Deinde leguntur sermones vel omelias catholicorum patrum ad ipsum diem pertinentes, id est Augustini, Gregorii, Hieronymi, Ambrosii vel ceterorum: this is the custom of Christmas Eve. For the feast of St. Stephen, Ordo Romanus XIII specifies: Legunt Actuum Apostolorum et lectiones orthodoxorum patrum ad ipsum diem pertinentes et similiter sermones ad ipsius celebritatem congruentes. The liturgist refers to patristic collections, liturgical anthologies structured acc. to the unfolding of the liturgical year.

If this patristic presence guaranteed a secure theological basis, avoiding doctrinal improvisations and imprecision, we must nevertheless inquire into the concrete pastoral efficacy of such texts. In catechesis and basic evangelization, was the thought of the Fathers, coldly read or declaimed, really a digestible food for Christians little prepared to listen to a theological language that was sometimes already outdated? Was the terminology of a *Leo the Great, proclaimed in a country church, really capable of moving medieval hearts and opening them to contemplation of the mystery? The problem raised by the patristic homily is always that of the liturgical use of such a document during the eucharistic celebration and choral (or individual) psalmody, as a substitute for a "direct" homily. Effective evangelizers like St. *Eligius (d. 659) and St. *Boniface (d. 759) did not hesitate to mechanically repeat the sermons of St. *Caesarius of Arles (d. 542). In the 8th c., Alcuin (d. 804), dedicating his Life of St. Willibrord (d. 739) to Bishop Beonrad of Sens, specified: "In the first book, I have inserted a homily, hoping that it may be worthy of being preached by your venerable mouth": this homily was therefore proposed for the liturgical feast of Willibrord. Hagiography has preserved some homilies of saints: e.g., the Life of St. Eligius (d. 659).

So it is certain that the homily—read, recited from memory or personally composed—has always been present in the Christian liturgy; the compilation of the homiliary came later. Indeed, this collection was not systematically and specifically planned, but was the result of an evolution of liturgical life itself.

In the West, homiletic literature was in Latin. This Latin culture, transmitted by means of the liturgy, accustomed clerics—the prime beneficiaries and most assiduous readers of the patristic texts—with monks and nuns, to concise formal expression, precision in their theological reasoning and firmness of catechetical doctrine. If patristic texts circulated in Latin in the West, the language of popular preaching followed the evolution of local languages. But Latin remained the official language of public worship in the Middle Ages, and long after; the written homily would therefore conform to this usage. Copyists transcribed patristic sermons and homilies, without translating them anew, but with some corruptions due to the spread of local linguistic peculiarities. Apropos of this, it would be interesting to analyze the textual variants of the Latin homilies, the most attested in the homiletic collections, with the aim of verifying the possible influence of the spread of Romance and Germanic morphological forms: perhaps we would encounter suggestive phenomena that would go beyond strictly grammatical and philological peculiarities, and would in some way concern the interpretation or exegesis of the thought of the Fathers and its contamination by contact with the new tendencies. Research of this kind would not be unrealistic, since it would find an analogous point of support in medieval biblical MSS.

Another problem is that of the spoken homily. Proclaimed in the vulgar or popular tongue, it could later be rewritten in Latin, with a view to circulation and publication. This occurred esp. in the 12th c.: we should cite here "the last of the Fathers," Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), along with many other medieval writers.

Referring to a biblical text just proclaimed, the homily examines the totality of that scriptural pericope or confines itself to interpreting a few of its verses: the preacher's freedom of inspiration is, here, the main criterion determining the content of the pastoral teaching. This immediate reference to Scripture, while introducing the audience or reader to the heart of the argument, ensures a link between the Word of God and the concrete reality of the liturgical act. St. Benedict provides for the reading of the whole of Scripture, both OT and NT, and these readings would be accompanied by apposite homilies. The choice of the Father to help the understanding of the sacred text was not left to individual judgment or chance improvisation, but followed precise requirements: the writer's fame, his Catholic sense of the church, his doctrinal rectitude.

Even with the lectio continua of Scripture, the homily did not intend to comment on the entirety of the sacred texts: in this the church took up the earlier tradition of the synagogue. Going beyond literal commentary (and so choosing, to this end, specific biblical texts), the homilist or preacher interpreted the pericope, penetrated its spirit, drew out its essential point and emphasized it, in accordance with the methodology typical of midrash. The patristic homily and medieval exegesis would always conform to this procedure. So *Jewish Christian hermeneutics would know the two kinds of midrash: midrash haggadah (paraphrase which is translation and interpretation—moral, historical, *allegorical or mystical—originating from the *targum) abounds in some Fathers such as *Jerome, *Origen, *Eusebius, *Clement of Alexandria, *Justin, *Aphraates, *Ephrem; midrash halakhah set out to apply the text to the concrete situations of life and, in a Christian transposition, would be the origin of the sermon.

The Fathers did not hesitate to develop a theme in successive homilies over two or more liturgical celebrations, with explicit reference to this occurrence: this is the case of *Peter Chrysologus and Augustine, to cite two notable examples. The pastoral intent was evident, and the benefit to catechesis undeniable. The ill fortune of the times, esp. due to abuses caused by tendentious and unprepared preachers, led to gradual abandonment of the reading of the Bible and devaluation of the homily; the decline of exegetical analysis corresponds to this. In the patristic era, the Word of God was the food of piety; exegesis, put forward in a homiletic and liturgical context, was adapted to the needs of the congregation. The abuse of allegory and symbolism took away the immediate didactic dynamism of God's Word, to the point that in 1080 Gregory VII found himself obliged to forbid public reading of the Bible in Slavonic, so as not to debase the sacred text and to respect the ancient *disciplina arcani. By this time a grave crisis of preaching had begun, which would only be resolved by the spread of the artes praedicandi and of new techniques followed by the mendicant orders (Dominicans and Franciscans)—as well as by followers of the heretical movements—and with the narrative genre of the exempla. The ancient heritage did not totally disappear, since the sacred rhetoric of the Middle Ages often returned to the pattern fixed by St. Augustine's De doctrina christiana. But this evolution corresponded to a different theological and philosophical structure: patristic theology, assimilated and enlivened by wisdom theology (or "monastic" theology), was now overtaken by scholastic theology. A new humanism led to new forms of evangelization and catechesis, and the phenomenon emerged of a preacher who was not necessarily the "actor" of a liturgical celebration: this was the age of the "occasional sermon" (apologetic, moralizing, commemorative, laudatory, polemical), of the university sermon and of thematic preaching.

Ch. Mohrmann, Praedicare-Tractare-Sermo, in Études sur le latin des chrétiens, II, Rome 1961, 63-72; J. Leclercq, La liturgie et les paradoxes chrétiens, Lex orandi 36, Paris 1965, 205-227; J.B. Schneyer, Geschichte der katholischen Predigt, Freiburg i.Br. 1968; W. Schütz, Geschichte der christlichen Predigt, Berlin-New York 1972; C. Delcorno, La predicazione nell'età comunale, Florence 1974; R. Grégoire, Homéliaires liturgiques médiévaux. Analyse de manuscrits, Spoleto 1981 (with list of incipitarii intended to facilitate the identification of the homilies), 490-517 (alphabetical list of patristic homilies frequently cited or present in the homiliaries); J. Longère, La prédication médiévale, Paris 1983; RAC 16, 148-175; TRE 27, 244-248; G. Groppo, Storia della predicazione e della catechesi antica e medievale, Rome 1986; A. Monaci Castagno, Origene predicatore, Milan 1988; A. Olivar, La predicación cristiana antigua, Barcelona 1991; M. Peinado Peinado, La predicación del evangelio en los Padres de la Iglesia, Madrid 1992; M. Banniard, Viva voce. Communication écrite et orale du IV^e au IX^e siècle en Occident latin, Paris 1992; S.M. Oberhelman, Rhetoric and Homilies in Fourth-Century Christian Literature, Atlanta 1991; E. Mühlenberg - J. van Oort (eds.), Predigt in der Alte Kirche, Kampen 1994; R. Étaix, Homéliaires patristiques latins: recueil d'études de manuscrits médiévaux, Paris 1994; F.J. Tovar Paz, Tractatus, sermones atque homiliae: el cultivo del género literario del discurso homilético en la Hispania tardoantica y visigoda, Cáceres 1994; F. Siegert, Homily and Panegyrical Sermon, Handbook of Classical Rhetoric in the Hellenistic Period 330 B.C.–A.D. 400, ed. S.E. Porter, Leiden 1997, 421-443; Preacher and Audience, Studies in Early Christian and Byzantine Homilies, ed. M. Cunningham - P. Allen, Leiden 1998; H.O. Old, The Reading and Preaching of the Scriptures in the Worship of the Christian Church, 2 vols., Grand Rapids, MI 1998; B. Studer, Schola Christiana, Paderborn 1998; M. Sodi - A.M. Triacca, Dizionario di omiletica, Turin 1998; A. Stewart-Sykes, From Prophecy to Preaching: A Search for the Origins of Christian Homily, Leiden 2001.

R. Grégoire

HOMINE MISERO, De. Although associated with the name of *Columbanus, it is not generally considered authentic. It is a short sermon, composed in Ireland in the 5th c., which focuses its attention on the transitory nature of earthly things and invites all people to be humble, following the example of Christ.

CPL 1107; PL 80, 258-259; J. Laporte, Étude d'authenticité des oeuvres attribuées à Saint Colomban: Revue Mabillon 45 (1955) 1-34; C. Stancliffe, The Thirteen Sermons Attributed to Columbanus, in Columbanus: Studies on the Latin Writings, ed. M. Lapidge, Studies in Celtic History, Cambridge 1997, 93-202.

P. Marone

HOMOIANS (Homoeans). "Theological group which, in the trinitarian discussions of the second half of the 4th century, occupied an intermediate position between the Nicenes and the Arians" (Brennecke). In contrast with the other terms which characterized the various groupings that formed in the trinitarian discussions of the 4th c. (*Arians, *homoousians, *homoiousians etc.), the term "homoians" (Homeéns, Homöer, Homoean) is not ancient, but was coined by modern scholars to specifically designate members of the episcopate, both Eastern and Western, who, with the events of 359–360, took a position in favor of the formula of faith put forth by the emperor Constantius, who defined the Son as like (homoios) to the Father acc. to the Scripture, thus distancing themselves from homoousians (= Nicenes), homoiousians and radical Arians (= *anomoians). Ancient Catholic polemicists and historians did not initially give a specific name to this group, except occasionally, in relation to the councils of *Seleucia (359) and *Constantinople (360), as Acacians (οἵ περὶ Ἀκάκιον), after their leader *Acacius of Caesarea; but in reference to later events, they defined them tout court as Arians, though distinguishing them, in the East, from the radical Arians of *Eunomius (anomoians). Modern scholars also use the name homoians to designate the group headed by *Eudoxius and *Euzoius, who dominated religious policy under *Valens and maintained a modest vitality even after the definitive victory of the homoousians (= Nicenes). The same name was attributed to the opponents, in the West, of the Nicene Creed of 325; at the time they were also called Arians. The meaning and popularity of this name in recent historiography derive from the conviction that ancient polemicists and historians in the Nicene camp had arbitrarily called Arians anyone who opposed the Nicene Creed in places where many, esp. in the East, were hostile to it, considering it of *monarchian tendency, though distinguishing themselves from Arians true and proper. Moreover, with respect to the clear doctrinal specificity that characterizes the other groups active in the mid-4th c. (homoousians, homoiousians, anomoians), the homoians seem to be much less specified in this sense: they included members of the episcopate who wanted to back the intentions and orientation of Constantius, who wanted to unify the majority of the episcopate on the basis of a profession of faith—as indeed had the councils of *Rimini (359) and *Constantinople (360)—sufficiently general as to be able to be interpreted in the widest variety of ways, and so to obtain maximum adherence. The same policy was later pursued in the East by Va-lens. In short: they sought a formula with a mainly political meaning, doctrinally very unspecific, apt to disguise even a pro-Arian doctrinal position.

H.Chr. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer. Der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1899; Id., Homéens: DHGE 24 (1993) 932-960; M. Simonetti, Alla ricerca dei cosiddetti Omei: Cassiodorus 2 (1996) 41-49.

M. Simonetti

HOMOIOSIS THEO. From the end of the 2nd c. on, the Hellenistic idea of the ὁμοίωσις θεῷ was used in patristic theology to illustrate a biblical theme which quickly became familiar to the baptismal catechesis: that of the creation of humanity acc. to the image of God. *Irenaeus remained attached to the primitive tradition, probably of Asiatic origin, acc. to which the whole human being, body and soul, is the image of Christ, God-man (Adv. Haer. V, 16, 1-2), and will therefore reach similitude with the immortal God in the resurrection of the flesh in all its human reality. *Clement of Alexandria, on the other hand, following *Philo, returned to the *Platonic theme developed later by the *Stoics: the end of humanity is to be assimilated, as far as possible, to the divinity—to become just and holy with intelligence (Theat. 176A) by means of a virtuous life and through contemplation (Rep. VI, 13: 500c). Within contemplation, Clement includes understanding of Scripture, based on faith, and a virtuous life brought about esp. through the imitation of Christ (Strom. II, 100,3; III, 42, 1-2; VI, 77,5). A similar position is found in *Origen (Princ. III, 6). Later, under the influence of *Plotinus, who had integrated the theme of ὁμοίωσις θεῷ in his speculations of the double divinity, i.e., on the identification of the soul with the Spirit and the One, *Gregory of Nyssa developed a noteworthy synthesis in this regard. Whether he speaks of humanity's original state or final state, Gregory understands the ὁμοίωσις as similitude of the νοῦς with the divinity. But he understands this ὁμοίωσις as a dynamic and constant process in which each one of the redeemed is brought from the image in himself or herself, which is deformed by sin to the image reformed. The role of the incarnation of the Word is emphasized, along with the death of Jesus as the end of corruption and the beginning of glorification, the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist, as well as the perfect establishment of the body of Christ in the resurrection (Hübner).

The Platonic-Stoic theme of ὁμοίωσις θεῷ did not have a large presence in Latin theology. Yet Augustine, using the *Neoplatonic doctrine of inspiration in the sense that the image deformed by sin is renewed in a long process toward the reformed image (Trin. 12, 14,23; 14, 16,22–17,23), did not neglect the role of Christ the mediator and his resurrection (Trin. 14, 18,24–19,25). In the soul that returns as far as possible to God is seen the most perfect image of the *Trinity (Trin. 14,12,15).

RAC 4, 461-479; DSp 6, 812-822; 7, 1406-1424; BA 13, 689-693; G.B. Ladner, The Idea of Reform, Cambridge, MA 1959; R.M. Hübner, Die Einheit des Leibes Christi bei Gregor von Nyssa, Leiden 1974; H. Crouzel: TRE 6 (1980) 499-502; L. Scheffczyk: LTK[3] 4, 874 f.; L. Ayres, The Christological Content of Trin. XIII: AugStud 29 (1998) 111-139; M.T. Clark, Image Doctrine: Augustine (1999) 440-442; C. Markschies, Gottebenbildlichkeit, II: GRR 3 (2000) 1160-1163.

B. Studer

HOMOIOUSIANS (Homoeousians). The term is documented by *Arian witnesses writing in Latin (homoeousiani). The Greek equivalent is semi-Arians, but the term is tendentious, because the homoiousians were anti-Arians: at most, it can describe the homoiousian group which, after 360, would not recognize the divinity of the *Holy Spirit (Macedonians). The homoiousians took their name from homoiousios, the distinctive term of their trinitarian definition, equivalent to homoios kat' ousian ("like acc. to essence, substance"). The sources of homoiousian theology must be sought in the trinitarian position of *Eusebius of Caesarea, who, though a *subordinationist, was averse to the radical theories of Arianism and affirmed the reality of Christ's divine sonship in the framework of the doctrine of the three hypostases, without recourse to the Nicene homoousios, whose meaning was too open to *Sabellian *monarchianism. This doctrinal definition, continued by *Eusebius of Emesa, who toned down its subordinationism, was developed around 355 mainly in *Asia Minor, in opposition both to Sabellian and *Marcellian *monarchianism and to the radical Arianism (*anomoianism) resurgent at the time. The term homoiousios is first attested in the markedly pro-Arian formula of *Sirmium of 357, which forbade its use and that of homoousios. But in 358 the synodal letter of *Ancyra, signed by *Basil of Ancyra and *George of Laodicea and immediately confirmed by other documents, officially put forward the homoiousian trinitarian theology. (The surviving homoiousian documents are cited by *Epiphanius, Pan. 73.)

It gives ousia the meaning of individual substance, and thus distinguishes in the *Trinity not just three hypostases but also three ousiae, and cannot accept homoousios, which identifies the ousia of the Son with that of the Father. Homoiousios (= homoios kat' ousian), affirming the Son's likeness with the Father as to substance, i.e., divine nature, is indicative of his full divinity and at the same time of his personal distinction from the Father. Father and Son differ from each other only by the relationship of origin: one generates and the other is generated; they are Father and Son in a real, not a metaphorical, sense; and from their mutual relationship (the Father is not so without the Son) we also infer that the Son is coeternal with the Father. Their unity is conceived in a dynamic way, as a unity of willing and acting.

The homoiousians, who maintained the validity of the Antiochene formula of faith of 341, were, after a momentary success (Council of Sirmium of 358), obliged by *Constantius to subscribe to the formula of *Rimini, which thwarted their doctrine (359–360). But they resumed the struggle against the Arians after Constantius's death (362), though no longer united in intention: some adhered to the Nicene homoousios, though interpreting it in the sense of homoiousios (Council of *Antioch of 363); others remained faithful to the Antiochene formula of 341. A further cause of division was the controversy over the Holy Spirit, which began in 360. Many homoiousians, adhering to the pure scriptural data, were uncertain of its nature and had difficulty in recognizing it as God; some of them came to consider it, like the Arians, as a creature. From the ranks of the homoiousians came *Basil of Caesarea, who succeeded, between 370 and 378, in reuniting a good many of the homoiousians under the authority of *Meletius of Antioch in recognition of both the Nicene homoousios, interpreted by him in an antimonarchian way compatible with the doctrine of the three hypostases, and the divinity of the Holy Spirit. But a group of homoiousians, headed by *Eleusius of Cyzicus, remained immovable in affirming the validity of the Antiochene formula of 341 and of the homoiousios and in denying the homoousios and the divinity of the Holy Spirit. They were called (ca. 380) Macedonians.

J. Gummerus, Die homöusianische Partei bis zum Tode des Konstantius, Leipzig 1900; G. Rasneur, L'homoiousianisme dans ses rapports avec l'orthodoxie: RHE 1 (1903) 189-206, 411-431; Simonetti, 593; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, Edinburgh 1988, 914.

M. Simonetti

HOMOIOUSIOS. From ὅμοιος ("similar, like") and οὐσία ("essence, substance"); thus, similar in substance. Together with ὅμοιος κατ' ουσίαν, which has the same meaning, it was a characteristic expression in *homoiousian theology.

M. Simonetti

HOMOOUSIANS. The term is attested in *Arian documents in Latin (homousiani); the Greek equivalent is ὁμοουσιαστής. Both indicate the anti-Arians who specifically professed the Nicene faith that hinged on the homoousios*.

PLS 1, 704.

M. Simonetti

HOMOOUSIOS. From ὅμος ("same") and οὐσία ("essence, substance"; Lat. consubstantialis). The term was first used in a technical sense by the *gnostics and esp. by the *Valentinians: the spirit of humanity is consubstantial with God, the soul with the demiurge, matter with the devil. The first certain attestation of the term used in a trinitarian sense, to indicate that the Son is of the same substance of the Father—apart from a passage in *Origen which is of uncertain authenticity—is found in *Dionysius of Alexandria: accused by his *monarchian adversaries of refusing to admit that the Son is homoousios with the Father, Dionysius points out the nonscriptural origin of the term, declaring, however, that he is disposed to accept it in the general sense of "of the same genus, of the same nature." A piece of information, the veracity of which cannot be determined, relates that in the Council of *Antioch ca. 268 *Paul of Samosata's adversaries required him to proclaim the Logos homoousios with the Father. *Arius, however, did not grant that the Son was homoousios with the Father since this would mean that the divinity was divided into two parts. The term was inserted after long disputes into the Nicene Creed (325) with an anti-Arian intention, but it is unknown who proposed the adoption of this term: the term was in use among the monarchians so as to oppose the trinitarian doctrine of three *hypostases, which tended to distinguish three ousia as well, of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. The term, however, was ambiguous, given the multiple possible meanings of the term ousia (general substance or particular substance) and also had implications of a materialistic nature. It was therefore unsatisfactory for many anti-Arians as well, and this explains why it was set aside by the various sides in conflict after Nicaea. Athanasius began to use it again in 355; it was imposed in the West, but raised strong disputes in the East. Of the *homoiousians prevalent there, some accepted it between 363 and 366, but they interpreted it in the sense of homoiousios; others rejected it, until *Basil of Caesarea rendered it compatible with the doctrine of the three hypostases by taking ousia in the sense of one substance, the divine nature common to the hypostases. With this meaning, the term was definitively confirmed by the Council of *Constantinople in 381.

W.A. Bienert, Das vornicaenische homoousios als Ausdruck der Rechtgläubigkeit: ZKG 90 (1979) 151-175; G.C. Stead, Divine Substance, Oxford 1977, 190-266 (bibl.); M. Simonetti, Ancora su Homoousios a proposito di due studi recenti: VetChr 17 (1980) 85-98; The Homoousion and Homoousios with the Father, in The Incarnation: Ecumenical Studies in the Nicene-Costantinopolitan Creed, A.D. 381, ed. by T.F. Torrance, Edinburgh 1981, 1-15 and 58-87; RAC 16, 364-433 (C. Stead); F. Ricken, L'homooùsios di Nicea come crisi del Platonismo cristiano antico, in Storia della cristologia, ed. by B. Welte, Brescia 1986, 89-119; R.M. Hübner, Basilius von Caesarea und das Homoousios, in Essays in tribute to G. Chr. Stead, Leiden 1993, 70-91, 663-671; Simonetti 161 (bibl.); P.F. Beatrice, The Word "Homoousios" from Hellenism to Christianity: ChHist 71 (2002) 243-272.

M. Simonetti

HONORATUS ANTONINUS (d. after 437). Bishop of *Constantine, in Africa, during the persecution of *Genseric, who intended to substitute the *Arian faith professed by the *Vandals for the Catholic faith. In ca. 437 he wrote an Epistula cohortatoria to Arcadius, a Spaniard exiled for religious reasons, exhorting him to remain firm in the faith and ready to face martyrdom, the numerous advantages of which he expounds. The letter refers to scriptural examples and contains the presentation, through images, of the Father-Son relationship in the Trinity.

CPL 426; PL 50, 567-570; Gennadius, Vir. ill. 96 (ed. Richardson); PCBE 1, 75.

A. Pollastri

HONORATUS of Lérins and Arles (d. 429/430). Founder and first abbot of the *asceterium of *Lérins, then bishop of *Arles, his family was distinguished, reaching the heights of the consulate. He was born probably in the regions of N Gaul. While we are ignorant of the other basic facts of his life, his exemplary life as an ascetic and saint is fully known, thanks to the commemorative sermon given on the anniversary of his death by his relative and successor *Hilary, and thanks to the mentions of other writers. A legendary Life (12th c.) was adapted into Provençal by the monk Raymond Féraut in ca. 1300. Still a youth, Honoratus was converted to asceticism and undertook a journey to the East with his brother Venantius and the aged Caprasius. On the brother's death he returned to the West and, in the first years of the 5th c., took up residence at Lérins, an islet off the Provençal coast between Cannes and Antibes. A part was played in this choice by Leontius, bishop of nearby Fréjus, by whom, presumably, Honoratus was ordained presbyter. Not just the initial establishment of the community but also its subsequent growth is linked to Honoratus's activity. In late 427 or early 428 he was called to rule the diocese of Arles, succeeding not Patroclus (as was thought), murdered in 426, but the brief episcopate of a monk named Euladius or Helladius. He lived at Arles about two years, until his death in 429 or 430. Nothing remains of his writings. Of a Rule he had drawn up for the monks of Lérins, more than once hypothesized, no sure traces remain.

BHL 592, 3975-3979; Hilarii, Sermo de vita Honorati, ed. S. Cavallin, Lund 1952; A.C. Cooper-Marsdin, The History of the Islands of the Lerins, Cambridge 1913, 128-136; L. Cristiani, Lérins et ses Fondateurs, S. Wandrille 1946, 1-77; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Munich 1965, 49-50; DSp 7 (1969) 717-718; S. Pricoco, Modelli di santità a Lerino. L'ideale ascetico nel "Sermo de vita Honorati" di Ilario d'Arles: Siculorum Gymn. 27 (1974) 54-88; Id., L'isola dei santi. Il cenobio di Lerino e le origini del monachesimo gallico, Rome 1978; R. Nouailhat, Saints et Patrons. Les premiers moines de Lérins, Paris 1988; R. Nurnberg, Askese als sozialer Impuls. Monastische-asketische Spiritualität als Wurzel und Triebfeder sozialer Ideen und Aktivitäten der Kirche in Sudgallien im 5. Jahrhundert, Bonn 1988; C.M. Kasper, Theologie und Askese. Die Spiritualität des Inselmönchtums von Lérins im Sudgallien im 5. Jahrhundert, Münster 1991; C. Leyser, "This Sainted Isle": Panegyric, Nostalgia and the Invention of Lerinian Monasticism, in W.E. Klingshirn - M. Vessey (eds.), Essays on Late Antique Thought and Culture in Honor of R.A. Markus, Univ. of Michigan 1999, 188-206; M. Labrousse, Saint Honorat d'Arles, moîne et évêque: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 79 (2000) 33-39.

S. Pricoco

HONORATUS of Marseille (5th c.). An Honoratus, bishop of *Marseille and correspondent of Pope *Gelasius I (492–494), an eloquent preacher and author of lives of the saints, is mentioned in *Gennadius's De viris illustribus—in a chapter, however, that is certainly apocryphal. It attributes to him the Vita S. Hilarii, a biography of *Hilary, bishop of *Arles from 428–440, well constructed and strongly governed by the rules of classical rhetoric. Although Honoratus's name does not appear in the MS tradition of the Vita, the good arguments adduced by scholars seem to confirm the attribution. The Vita was composed after 475 and before 496.

BHL 3882; CPL 506; PL 50, 1219-1246; S. Cavallin, Vitae SS. Ho- norati et Hilarii, Lund 1952; Gennadius, De vir. ill. 101; M. Schanz, Gesch. d. röm. Liter., IV, 2, Munich 1920, 565; B. Kolon, Die Vita S. Hilarii Arelatensis. Eine eidographische Studie, Paderborn 1925; M. Corti, Studi sulla latinità merovingia in testi agiografici minori, Messina-Milan 1939; F.E. Consolino, Ascesi e mondanità nella Gallia tardoantica, Naples 1979, 61-68; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Darmstadt 21988, 50.

S. Pricoco

HONORATUS of Vercelli (d. 416?). Third bishop of Vercelli, after Eusebius and Limenius. In 355 he accompanied his bishop *Eusebius into exile. His election came about at *Ambrose's suggestion. At that time the church of Vercelli was passing through a period of turbulence due to the presence of two apostate and agitating monks from Milan. Ambrose intervened, first with a letter Ad Ecclesiam Vercellensem (Ep. 63: PL 16, 1239-1272), and then in person through the election of a worthy bishop. The newly elect came from the *cenobium founded by Eusebius. The designation of Honoratus brought peace to the local church. Later, he went to Milan to assist Ambrose at his death. Honoratus died 28 October of an unspecified year (ca. 416?).

Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii: PL 14, 46; F. Savio, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia. Piemonte, Turin 1898, 421-423; F. Lanzoni, Le origini delle diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 1039; EC 9, 135; BS 9, 1210; PCBE 2, 1005-1006.

L. Dattrino

HONORIUS (Flavius Honorius) (384–423). Western Roman emperor (393–423), born at *Constantinople 9 September 384, son of *Theodosius the Great; died 15 August (?) 423 at *Ravenna. He was twice consul (first in 386); in 393 he became Augustus; from 394 to 402 he resided at *Milan, from 402 at *Ravenna. Easily influenced, Honorius was under the thumb of his general *Stilicho, and then of the comes et magister militum Flavius *Constantius, husband of his sister *Galla Placidia, and finally of *Ambrose, bishop of Milan. He was unable to allay the tensions created with his brother *Arcadius after the division of the empire in 395. In 406 he had to suffer the crossing of the Rhine by strong German forces, and in 410 the taking of *Rome by *Alaric. Thanks to the ability of Constantius, coregent from 421, and other generals, he managed for a time to hold back further invasions by Germanic tribes, repel numerous attempts at usurpation and restore the status quo. He had the protection of the church at heart, and conceded privileges to clerics. He fought a hard antiheretical battle against *Donatists and pagans, though the reaction of the latter, represented quite effectively at Rome by the circle of *Symmachus, gradually acquired new vigor with the favorable circumstances. *Augustine and *Orosius had to refute pagan arguments which blamed Christianity for the present calamities. State measures, passed to alleviate the needs arising from the barbarian invasions, were ineffective. The regime's prestige was waning in *Gaul, while in *Britain only weak traces of it remained.

KLP 2, 121212-13; PLRE 1, 442; B. Bleckmann, Honorius und das Ende der römischen Herrschaft in Westeuropa: Historische Zeitschrift 265/3 (1997) 561-595; M. Kulikowski (ed.), The Epistula Honorii, Again: Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigrafik 122 (1998) 247-252; J.F. Jordan Montes, Los judíos en el reinado de Honorio, in var. aus., Congreso internacional. La Hispania de Teodosio: actas, Valladolid 1998.

J. Irmscher

HONORIUS, pope (d. 638). Successor of *Boniface V (d. 25 November 625), Honorius was of a noble family of Campania: his father Petronius had been consul. The Liber pontificalis stresses only his vast religious building activity, but he was also interested in civil building, made possible economically by his sound administration of the church's patrimony (Jaffé 2001; 2013; 2031-2034; 2036). He even turned his house near the Lateran into a monastery. *Jonas of Bobbio, who knew him, calls him "wise of heart, shrewd in counsel, illustrious in doctrine, full of sweetness and humility" (Vita s. Betulfi 6: PL 87, 1063). Indeed, following *Gregory the Great's example, his pastoral activity was intense, as we deduce from his letters, which attest his measures in both East and West to have ecclesiastical discipline observed. He intervened effectively against Fortunatus, metropolitan of Aquileia-Grado, who had accepted the positions of the *Three Chapters. He continued Gregory's missionary work in *Britain by sending personnel and by a series of actions to improve the organization of those churches (Jaffé 2019-2023; Bede, HE 2, 19); he had no success with the Celtic Christians regarding computation of the date of the celebration of Easter.

But Honorius has been much discussed on account of his unhappy intervention in the *monothelite question with two letters to Patriarch *Sergius of Constantinople. Honorius was a convinced *Chalcedonian, thoroughly imbued with biblicism, more drawn to pastoral work than to theological subtleties and terminological distinctions. Though his intentions were orthodox, he used language which some considered heterodox. His language in fact gave rise to various interpretations in the monothe-lite question. Though his successor *John IV (640–642) sought to give an orthodox interpretation to his positions, Honorius was condemned as a heretic by the 6th Ecumenical Council (Constantinople III) of 680–681, a condemnation accepted by Pope *Leo II, whose formula seems deliberately ambiguous. On more than one occasion *Maximus the Confessor, who had possession of original texts, defended the action and doctrine of Pope Honorius. The case has been much disputed, esp. since the 15th c., when Nicholas of Cusa revived it; many different explanations have been proposed.

CPL 1726-1727; Verzeichnis 383-384; PL 80, 469-482; PLS 4, 1656-1659; LP I, 323-327; III, 94; DTC 7, 93-132; DACL 13, 1231-1234; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 305-315; P. Galtier, La première lettre du pape Honorius: Gregorianum 29 (1948) 42-61; F.X. Seppelt, Storia dei Papi, I, Rome 1962, 210-217; P. Stockmeier, Die "causa Honorii" und Karl Josef von Hefele: ThQ 148 (1968) 405-428; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei Papi del secolo VII, Milan 1971 (see Index); L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 198-204; G. Kreuzer, Die Honoriusfrage im Mittelalter und in der Neuzeit, Stuttgart 1975 (see RSCI 35 [1981] 152-158); G. Schwaiger, Die Honoriusfrage. Zu einer Untersuchung des alten Falles: ZKG 88 (1977) 85-97; P. Conte, Il significato del primato papale nei padri del VI concilio ecumenico: Archivum Hist. Pont. 15 (1977) 7-111 (esp. 80-103); A. Thanner, Papst Honorius, St. Ottilien 1989; F. Winkelmann, Die Quellen zur Erforschung des monergisch-monothelitisches Streites: Klio 69 (1978) 551-559; M. Doucet, Est-ce que le monothélisme a fait autant d'illustres victimes?: Science et esprit 35 (1983) 53-83; E. Zocca, Onorio I e la tradizione occidentale: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 571-615; Id., Una possibile derivazione gregoriana per il "monotelismo" di Onorio: Augustinianum 33 (1993) 519-575; DHGE 24, 1049-1050; LTK[3] 5, 766-768; Patrologia IV, 177-178; EPapi 1, 585-590.

A. Di Berardino

HONORIUS of Canterbury (d. 653). Monk of the monastery of St. Andrew in Monte Coelio, Rome. By invitation of Pope *Gregory the Great he went as a missionary to England. On the death of Justus (10 November 627) he was consecrated 5th bishop of *Canterbury (628?) by Paulinus of York who, with other missionaries, in 633 took refuge with him when forced to flee his see because of the victory of the pagan king Penda over Edwin king of Northumbria. On 11 June 634 Pope Honorius I, in a pontifical letter, granted the pallium to bishops Honorius and Paulinus and decreed the equality of their sees in such a way that, on the death of one of them, "the survivor will have authority to appoint a bishop in his place" (Bede, HE 2,18). So, at the death of Paulinus (d. 644), Honorius installed Ithamar as his successor. He died in 653 and was buried in St. Augustine's Abbey, Canterbury. Feast 30 September.

Cath 5, 928ff., CE 7, 129; BS 9, 1213ff.; DCB 3, 153; DHGE 24, 1058-1059.

A. Di Berardino

HONORIUS Scholasticus. It is difficult to identify this mid-6th-c. Honorius, who addressed to a certain Bishop Jordanes—not better identified and not to be confused with the author of the Getica—a brief composition in verse in which he repudiates the letters of Seneca in order to praise Christianity. In his Rescriptum, Honorius presents Jordanes as a teacher far superior to Seneca, since he has given Honorius the light of Christ.

CPL 193; Text of Rescriptum contra epistolas Senecae ad Jordanem episcopum, in F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia Latina, I, 2, Leipzig 1906, n. 666, 137-138; O. Plasberg, Zum Senecagedicht des Honorius: RhM n.f. 54 (1899) 144-149; E. Thomas (with the same title), ibid., 313-316; P. Faider, Études sur Sénèque, Gand 1921, 106-107.

S. Zincone

HOPE

I. Biblical foundations - II. The reappropriation of apostolic hope in the writings of the Fathers - III. Interaction with Greco-Roman culture.

I. Biblical foundations. The theme of hope is obviously at the center of the apostolic tradition: God is seen as the God of hope (Rom 15:13). Christians were opposed to pagans; i.e., those who did not possess any hope (1 Th 4:13). They themselves rejoice in hope (Rom 12:12), because Christ in them is the hope of glory (Col 1:27). This insistence on hope was without a doubt characteristic of the apostle *Paul. Nevertheless, although the term ἐλπίς (spes) is found almost exclusively in Paul's letters and is absent in the gospels, the idea of hope is present in the entire NT. In the same Pauline doctrine of hope are included the following ideas: waiting (ἀποκαραδοκία, προσδοκία) (see Phil 1:20), trust (πίστις) (see Rom 4:18) and persevering patience (ὑπομονή) (see Rom 15:4; 1 Cor 13:7; 1 Th 1:3). All these virtues, however, are also found in the other NT texts (see, e.g., Lk 12:36; 21:19; Jn 3:19-22; Heb 10:34ff.; Jas 1:1-4; 1 Pet 1:18-21). In reality, for the apostolic tradition, all faith in God and in his salvific presence in *Jesus Christ is only understood in the tension between the divine promises already completed (iam) and the trusting and persevering expectation of God's definitive coming (nondum). According to Jesus himself, the kingdom of God is both already present (see Mt 12:28) and still to be awaited (see Lk 17:20-37). Therefore, developing a teaching on the true righteousness, Paul emphasized that, though having risen in baptism, we must hope in the resurrection (see esp. Rom 5:1-11). In fact, he traces hope in the resurrection that is not seen to the activity of the *Holy Spirit (Rom 8:23-27). He likewise saw in the apostolic ministry a model of hope (2 Cor 3:12-13; see Phil 3:1-17). Along the same lines, 2 Peter, perhaps the last document of the NT, exhorts its readers to expect, with a holy life, the day of the Lord (2 Pet 3:11-12; see 2 Tim 2:18).

There is no doubt that this teaching on hope is found within the entirety of the Bible, as it was understood at the time of *Jesus and the early church. All the books of the OT, esp. those of the *Psalms and the *Prophets, were thoroughly filled with trust in the divine promises, and the covenant of God with his people—indeed, in God himself (see esp. Ps 73[74]:23-28), who possesses the power to save the righteous and who, in his mercy, relents from the wrath deserved by the unfaithfulness of humanity. Thus the Jews with trust awaited for deliverance from daily necessities and physical and moral sufferings (see Ps 38[37]:16; 71[70]:5-6), possession of the Promised Land (see Ps 37[36]:29), return from the Exile (see Is 43:16-21), the coming of a savior (see Ps 87[86]), peace among nations, and finally, during times of persecution, even resurrection from the dead (see 2 Macc 7:14.20-23; Dan 12:1-3). This hope in God, attested by the Hebrew Bible, found an even more intense and more universal expression in the translation of the *Septuagint (LXX) (see RAC 1172-1175).

In apocalyptic *Judaism, on the one hand, hope in the divine promises was placed within the clearly dualistic horizon of the two aeons, a horizon oriented, i.e., decisively toward a future that came only from God, even toward a life beyond this world. On the other hand, rabbinic Judaism, which tended to make the definitive realization of hope in God depend on the exact observance of the law, could not fail to provoke a reaction from Jesus, who insisted on filial trust in God alone (Mt 5–7), and from Paul, who taught the righteousness of faith (Gal, Rom) (see Rengstorf 522-536). It was precisely in this reaction that the novelty of Christian hope was proclaimed. Keeping in mind the work with which God, in the glorious passion of his Son and in the outpouring of the Spirit of the Risen Christ, completed the prophetic promises, the Christian hopes in the parousia of the Lord and in the resurrection of the dead (see 1 Th 1:9-10); i.e., the realization of all things proclaimed by God through the mouth of his prophets (Acts 3:19-21).

II. The reappropriation of apostolic hope in the writings of the Fathers. A foundational theme like hope naturally had to draw the attention of ancient Christian authors, esp. those who drew inspiration from Paul's teaching. There is, however, a scholar who maintains that hope was not central in the writings of patristic authors before *Augustine of Hippo (Link 1160). That claim may be true if one only pays attention to the occurrence of the religious use of the terms ἐλπίς and spes. However, aside from the fact that these terms are found much more than dictionaries and indexes would lead one to think, the theme of hope would certainly not be lacking in a theology entirely dominated by the authentically Christian antithesis of the now (iam) and the not yet (nondum) and saturated even in its later expressions by the apocalyptic distinction of the two aeons. (See the two καταστάσεις in the writings of *Theodore of Mopsuestia and the two Civitates in the works of Augustine.) Writers of the ancient church, however, certainly recovered the apostolic tradition of hope, not without always reinterpreting it. They developed it acc. to the pastoral, apologetic and spiritual demands, esp. acc. to those imposed by the continual interaction between Christianity and ancient culture. We note esp. that this reinterpretation was conditioned by the preference given for certain biblical texts, esp. the Psalms and Paul's Letters (Rom 5–8). Precisely in this field it is insufficient to call attention to the linguistic framework (Wortfeld) of the term ἐλπίς. One must also, and even more so, look at the biblical framework (Schriftfeld), in which the scriptural citations are placed together and thereby explained (see Tertull., De res. 23; Aug., Spir. et litt. 29-51).

The following examples that reflect the different theological and pastoral concerns of the first centuries show how much that principle is true. New emphases appear in the writings of those authors who had the pressure of encouraging the depressed faithful and warning the recalcitrant to conversion (RAC 1189-1192). Intervening in the community of *Corinth, which had been disturbed by certain disorders, the author of 1 Clement reminds the readers that God only helps those who hope in him (11,1). The author esp. commends them to hope in the resurrection (27,1) and in the salvation reserved for the elect (57,2.7; 58,2-3). In times of discouragement and moral decadence, it was fitting to emphasize esp. the hope of conversion (μετάνοια), as it appears in the 2 Clement (1,1-7; 17,7), and the Shepherd of *Hermas (Sim. VI, 2,4; VIII, 7,2; VIII,10,2), in *Tertullian's treatise De paenitentia (10,7,4) and in some of *Origen's sermons (see Hom. Jer. 20,9).

Theological controversy with the *Jews led ps.-*Barnabas to stigmatize the vain hope of Israel (16, 2) and to reinforce the "hope in the life that is the beginning and the end of faith" (1, 6) and to exalt trust in the Lord (14,4.8; 6,3; 11,11) and in his cross (11, 8). Shortly after, *Justin Martyr, addressing the *pagans and *Jews, develops his theology of history (RAC 1192ff.), which was characterized by the tension between the two parousias (1 Apol. 52; Dial. 52) and by insisting on hope in the crucified Christ (see Dial. 44,4; 96,1).

No less important was the refutation of the 2nd-c. heresies (RAC 1195ff.). Against those that called into question the unity of faith, *Ignatius of Antioch did not cease to recall the common hope in Jesus Christ (Eph. 21,1; Magn. 11,1; Trall. inscr. and 2,2; Philad. 5,2, etc.). Facing the *Valentinians and *Marcion, who denied the salvation of the flesh (salus carnis), Tertullian emphasized the true passion of Christ, the only "hope of the world" (spes totius orbis—De carne 5, with the entire context), and defended the rule of hope (regula spei) with the "example of the Lord's resurrection" (exemplum dominicae resurrectionis—De res. 48; see 1,1). Reacting not only against the heretics, but likewise against the objections posed by the pagans, he did not hesitate to present hope as a characteristic of Christianity. More than once, in fact, he defined the Christian religion as "faith, discipline and hope" (see RAC 1206, with Apol. 39,1; Nat. I, 7,129-130; Adv. Marc. I, 21,3; Praescr. 26,9; Res. 48,2; Orat. 9,1-2).

*Irenaeus, who prepared the way for Tertullian's theology salus carnis, was perhaps less explicit with respect to the spes resurrectionis. However, understanding the history of humankind as an education of human freedom and as a process in which God becomes accustomed to human beings and vice versa (Adv. haer. III, 20,2; V, 32,1), in presenting the resurrection of the righteous as the fulfillment of the divine promises (Adv. haer. V, 32ff.), Irenaeus is also to be placed within the perspective of Christian hope (see Adv. haer. II, 28,3; V, 32,1: Rom 8:19-21).

During times of persecution, moreover, the invitation to trust in God—indeed, the commendation of persevering hope—could not be lacking, as shown by the writings of Tertullian, Origen and *Cyprian as well as the very acts of the martyrs (see Spanneut, 22-23, 81ff., 181-184). Cyprian's teaching is esp. precise in this regard (RAC 1211-1214). In fact, while Tertullian had primarily seen patient perseverance in suffering, Cyprian considered it as expectation, hope. In fact, acc. to Cyprian, the entire Christian life is nothing else than hope: fiducia futurorum (De zelo 16)—hope, however, that is engaged in this time and leads to Christ (see De bono pat. 13-21), the fulfillment of what began in baptism (De mortal. 1). Cyprian also borrowed from Tertullian's threefold description of Christianity, but preferred "patience" to "discipline" (see Testim. III, 45, with Rom 8:24-25; De bono pat. 13).

Both in difficult conditions and in times of peace, preaching, esp. baptismal catechesis, evokes both hope in God and in eternal life, explaining the dynamics of Christian faith, trust in the paternal goodness of God, of whom believers through baptism have become adopted sons and daughters, and the reality of the resurrection of the righteous (RAC 1121-1222). See, e.g., the Tractatus de fide, spe et caritate by *Zeno of Verona (Tract. 1,36; see Tract. 2,3), explanations of the Oratio Dominica by Tertullian (2-9), Cyprian (1.6.15), and *Peter Chrysologus (Serm. 71,11), as well as considerations of the conclusion of the baptismal creed in the writings of *Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. 2,5[7]; 18,1; see 16,3), Zeno of Verona (Tract. 1,2) or *Nicetas of Remesiana (Lib. 5,12 and 14: ed. Burn 51-52). One can add the writings of consolation such as the funerary speeches of *Gregory of Nyssa on *Meletius of Antioch (ed. Spira, Leiden 1967, p. 455) or *Ambrose on his brother *Satyrus (see 1,70ff.; 2,124.133-134).

From the end of the 3rd c., the monastic life appears on the scene (RAC 1222ff.). Some authors called it martyrdom of the will or conscience. Certain authors spoke of it as a "philosophy," or a "philosophy of patience" or even a "philosophy of hope" (John Chrysostom, Hom. Gen. 9,4: PG 54, 625-626). Within this framework, one can find exhortations to disregard the world and to trust in what is to come (see Basil of Caesar., Ep. 46,5-6; 174) or to the "angelic life," i.e., to Christian hope. Basil and other authors completely expected an attitude of hope in all the difficulties of monastic life (Reg. fus. 42; reg. brev. 207). This ideal of Christian perfection is characterized esp. through his Christocentricism. The monk who hopes seeks to conform himself to the Risen Christ (Basil of Caesar., Hom. Ps. 32,10; 69,5).

Moreover, the deepening of the theology of hope was favored by *exegesis that by that point had become more developed (RAC 1224ff.). The commentaries on the Psalms by Basil of Caesarea (Hom. Ps. 7,2; 33,4; 45,3, etc.), *John Chrysostom (Expos. Ps. 10,1; 124,1; 141,2) and naturally those of Augustine (see Occhialini); the commentaries on the *Song of Songs by Origen, Gregory of Nyssa and Ambrose;

the commentaries on certain passages from the gospels, e.g., on the Transfiguration (see *Hilary of Poitiers, Com. Mat. 17,1-9); and esp. the commentaries on the corpus paulinum, for the letter to the Romans (see Schelkle), 1 Cor 13:13 (the trilogy of faith, hope and charity, from *Polycarp's letter often cited from that point onward) and Hebrews 11–12 emphasized more than ever the biblical ideas on hope.

Finally, the testimony of hope in God and in eternal life, which is found in early Christian art, esp. in sepulchral art, is not to be overlooked (RAC 1244-1247). In addition to the symbols of paradise, the symbol of the anchor that is already found in Heb 6:19 was esp. prominent, a symbol which, along with other naval symbols, was obviously also mentioned by the Fathers (see Stumpf and Rahner).

III. Interaction with Greco-Roman culture. The numerous and various occasions that continually invited a reappropriation of the apostolic discourse on hope certainly in themselves led Christian authors to greatly deepen their reflection on this topic. These occasions esp. led Christian thought to distinguish more clearly between faith—as mere intellectual acceptance of the divine revelation—and hope, a trusting disposition before God. This theological development was benefited by the pressures of maintaining the orthodoxy of faith, which by that point was considered the foundation of the empire's unity (RAC 1218ff.). Likewise, the developments of the liturgy and monastic spirituality caused Christian hope to center on the resurrection of the dead, guaranteed by the exemplum dominicae resurrectionis.

Before moving on to a specific treatment of the most important authors for our question, it is important to cast a glance on the use of the terms ἐλπίς and spes in Greco-Roman literature (see Bultmann-Rengstorf; Woschitz; Van Menxel). In classical language, the term ἐλπίς had an ambivalent meaning: with added specifications it was clarified whether it pertained to good or bad hope. Indeed, in certain cultural contexts the term primarily acquired a negative sense, signifying, i.e., a hardly justifiable expectation, a vain and presumptuous hope. Thus, primarily in Stoicism, acc. to which apatheia (i.e., freedom from suffering, passion or the emotions) must overcome hope, an uncertain conjecture (see Woschitz 174-175). One notes esp. the pessimism shown by Seneca for whom "hope is the name of an uncertain good" (spes incerti boni nomen est—Ep. 10,2). Nevertheless, there also existed more optimistic tendencies, esp. in the *Platonic tradition. The use of the term ἐλπίς was distinguished for a long time through the rational orientation. Only later, starting with Sophocles, was the idea of trust added to the chief idea of prognosis. As expectation, more or less justified, ἐλπίς pertains to future things whether auspicious or inauspicious. Spes est exspectatio futurorum. The idea of that which is to come was thematized by Plato, esp. in the Philebus, an ethical dialogue (39), and then adopted by *Aristotle, however, more so in his rhetoical than in his metaphysical writings (see Woschitz 118-130). According to their distinction, while memory refers to the past and sensation pertains to the present, hope concerns the future. In the Platonic tradition ἐλπίς could, however, also express the expectation of life in the hereafter. It is united to ἔρως, the impulse toward the beautiful and the good, and there finds its supreme fulfillment (see Simpos. 93e).

In the Christian gnosis of *Clement of Alexandria, hope occupies neither an important nor a fixed place with respect to faith and charity (RAC 1197-1200). It is defined as προσδοκία ἀγαθῶν, ἡ ἀπόντος ἀγαθοῦ εὔελπις (or προσδοκία ἀγαθῶν ἢ ἀπόντος ἀγαθοῦ ευνελπὶς—Strom. II,9,41,1, see II,6,27,2). At the level of the catechetical pedagogy, ἐλπίς, an expectance of good future things, along with fear, aroused by the fruits of divine providence (defended against the gnostics and perhaps against the Stoics), also prepares in a certain way for μετάνοια (repentance), for the fight against sin (ignorance) and, last, with love for gnosis (see Méhat 312-322, and also Paed. I, 10,91,2). In this process, which begins with faith, hope is in a certain way part of faith. Directed toward the past, faith is memory (μνήμη), but hope is open to the future. In any case, however, ἐλπίς is a knowledge coming from the Lord and from his promises (see Méhat 429-430, with the Strom. XI, 12, 53,1–55,6; V, 3,16,1; VI, 7,61,1). However, ἐλπίς is also found in the higher teaching relating to the process of the growth of the gnostics toward the perfect likeness with God (Méhat 456-475). Clement refers to the term of this transformation (μεταβολή) or this transposition (μετάβασις) not only the inheritance, rest, recompense, divine filiation, but also the realization of hope (ἀποκατάστασις τῆς ἐλπίδος), thus making understandable his concern of importing his ideal gnostic, who is certainly inspired by the Platonic tradition, into a gospel framework (see Strom. XI, 22,134ff.; I, 27,171,6). Moreover, uniting ἐλπίς to γνῶσις, he presents the first as an anticipated joy of the divine promises (Méhat 470, with Strom. VII, 7,47,4-5). Indeed, while arguing on philosophical testimonia with respect to hope in eternal life (Socrates, Plato, Empedocles and Parmenides), he leaves no doubt that the hope of "barbarian" philosophy was established on the basis of baptismal regeneration (Strom. V, 2,14-15; see IV, 8,57,1; IV, 22,144,2-3; IV, 25,160,2-3; II, 9,41,2).

Although Origen (RAC 1200-1205) was esp. interested in the spirituality of the gnostic's inner growth and continual progress (see Hom. Jer. 13,3), he does not seem to have spoken often of hope (see Völker 65-66, 147-148, 158-159, who, however, like other scholars, barely mentions the theme of hope). Nevertheless, there is still a special interest in this matter. Rejecting in the treatise Contra Celsum the objections against the naive credulity and simplistic hope of the faithful, Origen defended the resurrection (see V, 14-24: SC 147, 48-74). He likewise refuted the claim that Christians allured people with vain hopes and mentioned in this regard the conformity of Christian faith with those who defend the immortality of the soul (CC III, 78-81: SV 136, 174-184). Living by means of faith in the word of God, Christians possess better hope from God (CC IV, 27: SC 136, 248). Indeed, Jesus Christ gave the example of patience to all those who suffer persecution because of faith (CC II, 25: SC 132, 352). The last theme found an even more eloquent expression in Origen's Exhortation to Martyrdom (see RAC 1201-1202, with the Exhort. 29: GCS Orig. 1, 25). The Alexandrian reception of the apostolic thought concerning hope also distinguishes Origen's exegesis all the more. Preaching on the first seven books the Bible, he turns to the themes of the journey to the desert, the spiritual fight and the continual ascent that pertains to hope (see the explicit texts, but they are rather rare: Gen. hom. 2,6: SC 7bis, 106-110; Ex. hom. 9,3: SC 321, 286-294; Num. hom. 14,2,4: SC 442,168).

Likewise, he broaches the theme of hope in his interpretation of the Song of Songs (see Com. Cant. II, 4,20; II, 8,33: SC 375, 340ff., 426) and of the Psalms (see, e.g., in Ps 36 hom. 5,1 and 6; in Ps 38 hom. 1,10) and also in his Commentary on Matthew (see 13,30; 12,1, etc.—RAC 1202-1203). The most noteworthy texts are found in the Homilies on Jeremiah and naturally in the Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (RAC 1203ff.). Inserting himself on the path of the prophet Jeremiah, Origen maintained that those who repent with a sincere heart more easily reach hope of divine mercy (see Hom. Jer. 20,9: SC 238, 292). He understands, however, in a Christian sense the prophet's invitation to the conversion of the nations that have inherited the hope of Israel (Hom. Jer. 4,2: SC 232, 260). He interpreted the words of the prophet: "O God, do not your eyes search for faithfulness?" through the Stoic principle of the connection of the virtues, among which, however, he mentions esp. the Pauline triad of faith, hope and love (Hom. Jer. 6,1: SC 232, 328). Finally, in an eschatological vision Origen opposed the aversion of Israel, which Jeremiah lamented, to the enthusiasm of Christians, who do not look back, but go forward without stopping toward the mountain which is Christ (Hom. Jer. 13,3: SC 238, 58-62. See Hom. Jer. 15,6: SC 238, 126ff.: "Cursed is the one who trusts in man" [Jer 17:5]; the one who trusts in Christ, however, is blessed; Hom. Jer. 8,6: SC 232, 368ff.). Commenting, however, on the letter to the Romans, Origen discusses at length the chief affirmations in Rom 8:18-27 (Com. Rom. 7,4-6: FChr 2/4, 42-82). There he describes hope as the expectation of future good things (see FChr 2/4, 56.72). But, following the Apostle, he understands the things that are not seen, that are not known facie ad faciem, but only in aenigmate, things, however, spiritual and eternal, revealed by God (see FChr 2/4, 44.48.70), in concrete terms the divine adoption, the resurrection of the dead and the *redemption of the church, which is the body of Christ (see FChr 2/4, 60.68ff.). Precisely because Christians hope for invisible things and even more so in difficult situations, they must exspectare per patientiam (see also PA I, 7,5), and they are so much the more capable inasmuch as the *Holy Spirit intervenes within them (FChr 2/4, 63.78ff.). According to this exegesis of Rom 8, Christian are, therefore, those who hope, fideliter credentia (see Com. Rom. 4,4: FChr 2/2, 228, where Origen observes that in the Apostle's letters fides and spes are intertwined. The Christian hopes against hope, as did *Abraham. The Christian trusts totally in God (see Com. Rom. 4,6: FChr 2/2, 224-226). God therefore is not only the object of hope but also its grounds and guarantee (see Com. Rom. 9,11: PG 14, 1220AB). The measure in which Origen developed an entirely Christian concept of hope appears from the fact that he united it with the profectus fidei (Com. Rom. 4,6: FChr 2/2, 226, with 1 Cor 13:13).

Not even in the writings of Gregory of Nyssa (RAC 1226-1231), who also insisted more than Origen on spiritual progress, does hope seem to be the central theme (Völker 138). If anything, in the relatively few texts in which he uses the term ἐλπίς, he does so often in an ambivalent and therefore not typically biblical sense (see the table of contents and the index, SC 178, 300). Nevertheless, he reappropriated some traditional themes of hope. He emphasized not only the role of fear but also of hope in temptations (see De virg. 18,3: GNO 8/1, 318, and Daniélou 93-99). He recalls that the observance of the precepts pleases those who, now in hope, do good works and will fill in the future those who are worthy with glory, when they receive the fruit of a good hope (Ecc. hom. 8: GNO 5, 441; see Völker 133). Moreover, he reveals the connection between baptism and hope (Or. cat. 40,8) and esp. the παρρησία that the baptized regain before the heavenly Father (Or. dom. 5.; see Daniélou 110-123). Naturally, Gregory does not cease to point to the hope of the resurrection (Vita Macr. 5: GNO 8/1, 375, 19-20), prefigured in the faithful acceptance of virginity (De virg. 14,4: GNO 8/1, 308-309).

Nevertheless, it is of greater importance that Gregory returns to ἐλπίς in the rather philosophical context of his thought, not without, however, Christianizing it every time in a decisive way. For Gregory, thrown into the intellectual movements of his time, the human being, the creature of God, cannot live without hope because, while the human being turns to the past (μνήμη) and feels the present, the human being also awaits the future (ἐλπίς). Only in the perfect human being, as in God himself, is there neither memory nor hope, i.e., as the Apostle says, neither faith nor hope, but only love will never end. The human viator, however, must hope. If anything, hope can also be in contrast to the memory of human beings when it rebukes them for their sins (De an. et res.: PG 46, 92C-97A; see C. Eun. I, 372: GNO 9, 130; II [XII], 459: GNO 9, 344-345). But human beings in all their unstable existence are led by the εὐεργεσία of the Lord. When, therefore, human beings turn toward the future, this constitutes for them the hope of their expectations (Or. dom. 1: PG 44, 1124D-1125A). In this way, ἐλπίς no longer preserves that ambiguity of classical antiquity but expresses the Christian hope, which, committing itself in this time, leads to eternity. Moreover, the Christian, supporting his or her temporal existence in virtue of faith and hope, already anticipates in this life the grace of God (De op. hom. 22: PG 44, 208B-209A). Likewise, Gregory introduced ἐλπίς in the context in which it was particularly dear to him, i.e., that of ἔρως (Völker 221), thus inserting the entire spiritual process in a dynamic of hope. Ἔρως as the fervor of love which pushes the soul toward perfect union with God certainly resembles ἔρως as the irresistible impulse toward the absolute beauty of the Platonic tradition (see De virg. 5: GNO 8/1, 277-278). Nevertheless, in Gregory's thought, ἔρως assumed a deeply Christian meaning (see Daniélou 211-220). When Gregory, in fact, speaks of ἔρως toward the νύμφιος ἄφθαρτος ("the uncorrupted bridegroom"—De virg. 20: GNO 8/1, 328,8-9), it is placed in an entirely personal perspective, and he makes it depend on Christ's ἀγαπή, who gave his life for the life of humankind (see Com. Cant. II [1,7]: GNO 6, 61, 18ff. and Ecc. hom. 8: GNO 5, 422,11-426,7). He esp. showed that ἔρως will not come to an end even in eternity, because the divine infinity always opens to him new horizons (Com. Cant. 8: GNO 6, 246; see Daniélou 309-326). Now this ἔρως also includes ἐλπίς. In fact, Gregory calls the vision of God not only the fulfillment of every desire (ἐπιθυμία) but also the apex of every hope, the endpoint of all the divine promises (see De virg. 23,7: GNO 8/1, 343 and also 9,2: GNO 8/1, 287-289; 14,4: GNO 8/1, 308-309. See also Greg. Naz., Or. 11,7,10ff: SC 405, 344ff.). Last, presenting the paternal beatitude of the human being, he returns to the notion of ἐλπίς. The beatitude that includes the vision of God and divine filiation overcomes not only every human reflection (διάνοια) but also every expectation (ἐλπίς) (De beat. 7: PG 44, 1277A-C; see De op. hom., prooem.: PG 44, 128B). God is always bigger; for this reason human existence cannot but end in the perpetual praise of God's greatness (Inscrip. Ps. 1,9: GNO 5, 67ff.).

Like all his thought, *Augustine's doctrine of hope is also an expression of his personal and pastoral experiences (RAC 1231-1241). His work reflects (1) the encounter with philosophy which is at the origin of the search for the true wisdom (see Sol. I, 6,12-17; Conf. IX, 10,23); (2) the painful process of conversion marked by the tension between presumption and discouragement (see Conf. VI, 1,1; VIII, 3,6-7; VIII, 9,25); (3) the conflict with the *Manicheans which emphasized the critical issues of evil, the Christian understanding of the OT, and the resurrection (see C. Faust. 4,2; 11,7; Util. cred. 3,9; Agon. 24,26-26,28); (4) the pressure of preaching, esp. for *Easter, to show the via ad patriam and the transitus ad Patrem (Ep. 55; Serm. 261,1; En. Ps. 60,4) and for the feasts of the martyrs (En Ps. 121, 1; Serm. 280, 4-6) ; (5) interest in the Pauline Letters, esp. in Rom, Gal and Phil 3:12-20; (6) apologetic concerns, raised by the pagan objections (Civ. Dei XXII, 25-26; Serm. 241,8) and esp. by the disaster of 410 (Serm. 105); (7) the *Donatist controversy, in which there was a debate over the still imperfect church and the church called to perfection (see C. ep. Parm. II, 7,14; III, 5,27); (8) the anti-*Pelagian controversy, which made those engaged in it aware of the imperfection of the present righteousness (in spe) and the expectation of the heavenly righteousness (in re) (Spir. et litt. 36,64).

Among these different experiences, the first, however, were certainly the most decisive. Almost from the beginning, as clearly appears in the treatise De vera religione, three problems were imposed as determinative for Augustine's thought (see Lorenz 56ff.): (1) Questions pertaining to beatitudo (Vera rel.

1-10), which was understood as the enjoyment of God (fruitio Dei), the highest good (summum bonum), which includes the distinctions between frui and uti, via and patria, spes and res, as well as the entire dynamic of the desiderium veritatis, the transitus ad visionem, but also the ordo caritatis (see En. Ps. 91,1). (2) Questions pertaining to malum, the origo mali (Vera rel. 11-23), which include creatio and providentia, libertas and gratia, the history of the duo amores (with patience which must also undergo the presence of the wicked). (3) And questions concerning auctoritas and ratio (Vera rel. 24-55), and esp. scientia and sapientia (Trin. XII, 14,21-15,24), and therefore the entire structure of provisory knowledge, distinct from the eternal vision, which esp. characterizes the search without end, pertaining to the Trinitas quae est unus Deus (see esp. Trin. IX, 1,1, with Phil 3:13-15; XV, 28,51).

Within this framework, Augustine developed the concept of hope, clearly drawing inspiration from philosophical traditions, esp. Platonic ones. Nevertheless, he transformed no less clearly the philosophical approach by means of biblical data, taken esp. from the Psalms (see En. Ps.) and the Pauline Letters (see Exp. prop. Rm. 45 [53], with Rom 8:19-23, and Serm. 158), precisely acc. to some of his ministerial activities and personal research. In this way, he decisively oriented hope, the exspectatio futurorum bonorum, toward God, the guarantor and the goal of every trusting Christian expectation (see Ench. 2,8, to be compared with Cic., Tusc. 4,80, and with En. Ps. 39,7). Likewise, he clearly oriented hope toward the resurrection of the dead by establishing it upon the exemplum resurrectionis Christi (see En. Ps. 70,11,10; 90,11,4, Ballay 206-230). Precisely because the human being, though having been baptized, has not yet entered the gloria resurrectionis, but is living in corruptio and remains therefore subject to concupiscentia, in conditions, therefore, that will be abolished in the final resurrection, his salvation exists only in hope (in spe), but not yet in actuality (in re) (see Pecc. merit. II, 9,11-10,12; Spir. et litt. 29,51; Retr. I, 14,2, etc.). In this sense, the Christian is essentially a person of hope (see En. Ps. 131,19—compare with thee earlier writings of Philo of Alexandria, in RAC 1178, Deterius 5: OEuvres 5,102ff.; Ambrose, Parad. 3,19: Sancti Ambrosii Episcopi Mediolanensis Opera 2/1, 62). Christian hope makes up part of the iustitia peregrinationis (Serm. 158,8). Finally, hope is not only an expectation, neither is it only trust in the divine promises, but it is also patience (see Rom 8:25, which is cited many times: Ballay 223-230). Patience itself, however, would not be possible without the example of the crucified Christ and without the grace of the *Holy Spirit, who causes us to love righteousness, the unconditioned and complete acceptance of God's will (see Spir. et litt. 3,5; 18,31). This radical dependence on the divine promises, already accomplished in the Paschal mystery, allows a human being not to succumb either to presumption or to despair (see En. Ps. 61,20). On the other hand, the presence of the Holy Spirit incites almost a jubilation of hope within believers, a jubilation lived in the church and sung everyday in praise of God (see En. Ps. 145). Augustine thus reserved for hope a very broad space in his thought, but at the same time he gave it an authentically Christian meaning, even outdoing his predecessors, with the exception of Paul, his great teacher.

In conclusion, Christian thought concerning hope, which was established on the OT and contemporary Judaism, is different in two characteristics: The first characteristic possesses an entirely positive sense. Although in Greco-Roman antiquity, the words that express the idea of hope appear ambiguous, the hope of Christians will occur only as an expectation of future good things. It is not easy to explain why the expectation of the good was focused on life after death, esp. the resurrection. This development was certainly assisted by the apocalyptic distinction between the two aeons, interpreted by Christians as the tension between iam ("already") and nondum ("not yet"). The determining cause, however, was the Paschal experience in which faith in the resurrection of Christ became the reason for the hope of eternal life. Starting from the 3rd c., interest for the letter to the Romans definitively oriented the Christian theology of hope. Almost the entire patristic tradition, at least after *Justin Martyr, was then influenced by the Platonic tradition, acc. to which human nature requires purification and desires beatitude in God. The eschatological orientation of this tradition, which was deeply connected to the apocalyptic distinction between the two aeons, did not impede Christians from committing themselves in this world to also hope for temporal things, although always in view of God, as shown by the political theologians *Constantine the Great and *Eusebius of Caesarea as well as *Basil of Caesarea and Augustine.

The other characteristic of the Christian concept of hope consists in its certainty: Christian hope is no longer a more or less rational conjecture of the future. It is rather a solid conviction. This firmness was motivated by faith in the power of the creator of the world and in the faithfulness of the God of the fathers. Believing in the merciful love that God has shown in the fulfillment of his promises and finally in the example of Christ's resurrection (exemplum resurrectionis Christi), Christians look with trust to what is to come. Here is the truly Christian hope. Nevertheless, even on the level of subjective disposition the understanding of hope was deepened thanks to interaction with those outside the Christian faith. The philosophical analysis of time (past, present, future) and the ancient doctrine of knowledge helped Christian thinkers to circumscribe more precisely faith in the historical action of God and the commitment of trust in the future. Moreover, comparing hope, a certain expectation of future good things, with the natural desire of the human being to find beatitude, Christians were able to understand hope better. These new experiences, however, made the tension between the order of creation and that of redemption more serious, i.e., between the human being who, created in the image of God, is a being that hopes and the human being who, destined to mutability, despairs because of his or her sins. Responding with his doctrine on the absolute necessity of grace and the love of righteousness, inspired by the Holy Spirit, Augustine causes not only the sinning human being's hope but also the hope of every creature to depend on God. His concept of the relationship between God and the human being certainly does not resolve the tension between fear and hope, humble trust in divine mercy and the capacities given by the Creator. To the contrary, he led it to apply itself, hoping against hope, as a pastoral work for all people. Moreover, it is noteworthy that the spiritual aspirations of the Greco-Roman milieu oriented the elaboration of the Pauline triad of faith, hope and love (1 Cor 13:13) and led Christians to define Christianity as a religion of hope, a hope, however, that is based not only on human nature but also and even more so on the resurrection of Christ.

W. Völker, Das Vollkommenheitsideal des Origenes, Tübingen 1931; J. Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique (Grégoire de Nysse), Paris 1944; P. Stumpf, Anker: RAC 1 (1950) 440-443; W. Völker, Gregor von Nyssa als Mystiker, Wiesbaden 1955; K.H. Schelkle, Paulus Lehrer der Väter, Düsseldorf 1956; L. Ballay, Der Hoffnungsbegriff bei Augustinus, Munich 1964; H. Rahner, Symbole der Kirche. Die Ekklesiologie der Väter, Salzburg 1964, 237-564: Antenna crucis (Italian trans. Rome 1971); U. Occhialini, La speranza della Chiesa pellegrina. Teologia della speranza nelle "Enarrationes in Psalmos." di S. Augino, Assisi 1965; A. Méhat, Étude sur les "Stromates" de Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1966; R. Bultmann - K.H. Rengstorf, ἐλπίς: TDNT 2, 517-535; C. Becker, Fides: RAC 7 (1969) 801-839; L.J. Engels, Fiducia: RAC 7 (1969) 839-877; M. Spanneut, Tertullien et les premiers moralistes africains, Gembloux 1969; R. Lorenz, Das vierte bis sechste Jahrhundert, 1, in Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte, ed. K.D. Schmidt - E. Wolf, Göttingen 1970; O. Brabant, Le Christ, centre et source de la vie morale chez s. Augustin, Gembloux 1971; H.-G. Link, Hoffnung: Hist. Wörterbuch der Philosophie 3 (1974) 1157-1166; M. Spanneut, Geduld: RAC 9 (1976) 243-294; K.M. Woschitz, Elpis-Hoffnung. Geschichte, Philosophie, Exegese, Theologie eines Schlüsselbegriffes, Vienna 1979 (summ. in LTK[3] 5, 200-203); J. Janssens, Vita e morte del cristiano negli epitaffi di Roma anteriori al secolo VII, Rome 1981; L. Boros, Aurelius Augustinus, Aufstieg zu Gott, Olten 1982; F. van Menxel, Elpis, Espoir, Espérance. Études sémantiques du vocabulaire de l'espérance dans l'Hellénisme et le judaisme avant le NT, Berna 1983; B. Studer, Das christliche Fest ein Tag der gläubigen Hoffnung, in FS A. Nocent: Stud. Anselm. 95 (Rome 1988), 517-529; B. Studer, Augustine and the Pauline Theme of Hope, in W.S. Babcock (ed.), Paul and the Legacies of Paul, Dallas 1990, 201-221; A. Dihle (A), B. Studer (BC), F. Rickert (D), Hoffnung: RAC 15 (1991) 1159-1250 (bibl.; C: patristic part, foundational); G. Visonà, La speranza nei Padri, intr., tr. and notes by G.V., Milan 1993; F. Cocchini, Romani (exegetical writings on letter to the): (Diz.) Origene (Rome 2000), 415-418 (bibl.).

B. Studer

HORMISDAS, pope (d. 523). At the death of Pope *Symmachus (11 July 514), his deacon Hormisdas, a native of Frosinone who was ordained presbyter in 499, was elected to succeed him. He had been married (his wife entered the cloister) and had a son named Silverius, who wrote his father's epitaph (ICUR 2, 1, n. 15; Diehl 984, n. 184). Silverius became a subdeacon of the church of Rome, and later pope (536–537). Hormisdas took part in the Roman synod of 501 and occupied an important position in the Roman church during Symmachus's pontificate. Elected pope, he worked esp. to finally repair the *Laurentian Schism (LP I, 274: inscription); he took measures against the *Manichees (LP I, 270). He intervened in *Spain, where he charged John of Elche to be his representative, giving him norms to follow in ordinations (Ep. 25: PL 63, 421-423); for *Baetica and *Lusitania he charged Sallustius of Seville (Ep. 26: PL 63, 425-426). For Gaul, which had only recently become Catholic with *Clovis, he had links with *Avitus of Vienne and esp. with *Caesarius of Arles (Thiel 9; 22; 150). He managed, through a series of favorable circumstances, to end the *Acacian schism. During the revolt (513) of *Vitalian, who had asked the emperor *Anastasius to call a council, Anastasius wrote to Hormisdas inviting him to take part (CSEL 35, 499-500; 501-502). Hormisdas first consulted with King *Theoderic and with a Roman council, and then (in August) sent a legate to *Constantinople, with precise instructions (indiculus) and a formula of faith (Regula rectae fidei Hormisdae) which those who wanted to reenter into communion with Rome had to sign (CSEL 35, 520-522; DS 363-365). To bring the reconciliation to a conclusion, Hormisdas developed relations with some Eastern bishops.

Once the danger of Vitalian had passed, Anastasius became less conciliatory, though the movement for reunion continued to grow (Jaffé 780; 783; 785); for this reason he sent legates to Hormisdas and a letter to the Roman senate. The pope then sent a new delegation, which included *Ennodius of Pavia and Peregrinus of Misenum, but this obtained no positive results (Jaffé 720; 792-796). With Anastasius's death in 518, the accession of *Justin I (who was of orthodox faith and assisted by his nephew *Justinian as comes) and the election of the new patriarch, John II, the climate in the Byzantine capital changed. John communicated to Hormisdas that his name and that of Leo had been reinserted in the diptychs. At that time there was a close correspondence between Rome and Constantinople (letters largely preserved in the Collectio Avellana: CSEL 35).

Early in 519 Hormisdas sent another delegation, including Germanus of Capua, with the same libellus to be subscribed and a new indiculus, i.e., instructions which the delegation had to follow. At Easter (28 March 519), with the signing of the libellus by John and with the approval of the emperor, full communion was restored between the two churches and the schism ended, after 35 years of division (CSEL 35, 611). Now effort was made to secure the adherence of the other important sees of the East, in particular *Antioch and *Alexandria. At Thessalonica a revolt broke out against the pontifical delegation. But the union was to be clouded by the Scythian (Dobrugia) monks, who wanted approval for the formula Unus de Trinitate passus est de carne (see also *theopaschites), the better to defend the Council of *Chalcedon and Leo's Tomus ad Flavianum; at first they were not well received by Justinian (CSEL 35, 644-645), but he soon began to support them and plead their cause with Hormisdas (CSEL 35, 645-646; 648-649). Meanwhile, some of them had gone to Rome, where they remained from June 519 to September 520. But Hormisdas, who initially hesitated to respond as he waited for the return of the delegation from the East, in September 520 withheld his approval because he did not consider the formula useful and thought the monks enamored of novelty (Thiel 124). He expelled them from Rome (ACO IV, 2, 54-55) and communicated his decision to the emperor. Justinian took no account of the Roman position. Hormisdas sent relics of Peter and Paul to the emperor; he died 6 August 523 and was buried in St. Peter's.

CPL 1683-1684; Verzeichnis 384-389; PL 63, 367-528; Thiel 741-990; CSEL 35, 495-742; LP I, 275-278; III, 90; DTC 7, 161-176; R. Cessi, Lo scisma laurenziano e le origini della dottrina politica della Chiesa di Roma: Archivio della Soc. Romana di storia patria 42 (1919) 5-229; W. Haacke, Die Glaubensformel des Papstes Hormisdas im Acacianischen Schisma, AG 20, Rome 1939 (see the reservations in RBen 53 [1941] 153); A. Lentini, Il "libellus" portato a Bisanzio da Germano di Capua, in Il contributo dell'arcid. di Capua alla vita religiosa e culturale del Meridione, Rome 1967, 343-349; C. Capizzi, L'imperatore Anastasio I (491-518), OCA 184, Rome 1969; S.M. Meo, La dottrina mariana e le rispettive formule sintetiche dei Papi Ormisda e Giovanni II, del VI sec., in De cultu mariano saec. VI-XI, III, Rome 1972, 17-34; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei papi del secolo VII, Milan 1971, 407-423 (see index); L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 29-102; C. Capizzi, Sul fallimento di un negoziato di pace ecclesiastica fra il papa Ormisda e l'imperatore Anastasio I (515-517): Critica Storica 17 (1980) 23-54; Atti del Convegno su Papa Ormisda (514-523): magistero, cura pastorale ed impegno ecumenico, ed. C. Noce, Frosinone 1993; Patrologia IV, 134-137; Germano di Capua (d. 541 ca.). Ambasciatore ecumenico a Costantinopoli e modello di santità per il Cassinate, ed. F. Carcione, Venafro 1999; EPapi 1, 476-483.

A. Di Berardino

HORSIESI (ca. 305–ca. 390). Second successor of *Pachomius, after the brief rule of Petronius. We do not know his origin. Around 320 he attached himself to the disciples of Pachomius. Appointed superior at a moment of crisis which divided the monasteries, he was too meek and mild to succeed in imposing his authority; replaced by a "vicar general," Theodore, he withdrew to solitude, while in theory keeping his authority, which he resumed at Theodore's death. A Coptic text, not wholly believable, speaks of a visit by Horsiesi to *Alexandria at the time of Patriarch *Theophilus, with whom he discussed spiritual problems. Among the Pachomian documents translated into Latin by *Jerome is a Liber Horsiesi, lost in the Coptic and Greek text: rather than an organic literary composition, it is a homiletic work which takes up some catecheses and admonitions. Rich in biblical citations, it can be considered a spiritual testament appealing to fidelity. Many pages are addressed more specifically to superiors. The work's authenticity is undisputed, while the fragments found in Coptic seem to belong to later generations. The Liber Horsiesi has been translated into several modern languages, as it provides excellent evidence of Egyptian monastic ideas. Two letters have recently been discovered in the original Coptic, written on the occasion of the Pachomians' annual meeting. They deal, in an allusive style, with moral and disciplinary problems. Horsiesi may also have had a considerable part in drawing up the Pachomian rules and recording the life of the founder.

CPG/S 2367-2368; W.F. Crum, Der Papyruscodex Saec. VI-VII der Phillipps-Bibliothek in Cheltenham. Koptische theologische Schriften (Schriften der Wiss. Gesellsch. in Strassburg 18), Strassburg 1915; A. Boon, Pachomiana latina, Louvain 1932, 109-147; M. Elizalde, Libro de nuestro Padre S. Orsisio: Cuadernos Monásticos 4-5 (1967) 245-279; P. Deseille, L'esprit du monachisme pachômien, suivi de la traduction française des Pachomiana latina par les Moines de Solesmes, Bellefontaine 1968; H. Bacht, Das Vermächtnis des Ursprungs, Würzburg 1972; L. Cremaschi (ed.), Pacomio e i suoi discepoli, Magnano (VC) 1988; Patrologia V, 510-512.

J. Gribomont

HOSPITALITY, CHRISTIAN. From the beginnings of Christianity, the churches took up and exercised hospitality to its fullest impact, following the traditional pattern in the Jewish communities of the Diaspora, the nomadic civilization of the Near East and the maritime world of the Mediterranean. This involved heavy burdens for the communities, particularly those of the great commercial centers and transit towns. Despite the slowness of transport, and the fatigues and dangers of all kinds that threatened travelers in antiquity, there was much travel, by land and by sea, favored in part by the pax romana. The rudimentary structure of hotel services forced travelers to have recourse, if possible, to private lodgings, with more or less unknown landlords, toward whom they remained obliged on their return. This system, widespread in the Greek and Jewish world, particularly in the commercial areas, was transformed by the churches into a genuine institution. The first Christian missionaries could move about continually, using the system of the synagogue network. From this came the exhortation to mutual hospitality to favor the spread of the gospel, which was spread through preaching. Paul recommends it to the Romans: "Practice hospitality" (Rom 12:13). And Paul himself makes abundant use of it in his travels, even as a prisoner: arriving at Puteoli, he sought out the brothers in the faith and stayed with them for seven days (Acts 28:13-14). Travel was an essential necessity for fulfilling Jesus' commandment: "Go out to all the world and preach the gospel." The Didache has a specific chapter on missionaries and on the conditions of hospitality (11,1-3), but also for nonmissionaries. An ethics of hospitality, with precise stipulations, was elaborated from 2-3 John (see also Tertia Clementis; Hermas, Shepherd, Mand. 11). The problem was, in a period of high Christian mobility, to distinguish exploiters of the system from those who truly had a right to use it. Trips were expensive, and the Christian had to make use of only what was essential, not having much money. This poverty also made them less a target of robbers.

A Christian who traveled was assured of being fraternally received by all of the communities which he had met along his itinerary, since he was furnished with *letters of communion (litterae communicatoriae), duly signed by his bishop, which he had to present to the brothers. We have many examples of these letters, which attest the traditional character of hospitality. Although exercised in the context of the local community, it had a universal dimension, incarnating the very unity of the church and, as Tertullian emphasized (De praec. haer. 20,8), the communion of Christians in one faith. The duty of hospitality was incumbent on the entire community, laity and clergy. Hermas considers hospitable bishops blessed (Simil. 9,27,25; cf. Simil. 8,10). Justin, writing from Rome, says that one of the purposes of the Sunday collection was to receive "guests who came from other countries" (1 Apol 67). The numerous early Christian texts that address the problem of hospitality prove the importance of this institution in the life of local churches (Didache 11-12; I Clem. 10-12; Just., 1 Apol. 67; Luc. of Sam., De morte Peregr. 11-13; Tertull., Apol. 39; Didascalia 29-30). *Eusebius says that *Melito of Sardis wrote a work On Hospitality (HE 4,26,3), wholly lost.

It is not difficult to imagine that this generosity of the churches was sometimes abused by certain indiscreet brothers: the Didache sought to remedy this evil; *Lucian of Samosata derided the naiveté of Christians, who welcomed every new arrival. At the dawn of the 4th c., the so-called Council of *Elvira saw itself forced to take a harsh stance to prevent wandering Christians from defrauding the simple by showing false letters of communion and boasting of the title of confessor; in 394, the Council of *Nîmes warned against false Eastern clerics who were being maintained by the churches of *Gaul. But these abuses, always a possibility, did not discourage Christian charity, convinced of carrying out the commandment of the Lord Jesus (Mt 10:11ff.; Mk 6:8-13; Lk 9:2-6; 10:4-16), and intent on imitating the examples of Scripture (Abraham, Lot, Rahab, Zacchaeus, Simon, Martha and Mary), and in particular that of Jesus himself at the Last Supper (Jn 13). The tradition of hospitality continued all through the Constantinian era, with the creation of suitable buildings, intended for passing travelers; and it continued to hold a privileged place in monastic life.

D. Gorce, Les voyages, l'hospitalité et le port des lettres dans le monde chrétien des IV^e et V^e s., Poitiers 1925; M. Marty, Sur le devoir chrétien de l'hospitalité aux trois premiers siècles: RHPhR 19 (1939) 288-295; RAC 8, 1061-1123; DSp 7, 808-825; L. Peña, Hospederías sirias de los siglos IV, V, VI: Liber Annuus 32 (1982) 327-334; A.J. Malherbe, Hospitality and Inhospitality in the Church, in Social Aspects of Early Christianity, Philadelphia 1983, 92-112; N. Brox, The Stranger in Early Christianity: Theology Digest 41 (1994) 47-52; L. Padovese, L'originalità cristiana.

Il pensiero etico-sociale di alcuni vescovi norditaliani del IV secolo, Rome 1983; M. Maritano, Insegnamenti e pratica dell'ospitalità nei Padri della Chiesa, in Nuova ospitalità per una nuova evangelizzazione, Turin 1995, 21-75; C. Corsato, I volti della carità nell'esperienza dei Padri, Suppl. La Provvidenza n. 3, Padua 1997.

CH. MUNIER - A. DI BERARDINO

HUESCA (Lat. Osca, Oscensis, Spain). The correspondence between *Consentius and St. *Augustine informs us about the contamination of this church with *Priscillianism, at least in the person of its bishop, Siagrius. In the year 598 a provincial council was held in the city. We know its Acts thanks to the Codex Aemilianensis; redacted successively, they lack the signature of the bishops present, of whose number and identity we are ignorant. Its two canons, confirmed in the Council of *Terrassa in 614, prescribe that the bishops are to be vigilant over the moral life of the clergy and to hold an annual diocesan synod, at which the priests, deacons and the abbots of the monasteries in the diocese should be present as well.

Aug., Ep. 11* (Divjak); M. Moreau, Lecture de la lettre 11 de Consentius à Augustin. Un pastiche hagiographique: Les lettres de saint Augustin découvertes par J. Divjak*, Paris 1983, 215-223; Mansilla, Geografía I, 280-281; Hfl-Lecl 3, 237; Palazzini 2, 170; Vives, Concilios, 158; Orlandís, Concilios, 242-244.

P. DE LUIS

HUMILITY, Patristic Writings on. Humility, or tapeinophrosynē, praised already in Pr 29:23, as exaltation in the glory of the Lord in contrast to the hybris, which instead humiliates, is based on the OT, on the creation of humanity from clay. Adam means "lump of earth," for which reason Abraham says that before God he is "dust and ashes" (Gen 18:27): the same derivation applies to humilis, "lowly, modest, humble," from humus, "earth, ground." The sin of humanity is conversely the pride of becoming "like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen 3:5). In the Hebrew Bible, the social category of the poor person and the religious category of the humble are often correlated; the poor person relies on God, who says: "But I will leave among you a humble and lowly people, and they will take refuge in the name of the Lord" (Zeph 3:12); "But for whom shall I have respect? The one who is humble and of a contrite spirit" (Is 66:2). Many Psalms join the prayers of the poor and those of the humble, who trust entirely in God. In the NT tapeinophrosynē is commended or attributed to Christians eight times, in the Acts of the Apostles in Paul's words (20:19: "serving the Lord with all humility") and in the letters of the Pauline corpus, where the term tapeinophrosynē occurs frequently: Phil 2:3, where it is contrasted to vainglory; Rom 12:16, where lenient treatment of the lowly is commended; 2 Cor 7:6, where God comforts the humble (tapeinoi); in 10:1, where Paul says that he is humble before the recipients; in 11:7, where he says that he was humbled so that the Corinthians might be exalted (see 12:21). Ther term is likewise found frequently among the letters less universally received as coming directly from Paul's pen: Eph 4:2, where humility is associated to meekness and agapē; Col 2:23, where it is united to the divine worship and disregard of the body; Col 3:12, where it is exalted along with the Christian virtues of mercy, goodness, meekness and patience. Likewise, in 1 Pet 3:8, it is associated with mutual agreement, compassion and philanthropia, and in 5:5, it is said to obtain the grace of God, although God resists pride. In Jas 1:9 the whole person is invited to rejoice; God in fact grants grace to the humble but opposes the proud (4:6).

The model is obviously Christ, with his self-emptying (ekenōsen), his humility (etapeinōsen) and obedience (hypēkoos) to the point of death on a cross (Phil 2:7-8), a central idea in Pauline thought. *Jesus himself in Mt 11:29 sets himself forth as a model for Christians inasmuch as he is meek (praÿs) and humble (tapeinos) of heart, virtues that confer peace to our souls: in fact, the meek reenter the beatitudes along with the poor (Lk 6:20) in spirit (Mt 5:2). Jesus was also indeed the model of poverty (Mt 8:20; Lk 9:58); he came to serve (Mt 20:27-28; Lk 22:26-27) and gave an example of service and humility (Jn 13:2-17). The exhortation to be humble and like small children (Mt 18:4; see M. Berrouard, Enfance spirituelle, in DSp 4, 1959, 682-705) corresponds to Mt 23:12 and Lk 14:11 and 18:14: the one who exalts himself will be humbled; the one who humbles himself will be exalted: there one finds an echo of Jas 4:10 and 1 Pet 5:6, with the invitation to humble ourselves before the Lord, who in this case will exalt us. Another model of humility is naturally *Mary, as one can perceive from the Magnificat: God looked upon her humility (tapeinōsin) and has exalted the humble (Lk 1:48, 52).

Since the earliest days of Christianity, the terms tapeinophrosynē and tapeinotēs assumed a positive meaning, although often in the classical world they indicate a lack of importance and even worthlessness, and only rarely does one find the term "humility" used in a good sense, as is also the case with humilitas, which means low social condition, etc. (TLL 6, 3103-3119), but it does not have a moral and religious connotation, even though at the ethical level, since the time of Herodotus and Aeschylus, the invitation to avoid hybris (i.e., arrogance that transgresses human limits) was alive and well; nevertheless, even Aristotle, in his Nicomachean Ethics (1123b5-1125a30), saw humility in a negative sense and contrasted it to magnanimity (W. Den Boer, Tapeinos in Pagan and Christian Terminology, in Tria Corda, Scritti A. Momigliano, ed. E. Gabba, Como 1983, 143-162; A. Dihle, Demut: RAC 3 [1957] 735-778; P. Adnès, Humilité: DSp 7 [1969] 1152-1164; S. Rehrl, Demut: TRE 8 [1981] 463-468). Precisely because of the high value that humility acquired in Christianity scholars have supposed that such names as Stercorius or Projectus, names that frequently appear in Christian epigraphs but are almost completely absent in pagan ones, were assumed for love of humility, even though it could be a late onomastic development, of an age in which Christian epigraphs were by then the majority, as observes I. Kajanto, On the Problem of Names of Humility in Early Christian Epigraphy: Arctos 3 (1962) 45-53.

Similarly, in early Christian literature outside the NT, humility is presented as an important characteristic of Christians in the authentic letters of *Ignatius of Antioch (1,10), *Clement's Letter to the Corinthians, where one also notes the conceptual transformation of the technical rhetorical term tapeinōsis, which in the Christian sphere became "humility" (I. Lana, La cristianizzazione di alcuni termini retorici nella Lettera ai Corinti di Clemente, in Forma futuri, Turin 1975, 110-118), and so too as well in the *Letter of Barnabas, 19,3, which in its moral section exhorts one to humility in all things, against pride and vainglory. Likewise in the 2nd c., in the writings of the so-called postapostolic fathers, the Shepherd of *Hermas praises humility, one of the virtues by which one recognizes whether a person has the Spirit of God, along with meekness, serenity, abstention from all evil and lust; with his humility, the good Christian calms the soul of his neighbor and brings it about that his neighbor prays for him (43,8; 56,7; see 18,6): humility can also be an expression of contrition, which subsequently pleads for God's mercy (66,4): patience and humility constitute the commandments of the Lord and life in him (73,6). The preaching of humility and humiliation by Jesus was at the center of *Marcion's attention, who saw therein a subsequent break instituted by Jesus with respect to the law, which was established on the principle of retaliation, a perspective which was inserted within his vision of the complete separation of the OT from the NT and the creator God with respect to the Father of Jesus (E. Norelli, Note sulla soteriologia di Marcione: Augustinianum 35 [1995] 281-305).

*Clement of Alexandria, in the late 2nd c., recalls the humility of Isaiah and Jeremiah in their manner of dress, as a sign of disregard for everything that is vain (Paed. II, 10bis, 113,1); he ascribes the praise of humility in terms close to the ones used by Christians to Plato, who affirmed that the one who humbles himself will be exalted (Strom. II, 22,132,1). Following the lead of Mt 11:29, Clement directly identifies humility with meekness (praÿtēs) (Strom. III, 6,48,3), the object of blessings, such that Christ belongs to the humble, not the proud (Strom. IV, 6,33,3). He also identifies humility with the great power of agapē before God (Strom. IV, 17,108,3). The exhortation to humility in Strom. IV, 8,66,2 contains a direct citation of Col 3:12, and in Strom. VI, 8,65,3 a paraphrase is given from the *Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, which enjoins humility precisely to the most powerful in the community. In the Extracts from Theodotus (1,4,1), "great humility" is attributed directly to the Lord, who in virtue of it showed himself in the form of a human being and not an angel. Clement's disciple *Origen, who between the 2nd and the 3rd c., at Alexandria and then at Caesarea, developed his exegetical and theological teaching and maintained for the first time in complete form the doctrine of the apokatastasis, likewise wrote frequently about humility. From what remains extant from his work a good 32 occurrences of the terms tapeinophrosynē and tapeinophrōn can be found. He regarded deep humility as the disposition of the orans in C. Cels. VI, 15, where he cited Phil 2:8 with respect to Christ, who humbled himself to the point of death on the cross, and Mt 11:29 containing the words of *Jesus himself (likewise mentioned in Sel. in Ps.: PG 12, 1065, 1). Similarly, he comments on the Magnificat in his Hom. 8 on Lk 1:46, observing that humility is the lack of arrogance; it is a virtue with which it is fitting to look at God, who prefers humility over pride (frag. 163,7 on Lk). He cites Col 3:12 many times in his works, and in frag. 1 from the Commentary on Romans, he praises *Paul for having presented himself as a servant of Christ thanks to his "praiseworthy humility" which is given to him precisely for not having a slavish spirit of fear, but rather that filial spirit of service. In Sel. in Ps. 1428,26, humility appears in a list of Christian virtues: love, justice, sound judgment, temperance, knowledge and wisdom. The importance of humility is well understood if one considers that Origen states that the most grievous sin is pride (Exp. in Prv. PG 17, 169, 46), which the Lord opposes, and it is through humility that the humble obtain the glory or doxa of God (ibid., 249, 1). Humility and meekness are opposed to wrath, just as temperance and self-control are opposed to personal craving (ibid., 252, 2): the virtues are opposed to other specific passions on the basis of the *Platonic schema of the irascible soul and the concupiscible soul, which must be governed by the rational soul.

In the 3rd c., *Hippolytus, with respect to whom one should recall the problem of distinguishing the Roman and Eastern versions, presents a reflection on the theme of humility, esp. in his commentary on *Daniel, where this virtue is praised many times in the prophet's character (II, 6; IV, 19.29): thanks to humility, *Daniel was regarded as worthy of the divine revelations (IV, 36). And in De ben. Is. et Iac. (32,4, l), *Jacob's humility is opposed to the pride of those circumcised who consider themselves to be the only ones who were justified. Likewise in the writings of *Eusebius of Caesarea, in the 1st half of the 4th c., some 10 occurrences attest to a meditation on the theme, esp. in the commentary on the Psalms, where perfect humility is said to be that of Christ (PG 24, 25), who is born in the human being from the encounter with God: in this way David humbled himself in considering God's greatness and his own nothingness (PG 23, 772). *Epiphanius of Salamis and *Athanasius of Alexandria reflected on humility, although with much less close attention.

Christian reflection on humility had already been particularly developed in the writings of Origen and was subsequently developed in the thought of *Gregory of Nyssa, who borrowed from the Alexandrian many philosophical aspects, among which were the doctrine of the apokatastasis, and with respect to our concerns, several lines pertaining to humility. The intensity of Gregory's meditation on this theme emerges from the 55 occurrences alone of the terms tapeinophrosynē and tapeinophrōn: oxymoronically, he presents humility as a "very high mountain," in the funerary speech for *Meletius (GNO IX: 449,14), and an oxymoron analogue is presented in the funerary speech for Flacilla (GNO IX: 480,19), where Gregory recalls the empress's "sublime humility" (see 488,13: the "sublimity of humility" also in Infant. 68,16), a virtue that is most praised in Scripture (488,5), acc. to the concept already seen in the writings of Origen. Humility, therefore, takes on all the Christian virtues, as in the case of Paul inasmuch as he was an imitator of Christ (De perf. Christ., VIII, 1: 196,17). The humility of the Son, which does not mean his lack of dignity or inferiority with respect to the Father, is obviously a point of debate in the works against *Arius and *Sabellius, where the concept occurs many times (III, 1: 82,1ff.; 85,1ff.). It also appears in the work against *Eunomius (III, 3,24), where mention is made of the critical passage on the humility and obedience of Christ, Phil 2:8, cited again along with Mt 11:29; similarly he takes up the theme in his commentary on the Song (VI: 126,13). In the sermons on the Beatitudes, Gregory reflects on "poverty of spirit," the object of the first of the blessings, and identifies it with "voluntary humility," to which the future kingdom makes a comparison and whose paradigm is Christ-Logos (PG 44, 1200, 49ff.). Likewise in the writings of Gregory, as already in Hippolytus, the patriarch Jacob, not by chance a figura Christi, is the example of humility, in opposition to the wrath of his brother Esau (Adv. Maced. III, 1: 111,7). In the De instit. Chr., humility is one of the gifts of prayer, along with simplicity, love, strength and goodness (VIII, 1: 82,20). Gregory of Nyssa often underscores humility, accompanying it with a list of other virtues, in a context of struggle with the vices and evils, e.g., in the commentaries on Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs and in Ep. 17,25. In the biography on his sister *Macrina (ch. 11) he refers to the life of the consecrated virgin as inspired "by the measure of humility." In the sermons on the Beatitudes (PG 44, 1217, 14ff.), associating the humility of the Logos to meekness, he parallels these virtues with those of a mother and establishes human humility in the awareness of the nothingness of our nature in the sight of God, and as a result of this, humility signifies for us a deep inner peace (Mt 11:29).

The other Cappadocian Fathers, esp. *Basil of Caesarea, present interesting reflections on humility; *Gregory of Nazianzus, however, uses the term only eight times. But in comparison to Origen and Gregory of Nyssa in this exaltation of humility as a fundamental Christian virtue, it seems that the only one who even compares is the latter's contemporary, namely, *John Chrysostom, who dedicated complete homilies to the soul's humility and who presents in his extant writings more than 150 occurrences of the terms tapeinophrosynē and tapeinophrōn, esp. in the De Christi precibus, the De paenitentia and in the eight homilies on Genesis, but it is truly a reflection that crosses the numerous and disparate works of John Chrysostom. The Origenian tradition, which is evident in the writings of Gregory of Nyssa, is also present in the works of *Didymus the Blind and *Evagrius of Pontus. In the commentary on Job (cod. 121,17ff.), Didymus, as the exegete that he is, collects scriptural passages on humility, which serves as a proemium to the exaltation that comes from God, because the one who humbles himself will be exalted, and God grants grace to the humble.

In the Comm. in Ps. (201,28) Didymus likewise opposes humility to pride, hyperēphania, and in the commentary on *Genesis (see 70,26), humility, an example of which is *Jesus Christ, leads to the sublime height of God inasmuch as it causes the soul to grow like the wings of an eagle. He also incorporates lexical observations, as in Fr. in Ps. 272: tapeinōsis at times refers to humility, at other times it refers to the humiliation that one undergoes from one's enemies.

Evagrius of Pontus (in Pract. prol., l. 15, and in Inst. PG 79, 1236) opposes humility to pride or hyperēphania, the "original evil." It is humility that leads *Abraham to say: "I am but dust and ashes" and causes the psalmist to sing that "unless the Lord builds the house, those who build it labor in vain." In Pract. 57,4, Evagrius associates the infinite desire tending toward humility, which recalls Gregory of Nyssa's epektasis and which is established on the awareness of our radical poverty and God's riches. The rich are saved with the giving of alms, which win for them God's agape, and the poor are saved through poverty itself, which teaches them humility (In Prov. 104,19), called the "unbreakable weapon" (Aliae sent. 63); the demons take refuge there because they see therein their annihilation (exoudenōsis), but in actuality it lifts humanity up to the pinnacle of philosophy (Tr. ad Eul. PG 79, 110), to heaven and the choirs of angels, to the lofty height of the virtues, and prevents one from falling from there (Octo spir. mal. PG 79, 1164). Evagrius offers many, even psychological, reflections of great subtlety on humility, in the context of the study of virtues and vices.

In the Syriac church, the author who most intensely meditated on the concept of humility as Christ's virtue and Christian virtue was *Ephrem, who in the Greek versions that have survived well exceeds 200 occurrences of the terms tapeinophrosynē and tapeinophrōn, and who also wrote a work titled For the Defeat of Pride; many passages on humility are also found in the Sermo asceticus and in the work In Imitation of the Proverbs, and numerous *parenetic works directed toward monks.

In the Latin church, in addition to the work of *Hilary of Poitiers and *Ambrose of Milan (Adnès, 1152-1153), the most profound consideration of the concept of humility is found in the writings of *Augustine, a topic that has been extensively examined by O. Schaffner (Christliche Demut. Des hl. Augustinus Lehre von der Humilitas, Würzburg 1959) and by Reddy. In homilies 55-59 on John, e.g., commenting on the episode of the washing of the disciples' feet, or in the De fide et Symb. (5,11), *Augustine reflected on the Lord's humilitas, which was manifest in his birth and earthly life until his death, a virtue which belongs to God himself and to Christians, although it is unknown to the philosophers, in whom, as he affirms in the En. Ps. 31,2,18, "one can in every place find the best moral precepts, but not humility: this virtue comes from another source, namely, Christ. What else does Christ teach us, except humility," the humility that derives from God, who was manifest in Christ and upon whom are established other virtues. (See P. Adnès, L'humilité vertu spécifiquement chrétienne d'après s. Augustin: RevAscMyst 28 [1952] 208-223; F. Moriones, Jesu Cristo, redentor y maestro de humildad: Augustinus 45 [2000] 147-190; P. Langa, La humildad en la cristología de S. Agustín, in Tempus Implendi Promissa, Pamplona 2000, 301-330; Agostino di Ippona, L'umiltà dell'amore: il commento alla lavanda dei piedi, intr., tr. and notes by A. Montanari, Milan 2002.)

*Paul was central in Augustine's reflection on humility, who referred to himself as the least among the apostles (1 Cor 15:9) and who praised Christ's humility (Adnès, 1150) esp. in Phil 2, which Augustine meditates on in a special way, seeing therein a twofold humiliation in the assumption of humanity and the death on the cross (see A. Verwilghen, Christologie et spiritualité selon s. Augustin. L'hymne aux Philippiens, Paris 1985). Christ is, therefore, referred to by him as the "humble God" (Cat. rud. 4,8), "the humble physician" (Serm. 22,1), "the teacher of humility" (Joh. tr. 25,16; 59,1; Serm. 61,1; 62,1), "the way," "the foundation" and the "norm of humility" (resp. in Joh, tr. 5,3; Serm. 69,2; 60/A,11 and 68,11). Christ's humility corrects the human sin of pride, which is an orientation toward oneself, i.e., more toward nothing than toward God (Civ. Dei XIV, 13); it is the antidote against the tumor of pride, and it is salvific (Serm. 285,4; Doc. Chr. 1,14; R. Arbesmann, Christ the Medicus humilis in St. Augustine, in Augustinus Magister, Congrès international augustinien, Paris 1954, II, Paris 1955, 623-629, which esp. studies Augustine's sermons). Salvation is accomplished through the humble assumption of humanity by Christ, who in this way, when acting as mediator, makes us participants in his divinity (Trin. IV, 4; Ep. 137) through the cross (Serm. 75,2; 63,1-2). The humility of the kenōsis is a model for our own humility (Serm. 68; Ep. 118), acc. to the connected idea which was very dear to Augustine—namely, that every good thing comes not from us but rather from God's grace. Moreover, the humility of Christ's humanity continues to manifest itself in its presence in all the poor and all the humble (Serm. 123,3; 236,3). Christian humility indeed acquires a new value (see Ep. 153 to Macedonius and Sermo 142, edited and studied by A. Wilmart, Un développement inédit: RAscMyst 9 [1928] 282-290) and is one of the three traits that greatly characterize the Christian, along with charity and the interiority of the experience of God (J. Bonnefoy, L'idée du chrétien dans la doctrine augustinienne de la grâce: RecAug 5 [1968] 41-66). Inasmuch as it is a recognition of one's small stature, humility is always open to the power of grace. Especially commenting upon the Psalms, Augustine constantly maintained his attention toward these leading virtues of the Christian (A. Costa, El camino de la humilidad en las Enarr. sobre los salmos: Cuadernos monásticos [1987] 23-42). Likewise for Augustine, humility is the fundamental way of relating to God, as it appears, e.g., from Ep. 140 and 149 and Civ. Dei I, 19-29 (R. Dodaro, The Secret Justice of God and the Gift of Humility: AugStud 24 [2003] 83-96). And in relation to God, a special aspect of humility is that which the Christian teacher must always maintain, an awareness that the only teacher is Christ, as Augustine explains in the De magistro (A. Michel, La parole et la beauté dans la conception augustinienne de l'enseignement, in Augustin, ed. P. Ranson, Lausanne-Paris 1988, 102-112). And in relation to this teaching Augustine opts for humilitas also in style, and, following the treatise De catechizandis rudibus, sets forth an in-depth reflection on this point in book IV of the De doctrina Christiana, systematizing a model for Christian behavior, marked by simplicity and clarity, with the adaptation of the form to the argument and in general the imitation of the ways of Scripture. (On the sermo humilis in Antiquity, see the chapter by that name in E. Auerbach, Literary Language and Its Public, London 1965 [German orig. 1958].)

Likewise in the writings of Augustine, as in the case of Origen and Gregory of Nyssa, the excellence of humility is measured on the basis of the gravity of its opposed vice (N. Torchia, St. Augustine's Treatment of superbia: AugStud 18 [1987] 66-80). Pride, in fact, is connected to cupiditas and the dominandi libido, and, finally, to that contemptus Dei, which is the opposite of amor Dei usque ad contemptum sui civitas Dei, which characterizes the Christian's disposition marked by humility and which is the code of the civitas Dei (D. MacQueen, Contemptus Dei: St Augustine on the Disorder of Pride: RecAug 9 [1973] 227-293, then in Augustine, ed. J. Dunn - I. Harris, II, Cheltenham 1997, 43-109). The conflict between humility and pride is found in *Prudentius's Psychomachia, where at lines 178-309, the two are allegorized by means of *David and Goliath (M. Philonenko, Humilitas et superbia: RHPhR 71 [1991] 115-119). In monasticism, humility is esp. commended and associated with obedience, on the model of Christ, and, vice versa, a special aversion is reserved for praesumptio, which in the monastic rules of the 6th and 7th c. appears very frequently (P. Miquel, Praesumere-praesumptio dans l'ancienne littérature monastique: RBen 79 [1969] 424-436). The theme of humility as a Christian virtue became so typical that it was united to the rhetorical topos of the tapeinosis for the captatio benevolentiae of the exordium in the writings of *Paulinus of Nola, who in the Natalicia begins precisely with an assertion of Christian humility (H. Junod, Le poète chrétien selon Paulin de Nole: REAug 21 [1975] 13-54). One of the few positive elements of tapeinōsis in the pagan conception is recovered here and united to the Christian tradition on humility, which is entirely positive, because it has as its model Christ and its rationale in the creaturely status of the human being: the sublime nature of humility in Christianity is grounded in the marvelous creation and even more marvelous redemption.

A. Wilmart, Un sermon de s. Augustin sur le précepte de la charité: RAscMyst 2 (1921) 351-372: sermo Jacques 2,10; Wilmart 2, with crit. ed. and study; J. Saint-Martin, Humilité et perfection selon s. Augustin: Bibliothèque augustinienne. OEuvres de s. Augustin 3 (1949) 456; P. Adnès, L'humilité à l'école de s. Augustin: RAscMyst 31 (1955) 28-46; G.W.H. Lampe, A Patristic Greek Lexicon, Oxford 1961; S. Witek, Pensée antique gréco-romaine et conception chrétienne de l'humilité, Roczniki teolog.-kanon., Lublin, Univ. cathol. 18 (1971); J. Azcona, La doctrina agustiniana de la humildad en los Tractatus in Ioannem, Madrid 1972; J. Azcona, Cristo camino humilde, según san Agustín: Augustinus 18 (1973) 317-354; I. Jamieson, Augustine's Confessions: The Structure of Humility: Augustiniana 24 (1974) 234-246; M.-F. Berrouard, "Toute ton humilité consiste à reconnaître ce que tu es": Bibliothèque augustinienne. OEuvres de s. Augustin 72 (1977) 797-798; M.-F. Berrouard, Le Maître de l'humilité, ibid. 798-799; A. Verwilghen, Le Christ Jésus, source de l'humilité chrétienne, in S. Augustin et la Bible, ed. A.-M. La Bonnardière, Paris 1986, 427-437, Eng. tr. Jesus Christ: Source of Christian Humility, in Augustine and the Bible, ed. P. Bright, Notre Dame, IN 1999, 301-312; G. Bonner, Christ, God and Man in the Thought of St. Augustine, in God's Decree and Man's Destiny. Studies on the Thought of Augustine of Hippo, ed. G. Bonner, repr. London 1987, 268-294; M. Harl, La langue de Japhet: La Septante et le grec des chrétiens, Paris 1994, 199; G. Schlabach, Augustine's Hermeneutic of Humility: Journal of Religious Ethics 22 (1994) 299-332; P.L. MacKinnon, Augustine's City of God: The Divided Self, in The Divided Ciuitas, The City of God, ed. D.F. Donnelly, New York 1995, 319-352; M. Neusch, Initiation à s. Augustin, maître spirituel, Paris 1996; D. Konstan, Problems in the History of Christian Friendship: JECS 4 (1996) 87-113; P.-M. Hombert, Gloria Gratiae. Se glorifier en Dieu, principe et fin de la théologie augustinienne de la grâce, Paris 1996; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Agostino: tra Etica e Religione, Brescia 1999; D.W. Reddy, Umiltà, in Agostino, Diz. Encicl., ed. A. Fitzgerald, Rome 2007, 1414-1422.

I. Ramelli

HUNERIC. King of the *Vandals and the Alans of *Africa (477–484). His first wife was a daughter of the *Visigothic king *Theodoric I, but shortly after Huneric married *Eudoxia, the daughter of *Valentinian III, whom earlier his (i.e., Huneric's) father *Genseric had taken as a hostage. Having succeeded Genseric, Huneric was suspicious of and hostile to all possible claimants to his throne. He at first adopted a prudently conciliating political strategy toward *Zeno and *Odoacer, respecting the African-Roman *Catholics and persecuting the *Manicheans; but then, perceiving the weakness of the *Byzantine emperor, he persecuted the non-Arian population. In 472, Eudoxia fled to *Jerusalem. *Victor of Vita (Hist. pers. II, 3-4.39; III, 3-14) has preserved for us three of Huneric's edicts. He died after a famine and was not succeeded by his son Hilderic, but rather by his nephew Gunthamund.

PL 58, 203, 213, 235; MGH, Auct. ant. III, 1.14.22.40 (K. Halm); H.-J. Diesner: PWK Suppl. 10, 957-962; PLRE II, 572-573; H.-J. Diesner, Zur Katholikenverfolgung Hunerichs: ThLZ 90 (1965) 893-896; A. Roncoroni, Sulla morte di re Unerico (Vittore di Vita, Hist. pers. III,71): RomBarb 2 (1977) 247-257; E. Malaspina, L'idrovora di Unirico. Un epigramma (A.L. 387 R.2 = 382 Sh.B.) e il suo contesto storico-culturale: RomBarb 13 (1994-95) 43-56; N. Francovich Onesti, I Vandali. Lingua e storia, Rome 2002.

E. Malaspina

HUNS (Lat. Hunni, Chunni; Greek Οὖνοι, Χοῦνοι). The historical events surrounding the Huns can be said to be reasonably certain only if we consider the decades around AD 370, i.e., from the time in which they appeared from the steppes of the Don River until the disintegration of *Attila's empire.

The Huns originally inhabited the territories to the N of China; the most ancient pieces of information date back, probably, to the 6th c. BC. Chinese sources in fact state that the Huns descended from the Hiung-nu, a Mongolian population that had settled on the borders of the Chinese empire, in Kansu and in the S part of the Gobi Desert. Their importance was established esp. starting from the 3rd c. AD and over the course of the first decades of the 4th c., i.e., when bands of Huns were able to scale the Great Wall of China, invading central China to then occupy Beijing. Shortly thereafter, these Huns were defeated by the Avars, who were advancing from the N, and the Tibetans, who came from the S, and they moved W, to the N of the Caspian Sea and on the Volga River (4th c.). From this point, some of the Huns came to the S of the Aral Sea, in the direction of Persia, although the others, pushed by other populations, continued the march W, subjecting the Alans and the *Ostrogoths, and pushing the *Visigoths, who had been frightened by their advance, to the S of the Danube River, within the borders of the Roman Empire. For a certain period, the relations between the Huns, who did not yet even have a basic unitary organization, and the empire were by necessity rather cordial. They in fact remained divided into groups that were independent of each other, under their own leaders, and had the custom of selling their military services to the emperor, patrician or the rebel magister militum, and they were accustomed to fight against each other when employed by opposing factions. The situation changed when in *Pannonia, Uldin asserted his authority over all the Huns, being recognized as king, and subjected numerous Germanic populations. With Uldin and his successors, esp. Rua, the relations between the Huns and the empire, both of East and West, became even more intense. The Huns, in fact, helped the Romans—after receiving ever more conspicuous sums of money from them—against the barbarian leader Gainas, who had rebelled against the yoke of the Eastern part of the empire and was defeated and killed by Uldin. They also fought against the Goths of Radagaisus in the Battle of Faesulae of 406 and against the Visigoths of Ataulf during Alaric's undertaking in *Italy.

The relations with the Roman Empire of the West increasingly strengthened following the ascension of *Aetius Flavius, who in 409 was the emperor's hostage.

When the magister militum Felix took Pannonia from the Huns it was Aetius who restored it to them in 431. In the meantime the kingdom of the Huns was increasingly establishing itself as a state, and this was owed, probably, to the proximity and intense collaboration that then existed with the empire.

The first signs of attrition between Romans and Huns began to appear, however, esp. under Attila, who, after his brother Bleda had been killed, became lord of the territories between Germany, the distant Danish islands and the Aral Sea, all the while entertaining hopes of subjecting the empire to his rule. His attempt, however, failed following two events: his defeat at the Battle of the Catalaunian Plains, near Challons (451), which in fact denied him his conquest over *Gaul, and the intervention of Pope *Leo I (452), which did not allow him to invade Italy.

Upon Attila's death (453), there began in the Hunnic state a process of rapid disintegration, which very early on led to its disappearance; in the subsequent centuries other groups of Huns also disappeared, who were pushed into various regions of *Asia, perhaps even to India. For later generations, the Huns were a symbol of an unusual ferocity and destructive fury, which left the inhabitants incapable of reconstructing anything solid in places where they had annihilated the forms of existing civilization at the moment of their arrival.

Dispersed hordes of populations that at some point we can call descendants of the stock of the Huns dispersed from Mongolia and China to Gaul, from the Siberian steppes and from the N oceans to the Caucasus Mountains, the Danube and the Alps.

The apex of their historical appearance was reached, as was said, with the advent of Attila, who ruled with authority and terror and not by solid political organization. From the sources it is unclear whether there were well-defined ties that connected the subjected peoples to him; there were no central officials nor governors of provinces outside the entourage of the court; moreover, he used the services of Roman officials. Justice was administered by the king himself before the door of his palace. No mention is made in the juridical sources of the legal norms or the customs of law. Neither did there exist a tribute system, given that the revenues were obtained through the extreme sums extorted from the Roman Empire. The capital of the Hunnic Empire, situated in a place unknown to us, was nothing more than a large village and houses, as well as the imperial palace itself; all of these were made of wood, even though well elaborated. Polygamy was widespread, and the women lived in apartments where they could receive guests.

From a religious point of view, we know from *Priscus that people regarded as a fetish a sword that was lost and then found at the time of Attila, as an omen of his rule over the world. The only form of culture was represented by the songs they sang during banquets held in honor of the sovereign.

In addition to war, the Huns showed themselves adept in commerce, which they practiced with the Hiung-nu of Mongolia, the Chinese, the Persians and the Indians. In the West, they engaged in commercial relations with the Romans.

Sources: Ammianus Marcellinus, Res Gestae, ed. G. Viansino, Milan 2002, XXXI; Priscus and Menander Protector, Fragm. Histor. Graec., ed. Mueller, Paris 1851, IV; Jordanes, Historia Gothorum, ed. E. Bartolini, Milan 1999.

Studies: J. Deguignes, Histoire générale des Huns, Paris 1756-58; H.H. Howorth, History of the Mongols, London 1876-88; E. von Wietersheim, Geschichte der Völkerwanderung, Leipzig 1881; A. Solari, Gli Unni ed Attila, Pisa 1916; Popoli delle steppe: Unni, Avari, Ungari, XXXV Settimana del Centro Italiano di Studi sull'alto medioevo, Spoleto 1988; L. Montecchio, I Visigoti e la rinascita culturale del secolo VII, Perugia 2006, 16-17.

L. Montecchio

HYDATIUS (395–470). Bishop of Chaves (Aquae Flaviae, in *Gallaecia) during the 1st half of the 5th c. He carried out political activity concerning the barbarian invaders, known there as the Suebians. His Chronicon continues that of *Jerome from 379 to 468. For more distant years, Hydatius uses written sources and preserves the universal character which had been present in Jerome's work. But the information successively becomes firsthand and tends to limit itself to *Spain and above all to Gallaecia—a sign of his isolation. His source is important for events of the 5th c. because of the scarcity of information. He lived in a period of political upheaval; he laments the destruction brought about by the barbarians and other calamities which remind him of those predicted by the prophets of the Old Testament. He has no illusions about the state of the empire and does not see any possible solution to the pitiful state of things. The text is preserved in only one MS with corruptions in its text and in its chronology, due in part to a different method of dating events.

CPL 2263; SC 218-219; C. Molè, Uno storico del V secolo: il vescovo Idazio, Catania 1978; J. Campos, Idacio, obispo de Chaves: su Chronicon, Salamanca 1984; S. Muhlberger, The Fifth-Century Chroniclers: Prosper, Hydatius and the Gallic Chronicle of 452, Leeds 1990; R.W. Burgess, "Chronicle of Hydatius" and the "Consularia Constantinopolitana": Two Contemporary Accounts of the Final Years of the Roman Empire, Oxford 1993 (new ed. with tr. and comm.); C. Cardelle de Hartmann, Philologische Studien zur Chronik des Hydatius von Chaves, Stuttgart 1994; S. Bodelón, Idacio: prodigios y providencialismo en su Crónica: MHA 17 (1996) 117-132.

M. Simonetti

HYDATIUS of Mérida (4th c.). He immediately opposed *Priscillian and his followers with great tenacity, first at the Council of *Saragossa in 380. Later, he intervened before the civil power and obtained from *Gratian a decree which would be able to attack the Priscillianists under the accusation of *Manicheism. After the fall of Gratian and the usurpation of *Maximus, he worked in Trier, together with *Ithacius of Ossonuba, for the condemnation of Priscillian, who had in the meantime appealed to Maximus. Struck by the reaction which followed the execution of Priscillian, Hydatius avoided being removed from his episcopal charge by resigning spontaneously.

H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976; V. Burrus, The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1995, passim.

S. Zincone

HYGINUS, pope (d. 140). According to *Eusebius, his pontificate lasted four years, from 136 to 140 (HE 4,2). The Liber pontificalis indicates that his homeland was Greece and that he was the son of an Athenian philosopher and himself well versed in philosophy. According to *Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. III, 4,3), during his pontificate various *gnostics arrived in Rome from the East, among them the famous *Cerdo and *Valentinus. Yet their reception into the Roman community was opposed by the Roman clergy, so that they eventually left the city. Perhaps Hyginus composed a rule for the clergy and instituted the minor orders. He died a martyr (memorial 11 January).

LP I, 56-57 and 131; DTC 7, Paris 1927, 356-57; BS VII, 652 (A. Amore); LTK³ 5, 352-353; Epapi I, 219-220 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

HYGINUS of Cordoba (4th c.). He first called *Hydatius of Mérida's attention to *Priscillianism, concerning which he tried to keep a balanced position, far from opposite extremes. He did not take part in the Council of *Saragossa in 380, where, acc. to *Sulpicius Severus, he was formally reprimanded for his reluctance to excommunicate the Priscillianists (Chron. II, 47). A passage of *Ambrose (Ep. 30 [24],12; CSEL 82, 215) attests to Hyginus's presence in *Trier, where he was among the bishops who protested against the condemnation to death inflicted on Priscillian. For this reason, he was expelled from the city and exiled by the emperor *Maximus, in spite of his advanced age.

H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976; V. Burrus, The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1995, 27-28.

S. Zincone

HYMENAEUS of Jerusalem (d. after 268). Bishop who participated in the Councils of *Antioch in 264 and 268 against *Paul of Samosata. He appears as the first signatory of the letter sent to Paul by six bishops, at the conclusion of the council of 264, in a final attempt to convert him.

G. Bardy, Paul de Samosate, Louvain 1929, passim, esp. 13-19 (letter of the six bishops); P. de Navascués, Pablo de Samosata y sus adversarios. Estudio histórico-teológico del cristianismo antioqueno en el siglo III, Rome 2004.

E. Prinzivalli

HYMN – HYMNOLOGY. Two texts from the Pauline Epistles (Eph 5:19 [18] and Col 3:16) seem to attest well that the senses are equivalent, whether proper or figurative, of the three terms concerning ancient liturgical chant, namely, "psalms, hymns and spiritual songs [the Greek text has ōdais]."

It is clearly emblematic of continuity and interference, in the most ancient Christian hymnology, between the biblical tradition, esp. the Psalms, and the Greco-Roman poetic and religious tradition of hymnoi and cantica. Most often taking the form of a choral lyricism and songs of thanksgiving and prayers directed to a divinity, religious hymnody was already a fundamental liturgical act of the civilizations of Classical Antiquity, from the Homeric hymns to Horace's Carmen saeculare. In relation to the double tradition, Jewish and Greco-Roman, Christian innovation consisted in the fact that such a poetic and musical celebration, among its many forms, was directed "to Christ as to a God" (Plin., Ep. 96 [97], 7: carmen Christo quasi Deo dicere; a text explained in the sense of a song by Tertull., Apol. 2,5: ad canendum Christo ut Deo). This is also seen in the very ancient Phos Hilaron* (3rd c.?). This celebration of the "joyous light of holy glory / from the immortal heavenly Father / heavenly and blessed / Jesus Christ" (1st strophe) versified in three strophes of four members, written in ametrical Greek prose, as other Christian hymns of the 4th and 5th c. which have been found in the papyri. We also find anapestic formations (basic foot = two short + one long accented): see OxP 15, 1786 and AmherstP 1,2 (3rd c.?). *Clement of Alexandria's Paedagogus, in its famous final hymn called "Hymn of the Holy Savior," attests to the entrance of the Christian hymn into the metrical forms of ancient poetry. "The hymn is presented as a balanced set of systems or as unequal distichs of anapestic verses, of a relatively free character and thus, perhaps, almost popular" (H.I. Marrou and J. Irigoin, notes added to the translation and comments in SC 158, Paris 1970, 192-207). If we must be cautious of the term "popular hymnology" (this has an incontestable sense only if it refers to the "Christian people"), we must not entirely reject the hypothesis which accorded relevance, perhaps excessive, to heretics in the development of Christian hymnody, transformed into an instrument (a "medium") of theological propaganda: we know of some hymns of heterodox inspiration, and this detail recalls the ancient links between hymnody and kerygma. Those of Bishop *Synesius of Cyrene are at the same time Christian and *Neoplatonic. Latin (orthodox) hymnody effectively arises as a sort of "backlighting" of the *Arian question. Several authentic fragments attest to this, from the first two masters of the genre: *Hilary of Poitiers (three hymns discovered in 1885 with the distich which probably served as an epigraph for a collection in a MS at Arezzo) and above all *Ambrose of Milan. His 14 (?) hymns, generally recognized today as authentic, create an abiding "fixed form," for one and a half millennia, for the liturgy in Latin: 8 strophes of 4 iambic dimeters (iambus = short syllable + long accented syllable), generally isosyllabic (8 syllables). The Ambrosian hymn is the Christian Latin hymn par excellence; but this liturgical tradition does not exclude, among the lettered ascetics, a double divergence of form and function.

The metric hymn is cultivated with greater variety (the use of Catullian and Horatian strophes and meters) for the purpose of devout meditation, either individual or collective: such are the 12 hymns of the Cathemerinon of *Prudentius. It verges on an exercise of (pious) style with the hymn by *Paulinus of Nola in honor of John the Baptist (Carm., 6 in hexameter: it is a laus) or, above all, with the poor lyrical specimen of *Sidonius on St. *Saturninus of Toulouse (Ep. 9,16). *Fortunatus even dedicates to the cross some hymns which have justly remained celebrated in the liturgy. The medieval production is considerable and as yet little explored, though it affirms its personality in some lively regional liturgies, as in the Spanish hymnody until the Mozarabic period (9th–10th c.).

Editions: See, for the attributed pieces, the cited authors above s.v.; we cite here only some general collections and some anthologies: G.M. Dreves - C. Blume, Analecta hymnica medii aevi, 55 vols., Leipzig 1886-1922; A.J. Mason - A.S. Walpole, Early Latin Hymns, Cambridge 1922 (repr. Hildesheim 1966); W. Bulst, Hymni latini antiquissimi LXXV, Psalmi III, Heidelberg 1956; Th. Wolberg, Griechische religiose Gedichte der ersten christlichen Jahrhunderte. Bd. 1, Psalmen und Hymnen der Gnosis und des frühen Christentums, Meisenheim am Glan 1971 (Beiträge zur klassischen Philologie, 40).

Studies: Origins: J. Kroll, Die christliche Hymnodik bis zu Klemens von Alexandria, Programm der Akademie von Braunsberg 1921-1922 (2nd ed. repr. Darmstadt 1962 and 1968) remains fundamental. J. Schattenmann, Studien zum neutestamentlichen Prosahymnus, Munich 1965; R. Deichgraeber, Gotteshymnus und Christushymnus in der frühen Christenheit, Untersuchungen zur Form, Sprache und Stil der frühchristlichen Hymnen, Göttingen 1967; K.P. Joerns, Das hymnische Evangelium. Untersuchungen zu Aufbau, Funktion und Herkunft der hymnischen Stücke in der Johannesoffenbarung, Leiden 1971; M. Brioso Sánchez, Aspectos y problemas del himno cristiano primitivo, Salamanca 1972. History of Christian hymnody: M. Simonetti, Studi sull'innologia dei primi secoli: Atti dell'Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei, Memorie Scienze Morali Ser. III, vol. IV, 6 (1952) 341-484; J. Szöverffy, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung, Ein Handbuch, 1, Die lateinischen Hymnen bis zum Ende des 11. Jahrhunderts, Berlin 1964; A. Michel, In hymnis et canticis. Culture et beauté dans l'hymnique latine chrétienne, Paris 1976; J. Grosdidier de Matons, Romanos le Mélode et les origines de la poésie religieuse à Byzance, Paris 1977; J. Fontaine, Études sur la poésie latine tardive d'Ausone à Prudence, Paris 1980; Id., Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien. Esquisse d'une histoire de la poésie latine chrétienne du III[e] au VI[e] siècle, Paris 1981; A.A.R. Bastiaensen, "Psalmi, humni" and "cantica" in Early Jewish-Christian Tradition: SP 21 (1989) 15-26; M. Lattke, Hymnus: Materialen zu einer Geschichte der antiken Hymnologie, Fribourg 1991; J. Fontaine et al., Ambroise de Milan, Hymnes, Paris 1992; J.A. McGuckin, At the Lighting of the Lamps: Hymns of the Ancient Church, Oxford 1995.

J. Fontaine

HYMN of the PEARL. In the Acts of Thomas, a work composed in *Syriac during the 1st half of the 3rd c., a poetic composition of considerable length and beauty is preserved, delivered by Thomas while he was in prison. This so-called Hymn of the Pearl was perhaps originally a narrative text of Babylonian Syria, since its language attests to a non-Edessan and preclassical Syriac. In the Hymn the son of an Eastern king speaks to us of the mission he has just completed in the West, with the aim of retrieving a valuable pearl. Here, after he has forgotten the task assigned to him, a letter arrives from his parents which reawakens his self-perception and allows him thus to gain the pearl. He brings it back to his country, and in this way he obtains his inheritance. The themes have been interpreted as parts of a spiritual or salvific affair.

Patrologia V, 439-40; A.F.J. Klijn, The So-Called Hymn of the Pearl: VChr 14 (1960) 154-164; G. Quispel, Makarius, das Thomasevangelium und das Lied von der Perle, Leiden 1967; H. Poirier, L'Hymne de la perle des "Actes de Thomas." Introduction, texte, traduction, Louvain-la-Neuve 1981; B. Colless, The Letter to the Hebrews and the Song of the Pearl: Abr-Nahrain 25 (1987) 40-55; K. Beyer, Das syrische Perlenlied. Ein Erlösungsmythos als Märchengedicht: ZDMG 140 (1990) 234-259.

K. den Biesen

HYPATIA of Alexandria (ca. 370–415). She lived in *Alexandria straddling the 4th and 5th c. in a particular historic moment which saw the rapid evolution of the relationship between church and empire. Christianity, no longer persecuted but rather openly favored starting from *Constantine, had become with *Theodosius, thanks to the edict of 380, the official religion of the empire. The power relationships were thus inverted, esp. after 392, the year in which paganism was in fact proscribed (CTh XVI, 10,12). At Alexandria, in particular, a growing hostility toward the pagan religion began at that time to rise, a hostility which, at least to a certain degree, was favored and increased when *Cyril became bishop of the city (412). It is in this context that the dramatic account of Hypatia should be read and understood. Learned, having been educated in the school of her father Theon, she was a profound expert in mathematics, astronomy and geometry. It seems that the invention of certain scientific instruments should be attributed to her, such as the flat astrolabe, the hydroscope and the aerometer. In her writings, unfortunately lost, she commented on the works of Diophantus, Apollonius of Perga, Claudius Ptolemy and Euclid. A philosopher, she was considered by her contemporaries as the third great schoolmaster of *Platonism after Plato and *Plotinus. She taught in her city, perhaps occupying a seat of philosophy there (Marrou), and gathered around herself a scientific circle of scholars. *Synesius of Cyrene, who was her student, kept an emotional memory of this woman, famous for her profound culture, austere lifestyle and renowned beauty: "mother, sister, teacher and benefactress together, the height of everything which can be honored with words and deeds" (Ep. XVI).

The gifts just mentioned procured Hypatia a sincere esteem among a large part of her fellow citizens (not just pagan), but also brought about the preoccupied attention of Cyril and the hatred of bands of fanatics. The bishop, who already could barely tolerate the success of the *Neoplatonic teaching of Hypatia, seems to have held her responsible for the failure of his attempt at reconciliation with the prefect Orestes, an authority with which he had entered into conflict because of certain troubles which had taken place in the city (414–415), who was known to willingly seek the advice of Hypatia. Whatever role Cyril had in directing and inflaming public opinion, it is a fact that in the spring of 415 a band of parabalani monks, guided by a lector named Peter, attacked Hypatia while she was returning home, captured her, beat her, then dragged her body into a church, named Caesareum, and cut her flesh apart with sharp tiles. The remains were then carried to a place called Cinaron and burned. The school of Hypatia then dispersed, and no memory of her students remains except for Synesius, converted to Christianity and then elected bishop of Cyrene.

The particular events which distinguished the life and, above all, the death of this woman have caused her to be chosen as a symbol of various kinds of claims (freedom of thought, culture against obscurantism, feminism etc.) with the obvious consequences which this implies. Consigned to literature and poetry, but also elected as "patron" of scientific, philosophical or generically cultural circles, she is even today made the object of continual "rereadings," not always backed up by serious historical investigation. The principal ancient sources for knowledge of her tormented biography are however to be found in *Socrates Scholasticus (HE 7,15, 5), *Philostorgius (HE VIII, 9), *Damascius (Vita Isidori, cf. Suda 166 and Photius, Bibliotheca 181), *John Malalas (359), *John of Nikiu (Chron. 84. 100-102) and *Theophanes (Chron. 5906).

H.I. Marrou, Sinesio di Cirene e il neoplatonismo alessandrino, in Il conflitto tra paganesimo e cristianesimo nel secolo IV, Saggi, ed. by A. Momigliano, It. tr. Turin 1968, 141-164; PLRE 2, 575-6; M. Luzi, Libro di Ipazia, Milan 1978; M. Deakin, Hypatia and Her Mathematics: The American Mathematical Monthly 101, 3 (1994) 234-243; J. Rougé, La politique de Cyrille d'Alexandrie et le meurtre d'Hypatie: Cristianesimo nella storia 11 (1990) 485-504; E. Gajeri, Ipazia, un mito, Rome 1992; G. Beretta, Ipazia d'Alessandria, Rome 1993; S. Ronchey, Ipazia. l'intellettuale, in A. Fraschetti (ed. by), Roma al femminile, Rome 1994, 213-258; M. Dzielska, Hypatia of Alexandria, Harvard, MA 1995; H. Harich-Scharzebauer, Hypatia von Alexandria. Das Kleid der Philosophin: Metis 14 (1998) 31-38; L. Canfora, Un mestiere pericoloso. La vita quotidiana dei filosofi greci, Palermo 2000, 196-203; A. Petta, Ipazia, scienziata alessandrina, Milan 2004.

E. Zocca

HYPATIUS (ca. 336–446; feast 17 June). From a good *Phrygian family, he lived as a shepherd in *Thrace where, having become a monk, he dedicated himself to the care of the sick along with a soldier named Jonah. Around 400, having traveled to Constantinople, he reconciled with his father and took up residence, with some companions, in the Rufinian monastery, founded on the Asian shore, S of *Chalcedon, in 394 by the minister Rufinus (d. 395), later abandoned by the founding Egyptian monks (R. Janin, Les Églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins, Paris 1975, 36-40). There he became the *hegumen of an important community, protected by the court and rather close to the poor. He had influence with the emperor *Theodosius. He took the part of *Alexander the Acoemete against *Nestorius. His disciple *Callinicus wrote his life (ed. G.J.M. Bartelink, Callinicus, Vie d'Hypatios, SC 177, Paris 1971).

CPG 6042/BHG 760; A. J. Festugière, Les Moines d'Orient II, Paris 1961, 13-82; G. Dagron, Les moines et la ville: Travaux et Mémoires 4 (1970) 229-276; E. Woelfle, Hypatios. Leben und Bedeutung des Abtes von Rufiniane, Heidelberg 1984; Id., Der Abt Hypatios von Ruphinianai und der Akoimete Alexander: ByzZ 79 (1986) 302-309.

J. Gribomont

HYPATIUS of Ephesus (2nd half 5th c.–after 537/538). Metropolitan of Ephesus from 531. In 532 he took part as spokesman of the Catholic bishops in the dispute with the *monophysites, the so-called collatio cum Severianis, called by the emperor. A year later he went as delegate of *Justinian to see Pope *John II and obtained his commitment to the *theopaschite formula together with the condemnation of the *acoemetae monks, who opposed this formula strongly. At the Constantinopolitan synod of 536 he spoke in the name of all the bishops present against the patriarch *Anthimus, who was deposed because of his monophysitism. Beyond an episcopal decree on Christian burial, which has been preserved carved on stone, Hypatius wrote Συμμικτὰ ζητήματα (Quaestiones miscellaneae) in which he answered the questions raised by Atramyttium, his colleague in the episcopate. Hypatius composed commentaries on the Psalms, on the Minor Prophets and on the gospel of Luke. In the theological disputes in which he took part, Hypatius always distinguished himself for the defense of the Council of *Chalcedon and the formula of the two natures. Therefore he can rightly be considered a Chalcedonian "of the strict observance" in the same way as *Leontius of Byzantium and *Heraclian of Chalcedon.

CPG III, 6805-6807; F. Diekamp, Analecta patristica, Rome 1938, 109-126 (the decretum de mortuis sepeliendis on p. 126; the fragments of the writings and the commentaries on pp. 127-153); P.J. Alexander, Hypatius of Ephesus: A Note on Image Worship in the Sixth Century: HThR 45 (1952) 177-184; J. Gouillard, Hypatios d'Ephèse ou du Pseudo-Denys à Théodore Studite: REByz 19 (1961) 63-75; S. Brock, The Conversation with the Syrian Orthodox Under Justinian (532): OCP 47 (1981) 87-121; J. Speigl, Das Religionsgeschpräch mit den severianischen Bischöfen in Kostantinopel im Jahre 532: AHC 16 (1984) 264-285; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, II/2, London 1995, 230-248.

J. Irmscher

HYPERECHIUS (5th c.). Absolutely nothing is known of the life of this holy monk, who lived with all likelihood in the 5th c. He left an Exhortation to Monks, a collection, preserved in Greek, of 160 spiritual sentences related to the exercise of the various monastic virtues (PG 79, 1473-1489). The alphabetic collection of the Apophthegmata Patrum,* in the part dedicated to Hyperechius (PG 65, 429-439) has only preserved eight logia, coming from the Exhortation. A number of other logia, preserved in other anonymous and systematic collections of the apophthegmata, have been identifies through recent studies of the ascetic-monastic edifying literature.

CPG 5618; PG 79, 1473-1489; BS 7, 863-864; J.Cl. Guy, Recherches sur la tradition grecque des Apophthegmata Patrum (Subs. Hagiogr. 36), Brussels 1962 (see index); L. Regnault, Les sentences des Pères du désert, Troisième recueil et tables, Solesmes 1976, 242-243; Fr. tr. F. Poswick: Collectanea Cistercensia 32 (1970) 245-255.

J.-M. Sauget

HYPOSTASIS. As a technical term, hypostasis is found first in the Greek natural sciences, meaning sediment in a liquid. Behind this is a twofold idea, solidification and visibility, which appears in every use of the word, with one aspect or the other predominating. Thus, in the Greek Bible, hypostasis refers in particular to true reality (see Heb 1:3; 3:14; 11:1); the *Stoic tradition sees in the hypostasis the last individualization of the primordial essence; it is likewise present in *Neoplatonic tradition, i.e., from *Porphyry on—not yet in *Plotinus (Hammerstaedt 994 f.)—though on an entirely spiritual level and with a nuance of progression. The same is true for the technical use of the term which the Christian authors employ—always confronting the three traditions mentioned—in *trinitarian theology and then in *christology. Taken up by the *Origenian tradition, just as ousia (Hammerstaedt 1005-6) in order to emphasize the three divine realities in an anti-*Sabellian way (see Orig., Cels. 8,12; Jo 2,10,75), hypostasis found a more ample consensus in the Synod of *Alexandria (362). The Cappadocians, who contrasted the three hypostases with the one nature, the formula sanctioned also by the Council of *Constantinople (381) (COeD 24), nevertheless explained the term by emphasizing its characteristic aspect, individuality. Based on the new interpretation of the concept of hypostasis, Basil, and later *Cyril of Alexandria, compared the trinitarian usage with the Porphyrian doctrine of the three hypostases (Hammerstaedt 1029-30). In the same period, *Apollinaris of Laodicea introduced the term in christology, emphasizing by it the one reality of Christ. Hypostasis with this meaning became prominent through Cyril of Alexandria. Clearly distinguished from "nature," it entered also into the faith of *Chalcedon (DS 302). Nevertheless, in later discussions, in which there was an awareness that both of the natures in Christ, as *Nestorius had intended, must be hypostatic, i.e., individual, the Byzantine authors emphasized in the hypostasis the aspect of subsistence (καθ' ἑαυτόν), as well as that of characterizing property, so as to be able to use the term justly in both trinitarian theology and in christology (see *hypostatic union).

DTC 7 (1922) 369-437: TWNT 8, 571-588 (TDNT 8, 572-589); B. Studer, HWPh 3 (1974) 1255-1259 (bibl.); A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, Freiburg 1979; A. de Halleux, Personalisme ou essentialisme trinitaire chez les Pères cappado- ciens?: RTL 17 (1986) 129-155; 165-192; G. Bausenhart, "In allem uns gleich ausser der Sünde." Studien zum Beitrag Maximus des Bekenners zur altchristlichen Christologie, Mainz 1992 (bibl.); H. Ziebritzki, Hl. Geist und Weltseele. Das Problem der dritten Hypostase bei Origenes, Plotin und ihren Vorläufern, Tübingen 1994; J. Hammerstaedt, Hypostase: RAC 16 (1994) 986-1035 (fundamental); P. Hünermann, Hypostase, hypostatische Union: LTK³ 5, 371-373; L. Turcescu, "Prosopon" and "Hypostasis" in Basil of Caesarea's "Against Eunomius" and the "Epistles": VChr 51 (1997) 374-395; M. Erler: RGG 3 (2000) 1980-1 (bibl.).

B. Studer

HYPOSTATIC UNION. In simple terms, the hypostatic union consists in the fact that the Son of God is the subject of everything that the Bible maintains about Christ, both the affirmations about the divine, and those concerning the human. Speaking with more precision, the theological statement "hypostatic union" expresses the concept for which the second hypostasis of the *Trinity was united to a perfect and concrete human nature in such a way as to constitute through it the principle of incommunicable subsistence and to be the subject of its natural and individual properties. The very subtle doctrine was conceived on the line with the "high *christology," which insists on the eternal preexistence of Christ, and esp. the doctrine on the communicatio idiomatum in the strict sense (God born and died, *Theotokos etc.), sanctioned also by the Council of *Ephesus (431). In a certain sense, it was also anticipated by those who insisted, like *Augustine, on the fact that the Son alone became incarnate (see Studer, Una persona). It is not, however, explicitly expressed in the faith of *Chalcedon, as is often claimed. It constitutes, instead, the nucleus of the perception of the faith of Chalcedon, which was reached substantially in the first decades of the 6th c. Three groups of bishops and theologians contributed to its intricate elaboration, although in a different way: the group of the so-called *monophysites in the entourage of *Severus of Antioch, who defended *Cyril of Alexandria's profound intuition, which was expressed with the christological formulas "the Logos suffered in the flesh," "one of the Trinity suffered," the "union acc. to the hypostasis" and even "one nature of the incarnate Logos"; the group of the so-called Neo-chalcedonians, which was represented esp. by *John of Scythopolis and *Leontius of Jerusalem, who had the onus of harmonizing thus the Cyrillian formulas with the Chalcedonian distinction between φύσις and ὑπόστασις; the group of the Chalcedonians with *Ephrem of Antioch and *Leontius of Byzantium, who sought to develop through the patristic tradition and the dialectic of that time the aforementioned distinction forwarded by the Council of Chalcedon (for the phases of the development of the doctrine, see Moeller, Chalcédonisme).

The doctrine of the hypostatic union, which resulted from these complicated and difficult discussions, was not received by the first group, who, however, emphasized the unitive intuition of *Cyril of Alexandria—also present in the faith of Chalcedon—as well as the distinction between οὐσία and ὑπόστασις / φύσις (see Grillmeier, Christus II/2, 154). It was, however, accepted by the second group, which was more disposed to a doctrinal compromise, and also by the third group, which was much more integralist. It was even imposed by the emperor *Justinian as the sole faith of the empire. The 2nd Council of *Constantinople (553) also sanctioned it (DS 426). Subsequent authoritative theologians such as the author of the De Sectis and *Anastasius patriarch of Antioch attest the extent to which the hypostatic union became the common heritage of Byzantine orthodoxy. In the *monothelite controversy it was subsequently perfected in the sense that the second divine hypostasis was also declared to be the subject of the two wills of Christ, namely, the divine and human wills (DS 553-559). This affirmation also substantially held for the Latin churches. Already in 534, Pope John II had approved the formula Unus ex Trinitate passus est, which in the end had anticipated the dogma of the hypostatic union (DS 401-402). The same also held true for *Boethius. Although having some difficulties with the condemnation of the *Three Chapters, Pope *Vigilius and esp. *Facundus of Hermiane and *Rusticus appropriated the doctrine of the Word subsistent in the human nature. *Gregory followed them, inasmuch as he accepted the authority of the fifth ecumenical council. The subsequent councils, similarly, in which the Westerners also participated, the Lateran Synod of 649 and the 3rd Council of Constantinople of 681, moved along the same lines. The complete reception of the faith of Chalcedon, however, would occur in the West only during the Middle Ages.

The particular explanations of the hypostatic union had to do with the request for a technical terminology that was valid both for the trinitarian mystery and the mystery of the *incarnation. Applying to christology the distinction φύσις / κοινόν and ὑπόστασις / ἰδιόματα, introduced in the 4th c. for the trinitarian faith, it risked conceiving of the divine hypostases as natures or essences, or rather of attributing natural characteristics to the hypostasis of Christ. On the one hand, theology needed a concept of individual human nature (φύσις ἰδική) and, on the other, it needed a concept of hypostasis purely subsistent (καθ' ἑαυτὸν εἶναι) (Studer, Gott, 326-327, with references to Leontius of Byzantium, Epilysis: PG 86/2, 1971 CD.1945B, and Leontius of Jerusalem, Adv. Nest. I, 1: PG 86/1, 1414C. I, 20: PG 86/1, 1485B-D). Only with these two conditions in mind are we able to avoid both *tritheism and *theopaschitism. There is no doubt that these reflections remained very far from the *Bible; that is to say, they were very abstract and hardly *soteriological. Nevertheless, they intended to retain the ancient faith acc. to which neither an angel nor a man but God died for us. They even expressed an idea that was dear to *Augustine—namely, that our obedience toward God is supported by the obedience of the eternal Son, who became man (see Studer, Gott, 253ff.).

DTC 7, 437-568; LTK³ 5, 371-377 (with respect to the historical aspect, it remains inadequate). C. Moeller, Le chalcédonisme et le néo-chalcédonisme en Orient de 451 à la fin du VIᵉ siécle: Chalkedon I, Würzburg 1951, 637-720; S. Otto, Person und Subsistenz, Munich 1968; B. Studer, Una Persona in Christo. Ein augustinisches Thema bei Leo dem Grossen: AugR 25 (1985) 453-487; Grillmeier II/1-4, Freiburg 1986-2002 (see in the indexes the term hypostasis); B. Studer, Gott und unsere Erlösung im Glauben der Alten Kirche, Düsseldorf 1985, 262-283 (with studies and texts).

B. Studer

HYPSISTARIANS. *Gregory of Nyssa calls them hypsistians, having their name derived from ὕψιστον, inasmuch as they venerate God as the sole παντοκράτωρ, while not recognizing him to be Father (Eun. II: PG 45, 484). *Gregory of Nazianzus is, above all, the one who deals with them, given that his father had adhered to this sect before converting to Christianity; he calls them hypsistarians. Their doctrine presents itself as a collection of pagan and Jewish elements: from the former they took their veneration for fire and lights and rejected the cult of idols and sacrifices; from the latter they accepted the observance of the Sabbath and abstinence from certain foods, but circumcision was rejected (Or. 18,5: PG 35, 992).

C. Roberts - T.C. Skeat - A.D. Nock, The Gild of Zeus Hypsistes: HThR 29 (1936) 39-87.

F. Cocchini

HYSTASPES, Book of. The Book of Hystaspes is cited for the first time toward the middle of the 2nd c. AD, as an authoritative pagan prophetical work alongside the Sibyl and the biblical prophets, by *Justin Martyr, who informs us that its readers were liable to the death penalty (1 Apol. 20,1; 44,12). The Book of Hystaspes was notoriously a dangerous work and must have been particularly disquieting in the eyes of the political authorities because it contained, among other things, a prophecy of the end of the Roman Empire which is known to us from *Lactantius (Div. Inst. VII, 15,19). Lactantius reports from the same work another *eschatological prophecy, concerning the final salvific intervention of the supreme God in favor of pious and faithful men who invoke with groaning his protection against the impious and sinners (Div. Inst. VII, 8,1-2).

From this scarce information it is presumed with reasonable certainty that we are dealing with a *pseudepigraphic apocalypse of Zoroastrian origins, put under the ancient prestigious name of Hystaspes, father of Darius, contemporary of Zoroaster (6th c. BC), but composed in reality, like the contemporaneous apocalypse which *Elkesai had received from the Seres of Parthia (see Hippolytus, Ref. omn. haer. IX, 13,1 and IX, 16,4). This was during the time of *Trajan (beginning of the 2nd c. AD), occurring in the context of the confrontation between the Parthian Empire and the Roman Empire. In it the anti-Roman hatred and desire for liberty and revenge of the Mesopotamian world found expression. From this point of view, despite the notable analogies which it presents with the Jewish apocalyptic literature and its pseudepigraphic disguises (consider the prophecies of the book of Daniel or the Jewish Sibylline Oracles), the traditional hypothesis of a direct and exclusive Jewish origin appears completely unfounded (widespread between the 19th and 20th c., it has recently been defended, among others, by Gignoux and Flusser, who even considers it the source of the Johannine Apocalypse).

Also the current title, Oracles of Hystaspes, introduced by Windisch, should be rejected, as derived from an evident error in translation: the Greek expression chrēseis Hystaspou used by the Byzantine epitomator of the Theosophia (ed. Beatrice, 3) means in fact that in this work were contained not "oracles" (chrēsmoi/vaticinia, oracula) but "excerpts" (excerpta, extracts or citations) of the book of Hystaspes. The original title seems to have been rather Book of the Wisdom of Hystaspes.

The eschatological doctrine of the Book of Hystaspes, with its characteristic prophecy of the end of the Roman Empire, was perfectly integrated in the *millenaristic conception of Lactantius (this important aspect of the thought of Lactantius is unfortunately completely ignored by E. DePalma Digeser, The Making of a Christian Empire: Lactantius and Rome, Ithaca-London 2000, with the negative consequences which are easy to imagine for the overall interpretation of the political theology of Lactantius and its relationship with *Constantine). According to Lactantius, Hystaspes should be counted among the pagan prophets of the Christian truth (see Epitome 68,2), even if, in contrast to the Sibyl and Hermes Trismegistus, Hystaspes kept silence, through the trickery of the demons, about the fundamental doctrine of the salvific work of the Liberator sent by God. The silence concerning the Son of God is the proof that Lactantius, at the beginning of the 4th c., still had in his hands the original Zoroastrian redaction of the work.

But already from the 2nd half of the 2nd c. there are certain testimonies to the existence of a "Christianized" version of the Book of Hystaspes which pivots justly on the figure of Christ and his eschatological intervention. This version was elaborated in order to facilitate the penetration of Christian missionary propaganda in geographic areas marked by a strong Zoroastrian presence (Asia Minor, Syria and Mesopotamia), analogously to what had been done through the false oracles of the pagan gods and of the Sibyls in the Greco-Roman world. *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VI, 5,42,3-43,2), our oldest source, reports that the apostle Paul (in all likelihood he is alluding to a lost section of the apocryphal Acts of Paul) invited his listeners to read the books of the pagans. Besides the Sibyl, they were encouraged esp. to read the Book of Hystaspes, where they would find confirmation of his preaching on the eschatological mission of the Son of God (For the interpretive problems posed by this Clementine passage, see Zamagni, 74-96.) Mani, heir of the Elkesaite tradition, knew this work and cited it as Testimony of Hystaspes on the Beloved (the Christ) in his Book of the Mysteries (see the Fihrist of al-Nadim, ed. B. Dodge, 797). Among the extracts of the Christianized version of the Book of Hystaspes reproduced in the 4th book of the Theosophia, there was the famous prophecy of Zoroaster to Hystaspes on the coming of the Messiah (ed. Beatrice, 73-74).

H. Windisch, Die Orakel des Hystaspes, Amsterdam 1929; J. Bidez - F. Cumont, Les Mages hellénisés. Zoroastre, Ostanès et Hystaspe d'après la tradition grecque, Paris 1938; J.R. Hinnells, The Zoroastrian Doctrine of Salvation in the Roman World: A Study of the Oracle of Hystaspes, in E. Sharpe - J.R. Hinnells (eds.), Man and His Salvation: Studies in Memory of S.G.F. Brandon, Manchester 1973, 125-148; D. Flusser, Hystaspes and John of Patmos, in Irano-Judaica: Studies Relating to Jewish Contacts with Persian Culture Throughout the Ages, ed. Sh. Shaked, Jerusalem 1982, 12-75; C. Colpe, Hystaspes: RAC 16 (1994) 1056-1082; M. Perrin, Lactance et la culture grecque. Esquisse d'une problématique, in B. Pouderon - J. Doré (eds.), Les Apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, Théol. Hist. 105, Paris 1998, 297-313; P.F. Beatrice, Le livre d'Hystaspe aux mains des Chrétiens, in C. Bonnet - A. Motte (eds.), Les syncrétismes religieux dans le monde méditerranéen antique. Actes du Colloque International en l'honneur de Franz Cumont (Institut historique Belge de Rome. Études de philologie, d'archéologie et d'histoire anciennes 36), Brussels-Rome 1999, 357-382 (bibl.); C. Zamagni - A. D'Anna, Accertamenti sul "Kerygma Paulou," in Pietro e Paolo. Il loro rapporto con Roma nelle testimonianze antiche: SEA 74 (2001) 67-123; P.F. Beatrice, Anonymi Monophysitae Theosophia: An Attempt at Reconstruction, VChrS 56, Leiden-Boston-Cologne 2001; Id., Forgery, Propaganda and Power in Christian Antiquity: Some Methodological Remarks, in Alvarium. Festschrift Chr. Gnilka (JAC-Erg. Bd. 33), Münster 2002, 39-51.

P.F. Beatrice

I

IAMBLICHUS (d. ca. 325). *Neoplatonic philosopher. He was born at Chalcis, in Celesyria (a region probably situated at the borders of modern Lebanon or in the N of Syria), in the 2nd half of the 3rd c., and he died around 325. The scarce information about his life derives from Eunapius (Vitae Sophistarum V, 10,17–17,7) and, in a very small part, from hints contained within his works. The biographical narration of Eunapius appears to be largely legendary, and the certain historic elements come down to two: Iamblichus was initially a student of one of the first disciples of *Porphyry, specifically of the peripatetic Anatolius; later he became himself a student of Porphyry, whom he succeeded in the direction of the Neoplatonic school.

From his works, which must have been extensive, four writings remain, making up part of a "collection of Pythagorean opinions," and specifically The Life of Pythagoras, Protrepticus, De Communi mathematica scientia and In Nichomachi Arithmeticam Introductionem; a treatise on the Mysteries of the Egyptians; large fragments of a De anima (preserved in the anthology of Stobaeus); and finally some letters On Destiny and On the Dialectic. Within the Neoplatonic school Iamblichus appears as an innovator who stands out clearly from his predecessors. While a profound harmony prevailed in *Plotinus between rationalism and mystical exigencies, in Porphyry a compromise was already seen between the Plotinian teaching and the new Pythagorean-Chaldean influences, and Iamblichus moves overwhelmingly to a new philosophical approach. If the fundamental point of Plotinian Neoplatonism had been the salvation of souls through the power of the Logos, which reveals Being and purifies from the passions, acc. to Iamblichus one approaches Being by means of magic rites, with the use of divination and occult practices, with incantations which force the gods to descend into the priests and into statues (*theurgy). It is possible that in this new systemization of the Neoplatonic philosophy by means of a series of complex rituals Iamblichus demonstrates a kind of reaction to the spread of Christianity, which he opposes with a new form of religious and ritual philosophy.

The work of Iamblichus had a very profound influence on later Neoplatonists, and in particular on the school of Athens, from Plutarch of Athens up to Proclus and Damascius.

Editions: Protrepticus, H. Pistelli (Teubn.), Leipzig 1888, É. Des Places, Paris 1989 (with Fr. tr.); De communi mathematica scientia, N. Festa (Teubn.), Leipzig 1891; De Vita pythagorica liber, L. Deubner (Teubn.), Leipzig 1937, M. Von Albrecht, Zurich-Stuttgart 1963 (with Ger. tr.); In Nichomachi arithmeticam introductionem, H. Pistelli (Teubn.), Leipzig 1894; De mysteriis, É. des Places, Paris 1966 (with Fr. tr.); Iamblichi Chalcidensis Fragmenta, J.M. Dillon, Leiden 1973 (with Engl. tr.); Summa pitagorica: Vita di Pitagora; Esortazione alla filosofia; Scienza matematica comune; Introduzione all'aritmetica di Nicomaco; Teologia dell'aritmetica, intr., It. tr., notes and apparatus by F. Romano, Milan 2006.

Studies: J. Bidez, Le philosophe Jamblique et son école: REG 32 (1919) 29-40; De Jamblique à Proclus, Entretiens de la Fondation Hardt 21, Geneva 1975; H.J. Blumenthal - E.G. Clark (ed.), The Divine Iamblichus, Philosopher and Man of Gods, Bristol 1993; G. Shaw, Theurgy and the Soul: The Neoplatonism of Iamblichus, University Park, PA 1995; D.P. Taormina, Jamblique, critique de Plotin et de Porphyre. Quatre études, Paris 1999; G. Staab, Pythagoras in der Spätantike, Studien zu De Vita Pythagorica des Iamblichos von Chalkis, Munich 2002.

M. Conti

IBAS of Edessa (d. 457). Bishop of *Edessa (*Osroene), ca. 435–457. He was a professor at the school of the Persians in Edessa at the time of *Rabbula (ca. 415–435), whom he accompanied to *Ephesus for the council of 431. A convinced anti-Cyrillian and partisan of *Nestorius and of the traditional positions of the school of *Antioch, Ibas (in Syriac Yehiba) was certainly not in good relations with his bishop, and because of this he was expelled from the school and from Edessa. While in exile he wrote the christological letter—though some doubt his authorship—which was sent to Maris (CPG 6500), probably Mar Dadisho, bishop of Rewardasir in Persia. When Rabbula died in 435, at the time when the christological questions were passing through an acute stage, Ibas replaced him in the see of Edessa (435–457). Ibas was unable to bring about the unity of the clergy; in fact, he was accused of numerous faults by four of his priests in the synods held in Antioch (445 and 446); defended by a large part of his clergy, he was absolved by the Synods (or two sessions of the same council) of *Tyre and Beirut in 448/449, where the Letter to Maris was read. Among other things, he was accused of having called *Cyril of Alexandria a heretic. Ibas promised on this occasion to pardon his accusers and to occupy himself in pastoral activity. Upon his return to his see, he found popular opposition in favor of *monophysite doctrine. Absent from the turbulent Synod of Ephesus (latrocinium) in 449, he was condemned together with *Flavian of Constantinople, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and five other bishops. He was sent into exile and replaced in his see by *Nonnus. Just two years later, the Council of *Chalcedon, in 451, thanks to the Roman legates, recognized him as orthodox and reestablished him as head of his church, which he governed until his death on 28 October 457. The death of Ibas was certainly an opportunity to expel from Edessa his most enthusiastic supporters (professors and students), who fled to *Nisibis. The school of the Persians developed in this city when the school in Edessa was definitively closed in 489 by order of the emperor *Zeno.

According to the catalog of Abdisho of Nisibis, a Commentary on Proverbs, Homilies and Hymns were attributed to Ibas, as well as a polemical treatise. His letter to Maris, mentioned above (which is preserved only in a Greek translation, contained in the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, and in a Latin translation), was finally condemned, at the time of the emperor *Justinian, by the Council of Constantinople in 553, which thus put an end to the painful question of the *Three Chapters (*Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus and Ibas). With his disciples Kumi and Pruba, Ibas had translated from Greek into Syriac the commentaries of Theodore of Mopsuestia on the Old and New Testaments, the works of *Diodore of Tarsus and of Aristotle.

CPG 6500-6501; ACO II, 1, 3 (Ep. ad Marim Persam), 227-229; 'Abdīšo', Catalogus librorum syrorum, 61 (Assemani 32-34; ACO IV, 3, 1, 265-266; ACO IV, 3, 2; Bibliotheca Orientalis, Or. III, 1, Rome 1725, 85-86); Labourt 131-137, 254-261, passim; Duval 76-77, 247, 314, 341-342, 345; J. Flemming, Akten der ephesinischen Synode vom Jahre 449, AAWG, Berlin 1917 (Göttingen 1970); R. Devreesse, Le début de la querelle des Trois-Chapitres: la lettre d'Ibas et le tome de Proclus: RSR 11 (1931) 543-565; A. d'Ales, La lettre d'Ibas à Marès le Persan: RecSR 22 (1932) 5-25; M. van Esbroeck, Who Is Mari, the Addressee of Ibas' Letter?: JTS 38 (1987) 129-135; Patrologia V, 191-192; S. Acerbi, Conflitti politico-ecclesiastici in Oriente nella tarda antichità: Il II Concilio di Efeso (449), Madrid 2001, passim.

J.-M. Sauget

IBERIA (Lat. Iberia or Hiberia). The ancients distinguished two Iberias. One was the territory also called Hispania, S of the Pyrenees (see *Spain); the other was one part of the area of the Caucasus, corresponding approximately to the E part of what is now the Republic of Georgia (Kartli) (Appianus, Mithr. 101), while the W part corresponds to Colchis. The two areas are separated by mountainous zones (Surami Ridge). The Iberia of the Caucusus was bordered to the E by Albania (Azerbaijan), to the S by Armenia and to the W by Colchis on the Black Sea. It was crossed by the river Kyros-Cyrus (today Mtkvari), which empties into the Caspian Sea. The principal city was Hermastus, which already in the High Middle Ages became Tifilis (Photius, Bibl., cod. 26b)—today Tiflis (Tbilisi). From the time of Pompey it was under Roman influence but from the 4th c. was controlled by Sassanian Persia. It was Christianized in the 1st half of the 4th c., becoming officially Christian around 337 due esp. to S. Nino (Nouné), a Roman prisoner. At that time, the king of the Iberians asked the emperor *Constantine for a bishop and priests and had the first Christian church constructed (see Ruf., HE I, 10: PL 21, 480-481; Theodoret, HE I, 23: PG 82, 972-974; Socr., HE I, 20: PG 67, 129-133; Soz., HE 2,7: PG 67, 949-955). The *Georgian language, formerly only oral, developed into a written language with the conversion to Christianity. For the literature and archaeology, see *Georgia.

PWK Suppl. IX, 1899-1911; RAC 17, 12-106; TRE 12, 389ff.; M. van Esbroeck, RAC, Suppl. 1985, 257-266; D. Braund, Georgia in Antiquity. A History of Colchis and Transcausian Iberia 550-AD 562, Oxford 1994; N. Garsoïan, L'église arménienne et le Grand Schisme d'Orient, CSCO 574, subs. 100, Louvain 1999; Santa Nino e la Georgia. Storia e spiritualità cristiana nel Paese del Vello d'oro, Atti del I Conv. Int. di studi georgiani, ed. by Gaga Shurgaia, Rome 2000; E.M. Synek, Georgia's Conversion to Its Female Apostle, in Christianizing People and Converting, ed. by G. Armstrong - I.N. Wood, Turnhout 2000, 3-13.

A. Di Berardino

ICONIUM

I. City - II. Councils.

I. City. Ikonion (Iconium, today Konya), acc. to Xenophon (Anab. I, 2,19) the westernmost city of *Phrygia, in later authors the capital of Lycaonia (see Strab., Geogr. XII, 568c; Plin., Nat. Hist. V, 95: urbs celeberrima): see also Acts 13:51 and 14:1 (a populous city of Greeks and Jews) or else of Pisidia (Ammianus 17,2,1; Basil, Ep. 138). Under Claudius it had the name Claudiconium. It became a Roman colony at the time of *Hadrian (between 130 and 138) with the name Colonia Helia Hadriana Augusta Iconiensium. With the reform of *Diocletian the province of Pisidia was constituted with *Antioch as capital and Iconium as "the largest after the capital" (Basil, Ep. 138). Ca. 373 it was the metropolis of the province of Lycaonia, and *Amphilochius was the first metropolitan. It was Christianized in the apostolic era by Paul and Barnabas (Acts 14). A man named Hierax of Iconium was a martyr with *Justin in Rome in 163. The story of St. *Thecla is also set in Iconium. Bishops: Terence (martyr); Caronotus (martyr); Celsus (264–269); Nicomas; Peter (314); Eulalius (at Nicaea); Faustinus (372); John (375); Amphilochius (375–ca. 400, one of the great Cappadocians); Valerianus (431); Onesiphorus (449–451, at Chalcedon); Palladius; Theodulus; Theodorus; Paul (680); Elijah (692).

W. Ruge, Ikonion: PWK IX, 1, 990-991; W.M. Ramsay, The Cities of St. Paul, London 1907, 317-384; A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford [2]1971, 127 and 135. For the bishops, see Fedalto 1, 266; DHGE 25, 761-796.

M. Forlin Patrucco

II. Councils. Ca. 230–235. In this period a council was held in Iconium which united bishops of Phrygia, *Galatia, *Cilicia and neighboring regions. *Firmilian of Caesarea (of Cappadocia) also participated, in order to examine the validity of baptism administered by the heretics, above all by *Montanists. The council decreed that such baptism was not to be considered valid, and therefore those upon whom it had been conferred had to be rebaptized.

376. In the context of the controversies of the *Arians and pneumatomachoi, a local council presided over by Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, friend and collaborator of *Basil, confirmed the validity of the Nicene Creed of 325, condemned the Arians and the pneumatomachoi and proposed a theology regarding the *Trinity and the *Holy Spirit which was perfectly orthodox and adhered to the theology of Basil. We know of it through the synodal letter which has come down to us (PG 39, 93ff.).

230–235: Hfl-Lecl 1, 1, 159-161; 376: Hfl-Lecl 1, 2, 983; Palazzini 1, 175-177; K. Holl, Amphilochius von Ikonium in seinem Verhältnis zu den grossen Kappadoziern, Tübingen 1904, 25; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, Edinburgh 1988.

M. Simonetti

ICONOGRAPHY – ICONOLOGY. Especially after the research carried out in the 1930s by Aby Warburg, Fritz Saxl and Erwin Panofsky, the terms iconography and iconology delimit two different even if interdependent methods of investigation applied to the study of a figurative work. Iconographic investigation has as its immediate goal the verification and analysis of the elements which constitute any given figurative object, by which it individuates the scheme of the composition in all its components as well as attitudes and attributes of the characters; iconological investigation is concerned with interpretation and therefore with the attempt to understand the significance, whether clear or hidden, of a figure or of a composition. Thus, while iconography has a method which is above all analytic, iconology begins and proceeds in a synthetic process.

In the case of a figurative production such as that of Christian antiquity, strictly connected to the religious sphere and dense in conceptual content and cryptographic details, the application of iconographic and iconological methods are quite fitting, even if their application may be found to be rather complex, since they implicitly entail definition and evaluation of all the components which come together to bring about and give significance to a specific figurative "object."

It is well known that a large part of the figurative repertoire of the ancient Christian world derived directly from Sacred Scripture or at least took its inspiration from it; it is likewise known that the themes and content of the sacred texts were transmitted through catechesis and liturgical practice to the mass of the faithful, becoming in this way the inheritance of the community. There must nevertheless be kept in mind at least the possibility that in this process of transferring themes and contents from high to low, something might be lost or modified or receive some nuance in its relation to the receptivity, to the culture, to the social stratification, to the religious maturity of a given community. From this it follows that the literary text—already selective by its very nature, and yet an immediate or mediate reflection of organic and definite lines of doctrine—cannot by itself explain the entire interest of a figurative phenomenon.

In fact, the meaning of a given theme or of a single figure can change in relation to the environment and period to which it belongs; e.g., the meaning of the same scene can be different acc. to whether it is found in a cemeterial context or a building dedicated to worship, acc. to whether it belongs to the 3rd c. or to the age of *Constantine. Besides, even in the literary texts themselves there are not always univocal interpretations; rather, it often happens that for the same theme different interpretations are proposed. Saying this should not underrate the importance of literary tradition in the interpretation of the figurative repertoire of Christian antiquity, since studies, even recent ones, have shown the necessity of looking at patristic *exegesis for the integral comprehension esp. of figurative themes with a biblical character. We wish only to call attention to the fact that a figurative phenomenon is the fruit of a convergence of diverse components, and even the paleo-Christian figurative production is the fruit of the convergence of differing elements, which naturally are sometimes difficult to individuate and evaluate in their context. This is even more significant when we consider that ancient Christian art—above all, that of its beginnings—is not refined, nor does it demonstrate any concern for an aesthetic purpose. Rather, it presents itself as an object which has a community as its origin, and has as its primary purpose the need to transmit a content that was new and in some aspects revolutionary in relation to the society in which it was elaborated.

Consult the individual iconographic themes both for their content and meaning as well as for bibliography.

C. Carletti

IDALIUS of Barcelona (d. ca. 689). Successor of *Quiricus, he was bishop of *Barcelona ca. 666–689. Represented by the deacon Laulfus at the 13th Council of *Toledo (683), Idalius participated personally at the 15th Council of Toledo (688) and on that occasion had a long conversation with *Julian concerning the state of souls after death, which led him to invite his interlocutor to write about the topic in the Prognosticon futuri saeculi. When the work was completed, in order to celebrate its publication and favor its circulation, he wrote to his friend Julian (Ep. Barcinonensis episcopi ad Julianum toletanae primae sedis episcopum) and to the metropolitan of Narbonne, Zunfredus (Ep. Idalii ad Zuntfredum).

Díaz 253-254; PL 96, 815-818; J.N. Hillgarth ed., CCL 115, Turnhout 1976, 1-7 and LIX-LXIII (concerning the MS tradition); U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 481.

P. Marone

IDOLATRY – IDOLS. Etymologically idolatry signifies the worship of idols and in a wider sense belief in idols and therefore polytheistic religion. In Scripture, the term idol designates a being which is either real or imaginary, a false divinity, venerated with acts of worship reserved for God; the idol is frequently the symbol of the *demon (Dt 32:17; Ps 106:36-37; 1 Cor 10:20). Outside of revealed religions, idolatry is a common cultural practice. An idol, as a representation-image of the divinity, is not identical with the divinity, despite the close relationship between the two, and the acts of worship are conceived only in virtue of this relation. The construction of temples and the creation of a corresponding priesthood and rites presuppose the idea of a presence of the god, even if indefinable, and his acceptance of acts of worship. The term idol is a diminutive, signifying a small image (Tertullian, De Idololatria 3). Quite rough in the beginning, it became more and more refined with the progress of civilization, eventually arriving at the summits of art, esp. Greek art. In ancient Christian literature, the evaluation of idolatry is decisively negative, apart from art. As the antithesis of the knowledge of God (*Methodius of Olympus, The Banquet VII, 6), it is the greatest of sins, a species of fornication that blinds human beings and leads them to perdition (Apost. Const. II, 23,1; Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 16; Didache III, 4; Athan., Contra Gentes 29). The deliverance from its grasp comes about through the resurrection of Christ (Athan., Contra Gentes 1; De Incarnatione 30,6; 50,6), by means of baptism (John Chrys., Hom. in I Cor. 10:1) and with the blood of the martyrs (Martyrium Theodoti 3). The idol, a product of the imagination (Athen., Legatio 22, 5; 27,1), is a symbol of the pagan divinities, which Christians reject as beings which are dead and dumb (Barn. 4,8; 9,6; Just., 1 Apol. 64,1; Iren., Adv. haer. I, 6,3; Clem. Alex., Protrept. 4; Orig., Ad mart. 32; Hom. Clem. 11,13). It is opposed to truth (Athan., De Incarnatione II, 4), to the image (Clem. Alex., Paed. II, 8; Hom. Clem. 11,4) and the liberation which Christ brought (Just., Dial. 113,6; Athan., De Incarnatione 31,2). See *angel; *demon.

DTC 7, 602-669; EI 18, 708-709; DBS 4, 169-187; EC 6, 1578-1580; RAC 12, 828-895; RAC 13 (1986) 1113-1149; M. Pellegrino, Studi sull'antica apologetica, Rome 1947 (repr. 1977); J.-R. Laurin, Orientations maîtresses des Apologistes chrétiens de 270 à 361, Rome 1954; J. Daniélou, Message évangélique et culture hellénistique, Paris 1961; R.P.C. Hanson, Christian Attitudes to Pagan Religions: ANRW II, 23, 2, 910-973; J.-M. Vermander, La polémique des Apologistes latins contre les dieux du paganisme: RecAug 17 (1982) 3-128; P.G. Christiansen, The Great Conflict Revisted: Recent Work on Christianity and Paganism: Helios 15 (1988) 133-149; R.M. Grant, Greek Apologists of the Second Century, London 1988; M. Fédou, Christianisme et religions païennes dans le "Contre Celse" d'Origène, Paris 1988; A.J. Droge, Homer or Moses? Early Christian Interpretation of the History of Culture, Tübingen 1989; P. Pilhofer, Presbyteron kreitton. Der Altersbewiese der jüdischen und christlichen Apologeten und seine Vorgeschichte, Tübingen 1990; M. Rizzi, Ideologia e retorica negli "exordia" apologetici. Il problema dell'altro, Milan 1993; D. Gooch, Dangerous Food: 1 Corinthians 8-10 in Its Context, Waterloo 1993; P. Borgen, Early Christianity and Hellenistic Judaism, Edinburg 1996; J. Smit, "Do Not Be Idolaters." Paul's Rhetoric in First Corinthians 10:1-22: NT 39 (1997) 40-53; Les Apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, ed. B. Pouderon - J. Doré, Paris 1997; Apologetics in the Roman Empire: Pagans, Jews, and Christians, ed. by M.J. Edwards et al., Oxford 1999.

E. Peretto

IDOLOTHYTE. A term coined by Hellenized Jews so as to avoid other terms, such as hierothyte and theothyte, which had a more sacred tone. In the NT (Acts 15:29; 1 Cor 8:1, 4, 7, 10; 10:19; Rev 2:14), the term designates the flesh of animals sacrificed to pagan divinities, which Christians and Jews might have occasion to eat when they accepted invitations to the houses of pagans or because they had bought it in the markets, where it was sometimes placed for sale. The problem was posed for the community at Corinth, because it sometimes happened that the idolothyte had not been consumed within the sacred area and the Christians did not realize it. The prohibition on eating this meat was deduced from the Jewish tradition and imposed out of respect for this tradition, which perceived demonic power in the cult of idols (Dt 32:16-17; Bar 4:7; 1 Enoch 19,1; Jubilees 1,11). The legality of eating flesh already immolated to pagan gods (hierothyte, see Plat., Sym. 8,8,3), which Jews out of contempt called idolothyte, i.e., victim in idolatry, was not treated by Paul as a dogmatic problem. Rather, he passed judgment on a concrete discussion that existed within the community. He was not ignorant of the fact that private and familial/social events were celebrated with sacrificial offerings to a god followed by meals in company with friends and acquaintances served in rooms next to the sanctuary, yet constituting part of the area of the temple. His point of view is favorable to those who do not worry about the origin of the meat, since the idol is nothing (1 Cor 8:4). The strong (the *gnostic) and the weak (the nongnostic) coexist, but their consciences react differently: the strong avail themselves of their liberty and of their knowledge that an idol is nothing, while the weak are scandalized at this, since they are not yet completely freed from the relationship between the sacrifice and the idol. The weak would be led to a contradiction between interior conscience and external practice by the behavior of those who considered themselves free. Both of these had, in the past, carried out the idolatrous practice of eating meat sacrificed in the company of pagan friends and acquaintances. Their conversion to the faith did not cancel such a past, but it led them to a new consciousness and a new knowledge concerning the nature of an idol. Paul concludes that the individual's liberty ends when it becomes an obstacle for another person (1 Cor 8:8). Given the way in which Paul resolves the problem, it would seem that the cultic and religious character of the idolatrous sacrifice should not be transferred as a burden to the meal which follows, esp. if it was private, since its primary meaning was social, friendly, that of fraternally spending time together. His concern was that Christians not isolate themselves from society and exist as a ghetto (1 Cor 5:10). Foreign from the Pauline horizon is the idea of eating a god, of being invested with his energies or of mystical union with him. Prevalent, instead, is the social aspect, the occasion of pleasant socializing, a convivial spirit. In 1 Cor 10:19, Paul again considers the term idolothyte, which he speaks of as similar to idol, and affirms that the idolothyte does not in itself have any particular nature as such, since idols are absolutely nothing. But here the context is ritual: it is no longer a question of social conviviality but participation of a number of subjects in an act of worship directed to demons and not God. This is what Paul does not want: participation in the table of the Lord (eucharistic koinonia) is irreconcilable with participation in the table of demons. The prophetic tradition had insisted on the nonbeing of the gods of the nations, also called demons, which present the temptation of being the alternative to God (cf. Dt 32:7; Bar 4:7; 1 Enoch 19,1; Jubilees 1,11).

DTC 7,670-682; DBS 4,187-195; EC 6, 1580-1581; W. Mundle, ϵἴδωλον: Dis. conc. bibl. N.T. Bologna 1976, 836-839; Gordon D. Fee, Εἰδωλόθυτα Once Again. An Interpretation of I Corinthians 8-10: Biblica 61 (1980) 172-197; W.L. Willis, Idol Meat in Corinth, The Pauline Argument in 1 Corinthians 8 and 10, Chico, CA 1985; B.N. Fisk, Eating Meat Offered to Idols; Corinthian Behavior and Pauline Response in 1 Corinthians 8-10: Trinity Journal 10 (1989) 49-70; B.W. Winter, Theological and Ethical Responses to Religious Pluralism—1 Corinthians 8-10: Tyndale Bulletin 41 (1990) 209-222; H. Hübner, ϵἰδωλϵῖον: Dis. Es. NT, Brescia 1995, 1025-1032; G. Barbaglio, La prima lettera ai Corinzi, Bologna 1995, 372-390.

E. Peretto

IGNATIUS of Antioch (d. ca. 110)

I. Transmission of the letters - II. Dating - III. The struggle against the sabbatists and the docetists - IV. Unity with the bishop - V. Theology of martyrdom.

In the years 110–111 the bishop Ignatius of Antioch was arrested and led to *Rome, where he expected *martyrdom. After crossing Asia Minor, where he stopped in Philadelphia and *Phrygia, he arrived at *Smyrna, whose bishop at that time was *Polycarp, and he remained there a short time. He received a visit from the bishops of *Ephesus, Tralles and of Magnesia; he gave a letter to each of these churches. He also wrote to the Romans to announce his coming arrival. Next he traveled N, to Troas. There he wrote to the church of Philadelphia, the church of Smyrna and to Polycarp personally. These seven letters are preserved. We know that he was later led from Troas to *Philippi in *Macedonia, because some Christians of this city wrote to Polycarp and mentioned his passing through. We do not know whether he actually arrived in Rome and was put to death for the faith. Polycarp, responding to the Philippians, presumes that he died a martyr (9,2), yet without being certain (13,2). The same supposition was made at the time of *Eusebius, who notes that this is only "what is said" (HE 3, 36,3).

I. Transmission of the letters. Writing to Polycarp, the Philippians asked for a copy of the letters of Ignatius of Antioch. Polycarp enclosed with his response all the letters he knew (13,1). Because of its great interest, this collection was widely circulated. It was known by *Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. V, 28,4), by *Origen (Hom. Lc. 6,4) and by Eusebius (HE 3, 36), who enumerated all the parts that composed it, citing extracts: there were the seven letters of Ignatius of Antioch mentioned above, as well as the letter of Polycarp. Given the role played by the library of Eusebius in Caesarea in Palestine in the transmission of Christian texts, it is not surprising that these letters have come down to us. These were later translated into *Syriac in an abbreviated form. At the end of the 4th c., Julian the Arian, posited as the author of the Apostolic Constitutions, made an interpolated Greek edition of the seven letters of Ignatius of Antioch, to which he added three other letters. Doubts concerning the authenticity of the middle redaction are also raised periodically, since a monarchic structure in churches of so early a period seems anachronistic. But the history of hierarchical organization in the Christian communities is different acc. to geographical areas and the letters place in relief the newness of episcopal monarchy.

II. Dating. The Chronicle of Eusebius mentions both the martyrdom of Ignatius of Antioch and the letter of *Pliny to *Trajan around the tenth year of his reign (AD 107), but one can see in HE (3,33,36) that Eusebius did not have precise chronological information either for Ignatius of Antioch or Pliny. Eusebius merely wished to situate the two events approximately: he placed the letter of Pliny under Trajan and hypothesized that Ignatius of Antioch had been arrested during the persecution which the letter of Pliny speaks of. Therefore, we cannot take this date as certain.

III. The Struggle against the sabbatists and the docetists. In his letter to the faithful of Philadelphia, Ignatius of Antioch speaks of a schism which has occurred in that church. Some members of the community had separated themselves from the bishop because they held that it was necessary to observe the sabbath. They had certainly attempted to spread their ideas among the nearby churches, because Ignatius speaks of this situation in his letter to the faithful of Magnesia as well. He also opposed those Christians who denied that Jesus Christ was really born, died and resurrected. One passage (Magn. 8,12) establishes a link between these two controversies. In fact, in order to prove that the sabbath had been abolished in favor of Sunday, Ignatius did not rely on any scriptural testimony. The only argument he offered was that Sunday was the day of the resurrection of Jesus; in his view, to refuse Sunday meant rejecting the reality of the birth, passion and resurrection of the Savior.

IV. Unity with the bishop. In the face of such disagreements, Ignatius preached first of all union around the bishop and the clergy. While earlier documents speak at times of a college of elders (presbyters), at others of one hierarchy with two colleges (bishops and deacons), the letters of Ignatius of Antioch are the first testimonies to a hierarchy with three levels: monarchical bishop, priests (presbyters) and deacons. The letters exalt above all the bishop, who is the vicar of God (Magn. 3,1; 6,1; Trall. 3,1) or of Jesus Christ (Trall. 2,1; Eph. 6,1); nothing can be done without him (Trall. 2,2; Phil. 7,2; 4,1); in particular, Christians must not get married without his consent (Phil. 5,2). It is the first mention of an intervention of the church in the matrimony of Christians, dictated above all by the desire to avoid mixed marriages.

V. Theology of martyrdom. Another recurring theme in the letters of Ignatius is that of martyrdom, esp. in the letter to the Romans, where Ignatius begs them not to do anything to impede his execution: "Let me be the meal of the beasts!" (Rom. 4).

A disciple must imitate his master; thus, Ignatius wants to follow Christ even in his passion (6,3); then he will be a true disciple (4,2; cf. 5,1.3), he will find Christ (5,3), he will find God (Magn. 14; Trall. 12,2; 13,3; Rom. 1,2). His sacrifice will benefit others as well: an "offering to God" (Rom. 4,2), he is a ransom for all (Eph. 21,1; Smyr. 10,2) and asks for the prayers of his correspondents. This concept of martyrdom is very much inspired by St. Paul and by 4 Macc.; some expressions manifest the influence of Hellenistic philosophy as well: "Nothing of that which appears to the eyes is good" (Rom. 3,2); "There is no longer in me the ardor of love for matter" (Rom. 7,2).

Editions: CPG 1025-1036; P.Th. Camelot, SC 10 (Paris 1969), with Fr. tr.; F.X. Funk - K. Bihlmeyer - W. Schneemelcher, Tübingen 1970; Die apostolischen Väter, selected and tr. into Ger. by H. Ristow, Berlin 1964; J.A. Fischer, Darmstadt 1976, with Ger. tr.; W. Schoedel, Ignatius of Antioch. Hermeneia, ed. by H. Koester, Minneapolis 1985.

Studies: RAC 17 (1996) 933-953; G. Trentin, Rassegna di studi su Ignazio: StudPat (1972) 75-87; K. Bommes, Weizen Gottes. Untersuchung zur Theologie des Martyriums bei Ignatius von Antiochien, Cologne-Bonn 1976; H. Paulsen, Studien zur Theologie des Ignatius von Antiochien, Göttingen 1978; P. Meinhold, Studien zu Ignatius von Antiochien, Wiesbaden 1979; R. Joly, Le dossier d'Ignace d'Antioche, Brussels 1979; J. Rius-Camps, The Four Authentic Letters of Ignatius the Martyr, Rome 1979; C.P.H. Bammel, Ignatian Problems: JTS 33 (1982) 62-97; G. Carlozzo, L'ellissi in Ignazio di Antiochia e la questione dell'autenticità della recensione lunga: VetChr 19 (1982) 239-256; A. de Halleux, "L'Église catholique" dans la Lettre ignacienne aux Smyrniotes: EThL 58 (1982) 5-24; C. Munier, Où en est la question d'Ignace d'Antioche?: bilan d'un siècle de recherches 1870-1988: ANRW II, 2, 27, 359-484; W.R. Schoedel, Polycarp of Smyrna and Ignatius of Antioch: ANRW II, 2, 27, 272-358; C. Trevett, A Study of Ignatius of Antioch in Syria and Asia, Lewiston 1992; U. Neri, Ignazio di Antiochia, Bologna 1994; J. Rius-Camps, Indicios de una redacción muy temprana de las cartas auténticas de Ignacio (ca. 70-90 d.C.): Augustinianum 35 (1995) 199-214; R.M. Hübner, Thesen zur Echtheit und Datierung der sieben Briefe des Ignatius von Antiochien: ZAC 1 (1997) 44-72; G. Schöllgen, Die Ignatianen als pseudepigraphisches Briefcorpus: Anmerkung zu den Thesen von Reinhard M. Hübner: ZAC 2 (1998) 16-25; M.D. Goulder, Ignatius' "Docetists": VChr 53 (1999) 16-30; T. Lechner, Ignatius adversus Valentinianos?: chronologische und theologiegeschichtliche Studien zu den Briefen des Ignatius von Antiochien, Leiden 1999; H.J. Vogt, Vertreten die Ignatius-Briefe Patripassianismus?: ThQ 180 (2000) 237-251; C.T. Brown, The Gospel and Ignatius of Antioch, Bern 2000; Ignasi d'Antioquia; intr., rev. text, tr. with notes by J. Rius-Camps, Barcelona 2001; Concordantia in Patres Apostolicos. 6, Ignatii epistularum concordantia, ed. Á. Urbán, Hildesheim 2001.

P. Nautin

IGNATIUS of Antioch (pseudo) (4th c.). Bishop of Neapolis (*Anazarbus) who lived in an *Arian Antiochene environment in the 2nd half of the 4th c. There he was known by the name of Julian. He is the author of the Epp. Interpolatae (Ad Ephesios, Ad Magnesios, Ad Trallianos, Ad Romanos, Ad Philadelphenses, Ad Smyrnaeos, Ad Polycarpum) and of the Epp. Suppositiae (Ad Mariam, Ad Tarsenses, Ad Antiochenos, Ad Heronem Diaconum Antiochiae, Ad Philippenses), which are found in the Ignatian corpus. Probably long after the Council of Constantinople (381) he composed the Apostolic Constitutions (Perler, Hannah, Brown), a normative text of a disciplinary and liturgical character, and it seems that he can be identified with Julian the Anomoian who wrote a commentary on the book of Job (Hagedorn), shortly before the advent of Theodosius I (379), in which the term homoousios* is openly condemned.

CPG 1000.4, 1026, 1730, 1738, 2075; PG 5, 729-942; F.X. Funk, Didascalia et Constitutiones apostolorum, I, Paderborn 1905; F.X. Funk - F. Diekamp, Patres Apostolici, II, Tübingen 1913, 83-268; R. Draguet, Un Commentaire grec arien sur Job: RHE 20 (1924) 38-65; DACL IV/1, 949; O. Perler, Pseudo-Ignatius und Eusebius von Emesa: HJ 77 (1958) 73-82; J.W. Hannah, The Setting of the Ignatian Long Recension: Journal of Biblical Literature 79 (1960) 221-238; M.P. Brown, Notes on the Language and Style of Pseudo-Ignatius: Journal of Biblical Literature 83 (1964) 146-152; D. Hagedorn, Der Hiobkommentar des Arianers Julian: PTS 14 (1973) XXXVII-LVII.

P. Marone

ILDEFONSUS of Toledo (607–667). This archbishop of *Toledo in the 2nd half of the 7th c. is known to us, apart from his works, through three sources: the Elogium of Julian and the legendary Vita of Cixila, both archbishops of Toledo, in the 7th and 8th c. respectively, and finally a biography, even more suspect, written by Rodrigo de Cerrato in the 13th c. He was a monk in the monastery of Agali, outside the walls of the *Visigothic capital. Ildefonsus was ordained a deacon and later elected abbot (he signed the canons of the 8th and 9th Councils of Toledo in 653 and 655 with this title), lastly archbishop of the Urbs Regia from 657 to 667.

Some masses and hymns of the Mozarabic liturgy are attributed to him, as well as the composition of poems and epitaphs now lost. His De virginitate perpetua beatae Mariae is a polemical work written "against three opponents" of this belief: Helvidius and Jovinian (against whom St. Jerome had written two short works which Ildefonsus consulted), and a Jew. The treatise De cognitione baptismi, discovered in the 18th c., develops the traditional theology of this sacrament acc. to the Latin fathers; it had been a subject of dispute between Catholics and *Arians (single or triple immersion?). His De progressu spiritualis deserti (until recently incorrectly called De itinere deserti) develops the spiritual theology of conversion, following in the footsteps of the Synonyma of *Isidore.

In addition to a few letters (two of them addressed to Chirico of Barcelona), the most personal treatise is the De viris illustribus, which is at first glance a continuation of the homonymous treatises by *Jerome, *Gennadius and Isidore, but the work reveals a narrowed horizon and a shift of interest. Not only are these "famous men" all Spanish bishops (except the monk Donatus, who immigrated to *Spain from *Africa), but 7 out of 14 are bishops of Toledo. They are "famous" less for their literary and more for their moral, miraculous and pastoral achievements. The purpose is to raise the prestige of the archbishops of Toledo in opposition to the princes, in a likely crisis situation between the two powers (there was no national council in Toledo during the episcopate of Ildefonsus). In this "parochial" work the universalism of the church is no less in evidence than purely literary concerns. Chapter 3, however, gives valuable information about the exodus of African monks and their books to Spain in the 6th c. Ildefonsus is a believer in the rhymed and rhythmic "synonymic" style; perhaps for political reasons he does not say anything about the historical works of Isidore (too "Gothophile" in his eyes?).

CPL 1247-1257; PL 96, 53-208; ed. V. Blanco García, Madrid 1937 of the De virginitate and C. Codoñer, Salamanca 1972 of the De viris; S.A. Braegelmann, The Life and Writings of Saint Ildefonsus of Toledo, Washington, DC, 1942; J. Madoz, San Ildefonso de Toledo: EstEcl 26 (1957) 467-505; U. Domínguez del Val, Patrología española (appendix to the Sp. ed. of the Patrologie of B. Altaner), Madrid [4]1956, 103-107; Id., Ildefonso de Toledo: DHEE 2 (1972) 1188-1189; T.C. Akeley, Christian Initiation in Spain c. 300-1100, London 1967, 77-86; J. Fontaine, El "De viris illustribus" de San Ildefonso, tradición y originalidad: Anales Toledanos 3 (1970) 59-96; C. Codoñer Merino, El "De viris illustribus" de San Ildefonso de Toledo, study and critical ed., Univ. de Salamanca 1972, 7-86; J.M. Balleros Mateos, El tratado "de virginitate sanctae Mariae" de San Ildefonso de Toledo. Estudios sobre el estilo sinonímico latino, Toledo 1985; J.F. Rivera Recio, San Ildefonso de Toledo. Biografía, época y posteridad, BAC 466, Madrid 1985; P.J. Galán-Sánchez, El "De viris illustribus" de Ildefonso de Toledo o la modificación del género: Anuario de estudios teológicos 15 (1992) 69-80; L. Navarra, Ildefonso di Toledo, Rome 2003.

J. Fontaine

ILLUMINATION. The use of the Greek words φωτίζειν, φωτισμός, and the Latin illuminare, illuminatio as well as their synonyms, such as ἔκλαμψις, ἔλλαμψις, illustratio, manifestatio, is widespread in patristic works (Lampe 1504-1511; 433-434; 451: ThLL 7/1, 390-391). This is not surprising, considering that the symbolism of light, no less than in ancient religions, is essential in the biblical world, esp. in the later prophets (Is 42:6; 49:6), in the Psalms (Ps 119[118]: the light of the law), in the wisdom literature and in the Johannine writings (see the Lat. biblical texts in ThLL). Christian theology took up rather easily the biblical metaphors of light becaue it was confronted from the beginning with dualistic systems that distinguish light and darkness. *Gnosticism of the 2nd c. and later *Manicheism expressed their ideas on the return to the divine sphere of the divine particles fallen into matter, with the image of the struggle between light and darkness. From the 3rd c. onward, *Neoplatonism often clarified its philosophical and religious positions through the symbolism of light. Also to be considered are the mystery religions and various forms of astral cults, in particular that of the Sol invictus and the Luna patiens. The theme of illumination is to be found in the same narratio of the saving work of Christ. The glorious Lord appears as the Savior who, spiritually continuing the healing of the blind he did on earth, illuminates the world with his gospel (1 Clem. 59,2; Just., Dial. 122; Tertull., Apol. 21; Orig., Hom. 4 in Lc.) and the soul of the believer with the light of faith (1 Clem 36,2; Clem. Alex., Ecl. 5). The introduction of the Logos-*Christology, together with the increasing authority of the writings of *John, later induced Christian writers, esp. the Alexandrians, to attribute this work of illumination to the eternal Word (Clem. Alex., Protr. 114-115: Orig., Cels. 6,79). Next to the general theme, three particular topics should be noted: religious knowledge, conversion and Augustinian illumination. In their discussions of religious knowledge, the efforts of the *Alexandrians, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Evagrius and others reached a culmination in the synthesis of ps.-*Dionysius, who speaks not only of the light of darkness but also distinguishes the three ways of purification, illumination and union (Roques, Univers, 94-101). In the wake of particular biblical texts (Jn 9; Eph 5:14; Heb 6:4-6; 10:32), from the 2nd c. onward, conversion, sealed by baptism, was perceived as an illumination (Justin, 1 Apol. 61,12-3; Clem. Alex., Paed. I, 6,25-31; Basil., Hom. 13,1; Greg. Naz., Or. 40,3,1; John Damasc., Expos. 82), and therefore Easter and Epiphany were celebrated as days of illumination (Greg. Naz., Or. 45,2; Jobius Mon., Inc. 2). Finally, it is remarkable how *Augustine, under the influence of Neoplatonism, developed the epistemological theory of illumination. Humanity assesses the truth of knowledge through the mysterious presence of the divine light within (Solil. I, 8,15; Trin. 12,15,24; 14,15,21)—i.e., the eternal Word (Mag. 11,38; Trin. 4,2,4), by which the light of human intellect was created and illuminated (Nash, 440). This theory had great influence all through the Middle Ages, until St. Bonaventure brought it to perfection.

Cath 5, 1215-1221; DSp 7,1330-1346; E. Gilson, Introduction à l'étude de s. Augustin, Paris 1929; H. Rahner, Griechische Mythen in christlicher Deutung, Darmstadt 1957, 125-224 (It. tr. Bologna 1971); R. Roques, L'univers dionysien, Paris 1954; H. Turner, Jésus le Sauveur, Paris 1965, 35-52; W. Beierwaltes, in HWP 2 (1972) 712-717 (bibl.); B. Studer, Gratia Christi, 159-162; J.M. Rist, Augustine, Cambridge 1994; J. Weismayer: LTK[3] 3, 796ff.; R.H. Nash, Illumination, in Augustine Through the Ages, ed. A. Fitzgerald, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 438-440.

B. Studer

IMAGE

I. Theology of the image of God - II. Use and veneration of images.

I. Theology of the image of God. This issue is related to those of the "kinship" and "likeness" of humanity to God, as well as that of the "imitation" and "following" of God and Christ. It dominates the *Christology, *anthropology and spirituality of the Greek and Latin fathers. The sources are to be found in the Bible and Greek philosophy. For Plato, the sensible is the image of the idea, the human *soul is related to God—*Plato never defines it as the image of God, since the concept of image for him remains tied to the sensible world—and, as already formulated by the pre-Socratics, resemblance to God is the end of human life (Theaetetus 176 b): thus humanity can know God, because something can only be known by another thing similar to it. The Stoics have analogous ideas, as well as the *Middle Platonists, where the concept of an intermediary image appears with the divine Triad. The same is true in *Neoplatonism.

1. Christ, the image of God. This theme arises from Col 1:15 and implies a certain *subordinationism, which remains orthodox if it merely expresses the source of the second person without implying an inequality of power. But is Christ the image of God because of his dual nature or only by virtue of his divinity? In the first case, the human nature assumed by the Word would be, inasmuch as a revelation of God, a visible image of the reality of God. But proponents of the second view argue that God, being incorporeal, cannot have a corporeal image. The authors who attribute to the incarnate Word the quality of being the image of God are *Irenaeus, *Tertullian and, at least indirectly, *Marius Victorinus. Others attribute it only to the Word in his divinity, and Col 1:15 is interpreted by *Origen as "the invisible image of the invisible God." This dispute is linked to the problem of where one should place the image of humanity, whether on the whole it is formed of body and soul, or the soul alone. With respect to humanity the Word is an intermediary image, since humanity was created in relation to him. Many ancient Fathers see in the plural form of Gen 1:26 a dialogue between the Father and the Son, and identify this image with the Son, acc. to which humanity was created. For this reason, acc. to many, only the Son is called the "image," while humanity is only "according to the image" (κατ' εἰκόνα). The Word is an intermediary image between God and humanity not only in the moment of creation but also at every moment of spiritual progress accomplished through his grace and by imitating him: the human nature that he has assumed has the role of a second intermediate image, although, as a creature, and like all humans, it is "according to the image" or "an image of the image," and not simply the "image." That is the immediate model that the Word provides for humans to imitate. In the Son, his image, we contemplate the Father, and through him we come to know the Father (*Basil).

2. The Spirit, image of the Son. From the outset, the action of the *Holy Spirit is affirmed in spiritual progress, starting from participation in the image. But the quality of an image is attributed to the Holy Spirit for the first time in the Expositio fidei of *Gregory Thaumaturgus (PG 46, 916 D): he is the "perfect image of the perfect Son." It is found in *Athanasius, Basil, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Cyril of Alexandria, *John of Damascus. As an image of the Son the Spirit forms Christ in us, the perfect image of the Father.

3. Humanity according to the image. Humanity was thus created as an "image of the image" or "according to the image"—i.e., acc. to the Son, who is the image, and this participation in the image constitutes the essence of human nature. Since for most the image of God is the Word in his divinity, to the exclusion of his humanity, the expression "according to the image" does not apply to the whole human being, but the soul alone or, better, the νοῦς, the mind, his better part, the seat of knowledge, freedom, love and virtue, organ of spiritual and intellectual activity. The dignity of the image falls on the body only indirectly (Marius Victorinus), which becomes its sanctuary (Origen). Being "according to the image" is something imperfect, but dynamic, capable of progress and regression: it aims at reaching the perfection of its model. It is the principal foundation of the greatness and dignity of humanity.

a. Is this participation in God, constituted by the image, of a natural or supernatural order? In Irenaeus, who uses different expressions, the distinction between image and likeness corresponds in certain cases to that which exists between nature, i.e., the condition of being a creature, and grace. Tertullian distinguishes a likeness of nature and a likeness of grace. This concept is found in *Cyril of Jerusalem; in *Jerome, for whom the likeness is received at baptism; and in Marius Victorinus, who sees in this a spiritual quality that adds to the nature of the soul, which is an image. In contrast, *Clement of Alexandria, Origen and *Gregory of Nyssa make no distinction between the natural and supernatural: the image, therefore, is the desire for the supernatural and its seed; the natural, to some extent, is implicitly contained in the image. Contrary to some representations of Western scholasticism, which understand the supernatural as added above a "pure nature," it is rather, for Origen and Gregory, humanity's biological aspect that is added to the image possessing in itself the spiritual and intellectual aspect of the νοῦς or of the mens. The distinction is esp. clear in *Athanasius and more so in Cyril of Alexandria, who understands image and likeness in a double sense: first, reason oriented toward virtue; second, the gift of the Holy Spirit and participation in the divine nature. *Augustine reasons similarly and distinguishes two levels in the image: humans are capax Dei on account of their own nature, endowed with reason, on account of their immortality, and because of the natural knowledge of God that sin itself presupposes; humans become particeps Dei by means of the supernatural gifts.

b. One sometimes reads in the Fathers that the image is lost on account of sin. But when they turn their thoughts more specifically on that point, Origen, Athanasius, Basil and others believe that the image is indestructible: even when sin, acc. to Origen, hides it under a pile of opposing images, the image of the devil, of the world as identified with the devil, of Caesar as symbol of the prince of this world, or of the image of beasts, the former remains indelible in its orientation toward the supernatural, which constitutes its dynamism. Cyril and Augustine, on the contrary, who distinguish a double image or a double partition within the image, believe that the second image is lost because of sin, while the former persists. But for all the Fathers, the restoration of this image, either lost or covered up, is the work of Christ in his *incarnation and redemption, who transforms the human being into a child of God.

c. The distinction between image and likeness is therefore at times and to a certain extent that between natural and supernatural. But in Clement and esp. in Origen the image was received at the time of creation, as the beginning or seed for divinization, and the likeness, in agreement with Greek philosophers, is the goal or the outcome of spiritual progress in beatitude. Origen finds it in 1 Jn 3:2, "When he will manifest himself we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Similarly, in Gen 1:26-27, when God speaks of likeness, he announced his intention to create human beings, but did not mention it when showing the execution of this plan; likeness is restricted to the end. *John Chrysostom also sees in likeness the development of the image. Many other authors, such as Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Alexandria and Augustine, do not separate likeness from image. But, if we disregard the concepts used, they teach the same doctrine, inasmuch as divinization is always the ultimate goal of the image.

d. From image to likeness or divinization: this is the path of spiritual progress, in action and in knowledge. The achievements of *asceticism are the work of both divine grace and human effort: the virtues are acquired both by participation in Christ, who is all virtue and all the virtues, who forms the soul in his likeness and forms himself in the soul, and by imitation of God and Christ. This participation in the image allows the human being to know God: something is known only by that which is similar to it, and knowledge presupposes a shared nature between subject and object. God reveals himself through his creative act as through Scripture and the incarnation: however, there is no revelation other than when God manifests himself inside the soul, a manifestation of which the image is both the place and the means. Progress in virtue, developing the likeness with God and Christ, makes this understanding more profound, as it strengthens the soul in its shared nature with the divine. Finally, in the fullness of beatitude, the vision of God and Christ in their reality corresponds to the likeness and divinization, acc. to Jn 3:2. Conversely, the contemplation of God and of Christ develops the "second image": the transforming contemplation makes equal the one contemplating to the object of his contemplation. This is an example of a spiritual and intuitive knowledge rather than a discursive or logical kind. These two ways of knowing, however, should not be separated too strictly, nor should one refuse to see in the second a preparatory role for a spiritual vision.

e. All the Fathers emphasize the action of the three divine persons in the development of participation in the image. Marius Victorinus sees in the soul the image of the *Trinity because it is at once nature, life and thought; Augustine found it in the mens, because of its three main faculties, which he lists in different ways, such as memory, intelligence and will; *Fulgentius of Ruspe repeats his teaching.

These similarities are certainly the culmination of earlier speculation. Origen attributes the gift of being to the Father, reason to the Son, and holiness to the Spirit and conceives the generation of the Son by the Father as that of the will on the part of the intellect. Nevertheless, he never came to a clear conception of the image of the Trinity in humanity.

A. Strucken, Die Gottebenbildlichkeit des Menschen in der christlichen Literatur der ersten zwei Jahrhunderte, Münster, 1913; E. Peterson, L'immagine di Dio in S. Ireneo: Scuola Cattolica 69 (1941) 46-54; A. Mayer, Das Gottesbild im Menschen nach Clemens v. Alexandrien, Rome 1942; R. Leys, L'image de Dieu chez St. Grégoire de Nysse, Paris-Brussels 1952; R. Bernard, L'image de Dieu d'après St. Athanase, Paris 1952; H. Merki, Ὁμοίωσις Θεῷ, Von der platonischen Angleichung an Gott zur Gottähnlichkeit bei Gregor v. Nyssa, Freiburg 1952; P.Th. Camelot, La théologie de l'image de Dieu: RSPh 40 (1956) 443-471; W.J. Burghardt, The Image of God in Man According to Cyril of Alexandria, Woodstock, MD 1957; H. Crouzel, Théologie de l'image de Dieu chez Origène, Paris 1956; P. Hadot, L'image de la Trinité dans l'âme chez Victorinus et chez Augustin, SP VI, TU 81, 1962, 409-442; J. Kirchmeyer, Grecque (Église): DSp 6, 812-822; G.A. Maloney, Man, the Divine Icon, Pecos, NM 1973; M. Aghiorgoussis, Image as "Sign" (Semeion) of God: Knowledge of God Through the Image According to St. Basil: Gr.Orth.Th.R. 21 (1976) 19-54; St. Otto, Der Mensch als Bild Gottes bei Tertullian: MThZ 10 (1959) 276-282; A. Solignac, Image et Ressemblance II. Pères de l'Église: DSp 7/2 (1971) 1406-1425; H. Somers, Image de Dieu et Illumination divine: AugM 1 (1954) 452-462; Id., Image de Dieu: Les sources de l'exégèse augustinienne: REAug 7 (1961) 1-15, 105-125; St.E. Szyzik, Die geistiger Ursprünge der Imago-Dei-Lehre bei Ambrosius v. Mailand: Theol. Glaube 53 (1963) 161-176; Ph.Th. Wild, The Divinization of Man According to St. Hilary of Poitiers, Mundelein, IL 1950; G. Maertens, Augustine's Image of Man, in Images of Man in Ancient and Medieval Thought, Studia G. Berbeke, Leuven 1976, 175-198; M. Perrin, L'homme antique et chrétien. L'anthropologie de Lactance, Paris 1981; J. Fantino, L'homme image de Dieu chez saint Irenée de Lyon, Paris 1986; A.G. Hamman, L'homme image de Dieu. Essai d'une anthropologie chrétienne dans l'église des cinq permiers siècles, Paris 1987; P. Nellas, Deification in Christ: Orthodox Perspectives on the Nature of the Human Person, Crestwood, NY 1987; G. Robbins (ed.), Genesis 1-3 in the History of Interpretation. Intrigue in the Garden, Lewiston, NY 1988; K.E. Børresen (ed.), The Image of God and Gender Models in Judaeo-Christian Tradition, Minneapolis 1995; A.G. Hamman, L'homme, icône de Dieu, Textes choisis et traductions, Paris 1998; F.G. McLeod, The Image of God in the Antiochene Tradition, Washington, DC, 1999; A immagine di Dio. Modelli del genere nella tradizione giudaica e cristiana, ed. by K.E. Børresen, Rome 2001; L. Manca, Il primato della volontà in Agostino e Massimo il Confessore, Rome 2002.

II. Use and veneration of images. One must distinguish the use of images for the decoration of churches, the instruction of the faithful, and as an aid to prayer, from the veneration of images properly speaking.

1. Before the Council of Nicaea. During this period, ecclesiastical writers were not willing to accept the use of and even less the veneration of images, although most of the time they expressed themselves indirectly: they took a stance in the fight against pagan idolatry, basing themselves on the anti-image texts of the OT. The real image of God is Christ, then humanity and the virtue that is in it: the temple of the Christians is the human body, the shrine of the image, or it is the universe. At times their rejection of idolatry leads them to oppose those same arguments that were later adopted by the defenders of the veneration of images. Of note are the following: *Tertullian (De idolatria 4,1; Adv. Hermogenem I,2), who also says (De spectaculis 23,5) that God, being the Truth, cannot accept what is false; *Clement of Alexandria (Protr. IV, 62, 1-2), who specifies (Strom. VII, V, 28-29) that God cannot be contained; *Origen (C. Cels. VII, 62-67), *Minucius Felix (Octavius, 32), *Lactantius (Inst. Div II, 2). The early 4th-c. Council of *Elvira in canon 36 prohibited the display of paintings in churches.

One of the main reasons for this are the prohibitions of the OT, esp. considering that the *Decalogue is still valid in the new covenant, the prohibition to make images (the second commandment in Ex 20:4-5 or Dt 5:8-9). In fact, most of the Fathers before *Augustine follow the subdivision of the Decalogue by the Jews attested by *Philo (Quis rerum divinarum heres sit 15, De Decalogo 23) that distinguishes four commandments regarding God, one on the love of parents (the 5th), then five regarding one's neighbor, joining in the tenth all the sins of desire. This breakdown is attested in *Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autol. II, 35), *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VI, XVI, 146, 1), Origen (Fragm. Eph. XXXI, Com. Mt XI, 9). In Hom. Ex VIII, 2, Origen writes that for some this second commandment is one with the first, but it may be a clarification of the translator *Rufinus, a contemporary of Augustine. The same division is found in the Fathers after *Nicaea, who do not draw the same conclusions: the Synopsis Scripturae Sanctae attributed to *Athanasius (PG 28, 297), the dogmatic poem 15 of *Gregory of Nazianzus (PG 37, 476), *Jerome (Com. Eph. III on Eph 6,2; Com.Os. III on Os 10,9-10), *Ambrosiaster (Com. Eph. on Eph 6,3), the emperor *Julian acc. to Cyril of Alexandria (C. Julianum V, PG 76, 733), *John Cassian (Collatio VIII, 23).

This position of the Fathers before Nicaea poses a problem: in fact, Tertullian as a *Montanist asserts, without blaming them too explicitly, that the "*psychici," i.e., the Catholics, have on some chalices a depiction of the Good *Shepherd (De Pud. VII, 1; IX, 12) and a great many paintings of the Roman catacombs date back to the 3rd if not the 2nd c.; those in the East in the baptistery of *Dura

Europos cannot be later than the 3rd c., because the city was destroyed in 256. So there is a discrepancy between the position of some writers and actual practice. It should also be noted that although the prohibition of images in the OT seemed absolute, in practice it was much less so; as shown by the cherubim on the Tabernacle (Ex 25:17-20; Num 7:89; Ezek 41:18-20). The Jews of the early centuries of our era did not observe the prohibition of images strictly as shown by their catacombs in Rome, the synagogue of Dura Europos and even the Galilean synagogues (cf. DBS 4, 199-232). The same discrepancy can therefore be seen.

2. In the 4th and 5th c. Two isolated cases of the 4th c. show strong opposition to images. Eusebius testifies (HE 7, 18, 2-4) to having seen a monument erected in Paneas to Christ by the woman with the hemorrhage of blood whom he had healed, and that the monument represented her with Jesus—some think that it was actually Asclepius—as well as paintings of Peter, Paul and Jesus: he did not reprove the makers of these images too harshly, attributing these things to pagan custom. However, when the empress *Constantia, sister of *Constantine and the widow of *Licinius, wanted to obtain from him an image of Christ, Eusebius rejected the request outright, saying that the human form of Christ was now completely deified, and could not therefore be represented (PG 20, 1545-50). In a letter to John of *Jerusalem, translated into *Latin by Jerome (51 in the correspondence of the latter), *Epiphanius reports that he found in Palestine, in a church in a village, a curtain on which was painted "the image of Christ or a saint." Faithful to Scripture he pulls the curtain down and asks John to put an end to these practices which are "against our religion." Nevertheless, other Fathers speak incidentally of images without showing the slightest disapproval. Sometimes they make reference esp. to the cross, not only of the wood of the original, which is venerated as a relic, but also of the "sign" that tends to be depicted more and more: the emperor *Julian, acc. to Cyril of Alexandria, and Cyril himself (C. Julianum VI: PG 76, 796ff.); *John Chrysostom (Quod Christus sit Deus 9: PG 48, 826); *Asterius of Amasea (Hom XI in laudem S. Euphemiae: PG 40, 333-334). Augustine (Tract. in Jo. 117, 3 on Jo 19; Serm. 99,9) and *Prudentius (Apotheosis 448) speak of the cross that the emperors wear on their crown. *Theodoret (Graec. Af. Curatio VI: SC 57, 285) also speaks of the veneration (γεραίρειν) of the sign (σημεῖον) of the cross: he is not referring in this context, therefore, to the relic of the cross. The evidence for paintings does not yet attest their veneration. They are scenes of the OT, like the sacrifice of Abraham, which moves *Gregory of Nyssa (De deitate Filii et Spiritus Sancti: PG 46, 572 C). Augustine attests that such images are represented everywhere (C. Faust XXII, 73); there are also figures of the NT such as the apostles, painted on vases acc. to Jerome (Com. Jon. IV, 6), and Peter and Paul with Christ, acc. to Augustine (De cons. evang. I, 10 [16]). Finally, the basilicas of the martyrs are full of depictions of their passions: Gregory of Nyssa describes that of the martyr Theodore, where an image of Christ was also included (De S. Theodoro: PG 46, 737 D); Asterius of Amasea describes that of Saint Euphemia (Hom. XI: PG 40, 333). *Basil invites painters to depict the martyr *Barlaam (Hom. XVII in Barlaam mart.: PG 31, 489). Similar paintings are mentioned by Prudentius (Peristephanon IX, 9ff.).

The image of St. Polemon stopped a prostitute (Greg. Naz., Poemi morali X, 802-807). *Paulinus of Nola wanted to build porches all frescoed with images in honor of his dear St. *Felix (Poema 27,511; Poema 28, 20-21), and his letter 32 to *Sulpicius Severus described the subjects he must represent, above all St. *Martin, in the basilica that he plans for Primuliacum. Gregory of Nyssa promoted these paintings, writing on the basilica of St. Theodore, because they are like a book that speaks to those who cannot read and they give rise to the desire for spiritual realities. Similarly, a letter of *Nilus to the governor Olympiodorus (IV, 61: PG 79, 577) dissuades the latter from introducing into the basilica that he wants to build representations of purely ornamental animals and plants: rather, he should represent scenes of the two Testaments designed to educate the illiterate and instill in them a burning desire for heaven. At the end of the 6th c., two letters of *Gregory the Great (IX, 105 and XI, 13: PL 77, 1027ff., 1128ff.) praise Serenus, bishop of *Marseille, for impeding in his diocese a superstitious worship of images, but censures him for their destruction and for having thus caused a division among his faithful: the letters emphasize the educational function of images.

3. Before and during the iconoclastic crisis. So far there had not been a liturgical veneration of images. The phrase of Basil, quoted in the Second Council of Nicaea: "The honor given to the image refers back to its prototype" (De Spir. S.to XVIII, 45) cannot be used to posit the liturgical veneration of images, because the council extrapolates it from its context, which deals with the theology of the image of God, in order to apply it to the veneration of images. Origen had rejected a similar argument made by the pagans to justify their idolatrous worship (C. Cels. VI, 14), but the dogma of the *incarnation, developed in earlier centuries through the crisis provoked by *Apollinarianism, *Nestorianism, the *monophysite heresy and its various offshoots provided a justification for the veneration of images. It is difficult to know when and how the representation of sacred images produced a liturgical veneration. Three canons of the Quinisext Council or *In Trullo of 692 treat this matter: canon 73 regards the veneration of the cross; canon 82 calls for the replacement of the symbolic and allegorical representations of Christ, such as the Lamb, with human figures; canon 100 provides rules for decency in sacred art. The iconoclastic currents also had as their main motive the fear of idolatry and prohibitions of the OT; some radicals demanded the complete destruction of images; others, more moderate, rejected their veneration, or accepted some images but not others. Abuses gave them their pretext, and political pressures, if not from Muslims or Jews, at least from the *Manicheans or *Paulicians, also played a role. The two crises were stirred and then muffled by the direct interference of the emperor. The initiative came from *Leo III the Isaurian in the fall of 725: the Patriarch *Germanus of Constantinople, who opposed him, was forced to abdicate in 729; he was supported by Popes *Gregory II and *Gregory III, who refused to acknowledge the imperial measures. Constantine V Copronymus continued the religious policy of his father and in 752 called an iconoclastic synod of 338 bishops in the Hieria palace, on the E outskirts of the capital: the council decreed the destruction of all images that were in churches, and following upon these decrees, Constantine violently persecuted the supporters of images. But after his death in 775 and that of his son Leo IV in 780, the latter's widow, Irene, regent because of the age of the child Constantine VI, prudently restored the veneration of images. A new council was called at Nicaea in 787, the seventh ecumenical council, which condemned the council at the Hieria and defended the veneration of images. Nevertheless, the crisis resumed in 813, with the advent of Leo the Armenian and continued under his successors Michael II and Theophilus. At the latter's death in 843, his wife, Theodora, regent for her underage son, restored the veneration of images, commemorating it with the Feast of Orthodoxy, which would from then on be celebrated 11 March every year. The two iconoclast crises were the occasion for theological reflection, developed in the first crisis by Patriarch Germanus of Constantinople, the monk George of Cyprus and esp. *John of Damascus in three discourses against the iconoclasts; during the second by Patriarch Nicephorus of Constantinople and above all by Theodore the Studite. They emphasized, as a consequence of the incarnation, the sacramental character of the icon, which on account of its participation in what it represents is a source of grace.

We list above all important articles with rich bibliographies.: Iconoclasme (C. Emerau) and Images (Culte des) (V. Grumel), in DTC 7, 575-595, 766-844 (see general tables 2, 2186-2192); RAC 14, 66-96; Images (chez les Juifs) (J.B. Frey), in DBS 4, 199-232. Furthermore: J. Tixeront, Histoire des dogmes dans l'antiquité chrétienne, Paris 1912, III, 435-483; V. Fazzo, La giustificazione delle immagini religiose, Naples 1977; Chr. von Schönborn, L'Icône du Christ: Fondements théologiques, Fribourg-Suisse 1976; L. Ouspensky, La théôlogie de l'icône dans l'Église orthodoxe, Paris 1980; A. Marino, Storia della lesgislazione sul culto delle immagini dall'inizio al trionfo dell'ortodossia, Rome 1981; J. Gutmann, Early Synagogue and Jewish Catacomb: Art and Its Relation to Christian Art: ANRW II, 21,2 (1984) 1313-1342; Culto delle immagini e crisi iconoclasta, Atti del convegno di studi (Catania 16-17 maggio 1984), Palermo 1986; P. Schreiner, Der byzantinische Bilderstreit: kritische Analyse der zeitgenössischen Meinungen und das Urteil der Nachwelt bis heute, Spoleto 1988; P. Prigent, L'image dans le judaïsme, Geneva 1991; H.G. Thümmel, Bilderlehre und Bilderstreit: Arbeiten zur Auseinandersetzung über die Ikone und ihre Begründung vornehmlich im 8. und 9. Jahrhundert, Würzburg 1991; Id., Die Frühgeschichte der östkirchlichen Bilderlehre: Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, Berlin 1992; E. Kitzinger, Il culto delle immagini: l'arte bizantina dal cristianesimo delle origini all'iconoclastia, Florence 1992; S. Bigham, Les chrétiens et les images, Montréal 1992; P. Corby Finney, The Invisible God: The Earliest Christians on Art, New York 1994; D. Menozzi, La Chiesa e le immagini. I testi fondamentali sulle arti figurative dalle origini ai nostri giorni, Cinisello Balsamo 1995; Vedere l'invisibile: Nicea e lo statuto dell'immagine, ed. L. Russo, Palermo 1997.

H. Crouzel

IMPERIAL CULT. The part that the imperial cult played in the conflict between the church and the Roman Empire is not easy to determine. One thing is clear: the imperial cult was a component of the Roman religion, and the Christian religion's intransigent monotheism, inherited from the Jewish tradition, condemned all pagan cults as genuine impiety; thus, it could not accept the various expressions of the cult. All of this became increasingly important from the 1st c., in both public and private religious life, continuing to gain strength in the 2nd and 3rd c. and provoking the invective of St. John's Apocalypse (Rev 2:20) and, later, the criticism of the Apologists (Just., 1 Apol. 21,3; Tatian, Or. X, 4; Melito of Sardis: PG 5, 1226). *Tertullian spoke of it at length in his Apologeticum (22-35), emphasizing the clash between the Roman religion and patriotism, identifying refusal to participate in it as the decisive reason for the persecutions. His presentation, however, does not correspond to the facts. Examination of the Acts of the Martyrs shows that refusal to participate in the cult is never the legal justification for the arrest and condemnation of Christians. Moreover, when this reason is not explicitly stated, the accusation sufficient for subjecting Christians to judgment and condemnation is the simple fact of being Christians, the nomen christianum. Nonetheless, in the procedure proposed by *Pliny the Younger and in part confirmed by *Trajan, the imperial cult served as a test for obliging Christians to proclaim themselves as such. Pliny asked those brought before him to invoke the gods, to offer a supplicatio with an offering of wine and incense to the emperor's image and to those of the gods, and, finally, to curse Christ. Trajan confirmed just the first of these tactics. The actions of the imperial cult, then, were not an end in themselves but a means for recognizing true Christians and an opportunity for those brought before the tribunals to save their lives by proving their loyalty to the emperor: a tragic dilemma, which could be fatal.

R. Boreux, Le culte impérial dans les persécutions des premiers siècles d'après les Actes authentiques des martyrs, Louvain 1948 (thesis); L. Cerfaux - J. Tondriau, Le culte des souverains dans la civilisation gréco-romaine, Paris 1957; Le culte des souverains dans l'Empire romain, Entretiens sur l'Antiquité classique 19, Vendoeuvres-Geneva 1972; LTK³ 5, 41-42; TRE 15, 251-255; RAC 3, 284-294, 353-356, 1047-1093; F. Millar, The Imperial Cult and the Persecutions: Éntretiens sur l'Antiquité classique 19 (1973) n. 7; Ch. Munier, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain (IIᵉ-IIIᵉ siècles), III, Église et Cité, Paris 1979, 196-205; S.R.F. Price, Between Man and God: Sacrifice in the Roman Imperial Cult: JRS 70 (1980) 28-43; H.-J. Klauck, Die religiöse Umwelt des Urchristentums, 2, Stuttgart 1996, 17-74; I. Gradel, Emperor Worship and Roman Religion, Oxford 2002.

Ch. Munier

IMPIETY. The attitude of one who does not worship God or respect his laws. Its dominant note is the lack of a sense of duty conceived of as divine law. The Bible is unaware of impiety as an expression of theoretical atheism, but knows and condemns it as practical atheism, contempt of the God of revelation. In Rom 1:18 the coupling of impiety and injustice signifies an egregious unrighteousness. Elsewhere allusion is not to perverse doctrinal statements but to the moral and religious effects deriving from them (2 Tim 2:16), to the intentional breaking of rules and to worldly pleasures (Tit 2:12), and above all to great sinners (1 Pet 4:18; 2 Pet 2:5; Jude 15, 18). While for the classical Greek world the term defines various attitudes—contempt of the gods, esp. those who protect the city and guarantee treaties; contempt of relatives living and dead; absence from public worship and transgression of the order of the polis—in Judaism there is a rational simplification which combines under this term the defiant attitude of the flood generation (Gen 6:11; cf. Job 22:15ff.), the builders of the tower of Babel (Gen 11:4), the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah (Wis 10:6), the classical enemies of Israel—Pharaoh, the Canaanites, Sennacherib, Babylon, Antiochus Epiphanes—and the people of God themselves, whose history is studded with infidelity and idolatry. The essential component of impiety is not irreligion or atheism, but the positive will to do the opposite of what fear and reverence for God command. Impiety adds to contempt of God and his law a substantial tone of hostility and defiance, which manifests itself in acts of violence, pride and the obstinate refusal to recognize God in his works (Ps 19:1; cf. Rom 1:18-20). Paul speaks of the existence of the "man of impiety" par excellence (Satan), whose activity (mystery of impiety) is already at work in the world (cf. 2 Th 2:7); in the last times he will exalt himself above all and proclaim himself to be God (2 Th 2:3–4:8). The literature of Qumran adds a new note: the impious are all those who are not part of the community and who do not follow the "teacher of righteousness," including the impious priest. In patristic literature other emphases appear, esp. with regard to orthodoxy (cf. Iren., Ad Haer., 1,15, 5; 16, 3; 27, 4; 2, 1,5; passim; Did., Eun., 5, PG 29, 740; John Chrys., Hom. 78, 2 in Jo; Gel. Cyz., HE, 2, 23, 12; Theod., Haer., 4, 12); they inherit from the OT the concept of idolatry, deception, violence, irreverence toward God and human beings, and perverse conduct (cf. Just., 1 Apol. 4, 7; 2 Clem., 10, 1; Iren., Ad. Haer., passim; John Chrys., Hom., 20, 4 in 1 Cor 19, 3). The mass of people in general, however, were not accused of impiety in matters of legal observance.

W. Foerster, ἀσεβής, ἀσέβεια, ἀσεβέω: GLNT XI, 1486-1502 [Eng. tr. TDNT 7:185-191]; J. Schmid, Empietà: Enc. della Bibbia, II, Turin 1969, 1309; Lampe, 242-243; X. Léon-Dufour, Empietà, Diz. Teol. Bibl., Turin 1965, 285-288; H. Cremer, Biblico-Theological Lexicon of New Testament Greek, Edinburgh ⁴1954, 523-524, 857-858; B. Reynders, Lexique compare . . . de l'"Adversus Haereses" de Saint Irénée, Louvain 1954, s.v.

E. Peretto

IMPROPERIA (or REPROACHES). The Improperia of the Western liturgy of Good Friday have their antecedents in the Quartodeciman Easter homilies of Asia Minor. The anti-Jewish invective, present in those sermons, is a testimony to the increasing differentiation of the Christian community from its Jewish roots. The Jews celebrated the Passover by sacrificing the paschal lamb on a fixed date, 14 Nisan.

So did the Quartodeciman Christians, but in the lamb of the Jewish celebration of Passover they saw the figure of the crucified Lord and, in their Eucharist, the participation in the Passover of the Lord. The sociological reality of the two communities, already far from peaceful, came to a head at the simultaneous celebration of Easter/Passover. In the context of both celebrations, sections of the liturgy developed that, anchored in the theme of Easter/Passover (pascha), recalled the accusations typical of the prophetic indictment of the OT (rîb = strife, dispute), which articulated the contrast between the generosity of God and the ingratitude of the people. This prophetic indictment enumerating the benefits of Yahweh and describing Israel's infidelity was intended to make Israel's guilt clear. The Quartodeciman homilists, in particular *Melito of Sardis, adapted such indictment, making particular use of Jeremiah's indictment regarding the breaking of the covenant (Jer 2:4-13; 6:16-21 and 9:1-26). The recurrence of the old sins of Israel (infidelity) were recalled, along with the futility, or rather the falsity, of their worship no longer linked to the covenant. In the Quartodeciman vision, Christ, to free humans from their suffering, must suffer, but Israel is blamed for that suffering. The ingratitude of Israel to Jesus Christ after the disappearance of the anti-Jewish polemic became the topos of human ingratitude toward God, and those are the Lamentations (Improperia) of the Lord in the liturgy of the adoration of the cross on Good Friday.

L. Brou, Les impropères du Vendredi Saint: Revue Grégorienne 20 (1935) 161-179; 21 (1936) 8-16; 22 (1937) 1-9 and 44-51; V. Grossi, Melitone di Sardi, Perì Pascha 72-99, 523-763. Sull'origine degli Improperia nella liturgia del Venerdì Santo, in Dimensioni drammatiche della liturgia medievale, Rome 1977, 203-216.

V. Grossi

INCARNATION. Patristic theology formed the concept of the incarnation following the writings of John (Jn 1:14; 1 Jn 4:2). The noun σάρκωσις, though already used by *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. III, 18,3; 19,1) and by the C. Noetum (16), becomes widely used only in the 2nd half of the 4th c. during the *Apollinarian controversy (see Lampe 1224). The same is true of the Latin version incarnatio (see Braun, Deus, 302). Since the NT points to the same reality with a number of other expressions (see esp. Phil 2:6-11; 1 Tim 3:16; 2 Tim 1:10), Christian authors, in turn, present it with a variety of words: ἐνανθρώπησις (see DS 125, Athanasius), ἐνσωμάτωσις (esp. Origen, see Liébaert, HDG 51), παρουσία, ἐπιδημία (most frequent term in Origen, see Harl, Origène, 205) etc. (see Orig., Princ. I praef. 4; for Tertull.: Braun, Deus, 298-326; Athan.: SC 199, 93-139). At the same time, they considered it from different points of view: as a historical event in being born of *Mary (see the creeds), as the assumption of human nature (see the theological formulations), as the continued existence of the Logos in the flesh (ἕνωσις, κρᾶσις), as the mystery of salvation in a global sense (οἰκονομία, Irenaeus, *Tertullian).

This diversity of expressions and approaches alone demonstrates the complexity and centrality of the mystery of the incarnation in patristic theology. On the one hand, it had a difficult time reconciling this paradox of the Christian faith with objections regarding the immutability of God, a fundamental tenet of Greek philosophy (see Aug., Ep. 137), while at the same time it confronted the need for a savior free from the contamination of human sinful flesh. (See the patristic exegesis of Rom 8:3 against *docetic trends, as well as the subject of the virgin birth.) It was no less difficult to explain the intimate union of God with a complete human nature—namely, the coexistence of two wills in the one Christ. From the 2nd to the 7th c., this christological controversy made use of many intellectual and religious forces (see *Christology). Particularly noteworthy is the position of *Origen (see Studer, Incarnation, 227-228). In the wake of Irenaeus he developed the distinction between the divine and human in Christ, but not without theological reflections that bring one to acknowledge the one Christ. It is a pity that his doctrine on the soul of Jesus was too ambiguous to be widely accepted, because it grasps the crucial point of the encounter between God-the-Creator and man-the-created in Christ. Equally interesting is the fundamental assertion of *Augustine that only the Son became incarnate (Trin. I, 4,7-8) (see B.E. Daley). It forms the basis of the doctrine on the *hypostatic union which was elaborated in subsequent debates between the followers of *Cyril of Alexandria and the defenders of the faith of *Chalcedon (see Grillmeier II/1 and II/2).

On the other hand, the wealth of biblical and philosophical terms with which the Fathers were trying to express the mystery of the incarnation makes it possible to understand how this doctrine is right at the center of the Christian faith, to which in a more or less explicit way all the other mysteries must relate. The following facts are of particular note: early on there was a shift from an apocalyptic reflection, which had opposed the resurrection of Christ to the parousia, to that comparing the incarnation of the preexisting Word with the final resurrection of the dead (see Cantalamessa, Problema cristologico, 155-160). It is already mentioned in *Ignatius of Antioch (cf. Eph. 7,2; 19) and *Justin (distinction between the two parousias). This theology of the incarnation established itself during the antignostic controversy, in which Irenaeus and *Tertullian defended the salus carnis, the salvation of the whole human precisely with the belief in the real incarnation of God (see Studer, Soteriologie, 73-85). In this context, the incarnation is also included as a condition for death and then the resurrection (see Tertull., Carn. 6,6-7) and as the basis of the new birth for Christians (see Tertull., Carn. 17,2). This "incarnational" realism will later be the necessary prerequisite for the theology of the sacrifice of the one Redeemer (see Lyonnet, Sin, 196; 250-251). Along the same line, the whole Christian life, not just its beginning in baptism and its end in the resurrection, is seen as an imitation of the incarnation of the Son of God. This basic theme, based esp. on the letter to the Philippians (2:5-11), has found its most eloquent expression in the Augustinian theology in which the humility of God, demonstrated in the incarnation (humanitas = humilitas), is the only way to overcome pride and arrive at the love of God and neighbor, i.e., true righteousness, and in which the same incarnation is the model of the absolute free character of divine grace, without which one cannot imitate the humility of Christ, persevering to the end (see Studer, Soteriologie, 156-174). No less important is the relationship the Fathers recognize between the incarnation of the Word and the church. This is demonstrated in particular in the texts of Origen and Augustine, who, against the background of 1 Cor 6:17 and Eph 5:31-32, explain using the same matrimonial language for both the incarnation, as the union of the Word with the flesh, and the church as a union between Christ and Christians (see Schmid, RivAC 2, 555-558). In the ecclesiological context, the comparison between the incarnation and the Eucharist, which can be found from Justin onward (1 Apol. 66), deserves to be mentioned in a special way. It is also worth noting the comparison *Nemesius makes of the union in human beings of the body and soul with the incarnation, while *Gregory of Nazianzus and Augustine do the opposite (cf. Grillmeier, Jesus, 574ff., 602). In conclusion, one may recall Origen's theology of the mystery, acc. to which, while all created things symbolize the Word of God, the incarnation appears as the summary of the whole economy of salvation (see Harl, Origène, 143,200-204). Thus patristic theology foreshadowed the modern theory that the incarnation of the Word is the model of the relationship between God and humanity—indeed, of every relationship between the Creator and his creation (Rahner).

J. Schmid, Brautschaft: RAC 2, 528-564; T. van Bavel, Recherches sur la christologie de s. Augustin, Fribourg 1954; M. Harl, Origène et la fonction révélatrice du Verbe incarné, Paris 1958; R. Braun, Deus Christianorum, Paris 1962; J. Liébaert, Christologie: HDG III/1a, Freiburg 1965; S. Lyonnet, Sin: Redemption and Sacrifice, Rome 1970; R. Cantalamessa, in Il problema cristologico oggi, Assisi 1973, 143-197; B. Studer, Soteriologie der Kirchenväter: HDG III/2a, Freiburg 1978; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche I. (Freiburg 1979), II/1 (1986), II/2 (1989); H. Stickelberger, Freisetzende Einheit. Über ein christologisches Grundaxiom bei Maximus Confessor und Karl Rahner, in Maximus Confessor, ed. F. Heniger - Chr. Schönborn, Fribourg 1982, 365-373; B. Studer, Gott und unsere Erlösung im Glauben der Alten Kirche, Düsseldorf 1985 (It., Fr., Eng. tr.); R. Williams, Jesus Christus, II: Alte Kirche: TRE 16 (1987) 726-745 (bibl.); G. Madec, Christus: AugL I/5-6 (1992) 845-908 (bibl.); B. Studer, Gratia Christi, Rome 1993, espec. 74-79, 110-119; P. Hünermann: LTK³ 5, 498ff.; B.E. Daley, Incarnation, in Augustine Through the Ages, ed. A. Fitzgerald, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 445ff. (bibl.); B. Studer, Incarnazione: Orig. Diz. (2000) 225-229 (bibl.); C. Gunton: RGG 4 (2001) 141-142.

B. Studer

INCENSE. Resinous substance that is burned, emitting a smoke with a pleasant smell. Also known and used for purposes of worship by all the peoples of antiquity, including the Greeks and Romans. Together with other perfumes, it was used by the Jews for worship in the Mosaic tabernacle (Ex 30:34) and later in the temple for the offerings (Lev 2, passim). It was introduced in the Christian liturgy at a relatively late date, due to the hostility toward anything that could recall the pagan rites: see the precise positions of *Tertullian (Apol. 30) and *Augustine (Enar. in ps. 49,14). This did not prevent the use of incense in funeral rites (see Tertull., Apol. 42), and generally it was considered a symbol of prayer (in relation to Ps 141[140]:2: "Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense") and of divine worship. We know that *Constantine gave to the Lateran Basilica incense burners to perfume the environment, but not for liturgical use, properly speaking (Lib. pont., ed. Duchesne, 227), see *Egeria on the use of incense to scent the air in the church of the Anastasis in Jerusalem (Peregr.: CSEL 39, 73). It is believed that the use of incense in the liturgy began to establish itself in both East and West at the end of the 4th c.

DACL V, 2-21; EC VI, 1753-1755; LTK³ 10, 1024-1025 (Weikrauch); M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, I, Milan 1964, 390-394; B. Caseau, Euodia: The Use and Meaning of Fragrances in the Ancient World and Their Christianization (100-900), Ann Arbor, MI 1994.

F. Scorza Barcellona

INCEST. The Latin term is formally the opposite of castum. The debate on the exact definition of incestum lasted for many centuries. In principle, it is an impure relationship with respect to what is fas (lawful): incest was described as sexual intercourse between certain family members or, as another example, with a vestal virgin. Regarding the former, with the great frequency or even prescription of certain types of endogamous marriages in the Rome of the Republican and archaic period, the range of incest within the family, although sanctioned by imperial laws with the penalty of deportatio in insulam for the honestiores and verberatio for humiliores but without penalty for the woman (Paulus, Sent. 2,26,15), was restricted to the closest degrees of relationship. New and different rules for the prohibition of marriage between blood relatives for the Christians came with the OT (Lev 18). That these restrictions of Jewish origin were extended to Christian converts from paganism is clear from Acts 15:20 and 29, where they are mentioned under the name of *fornication/porneia. Crimes of incest were also included in the latter technical term that includes all crimes in the whole area of sexuality; see the use of the word in 1 Cor 5:1-5. Some canons of councils, from the 4th c. onward, prohibit marriage between persons united by ties of affinity: Elvira (ca. 300) can. 61 and 66, Neocaesarea (between 314 and 325) can. 2, Orleans (511) can. 18, Epaone (517) can. 30, and others. These canons formulate bans and prescribe penances, but only Epaone requires the separation of the people involved, while Orleans 538 makes an exemption when there is no prior knowledge of the ban. The canons of Basil prohibit marriage between brothers- and sisters-in-law (23: requiring the separation of the couple; 78), between brother and sister (67: imposes the same penance as for murder; 75,79), prohibition extended to all the degrees of consanguinity (68: same punishments as for adultery), between stepchildren and the widow of the father (stepmother).

Ph. Moreau, Plutarque, Augustin, Lévy-Strauss. Prohibition de l'inceste et mariage préférentiel dans la Rome primitive: RBPh 56 (1978) 41-54; T. Cornell, Some Observations on the "Crimen incesti": Le délit religieux dans la cité antique, Table ronde, Rome, 6-7 avril 1978, Paris 1981, 27-37; Y. Thomas, Mariages endogamiques à Rome. Patrimoine, pouvoir et parenté depuis l'époque archaïque: RD 58 (1980) 345-382; Ph. Moreau, Le mariage dans les degrés rapprochés: le dossier romain I siècle av. J.-C. – III siècle ap. J.-C., in P. Bonte (ed.), Épouser au plus proche: inceste, prohibitions et stratégies matrimoniales autour de la Méditerranée, Paris 1994, 59-78; C.S. De Vos, Stepmothers, Concubines and the Case of Porneia in 1 Corinthians 5: NTS 44 (1998) 104-114.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

INCORRUPTIBILITY. The terms ἀφθαρσία and ἀθανασία do not appear in the Septuagint, but only in the books of Wisdom and 4 Maccabees. Humanity is made for incorruptibility (Wis 6:17-19). St. Paul places himself in this sapiential tradition (ἀφθαρσία: Rom 2:7; 1 Cor 15:42; Eph 6:24; 2 Tim 1:10; ἀθανασία: Rom 1:23; 1 Cor 9:25; 1 Tim 1:17; 1 Pet 1:4, 23; 3:4). Immortality and incorruptibility are attributes of the "incorruptible God" (Rom 1:23), who "alone is immortal" (1 Tim 6:16); whereas humanity, who was created to be incorruptible, was doomed to corruption on account of sin (Wis 2:23; Rom 1:23; 8:21; 1 Cor 15:42-54; 2 Cor 4:16; Gal 6:8; Eph 4:22; 2 Pet 1:4; 2:12). Therefore, the resurrection of Christ brings new hope for the resurrection of the body: this is the kerygma of 1 Cor 15. Because of Christ, who has been preserved from corruption (Acts 2:27, 31; 13:34-37), humanity may one day, through the word of the living God (Wis 6:19; 1 Pet 1:18, 23; 3:4), inherit incorruptibility (Rom 2:7; 1 Cor 9:25; 15:42-54; Eph 6:24; 2 Tim 1:10; 1 Pet 1:14).

1. The early church attached great importance to the gift of immortality and incorruptibility, synonymous with eternal life. The author of the 2 Clement called Christ "Savior and founder of incorruptibility" (2 Cl. 20,5). Incorruptibility is a key term of the theology of *Irenaeus of Lyons (see P. Reynders, Lexique de l'Adversus haereses de S. Irénée, Louvain 1954; M. Aubineau, Incorruptibilité et Divinisation selon saint Irénée: RSR 44 [1956] 25-52 and A. Orbe, Homo vivens: Gregorianum 73 [1992] 205-268).

Y. de Andia has taken this term as the main theme of the anthropology of Irenaeus of Lyons (Homo vivens. Incorruptibilité et divinisation selon Irénée de Lyon: Études Augustiniennes, Paris 1986). Human perfection is conducted through a progression to incorruptibility (Adv. Haer. IV, 38,1-4), acc. to a certain "order": to the Father through the Son, "the Incorruptible Word" (Adv. Haer. III, 19.1), in the Spirit. Indeed, it is through union to immortality and incorruptibility (Adv. Haer. III, 18,7; 19,1-3; 20,1-2) that humanity participates in them both, and it is through the Spirit that the "pledge" of incorruptibility is given in the sacraments, and esp. the Eucharist. Finally, the vision of the Father grants incorruptibility (Adv. Haer. IV, 38,3). "The teaching on the resurrection of the body then emerges in its truth and its strength. It is this doctrine that we, for our part, believe in: God, by resurrecting our mortal bodies which will have undergone judgment, will make them incorruptible and immortal" (Adv. Haer. II, 29,2). Against the *gnostics who say that, based on the verse of 1 Cor 15:53, "Flesh and blood cannot inherit incorruptibility," Irenaeus gives an exegesis of 1 Cor 15. The theological argument of Irenaeus is based on "the power of God"—the God of the gnostics, who does not resurrect the body is, for Irenaeus, "devoid of power"!—and bases his philosophical argument on the change of "qualities" (the corruptible becomes incorruptible) within the identity of the "substance."

2. After Nicaea, the deification of humanity is no longer mainly expressed through participation in incorruptibility. *Gregory of Nyssa shows, in his treatise on virginity, the relationship between virginity and incorruptibility.

3. The question of the incorruptibility of Christ's body after death was posed by St. *Augustine in his Letter 205 of October 420: "The divine power can therefore give bodies the visible and sensitive qualities that it wants without providing them all; it can put mortal members into an unalterable strength, so that they maintain their outward appearance without preserving their corruption; it is the same image without mortality."

4. The incorruptibility of the body of Christ was also established by *Athanasius: "Because of the descent in him of the Logos, the body does not corrupt acc. to the law of his nature; through the indwelling of the Logos of God, it is wholly devoid of corruption" (De Incarnatione 20,4, SC 199, 338-339; see also Contra Arianos III, PG 26, 444 C; De tridui spatio, Epistula III, and l'Adversus Apollinarium. See the studies of J. Lebourlier, À propos de l'état du Christ dans la mort: RSPh 67 (1963) 161-180 and of M. Canévet, La mort du Christ et le mystère de sa personne humano-divine dans la théologie du IVᵉ siècle: Quatre Fleuves 15-16 [1982] 71-92).

5. In the 5th c., the *aphthardocetist dispute (see M. Jugie, Eutychès. Eutychianisme: DTC 5,2, Paris 1924) caused *Severus of Antioch and *Julian of Halicarnassus to dispute the corruptibility of the body of Christ. The name "aphthardocetist" given to Julian, Gaianus and their followers, was an abusive term because they could not be accused of *docetism, having never denied the passibility of Christ during his mortal life. Their mistake was to believe that this passibility was a perpetual miracle because the body of Christ had every right to incorruptibility; this could be interpreted as a denial of the consubstantial nature of Christ's body with ours and, therefore, as a Eutychian *monophysitism. Julian, however, always denied being a disciple of Eutyches.

M. Jugie, Eutychès. Eutychianisme: DTC 5,2, Paris 1924; P. Reynders, Lexique de l'Adversus haereses de S. Irénée, Louvain 1954; M. Aubineau, Incorruptibilité et Divinisation selon saint Irénée: RSR 44 (1956) 25-52; J. Lebourlier, À propos de l'état du Christ dans la mort: RSPh 67 (1963) 161-180; M. Canévet, La mort du Christ et le mystère de sa personne humano-divine dans la théologie du IVᵉ siècle: Quatre Fleuves 15-16 (1982) 71-92; Y. de Andia, Eucharistie et incorruptibilité: Revue thomiste 85 (1985) 464-479; Id., Homo vivens. Incorruptibilité et divinisation selon Irénée de Lyon: Études Augustiniennes, Paris 1986; A. Orbe, Homo vivens: Gregorianum 73 (1992) 205-268.

Y. de Andia

INCUBATIO. The incubatio (Gk. ἐκοίμησις) was a divinatory and medical practice typical of the pagan world, which was inherited also in Christian culture. It consisted in sleeping in a temple with the purpose of having dreams, to be interpreted by the priests the day after, and being healed (see, e.g., Strabo 11,7,1; 16,2,35). It was esp. in sanctuaries of Asclepius, the so-called Asclepieia, or of Isis, that the incubatio took place: there were special rooms devoted to this practice, where patients would sleep, generally after purifying baths, fasting and sacrifices. For example, at Oropus, at the sanctuary of Amphiaraus, they had to fast one day and abstain from wine, and Pausanias (1,34,5) attests that the sacrifice of a ram was required; then one had to sleep upon its skin.

Plutarch (Cons. ad Apoll. 14,109C) designates the incubatio in a sanctuary as ἐγκοιμᾶσθαι καὶ ἰδεῖν ὄψιν ("sleeping inside and having a vision/a dream"), which could be done even on behalf of someone else, as in the case of two friends of Alexander the Great, who slept in a temple of Serapis instead of him during his last illness (Arr. Exp. Alex. 3,26,2; Plut. Alex. 76). Virgil (Aen. 7,81-101) describes the incubatio practiced by Daunus, Lavinia's father, who was doubtful about who would be the best husband for his daughter. He offered a sheep sacrifice, slept on the skin and received the apparition of Faunus, who advised him to give his daughter to Aeneas. In the same passage Virgil also says that Latinus too used to sacrifice sheep in that same place and sleep on their skins in order to get a response. In Sparta there was a temple of Pasiphae where divination through dreams was practiced. But the incubatio also took place in the temples of Zeus in Dodona (already attested in the Iliad, 16,235), of Mopsus in Mallus in Cilicia (Plut. De orac. def. 5,412A), of Pallas Hygeia in *Athens near the entrance to the Acropolis (Plut. Per. 13), etc. Accius in his Brutus (ap. Cic. Div. 1,44) described a dream of Tarquinius Superbus involving the sacrifice of a ram and a sort of incubatio, then the interpretation of the vision. Diodorus Siculus (1,53) ascribes the practice of incubatio in sanctuaries (ἡ ἐγκοίμησις ἡ ἐν τοῖς ἱεροῖς), aimed at knowing the future, to an Egyptian princess.

The most complete description of several Asclepieia comes from four orations by Aelius Aristides, who visited them during seventeen years in the 2nd c. AD in hopes of recovering his health, and practiced purifying baths and the incubatio; he also describes many persons who frequented such sanctuaries. In the late 4th c. Jerome, In Isaiam 65, speaks of pagan incubatio as still existing in his day: in delubris idolorum . . . stratis pellibus hostiarum incubare soliti erant, ut somnis futura cognoscerent. Quod in fano Aesculapii usque hodie error celebrat ethnicorum multorumque aliorum.

In Christianity, the incubatio was practiced above all by *Montanists, who were convinced that dreams and visions, inspired by the Spirit, would complete the NT revelation. They used fasting, prayer and incubatio in order to facilitate them. Epiphanius (Panarion 49,1) reports that in *Pepuza, a Phrygian town, one of their prophetesses, Quintilla or Priscilla, during her sleep was visited by Christ in a vision: he looked like a woman, infused wisdom into her, and revealed to her that Pepuza was a holy place, where the heavenly Jerusalem had descended. From then on, both men and women practiced the incubatio there, in hopes of receiving a vision of Christ. Tertullian (De Anima 48,3) is a witness to the practice of fasting before the incubatio: apud oracula incubaturis ieiunium indicitur, and he also attests to the opposite phenomenon, of a deity that prevented people from dreaming during the incubatio: Aristoteles heroem quendam Sardiniae notat incubatores fani sui uisionibus priuantem (De Anima 49,2).

But also outside Montanist and *Donatist groups, the practice of incubatio is attested in Christianity, esp. in some particular places, such as the Cave of St. Michael at Mount St. Angel (Gargano, Puglia), or the Michaelion close to *Constantinople, at Hestiae, as we know from *Sozomen (HE II 3,9-12), who also recounts episodes of incubatio there resulting in a healing, either physical or spiritual. Similar episodes are attested for the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, where *Porphyry of Gaza was healed, and for the tomb of St. Euthymius in Palestine.

Sogni, visioni e profezie nell'antico Cristianesimo. XVII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Augustinianum 29 (1989); G. Otranto - C. Carletti, Il santuario di San Michele Arcangelo sul Gargano dalle origini al X secolo, Bari 1990; Id., Culto e insediamenti micaelici nell'Italia meridionale, Bari 1994; B. Näf, Traum und Traumdeutung im Altertum, Berlin 2004; P. Grossmann, Late Antique Christian Incubation Centres in Egypt, in Salute e guarigione nella Tarda Antichità, ed. H. Brandenburg, S. Heid, C. Markschies, Vatican City 2007, 125-140; T. Lehmann, Felix medicus ed Ambrosius medicus. Vescovi, santi ed i luoghi di salvezza e guarigione fra IV e V secolo, ibid. 149-164; C. Markschies, Gesund werden im Schlaf – Einige Rezepte aus der Antike, ibid., 165-198; R. Teja, Cultos y ritos terapéuticos cristianos en la hagiografía de Oriente, in Cristo e Asclepio: culti terapeutici e taumaturgici nel mondo Mediterraneo antico tra cristiani e pagani, ed. E. Dal Covolo - G. Sfameni Gasparro, Rome: LAS 2008, 129-159: 138-145.

I. Ramelli

INDEX OLEORUM. A list of names (notula) of Roman martyrs made (it is theorized) by a certain John, as it appears in the subscription: Iohannis (sic) indignus peccator. It is not impossible that he himself collected in individual vials portions of the oil from the lamps that burned at the graves of the martyrs in Rome. To each of the ampules were affixed the so-called pittacia, pieces of papyrus, on which was written the name of the martyr. According to the subscription, all the ampules were given as a gift at the time of *Gregory the Great to Queen Theodolinda, residing in Monza. These signs of Christian piety are kept today in the cathedral treasury of Monza: sixteen are still extant. The catalog of the names of the martyrs, even if of little value in relation to the topography of ancient Rome, is now considered an equally important document, although it is now considered a copy completed after the age of Gregory the Great and prepared, moreover, not in Rome, but at Monza.

L.A. Muratori, Anecdota latina, II, Milan 1698, 191-192; A. Sepolcri, I papiri della basilica di Monza: Archivio storico lombardo, s. 3a, 30 (1903) 241-262; R. Valentini - G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma, II, Rome 1942, 29-47; DACL 11, 2752-2761 (Monza); EC 6, 1799; Fliche-Martin V (1970) 523-524, n. 22.

L. Dattrino

INDICTION. The term is derived from indicere (to declare, proclaim, announce, or call an assembly; Gr.: epinemēsis); the indictio was the declaration of an extraordinary tax, a fiscal imposition. In the most ancient period, an extraordinary requisition of goods in nature (e.g. grain; annona), levied upon the possessors of provincial lands (Daremberg 2,468). With the intent of rationalizing the tax system, *Diocletian introduced the yearly indictiones extraordinariae (they had been arbitrary before); they were introduced in Egypt in 287, and then gradually in other provinces, with a five-year fiscal cycle (Jones, Il Tardo impero, 92-93; 174-175); starting in 312, the cycle was for fifteen years (Grumel, 192). From the time of *Constantine indictio was the law or edict by which the quantity of contribution (capitatio, iugatio) was imposed (indictio, indicta, indictum) annually. The edict was transmitted to the governors of the provinces, who then published it. In addition, the term indictio came to have a double sense: (1) a period of fifteen years, beginning in 312, introduced by Licinius and marked by the Chronicon Paschale;* the emperor *Justinian rendered it obligatory for dating official documents (Novella 47,2); (2) yet, above all, it was each fiscal year in the scope of the fifteen-year period (indictio) and always starting from 312, i.e., the number of indictions in the midst of the fifteen-year cycle. A calculation does not exist of the successive indictiones, understood as fifteen-year periods. Such a system was imposed immediately for dating documents: e.g., *Athanasius begins to use it already in 329 (II i.) in the festal letters (see A. Camplani, Atanasio di A., Lettere festali, Milan 2003, 221). Thus, in this sense, the year 313 is the first indictio, the year 314 the second indictio, 315 the third, and so on; after the fifteenth year, it started over from the beginning. The system was used during the entire Middle Ages and was the most precise for dating, but it was not absolute, and thus to translate it into dates one had to make reference to other systems or facts. Some think the beginning is 313, but it depends on the manner of counting. There also exists a variation in the days which begin and end the indictio: (1) Byzantine indiction (Constantinian or of Constantinople): initially this went from 23 September (Natalis Augusti, the ancient Eastern commencement of the year, in some E provinces); in a later period, ca. 462, the beginning entered into effect on 1 September; the memory of the old beginning remained for a long time in the ecclesiastical year, which began 23 September in Byzantium (Grumel, 198-200); (2) in Egypt the date could vary in relation to the publication of the edict and of the harvest. For example, in 551 June of the fourteenth indiction in Egypt was the fifteenth indiction at Constantinople; (3) Bedan (of Bede, imperial or Western) indiction began 24 September; (4) Roman or pontifical indcition began 25 December. From the 11th c., it was the most observed in the West. From the time of Pope Gregory XIII (1572–1585) the indiciont began 1 January. Yet there are other commencement dates of the indiction which were used throughout the Middle Ages and by the tribunal of the Holy Roman Empire until its abolition (1806). Sometimes books on chronology still give the indictions to this day, for which 2014 would correspond to the seventh indiction (e.g., Lietz and Cappelli).

J. Gothofredus, Ad Codicem Theodosii, I, Lyon, CLXXIX-CLXXXII; ICR (1861) XVIIf.; A. Cappelli, Cronologia, cronografia e calendario perpetuo, Milan 1998, 5-6; CE 7, 467-468 (Grumel); EC 6, 1870-1871; E.J. Bickerman, Chronology of the Ancient World, London 1968, 78ff.; V. Grumel, La chronologie, Paris 1958, 192-206; A.H.M. Jones, Il Tardo impero (284-602 d.C.), Milan 1973; R.S. Bagnall - K.A. Worp, Chronological Systems of Byzantine Egypt, Leiden [2]2004.

A. Di Berardino

INFINITY – INFINITUDE. In Greek philosophy infinitude was generally not valued, as it was associated with indeterminacy. Finitude, and thus limitedness, was associated with the idea of order and perfection. This conception, which has its roots in Pythagoreanism, Parmenides and *Plato (whereas a more positive idea of infinitude was held by Anaximander, Anaxagoras, the atomists and Epicurus), found its paradigmatic expression in *Aristotle, acc. to whom nothing which has no limit (peras) is perfect, and the limit is the end (telos). According to Aristotle, there can exist nothing actually infinite, but only potentially. According to *Philo, on the contrary, God is infinite, and this notion, which is related to the biblical idea of the omnipotence of God, was taken up esp. by *Origen and by *Gregory of Nyssa. But their positive concept of infinitude has a precise correspondent in *Plotinus and in *Neoplatonism, and this is one of the many remarkable correspondences between Origen and Plotinus. For Plotinus, the One is characterized by an infinite power and richness. This is also why, acc. to Plotinus, it is impossible to grasp the One: “It is ridiculous to try to grasp and comprehend [περιλαμβάνειν] what is infinite by nature” (Enn. V 5,6,15). Likewise for Gregory of Nyssa it is impossible to grasp the Godhead because of its infinity.

Gregory is unequivocal in stating that “the Godhead is infinite” (Or. cat. 10). Infinitude is the mark and peculiarity of God vis-à-vis all creatures, both intelligible and sense-perceptible; God is the only being who is uncreated, and therefore also the only being who is infinite (C. Eun. III, vi, p. 209,19-21; iii, pp. 107-108; i, pp. 105-106). In his sixth homily on the Song of Songs, p. 174, however, infinitude is ascribed to “the intelligible and immaterial substance” as opposed to the sense-perceptible and material one, which is “included within given limits.”

God’s infinity, acc. to Gregory, is characterized by an infinite extension in time and by the immutability and infinity of the various traits that we humans ascribe to God. God’s infinitude is made possible by the absence of a principle that is equal and opposite to God, a feature that is typical of dualistic systems like *Manicheism. Such a principle would constitute a limitation of God. Once again, this concept is very close to that of Plotinus, who describes the One as lacking every dimension and number, in that it precedes numbers and is endowed with an infinite power (Enn. VI 9,6,10; V 5,10,19-23;11,1-4). Plotinus explains, like Gregory afterward, that the infinity of the One's power derives from the absence of any other equal principle which could limit it. These details are very close to those offered by Gregory of Nyssa (C. Eun. I 231-236). Gregory also develops the notion of God's temporal infinitude, or better of God's transcendence in respect to time, which is a διάστημα, i.e., a dimension, typical only of creatures (C. Eun. I 362-364). The Creator is eternal and never had origins, unlike creatures. Similarly, Plotinus maintained that time pertains to the world soul, whereas the One and the Nous transcend time (Enn. III 7,3-4). The temporal infinity of God, or better God's transcending time, was already maintained by Origen (Princ. IV 4,1: only the *Trinity transcends every χρόνοι and every αἰών, whereas all the rest is measured against time and duration).

There is a close relationship between the idea of the infinitude of God and apophaticism. The Godhead, insofar as it is infinite, escapes every definition and delimitation, and every discursive knowledge which proceeds through definitions. Indeed, for Gregory, God's infinitude implies God's incomprehensibility, as the divine exceeds the limits of human intellect (C. Eun. I 364,369,373) and can be grasped only through faith (ibid., I 371).

This concept was already present in Origen and even in *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. V 12,81-82). Apophaticism is ultimately grounded in God's infinity and indeterminacy; for it is impossible for humans to apply any ὅρος, any limit or definition, to God. As Gregory explains in Ad Ablabium, God's nature is impossible to define and comprehend (ἀόριστον, ἀπερίληπτον), as its infinitude (ἀπειρία) eludes every definition and delimitation. Likewise, commenting on the Song of Songs, Gregory affirms that God's infinite nature (ἀόριστον) cannot be encompassed in the meaning of a name. All good that may be conceived about it resolves itself into infinity and indeterminacy; it remains indeterminate in the good and has no limit in itself.

Gregory's own conception of ἐπέκτασις entirely depends on the notion of God as infinite. Every soul is destined to elevation and infinite development, by always increasingly participating in divine Good (De An. 105AD), because the Good, who is God, "proceeds toward infinity" (ibid., 97A). This idea is also stressed in the fifth homily on the Song of Songs. God is the Good, and nothing can limit it, as evil is limited itself; as a consequence, the soul who participates in this Good experiences an infinite progression. The eighth homily is entirely focused on the theme of ἐπέκτασις as an infinite growth of the soul toward God's infinite nature, which remains always further and ungraspable.

*Hilary of Poitiers, who was deeply influenced by Origen, in his Trin. presents God as infinite in space, time and power, basing himself on Ex 3:14; Is 40:12; and Is 66:1-2. Hilary speaks of an infinitas potens of God. As for Origen himself, he surely considered at least God's wisdom to be infinite (ἀπέραντος). Even if one remains skeptical concerning two passages, Sel. in Ps. 144 (PG 12,1673) and Fr. in Ps. 70,14 and 138,7, at least another passage is surely authentic: C. Cels. III 77, in which Origen describes God as infinite and unlimited (τῷ ἀπείρῳ). In De Or. 27,16 God is said to be ἐξ ἀπείρων ἐπ' ἄπειρον. This also makes the authenticity of Sel. in Ps. 144 more likely, where it is declared that "there is no limit to God's greatness" (οὐκ ἔστι πέρας τῆς μεγαλοσύνης αὐτοῦ) and God's providence extends ἐξ ἀπείρου ἐπ' ἄπειρον. Gregory of Nyssa will echo this in his Antirrh. adv. Apol. GNO III/1,156: "The greatness of God's power extends up to infinity"; in C. Eun. III 3,68: "the infinity of divine power"; and Ep. 3,20: "The power of the divinity is something infinite and impossible to measure."

It is on the basis of God's infinitude that it was possible to support the thesis of the ontological priority of the Good over evil. This is particularly clear in Gregory of Nyssa. In Vit. Mos. 5,5 he can affirm that virtue has no limit "because all that is good, by its very nature, has no limit." Gregory argues on the basis of the infinitude of God-Good and the finitude of evil that it will be impossible for any creature to advance in evil or remain in evil forever; for evil is limited, and once one has reached its utmost depth, one cannot but return back again to the Good, which is unlimited and has no end, because the Good is God. Moreover, since evil is pure negativity, it will not exsist forever, but will disappear, acc. to its own nature, which is nonexistence. For evil is no creature of God, but only the result of an error, of a bad choice of the free will of rational creatures. In De hom. op. 21, Gregory opposes the immutability (τὸ ἀμετάθετον) of God's will, which is always in the Good, to the mutability (τὸ τρεπτόν) of human will, which cannot stably remain in evil forever. He argues that, since evil is limited, an infinite progression in evil is impossible: "Therefore, after the utmost culmination of evil, there comes again the Good . . . even though we had crossed the boundary of evilness and had arrived at the apex of the shadow of sin, we shall return again to living in the light." A variant of this argument, based on the (very Origenian) notion of κόρος is expounded by Gregory of Nyssa in De mortuis (esp. in § 19 Lozza).

That human will may persist in evil forever is impossible, in that the desire for evil generates κόρος. Only the desire for the Good can endure eternally, because it produces satisfaction and contentment rather than κόρος.

God's infinity was held by *Gregory of Nazianzus as well (Or. 6,22; 38,7). He ascribes to God infinity in time (Or. 38,7-8), but this is only an aspect of God's general infinity. He too argues on the basis of Ex 3:14, and assimilates God to "an ocean of Being, infinite and unlimited." Gregory of Nazianzus also grounds apophaticism in the conception of God as infinite, and thus ungraspable (e.g., in Or. 38,7).

The notion of the soul's love for God as an infinite progression is taken up by *John Climacus, who in his Ladder 30,197-201 defines love as "an eternal progression."

E. Mühlenberg, Die Unendlichkeit Gottes bei Gregor von Nyssa, Göttingen 1966; T. Boehm, Theoria – Unendlichkeit – Aufstieg, Leiden 1996; C. Apostolopoulos, Aoriston, Platon 51 (1999–2000) 109-188; I. Ramelli, Gregorio di Nissa Sull'anima e la resurrezione, Milan 2007; Id., Apofatismo cristiano e relativismo pagano: un confronto tra filosofi platonici, in Verità e mistero fra tradizione greco romana e multiculturalismo tardo antico, ed. A.M. Mazzanti, Bologna 2009, 101-169.

I. Ramelli

INITIATION, CHRISTIAN. The modern concept of Christian initiation refers to the unity between the sacraments of *baptism, confirmation and *Eucharist; in its largest sense, it can also include the catechumenal process of integration into the Christian life. In the Fathers, however, Christian initiation is not seen as the *catechumenate, but it refers to sacramental rites by which one receives the baptismal washing, the *Holy Spirit and the Eucharist; in this manner the catechumen becomes initiated. Nevertheless, one cannot speak of three distinct sacraments in the patristic era, because the whole was integrated in one liturgical moment.

We find the Latin term initiatio in reference to the Christian rites already in *Tertullian (Apol. 7,7). In *Alexandria, *Clement and *Origen use the Greek vocabulary of initiation: μυστήριον, τελετή, μυέω, μυσταγωγέω. Yet, given the link between this terminology and that of the mystery religions, normally the Fathers avoided it and sought to distinguish the Christian rites from the pagan mysteries; *Justin (1 Apol., 54,6; 66,4) and Tertullian (De praesc. haeret. 40,1-4; Bapt. 5) attribute the analogies to the work of demons. In the catechesis of the 4th and 5th c. the vocabulary of initiation developed, at least that used by *Ambrose and *John Chrysostom in a sacramental sense. In the preaching of *Augustine and in his anti-*Donatist writings we do not find this term, but in other works the verb initiare appears to be used in a sacramental sense (Conf. I, 11,17; Civ. Dei XV, 26,1).

Beyond the language, there are similarities with the mystery initiation in the Disciplina Arcani* and in other rites, but this does not mean that there is a dependence of one upon the others. The origin of the primitive rites of Christian initiation must be sought in baptismal practices and in the ritual meals of *Judaism, transformed acc. to Christian usage. One can gather from the NT that the first Christian communities received their new members through baptism, which was distinguished from the baptism of John, as it was linked to the reception of the Holy Spirit.

Baptism was the center of Christian initiation in the primitive church, but its administration was unthinkable without the gift of the Holy Spirit and communion of the body and blood of Christ. The ritual structure of this celebration was not homogeneous. In the West, at the beginning of the 3rd c. we find the presence of baptismal rites such as the signatio, the anointing and the laying on of hands; while, in the Syro-Palestine area, in the same era a prebaptismal anointing was practiced which was understood to confer the gift of the Holy Spirit. Even during the time of John Chrysostom, in *Antioch, there was no rite of postbaptismal anointing (see *catechesis; *catechumen – catechumenate; *baptism).

RAC I, 667-676; R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionem, Leipzig-Berlin 1910; F.J. Dölger, Antike und Christentum, II, Münster 1930, 57-69; V, 1935, 165-175; K. Prümm, Religionsgeschichtliches Handbuch, Freiburg 1943, 308-352; G. Kretschmar, Die Geschichte des Taufgottesdienstes in der alten Kirche, in Leiturgia V, Kessel 1970, 1-348; P.-M. Gy, La notion chrétienne d'initiation: La MaisonD 132 (1977) 33-54; H.M. Riley, Christian Initiation, Washington, DC, 1974; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du II^e au IV^e siècle, Spoleto 1988; C. Munier, Initiation chrétienne et rites d'onction (II^e-III^e siècles): RSR 64 (1990) 115-125; M.E. Johnson, The Rites of Christian Initiation, Collegeville, MN 1999, 1-158.

O. Jiménez

INNOCENT I, pope (d. 417). He belonged to the home environment of *Anastasius I (339–402) (see Jerome, Ep. 130,16). Innocent was called to govern the Roman church in a very difficult period: during his pontificate (402–417), the city of Rome was conquered (410) by *Alaric's troops, an event which had a profound effect on all, pagans and Christians alike; but Innocent acted as if he were indifferent to it (Ep. 36). At the same time the Latin church was shaken up by the first phases of the *Pelagian controversy. In such a grave situation, Innocent showed himself a vigorous defender of Roman primacy. He took up the ideas regarding it which were already traditional, developed them and defined them more precisely. His letters (ca. 36) attest to this. Among these letters, of particular importance are those addressed to some bishops of *Italy and *Gaul, in which Innocent takes positions on disciplinary questions, asserting the conformity of all churches of the West with the consuetudo of the church of Peter, which he demands to be the last resort for the causae maiores. Along the same political lines, he founded the apostolic vicariate of Thessalonica, whose bishop was treated as a Roman vicar (Ep. 1; 13; 17; 18). Responding in 417 with three letters (Ep. 29-31) to the same number, written by African bishops, regarding the Pelagian affair, Innocent did not hesitate to affirm the supreme authority of the Sedes Apostolica in doctrinal matters (Ep. 29,1; 30,2). Informed by *Theophilus of Alexandria about the deposition of *John Chrysostom and questioned by the same, Innocent took the side of the bishop of *Constantinople, breaking communion with both *Alexandria and with *Antioch, thereby defending the hierarchical order of the major apostolic sees (Ep. 7,3; 19; 24). Also notable are the positions he took on baptism administered by heretics (Ep. 2), on penance (Ep. 6 and 25) and on the canonicity of Sacred Scriptures (Ep. 13). An evaluation of all these interventions must carefully consider the different conditions of each of the addressees of the letters, their reactions, the rank of authority employed, the motives (the authority of Peter, synodal legislation, ideology of Roma aeterna), but also the ideas of that time concerning the communio fidei and the receptio of dogmatic definitions.

CPL 1641-1643ff., with special editions; PL 20, 463-608 (Coustant, 1721); PL 84, 657-658; PLS 1, 793-796; W. Marschall, Karthago und Rom, Stuttgart 1971, 127-150; M.R. Green, Pope Innocent I: Diss., Oxford 1973; O. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius, Stuttgart 1975, 116-133; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, passim; Patrologia III, 550-553 (bibl. prior to 1978); var. aus., Il primato del vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio, Vatican City 1989; LTK³ 5, 514-515; L. Dattrino, Sollecitudine pastorale di Innocenzo I: Lateranum 64 (1998) 221-225; RGG 4 (2001) 159-60; LACL (2002) 349-50.

B. Studer

INNOCENT of Maroneia (6th c.). He was the replacement for the bishop of *Philippi Demetrius, who was sick, at the time of the talks organized at the end of 532 or at the beginning of 533 by *Justinian at *Constantinople, for finding common ground between the orthodox and the *Severians. The Severian party had six delegates on its side. Two documents from Innocent have come down to us in a *Latin translation: the first is a treatise on the events that followed upon the condemnation of *Nestorius, of which Pope *John II made use and to whom it is implicitly directed (ACO 11, 4, 68-69). The other is a letter sent to Thomas, a priest of the church of *Thessalonica, on the development of the talks mentioned above. Innocent therein shows himself a complete supporter of Justinian's politics. He defends a mitigated formula of the epithet "one incarnate of the Trinity."

ACO IV, 2, Berlin 1914, XVI-XXVI.

M. van Esbroeck

INNOCENTS, Feast of the. The memorial of the children of Bethlehem below two years of age who were massacred by Herod in his attempt to eliminate the king of the Jews, of whose birth he had been informed by the magi (Mt 2), is connected to the celebration of the birth of Jesus in some homilies on Christmas from the 2nd half of the 4th c., such as those of *Gregory of Nazianzus (PG 36, 311-334), *Gregory of Nyssa (PG 46, 1127-1150) and in the *Nativity sermon attributed to *Optatus of Milevis (PLS 1, 288-294). But between the end of the 4th and the 1st half of the 5th c., in the West, it was also connected to the feast of the *Epiphany, wherever that solemnity was dedicated to the adoration of the magi, as it was in *Africa or at Rome (see, e.g., Aug., Sermones 199 and 202; Leo the Great, Tractatus 31-38). The first homiletic texts regarding the massacre of the innocents which are of secure attribution go back to the 5th c.: see Maximinus Arianus (Serm. 8, posterior to the Nativity sermon attributed to Optatus of Milevis, which is surely evoked); *Peter Chrysologus (Sermones 152-153); *Basil of Seleucia (Or. 37). It is supposed therefore that a proper Feast of the Holy Innocents was introduced during the course of the 5th c., at diverse times, depending on the different liturgical uses of various environments, fixed on 28 December in Africa and at Rome (see Kalendarium Ecclesiae Carthaginiensis, from the beginning of the 6th c.; Martyrologium hieronymianum, 6th–7th c.), 8 January in the Mozarabic rite (see the calendars published by M. Ferotin, Le liber ordinum, Paris 1905, 450-451) and in the East, for the most part, 29 December, as in the Synaxarium Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae of the 10th–11th c. (in other calendars 26 or 27 December: at Jerusalem, in the 5th c., 9 or 18 May, around the Feast of the Ascension, see PO 35, 72-73). There is a remarkable homiletic literature about the Holy Innocents, esp. in the Latin language, in which they are celebrated as the firstfruits of the martyrs.

DACL 7, 608-616; LTK[3] 10, 425 (Unschuldige Kinder); B. Botte, Les origines de la Noël et de l'Epiphanie. Étude historique, Louvain 1932; J. Leclerc, Aux origines du cycle de Noël: EphemLiturg 60 (1946); Chr. Mohrmann, Epiphanie: RSPh 37 (1953) 644-670 (= Études sur le latin des chrétiens, I, Rome 1961, 245-275); Innocents. IV. Culte. Cath 5, 1575-1676: BS 7, 819-823; P. Devos, Égérie à Bethlehem. Le 40e jour après Pâques à Jérusalem: AB 86 (1968) 87-108; F. Scorza Barcellona, La celebrazione dei santi Innocenti nell'omiletica latina dei secoli IV-VI: StudMed 3af., 15 (1974) 705-767; Id., La celebrazione dei santi Innocenti nell'omiletica greca: Bollettino della Badia greca di Grottaferrata, n.s. 29 (1975) 105-135 and 30 (1976) 73-101; J. Lemarié, Le Sermoin Mai 193 et l'origine de la fête des SS. Innocents en Occident: AB 39 (1981) 135-150.

F. Scorza Barcellona

INSTANTIUS (4th c.). The bishop Instantius clung to the teaching of *Priscillian and, to support his activity and to give it more authority, together with his colleague Salvianus, consecrated him bishop of Avila. Struck by Gratian's decree against the *Manicheans, which was worded so broadly as to include Priscillian and his followers, he went into exile, so that he could not reenter *Spain thereafter until the annulment of *Gratian's decree. Instantius was denounced, along with Priscillian, at the Council of *Bordeaux (384); he was deposed from his episcopal see and thereupon, after Priscillian's condemnation to death, was exiled to the Isles of Scilly, close to Cornwall.

The theory of G. Morin that attributes to Instantius the authorship of anonymous writings passed down by a MS of Würzburg and published by G. Schepss in 1889 (CSEL 18) has not received widespread acceptance; recently H. Chadwick upheld the Priscillian authorship of many of these writings. The attribution of the De Trinitate fidei catholicae is uncertain and is to be placed, perhaps, among a Priscillianist circle.

CPL 785, 788; G. Morin, Pro Instantio. Contre l'attribution à Priscillien des opuscules du manuscrit de Würzburg: RBen 30 (1913) 153-173; M. Hartberger, Instantius oder Priscillian?: ThQ 95 (1913) 401-430; E. Buonaiuti, Instanzio o Priscilliano?: RivScRel 1 (1916) 41-53; J. Martin, Priscillianus oder Instantius?: HJ 47 (1927) 237-251; H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976; V. Burrus, The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1995, passim.

S. Zincone

INSTITUTUM NERONIANUM. It is difficult to specify exactly what kind of legal foundation the first phase of the persecutions against the Christians by the Roman Empire had (from the year AD 64 until 250), inasmuch as the historical sources are confusing regarding the subject. Some scholars have held to the existence of a general law against the Christians, which *Tertullian (Ad nationes 1,7,9) calls the Institutum Neronianum, but, in reality, it does not seem correct to speak of a repressive law against the Christians during the first two centuries. The document known as the Institutum Neronianum must not be considered as the legal basis of an anti-Christian policy of the successive emperors, but rather it responded to the Neronian aim of dispelling from his person the insistent accusations which fell upon him after the great fire of Rome (AD 64). In this manner, the measures adopted by Nero affected not only Christians but also representatives of other religious and philosophical sects, such as—basically—an entire series of the socially disaffected and destitute (vagabonds, beggars etc.), who were integrated into the urban population.

J. Moreau, La persécution du christianisme dans l'empire romain, Paris 1956, 65-74; P. Keresztes, The Imperial Roman Government and the Christian Church I: From Nero to the Severi: ANRW II.1.23 (1974) 247-310; N. Santos Yanguas, Cristianismo e imperio romano durante el siglo I, Madrid 1991, 36-57.

A. Viciano

INTERCESSION. In Roman law there was the legal institution of intercessio, which, in public law, consisted of a magistrate's veto against someone else (e.g., in the Republican period, a consul against his colleague by the principle of the par potestas; or by a tribune of the plebs. In the 4th c. Christian intercessio and asylum in the churches became important: these are two distinct practices, even though they were often complementary. Intercessio consisted in the intervention with the authorities in favor of someone in difficulty (not a simple recommendation, as often happened). Though this was not a true legal institution in the technical sense, it was acc. to the traditional Roman practice (Gaudemet, 282). The intercessio was efficacious if the authority of the mediator was recognized and respected by the authorities concerned with the matter. The Christian clergy by this time enjoyed an authority in the name of religion and not only by the figure of the intercessor as such, even if personal prestige had its importance (e.g., *Augustine, *Ambrose etc.). Someone intervened to abolish or to delay a sentence, or to give room for the amendment of the guilty; such an intervention posed legal, moral and practical problems. Augustine elaborated his teaching on the issue and gave his responses above all in his letter to Macedonius (Ep. 152 and 153). Augustine considered it an episcopal duty (officii sacerdotii nostri esse dicamus intervenire pro reis, Ep. 153,1; intercessionis officio, Ep. 151,2). In the case of the murder of Marcellinus and his brother by the count Marinus, who feared that the intervention of the church would impede it (Ep. 151), the church's intervention was shown to be necessary. *Synesius of Cyrene refused the request of a certain Alexander, who adulterated wine and was arrested for fraud and put in prison (Ep. 121), because acc. to him the guilty had to be punished to purify the city.

The intercessio was born from the Christian concept of pardon in view of the reformation of the guilty. Asylum (ad ecclesiam confugere), however, consisted in receiving and protecting someone in a place held to be sacred: it was the special quality of the place that had to guarantee safety to whoever wished to make use of it. Intercessio and asylum were distinct practices, for which reason there could be a case, as sometimes occurred, in which only intercessio was invoked (if someone was in prison, in exile etc.) or in which asylum alone was granted. Still, asylum—if it allowed the fugitive to escape—normally involved also an intercessio before the authorities, in favor of the fugitive. The Council of *Serdica in 343, speaking of asylum in a church, also spoke of intercessio: "It is an honest thing that the bishops advance intercessio (episcopi intercessionem praestant) for those who are oppressed unjustly, for the poorly treated widow, or for the orphan who was spoiled of his goods" (can. 7). Also, as the person who took refuge in church—so it was thought—could be innocent, then there was a time of protection which was useful for proving one's innocence. The greatest episcopal activity of intervention can be seen in matters of penal justice, partially because of the conviction of the corruption of the judges and of the system, which takes into account class differences and the consequent oppression of the poor, or also because of the punishments, considered excessive.

The bishops felt themselves obliged to intercede on behalf of the condemned: Ambrose (De off. 2,21,102; Expos. prol. 118,8,41; Ep. 25,3; 40,25; 51,6; 61-62), Possidius (Vita 19,6; 20,2), Augustine (Ep. 134,1,3; 151,2; 151-153; Sermo 302,17; 114). The monks, esp. in the East in general and at *Constantinople in particular, powerful by means of their social and political influence, were considered the guarantors of true justice for the protection of the poor. Some bishops, e.g., *Rabbula of Edessa, wished to reserve intervention before judges to the clergy alone (see Barone Adesi, 260-261). The imperial reaction to the excessive intrusion of the monks was to respond by prohibiting the monks from going to the city (CTh 16,3,1, successively revoked by CTh 16,3,2 and proposed again, with modifications, in CI 1,3,22). The imperial legislation on the subject only intended to limit the actual application of the custom of ecclesiastical intervention, or that of the monks. In 392 the emperor *Theodosius (CTh 9,40,15 from 13 March, and CTh 11,36,31, from 9 April) warned the judges to be solicitous in the application of punishment and not to offer the excuse of ecclesiastical intervention for their delays; therefore, ecclesiastics should not be allowed to impede the fulfillment of sentences, by appeal or removal of the condemned. The law CTh 11,36,31 did not admit intercessio of the clergy for someone condemned or for one who confessed his guilt. In 398 Arcadius (CTh 9,40,16) forbade the clergy and monks from removing the condemned from their punishment pro criminum immanitate or from retaining the condemned with themselves (asylum), but, for humanitarian motivations, it conceded an appeal for greater guarantees. Once the time for recourse had expired, other clerical interferences were not admitted. The bishops had the responsibility of controlling the monks in judiciary matters (Barone Adesi, 244ff.).

Daremberg-Saglio III, 548-556; J. Gaudemet, L'église dans l'Empire Romain, Paris 1958, 282-283; G. Dagron, Les moins et la ville. Le monachisme à Constantinople jusqu'au concile de Chalcedoine (451): Travaux et Mémoires 4 (1970) 229-276; M. Bianchini, Sui rapporti fra provocatio ed intercessio, in Studi in onore di G. Scherillo, I, Milan 1972, 93-110; M. Moreau, Le dossier Marcellinus dans Correspondence d'Augustin: RecAug 9 (1973) 3-18; G. Barone Adesi, Monachesimo ortodosso e diritto romano nel Tardoantico, Milan 1990; O. O'Donovan, Law, Moderation and Forgiveness: Gregorianum 82 (2001) 625-636.

A. Di Berardino

INTERCESSIONS, GENERAL (Oratio Fidelium). The Intercession, or oratio fidelium, takes place within the liturgy of the Word. *Justin locates it after the sermon given by the presider of the assembly: ἔπειτα ἀνιστάμεθα κοινῇ πάντες καί εὐχᾶς πέμπομεν (1 Apol. 67). In connection with the baptismal liturgy, he mentions the intentions for ourselves, for those who have been enlightened and that everyone, wherever they may be, may remain faithful to his knowledge of the truth (1 Apol. 65). In Justin's understanding, the prayer of the faithful takes on the role of the response of the assembly, as a petition, to the Word of God proclaimed in the readings and explained in the homily. *Hippolytus of Rome excludes the catechumens from the oratio fidelium and from the kiss of peace which follows, since these actions presume baptism (B. Botte, La Tradition apostolique, LQF 39, 40). *Tertullian lists the intentions of the oratio fidelium which concern the reader of his Apologeticum: Oramus pro imperatoribus, pro ministris eorum et potestatibus, pro statu saeculi, pro rerum quiete, pro mora finis (Apol. 39: CSEL 20, 91). The structure of the intercessions is different in East and West. *Serapion of Thmuis foresees two groups of prayers: one for the catechumens and the other for the faithful. In both, nonetheless, the intention is followed by a short prayer, similar to the structure of the Roman liturgy of Good Friday (Mohlberg, Liber sacramentorum, 65-67). In the eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions* we find three groups of intercessions in litany form. The first group concludes the liturgy of the Word and is recited by the catechumens, the penitents and the faithful in three separate groups. The deacon proposes the intention and the assembly responds Kyrie eleison. At the end, the bishop says the closing prayer and the faithful exchange the kiss of peace (Funk, Didascalia et Constit. Apostol., 478-495). The second group of intercessions comes after the epiclesis and the third before communion (ibid., 511-517).

In the West, the distinction was maintained between the intercessions for the catechumens and those for the baptized. *Prosper of Aquitaine demands that they be celebrated in the same way throughout the world, and lists the particular intentions for which the entire church prays, in obedience to the divine command: for the infidels, the heretics, the penitents and the catechumens (Auctoritates [Indiculus] de gratia 8: PL 51, 209-210). In *Africa, acc. to the witness of *Augustine, the prayer of the faithful comes after the homily; this is why many homilies of Augustine end with the invitation: Conversi ad Dominum (59 times; cf. Serm. 26: PL 38, 26; Serm. 34: ibid., 213; Serm. 100: ibid., 605; Serm. 141: ibid., 778). The structure is that of the liturgy of Good Friday in the Roman rite. From the 6th c. the oratio fidelium disappears from the Roman Mass, except for Good Friday. Pope *Gelasius suppressed it, substituting the litanies known as the deprecationes gelasianae which contain 19 intentions with the response Kyrie eleison (Capelle, Le Kyrie de la messe). The practice existed at Jerusalem for the Vespers, when, acc. to *Egeria, the deacon proclaimed the intentions and the children sang in response Kyrie eleison (Itinerarium: CSEL 39,72). Inspired by the Roman practice, probably derived from the East, *Caesarius of Arles, at the Council of *Vaison in Provence, decreed, ut in omnibus ecclesiis nostris ita tam sancta consuetudo et ad matutinum et ad missas et ad vesperas Deo propitio intromittatur (can. 3: MGH, Conc. Aev. Mer., 56-57). The Rule of St. *Benedict speaks of the litania for Lauds and Vespers, probably in the style of the Gelasian deprecatio (chs. 9 and 12). When the deprecatio was moved to the initial rite of the Mass, the intercession, or oratio fidelium, as a component of the liturgy of the Word disappeared. The reform of *Gregory the Great, characterized by the desire to shorten the celebration of the Mass, left the deprecatio out of the responses Kyrie and Christe eleison on workdays so as to allow the assembly to lengthen these two invocations.

B. Capelle, Le Kyrie de la messe et la pape Gélase: RBen 46 (1934) 126-144; Id., L'intercession dans la messe romaine: RBen 65 (1955) 181-191; P. Borella, Oratio fidelium e dittici nelle Segrete dell'Offertorio: Ambrosius 36 Suppl. (1960) 1-21; A. Nocent, La prière commune des fidèles: NRTh 86 (1964) 948-964; L. Mohlberg, Liber sacramentorum romanae ecclesiae ordinis anni circuli, Rome 1960, ²1968 (Rer. Eccl. Docum. 4); P. De Clerck, La "prière universelle" dans les liturgies latines anciennes, Münster i.W. 1977 (LQF 62); J.A. Melloh, The General Intercessions Revisited: Worship 61 (1987) 152-162; var. aus., La preghiera dei fedeli: Riv. lit. 74 (1987) 1-141; J. Zimmermann, The General Intercessions: Yet Another Visit: Worship 65 (1991) 306-319.

A. Chupungco

INTERPOLATION. Interpolation is the simplest form of literary fraud. It is sufficient to take a writing and insert unpublished passages into it. The process was employed from the first Christian centuries, when certain Jewish texts were Christianized in this way, such as the Ascension of Isaiah, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and 2 Enoch. The Sibylline Oracles, originally an incontestably Jewish work, were riddled with Christian compositions. For the entire patristic era we can follow the history of the interpolations, intended to provide credentials for innovative ideas or discredit an author. *Origen was one of the principal victims. *Rufinus was able to compose an entire book on the adulteration of Origen's works: interpolations which contributed to impugn his memory and doctrine. The letter of *Gregory of Nyssa against the pilgrimages to Jerusalem was particularly targeted by interpolators, who deformed it acc. to their personal views. The heretics, esp. *Apollinarists and *Luciferians, interpolated numerous texts to give credit to their own ideas.

G. Pasquali, Storia della tradizione e critica del testo, Florence 1934, 217, 335, 348, 397; W. Speyer, Fälschung: RAC 7, 236-277; Id., Die lit. Fälschung im heidnischen und christlichen Altertum, Munich 1971; R.M. Grant, Heresy and Criticism: The Search for Authenticity in Early Christian Literature, Westminster 1993.

A. Hamman

INTOLERANCE, CHRISTIAN. The concept of religious "tolerance" (and respectively "intolerance") emerged in the course of the debate on freedom of conscience provoked by the numerous cruel wars of religion in the modern period. It was clearly introduced, it seems for the first time, in the Epistola de tolerantia of the English philosopher John Locke (1689). This does not exclude that this category can be legitimately applied also in the study of the religious conflicts of Antiquity and the Middle Ages, provided that the distinctive environmental peculiarities and specific ideological and cultural presuppositions of these conflicts are kept clearly in mind. Among the ancients, at least in philosophical circles since the spiritual revolution carried out by the Sophists of the 5th c. BC, freedom of conscience in religious matters was not entirely unknown, and already at that time the problem of its compatibility with the undeniable "political" requirements of public worship. The persecution of individuals or of groups for religious motives on the part of the political authority (consider the trials for "atheism" and "impiety" or the repression of the baccanalia) and the violent oppression effected by one religious (or ethnic-religious) group on another, with recourse to various forms of coercion (e.g., the conflicts between pagans and Jews at *Alexandria), were not rare experiences in Greco-Roman Antiquity.

The Christians were involved in these problems, at first being persecuted, victims of Jewish and esp. pagan intolerance, but then in their turn also as persecutors. The arrival of the Christian religion in the end radically modified the terms of the problem in the passage from the ancient world to the Middle Ages. It should not be forgotten that to understand the real historical dimensions of the question it is not sufficient to start from the Constantinian era, as usually happens in the current bibliography; rather it is necessary to return to the events of the 2nd c.

1. Around the middle of the 2nd c., in a difficult situation of conflict with pagans and Jews, the anonymous author of the letter *Ad Diognetum (7,2-4) affirms that the Son was sent by God to save and persuade men, not to commit violence, since violence is not suitable for God. This teaching on religious liberty was repeated and justified in different ways by *Irenaeus (Ad. haer. IV, 37,1; IV, 37,3; IV, 39,3; V, 1,1), *Clement of Alexandria (QDS 10,2 and 21,2), *Hippolytus (Ref. omn. haer. X, 33,13), *Tertullian (Apol. 24,5-6; 28,1; Ad Scap. 2,2) and *Lactantius (Div. Inst. V, 19-20). To these noble declarations of principle, expressed by prestigious thinkers of the church of the martyrs, coherent behaviors in the Christianity of the first centuries did not always correspond. The Christians, while they requested tolerance for themselves in the periods of persecution, did not exert themselves to guarantee it in every case for others. A few years after the Ad Diognetum, in fact, the pagan philosopher *Celsus denounced the iconoclastic aggressiveness of the Christians toward statues of Zeus or Apollo (ap. Origen, C. Cels. VIII, 38), a sign that very early, even on this burning theme, contrasting convictions and attitudes were clear which gave rise to very strong tensions within the Christian community. At the beginning of the 4th c., e.g., the bishops gathered at the Council of *Elvira refused to count among the martyrs of the faith those Christians who had lost their lives following the destruction of the pagan idols (can. 60).

2. Things went much worse after the Constantinian change, in the sense that, from presumably sporadic and local episodes of intolerance, there was a turn to systematic actions which saw various emperors and bishops involved, each one with his specific responsibilities. The phenomenon of Christian intolerance assumed new and more vast dimensions precisely due to the conversion of *Constantine. In the course of the 4th c., thanks to the support offered by the emperors, orthodox Christianity was first recognized as a licit religion (with the Edict of *Galerius in 311 and with the Edict of Constantine and *Licinius in 313), and then as the religion of the state (with the edict of *Thessalonica decreed by *Theodosius I in 380). This new situation pushed the members of the clergy and the monks to intensify their aggressiveness not only toward the pagan component of society but also against the heretics and the Jews (heretics, Jews and pagans are the three religious groups which the Catholic Church confronts acc. to Augustine, Sermo 62,12,18). To obtain the conversion, even if forced, of these groups, or at least to neutralize their presence on the terrain, the Christians did not hesitate to destroy their worship places, in urban centers or in rural areas, supported by the imperial legislation, which became the preferred instrument for the judicial repression of religious dissent.

3. The study of the intolerance carried out by the Christians of the period which goes from Constantine to *Heraclius starts from a long series of Christian and pagan literary texts (historiographic works, biographies, homilies, apologies, letters, orations), and of archaeological discoveries which describe the violence and the prevarications perpetrated by Christian groups in different circumstances against pagans, heretics and Jews, and the reactions, sometimes bloody, which these aggressions provoked. Despite the difficulties of interpreting these sources, there are multiple episodes which have been confirmed so far, and it is not possible to list them all here. It is enough to mention the systematic demolition of pagan temples, such as the temple of Zeus at *Apamea, the *Serapeion of Alexandria, the temple of Isis at Philae and the destruction of Jewish synagogues, such as those of *Callinicus and of Minorca. These devastations should be considered in the much larger context of the missionary and evangelizing mission carried out both in East and West by bishops and monks. Among these stand out *Martin of Tours, *Vigilius of Trent and the three martyrs of Anaunia, *Severinus of Noricum, *Benedict of Nursia, *George the Cappadocian, Marcellus of Apamea, *Porphyry of Gaza, *Theophilus of Alexandria, *Shenoute of Atripe, *Peter Mongus, *John of Ephesus. To this is added the bonfires of books of magic and pagan philosophy (the double condemnation of the anti-Christian treatise of Porphyry, first by Constantine and then by *Theodosius II and *Valentinian III, is famous), the persecutions inflicted by pro-*Arian emperors such as *Constantius II and *Valens on the "heretic" followers of the Nicene Creed, the execution of *Priscillian (the first execution of a bishop motivated by an accusation raised by other bishops), the assassination of *Hypatia, the capture and the torture of other prestigious pagan intellectuals such as *Hierocles and Horapollo (who would, however, later convert to Christianity to the grave disappointment of *Damascius), the ban on teaching imposed by *Justinian on heretics and pagans, the forced baptisms of the Jews imposed by Heraclius, etc.

4. The study of the legislation of the Christian emperors, from Constantine to Theodosius II, to repress every form of religious deviance, is essentially based on book 16 of the Codex Theodosianus. The legislation against the heretics is contained in CTh. XVI, 5; that which strikes apostates can be read in CTh. XVI, 7; finally CTh. XVI, 10 (de paganis, sacrificiis et templis) is directed at pagans. To the Jews is dedicated the material gathered in CTh. XVI, 8 and 9: on the one hand the legislator acknowledges as a general rule the traditional rights and privileges of the Jews and their leaders, but on the other hand inflicts a very severe blow on them with the prohibition on carrying out proselytism and on buying Christian slaves and submitting them, in addition, to circumcision. Many of these decisions were later taken up in the Codex Justinianus* with the publication of even more restrictive norms. These sources, sometimes of controversial date and difficult to evaluate, belong primarily to the history of Late Antique Roman law. They testify to the substantial continuity of the repressive attitude toward those forms of religious dissidence that were considered esp. dangerous for public order and the security of the empire. It is not by chance that anti-*Manichean legislation had already been begun with an edict of a pagan emperor like *Diocletian. Certainly, however, one observes in this period a progressive stiffening of the laws, directed toward the definitive affirmation of the exclusively "orthodox Christian" character of the Roman-Byzantine Empire. The erudite investigation of the imperial legislation should not be separated, during historical analysis, from the study of the contemporaneous ecclesiastical legislation concerning the same problems.

5. Nevertheless, the phenomenon of Christian intolerance cannot be understood truly in all its historical and cultural extent if one ignores the study of the interventions of certain authoritative ecclesiastical writers who have been, in various circumstances and on different fronts, the real theoreticians of intransigence up to the theological justification of coercion. Here one does not refer only, as is evident, to apologists such as *Eusebius of Caesarea and *Firmicus Maternus, who exhorted the Christian emperors to demolish the temples and abolish by force the pagan cults, or historians such as *Rufinus of Aquileia, who spoke about the edification of the kingdom of God on the rubble of the Serapeion. One thinks above all of the preaching and work of the great bishops such as *Ambrose, *John Chrysostom, *Cyril of Alexandria, *Augustine, who profoundly influenced with their authority the practical orientations of the church in the centuries of the Christian empire. Each one of these pastors explains his own point of view with regard to the relationship that ought to be maintained with religious expressions that are incompatible with orthodoxy and adopts corresponding attitudes.

Ambrose, e.g., opposed the replacement of the statue of Victory (see *Altar of Victory) in the curia, and in the name of the superiority of Christianity pressured Theodosius strongly so that he would revoke the order to punish the Christians who had sacked the synagogue of Callinicus. The mild but inflexible Chrysostom preached no less than eight homilies against the Jews, using defamatory language full of insults and organized an expedition of monks in Phoenicia to raze pagan temples. Cyril of Alexandria expelled the Jews from Alexandria and was involved in a certain manner in the assassination of Hypatia.

Augustine represents perhaps the most interesting case because of his unique positions. He vied essentially with the problems posed by the three great heresies rooted in the African church of his time, Manicheism, *Donatism and *Pelagianism, and by the survival of pagan worship. Multiple times he accepts and justifies the repressive action put into effect by the imperial power to obtain not so much the punishment of the heretics and the pagans or their forced conversion rather than their repentance and then their convinced return to orthodoxy. (Among numerous texts, see his Ep. 105,2,7-10 and Ep. 137,4,16 and his contemporizing exegesis of the compelle intrare of the parable of the feast acc. to the version of Lk 14:22-23 in Sermon 112,8, Ep. 173,10 and Ep. 185,6,24.) In Civ. Dei V, 24 Augustine calls "blessed" the emperors who put their power at the service of God to spread as far as possible true Christian worship. The pastoral and pedagogical intent explains his opposition to the indiscriminate use of violence and of extreme punitive measures such as the death penalty. With the Jews, on the contrary, Augustine shows himself to be remarkably "tolerant." For Augustine the Jews should not be eliminated since they are living witnesses, even if unwillingly, of the Christian truth of the prophecies of the OT (cf. En. Ps. 58, 21-22 on Ps 59[58]:12-14; Civ. Dei 18,46).

A particularly impressive example of the theology of intolerance is offered, at the beginning of the 6th c., by the monophysite author of the Theosophy. The latter reports false oracles of Apollo who, with scourging language, prophesies the violent end of the ancient pagan cults (see, e.g., I, 5-6; I, 54-55 ed. Beatrice) and the punishment of the Jews (I, 53), and approves of the frightful divine vendetta against the "heretical" pro-Chalcedonian emperors *Leo and *Basiliscus (III B, 17-18).

6. As often happens, religious tolerance is an important value esp. for those who, being persecuted, are able to appreciate its benefits and invoke it for their protection. It is much more difficult to preach and practice tolerance when one finds oneself in a dominating position. This observation, valid for Christians, finds a precise parallel in the attitude taken in different moments by the representatives of the pagan intelligentsia. If the *Neoplatonic *Porphyry, on the eve of the great persecution of *Diocletian, maintains that Christians ought to be punished justly for their religious aberration which makes them particularly dangerous for the stability and survival of the empire, the senator *Symmachus, a century later, in the context of the Reichskirche and in completely changed conditions of the polemic with Ambrose, becomes in turn the champion of tolerance toward the pagan cults, recalling that there are many ways which led to the mystery of the divinity.

One should, finally, observe that the recourse of the Christians to more or less legal violence alternates with periods in which verbal aggression and ideological propaganda predominates in the quest for consensus. Certainly one must distinguish these actions acc. to times and places, and take into account their results, different acc. to religious groups and social classes.

Each of the three hostile fronts on which Christian intolerance was exercised—i.e., pagan, heretic and Jew—followed a different destiny. The polemic against paganism, extensively developed in the apologetic literature, led to its complete destruction, to the pure and simple disappearance of the cults and religious institutions of the ancient world (temples, priestly offices, sacrifices, oracles, mystery cults etc.). The heresies were condemned and their followers subjected to various forms of persecution and repression (confiscation of property, banishment, forced conversion, capital punishment). It can be said that the highest toll of violence is found in the behavior taken by Christians against their dissident brothers and sisters: as the emperor *Julian noted, the Christians tear each other to pieces like ferocious beasts (see Ammianus, XXII, 5,4). Paradoxically, the Jews are the group who received the relatively best treatment. Despite the violent attacks contained in the centuries-old literature adversus Iudaeos, and even among the enormous difficulties and humiliations imposed on them by Christian society and legislation, they succeeded in organizing themselves and in surviving, preserving their own identity in later centuries. How much, finally, of modern and contemporary anti-Semitism should be traced back, not only to Greco-Roman anti-Semitism, but also to, properly speaking, Christian anti-Semitism (NT, patristic and Medieval) constitutes a separate problem, an object for other studies.

F. Decret, L'Afrique manichéenne (IVe-Ve siècles). Étude historique et doctrinale, Paris 1978; L. De Giovanni, Chiesa e Stato nel codice Teodosiano. Saggio sul libro XVI, Naples 1980; A.M. Rabello, The Legal Condition of the Jews in the Roman Empire: ANRW II, 13, Berlin-New York 1980, 662-762; W. Speyer, Büchervernichtung und Zensur des Geistes bei Heiden, Juden und Christen, Stuttgart 1981; K.L. Noetlichs, Heidenverfolgung: RAC 13 (1986) 1149-1190; R. MacMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire (A.D. 100-400), New Haven-London 1984; A. Linder, The Jews in Roman Imperial Legislation, Detroit 1987; P. Chuvin, Chronique des derniers païens. La disparition du paganisme dans l'Empire romain, du règne de Constantin à celui de Justinien, Paris [2]1991; W. Pakter, Early Western Church Law and the Jews, in H.W. Attridge - G. Hata (eds.), Eusebius, Christianity, and Judaism, Detroit 1992, 714-735; P.F. Beatrice (ed.), L'intolleranza cristiana nei confronti dei pagani, Bologna 1993; F.R. Trombley, Hellenic Religion and Christianization c. 370-529 (Religions of the Graeco-Roman World 115/1-2), Leiden-New York-Cologne 1993–1994; S. Bradbury, Constantine and the Problem of Anti-Pagan Legislation in the Fourth Century: CPh 89 (1994) 120-139; P. Fredriksen, Excaecati Occulta Justitia Dei: Augustine on Jews and Judaism: JECS 3 (1995) 299-324; C. Ando, Pagan Apologetics and Christian Intolerance in the Ages of Themistius and Augustine: JECS 4 (1996) 171-207; P.F. Beatrice, La christianisation des campagnes pendant l'Antiquité Tardive dans les régions méditerranéennes. Bilan des recherches et questions de méthode, in J.-P. Massaut - M.-E. Henneau (eds.), La christianisation des campagnes. Actes du colloque du C.I.H.E.C. (25-27 août 1994), Brussels-Rome 1996, I, 9-35; O. Limor - G.G. Stroumsa (eds.), Contra Iudaeos. Ancient and Medieval Polemics Between Christians and Jews, Tübingen 1996; P.R. Brown, Christianization and Religious Conflict: CAH XIII, 1998, 632-664; G. Stanton - G.G. Stroumsa (eds.), Tolerance and Intolerance in Early Judaism and Christianity, Cambridge 1998; P. Athanassiadi, Damascius: The Philosophical History: Text with Translation and Notes, Athens 1999; E. DePalma Digeser, The Making of a Christian Empire: Lactantius and Rome, Ithaca-London 2000; H.A. Drake, Constantine and the Bishops: The Politics of Intolerance, Baltimore-London 2000; D. Frankfurter, "Things Unbefitting Christians": Violence and Christianization in Fifth-Century Panopolis: JECS 8 (2000) 273-295; P.F. Beatrice, Anonymi Monophysitae Theosophia: An Attempt at Reconstruction (VChrS 56), Leiden-Boston-Cologne 2001.

P.F. Beatrice

INTRAMURAL GRAVES. One of the most discussed aspects of recent urban archaeology is certainly that of intramural graves. The existence of the tombs within the city (an element of separation from the point of view of the urban landscape and with legal and religious repercussions which have still not been fully understood) nevertheless was already known in past centuries, but a series of imprecise interpretations, which had solidified in archaeological literature, had long misled scholars from a correct framing of the problem and an impartial critical analysis. Further analysis of the archive, connected to a firm understanding of the historical dynamics, has allowed in recent years—primarily thanks to the studies of Roberto Meneghini and Riccardo Santangeli Valenzani—to frame the debate on a new foundation, which in a short time has shown itself to be central to understanding the Late Antique and Early Medieval city. As much as has been possible to reconstruct on a limited basis with respect to the city of *Rome, we find that starting from the 2nd half of the 6th c., while going against a centureis-long solidified tradition and certainly in response to the Greek-Gothic conflict but also to an altered change of mentality for practical reasons and not secondarily economic, people began to bury the dead within the city, though not definitively abandoning burial in the catacombs. Even though the dynamics have not yet been fully understood, given the widespread nature of the phenomenon, the shift in burial areas could not help bringing about a marked change in the urban geography, at least at the level of simple visual perception, and it serves as an indicator for understanding the complex geographical dynamics. It should in fact be recalled, acc. to the account of *Zosimus (who wrote almost a century later), that as early as the siege of Rome by *Alaric in the autumn of 408, urban burials were made necessary by the inaccessibility of the suburbs (Zos. V, 39: τῆς δε πόλεως ἔξω θάπτεσθαι τῶν σωμάτων οὐ δυναμένων [πᾶσαν γὰρ ἔξοδον ἐφύλαττον οἱ πολέμιοι] τάφος ἦν ἡ πόλις τῶν τεθνεώτων, ὥστε καὶ ἄλλως εἶναι τὸ χωρίον ἀοίκητον, ἀρκεῖν τε, εἰ καὶ μὴ τροφῆς ἦν σπάνις, εἰς σωμάτων διαφθορὰν τὴν ἀπὸ τῶν νεκρῶν ἀναδιδομένην ὀσμήν). The origin of intramural burials seems, therefore, connected to exceptional moments and the emergencies caused by war, during which the usual funerary practices in the suburbs were curtailed. At the same time, however, one should not underestimate the ideological factor in the spread of the phenomenon, or rather the society's change in attitude toward death which began in the 5th c. and which saw the cemeteries penetrate the cities, favoring the invisible cohabitation of the living and the dead.

From the typographical point of view, the funerary interments, rarely elaborate in the case of the poor, are attested by different forms of burial: from the simplest in the least demanding holes dug in the earth and protected by large fragments of ceramic containers or pieces of different types of materials, to the most widespread tombs, often called in Italian alla cappuccina (because it resembles a monk's hood) with the body covered by two rows of tiles leaned against each other like a hut, to the most costly burials in semicylindrical brickwork "vaults" or in reused *sarcophagi that were more or less intact.

From the topographical point of view, the phenomenon of intramural graves—more apparent in growing numbers following ongoing discoveries—is seemingly characterized by constant capillarity and widespread presence, because the burials are located anywhere within the Aurelian Walls and tend to occupy all different types of buildings. The graves are found, in fact, overrun both within the abandoned monumental complexes such as some sectors of the Crypta of Balbus or a vast portion of the baths of *Caracalla, with respect to the margins of the streets and the piazzas that were still visited, such as the *Colosseum, or within the numerous formerly inhabited buildings, e.g., the insulae of the Via Anicia and the Via dei Simmachi, or even in the immediate neighborhoods or within religious buildings, as in the case of the recently excavated necropolis of the Templum Pacis in the vicinity of the church dedicated to Sts. *Cosmas and Damian. The extremely low number of the attested graves is surprising, however, as some scholars have pointed out: in fact, burials of individual or small groups only rarely reach as many as twenty units. In all, the total number of graves we are aware of for the long period of time between the mid-6th c. and the end of the subsequent century do not amount to more than 400 units, a relatively low number that—even if in the incomplete data available to us and also not forgetting the likely heavy demographic decline—suggests that the communal sepulchral spaces of Rome for that period have not yet been fully identified.

See the foundational contributions of C. Lambert, Le sepolture in urbe nella norma e nella prassi (tarda antichità - alto medioevo), in L. Paroli (ed.), L'Italia centro-settentrionale in età longobarda. Atti del Convegno, Ascoli Piceno, 6-7 ottobre 1995, Florence 1997, 285-293; R. Meneghini - R. Santangeli Valenzani, Sepolture intramuranee e paesaggio urbano a Roma tra V e VII secolo, in L. Paroli - P. Delogu (ed.), La storia economica di Roma nell'alto medioevo alla luce dei recenti scavi archeologici. Atti del Seminario, Roma, 2-3 aprile 1992, Florence 1993, 89-111; Id., Corredi funerari, produzioni e paesaggio sociale a Roma tra VI e VII secolo: RivAC 70 (1994) 321-337; Id., Sepolture intramuranee a Roma tra V e VII secolo d.C. Aggiornamenti e considerazioni: ArchMed 22 (1995) 283-290; Id., Osservazioni sul popolamento di Roma tra V e VII secolo d.C. attraverso lo studio delle sepolture intramuranee, in E. Sonnino (ed.), Popolazione e società a Roma dal medioevo all'età contemporanea, Rome 1998, 29-36; Id., Intramural Burials at Rome between the Vth and VIIth Century AD, in J. Pearce - M. Millet - M. Struck (eds.), Burial, Society and Context in the Roman World, Oxford 2000, 263-269; Id., La trasformazione del tessuto urbano tra V e IX secolo, in var. aus. (ed.), Roma dall'antichità al medioevo. Archeologia e storia nel Museo Nazionale Romano Crypta Balbi, Milan 2001, 30-33.

See also G.P. Brogiolo - G. Cantino Wataghin (eds.), Sepolture tra IV e VII secolo, VII Seminario sul tardoantico e l'altomedioevo in Italia centrosettentrionale, Gardone Riviera 24-26 ottobre 1996, Mantua 1998; G. Cantino Wataghin, The Ideology of Urban Burials, in The Idea and Ideal of the Town Between Late Antiquity and Early Middle Ages, Leiden-Boston-Cologne 1999, 147-180; M. Costambeys, Burial Topography and the Power of the Church in Fifth- and Sixth-Century Rome: PBSR 69 (2001) 169-189; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Strutture funerarie e edifici di culto paleocristiani di Roma dal IV al VI secolo, Vatican City 2001, 134-137; M. Capponi - M. Ghilardi, Scoperta, nel Templum Pacis, di un'area sepolcrale probabilmente contemporanea alla fondazione dei SS. Cosma e Damiano, in F. Guidobaldi - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi (eds.), Ecclesiae Urbis. Congr. Int. di Studi sulle Chiese di Roma (IV-X sec.), Roma, 4-10 settembre 2000, Vatican City 2002, 733-756; K. Jonsson, Intra-Mural Graves in Rome: Social Dimensions in Early Medieval Burial Practices: Opuscula Romana 30 (2005) 85-95; M. Ghilardi, Trasformazioni del paesaggio urbano. Il Templum Pacis durante la guerra greco-gotica (a proposito di Procop., Goth. IV 21), in M. Ghilardi - Ch.J. Goddard - P. Porena (ed.), Les cités de l'Italie tardo-antique (IVe-VIe siècle). Institutions, économie, société, culture et religion, Rome 2006, 137-148.

M. Ghilardi

IOCA MONACHORUM. This name indicates various texts of monastic origin, written in *Gaul starting from the 6th–7th c., consisting of a series of questions and answers on religious and other themes, in the form of riddles. The oldest text is the Altercatio Adriani et Epictiti. Here are some examples of question and answer: "What is the sky? Like a stretched skin. What is the sun? Splendor of the day and life of all. What is seen and not touched? The sun in the sky. Who died and was not born? Adam. Who gave and did not receive? Eve, milk."

DACL 7, 2569 2572; W. Suchier, Das mittellateinische Gespräch Adrian und Epictitus nebst verwandten Texten, Tübingen 1955; F. Brünhölz, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters, Munich 1975, 147-148 (cf. 527-528); CPPM IIA 3675; Augustine Through the Ages: An Encyclopedia, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 301.

M. Simonetti

IONA, De (De Nineve). This text circulated together with the De Sodoma sometimes under the name of *Tertullian, sometimes under the name of *Cyprian. The two parts are like a diptych by the same author, who lived, acc. to the common opinion, at the beginning of the 5th c., acc. to others—e.g., Hexter—in the 6th. In some MSS one was located after the other. The attribution, however, is closely linked with the De Sodoma. The De Iona (incipit: Post Sodomum et Gomorum viventia funera) is composed of 105 verses and in the present state is mutilated. The poet, after having spoken of the patience of God waiting for the repentance of humanity, explains the adventures of the prophet Jonah.

CPL 1426; CPPM II, A, n. 2147; PL 2, 1108-1114; CSEL III, 3, 297-301; CSEL 23, 221-226; M. Dando, Alcimus Avitus as the Author of . . . De Sodoma and De Jona, Formerly Attributed to Tertullian and Cyprian: CM 26 (1967) 258-275; W. Antuono, The Structure and Sources of Patience: Medieval Studies 34 (1972) 411-413; Versus de Sodoma, intr., critical text, It. tr. and comm. by L. Moris, Bologna 1993; R. Palla, Una trascrizione umanistica del Carmen de Iona, in Ad contemplandam sapientiam, Studi in memoria di S. Lenza, Soveria Mannelli 2004, 523-532.

A. Di Berardino

IRELAND

I. Pre-Christian period - II. Christianization and monasticism - III. Culture.

I. Pre-Christian period. Ireland is the smaller of the two principal British islands, called in Greek "Pretanic islands" from the name "Pretans" (Gael. Cruithin), given perhaps by the *Celts of *Gaul to the ancient inhabitants of Albion and Hibernia (Lat.

Hibernia, Hiberio, Gael. Eriu, Eire). In Latin, starting from Caesar, the name Brittani (Britanni, Brittones) is limited to the population of the larger island, called Britannia. The Pretans were later called Picti, perhaps from the name of the hegemonic people in those islands during the Bronze Age; in addition to the Pretans, groups speaking a Celtic language of the q type (the Celts of Gaul and Britain spoke a language of the p type) entered Ireland around the 5th c. BC, perhaps coming from the Iberian Peninsula.

Ireland was never occupied by the Romans, but today archaeology underlines the presence on the island of Roman remains due to commercial relationships and brigandage; votive offerings of Roman coins from the 1st to the 4th c. AD and Roman jewelry from the 4th c. AD have been found at Newgrange (Co. Meath), a place famous for the grandiose pre-Celtic royal tomb (3000–2000 BC): but we cannot therefore hypothesize that this place—linked in Medieval traditions to ancient local paganism—was inhabited by Romans. From the 3rd c. AD Irish incursions and settlements occur in Britannia, where Roman administration had by then weakened. The Latins called the Irish at that time no longer Hiberni or Iverni, but Scotti, which *Jerome distinguished from the Atecotti (perhaps aithech-thúatha, i.e., "tribe subject to tribute") seen by him in youth in Gaul: these were perhaps tribes oppressed by the larger kingdoms (Tara, Connachta, Munster) and chased from the island after having taken sides for the losing Ulaid, a tribe of the present Ulster. Battles between rival tribes in Ireland are briefly spoken of by Tacitus (Agr. 24), who had information, through his father-in-law Agricola, about an Irish rí (lat. regulus) who had taken refuge in Britannia with the same Agricola. The geographer Philemon gathered information from merchants about Ireland before his expedition to Britannia in AD 43 (see Ptol., Geogr. 1,11,7). He is the basis for Ptolemy's knowledge of Hibernian toponomastics; Tacitus too speaks of negotiatores as the source of knowledge about the aditus portusque of Hibernia. The Hibernian colonies situated in W Britannia were also a meeting place between Gaelic and Latin civilizations, in a certainly more peaceful way than the deportations of Britanni into Hibernia (among these there was also the sixteen-year-old Patrick, future evangelizer of Ireland). Nevertheless, a certain intolerance for the overseas guests must have spread among the Britanno-Romans, if around AD 400 Cunedda chased with arms the foreign Scots back to their homeland (Hist. Britt. 14 and 62). To a family of this kind of Scots immigrants in Britannia *Pelagius perhaps belonged, and possibly, although with less likelihood, his disciple *Celestius.

The Celtic ethnic group mixed later with Anglo-Saxon elements at the end of the 8th c., following the Viking incursions on the Irish coasts (792–1014).

The Celts of Ireland lived in tribes (túatha), each of which elected its own king (rí), head of the army and representative of his people in the negotiations with other kings; he was assisted by a council of nobles (áes dána) and by jurists (brithemoin). The druíd, diviners and doctors, also supervised the instruction of the young. A group of tribes constituted a large kingdom, and the highest level was that of the "king of kings" (árd-rí), acknowledged, e.g., to the king of Tara. Every inhabited settlement (dún or ráth), on a circular plan, was surrounded by a rampart sealed with stones, and the king's dún constituted a meeting and assembly place. The nucleus of society—of rural character—was the family and not the individual: the king did not interfere in the internal affairs of the families, but regulated just the relationships between tribes. He was not a legislator or supreme judge, but the traditional laws were interpreted and applied by the brithemoin, who judged crimes committed within the túath, and had to enforce respect for the laws even in the absence of a state apparatus. The Irish annals, which collect oral traditions, place in the 5th c. Niall Noígiallach and his son Loegare, king of Connacht before being consecrated king of Tara (or Temair), to the N of present Dublin. Niall Noígiallach, founder of the Uí Néill, was the son of the king Eochu Mugmedón and of the Roman woman Cairenn (= Lat. Carina), stolen by him during a raid into Britannia; acc. to the Irish traditions Niall carried out a victorious expedition to the Alps (or perhaps rather in Armorica), and his nickname derives from the nine hostages which he obtained from the different tribes then existing in Ireland.

II. Christianization and monasticism. *Prosper of Aquitaine (Chron. 1307, MGH, chron. min. I, 473; cf. Contra collatorem 21: PL 51, 271 C) reports that in 431 Pope *Celestine I sent the deacon *Palladius as bishop to Ireland ad Scottos in Christum credentes—i.e., to an already-existing Christian community (perhaps in S Ireland). A year later—acc. to the Irish Annals but perhaps later—Patrick arrived on the island, disembarking acc. to tradition at Downpatrick and supported by the king of Tara Loegare, descnded from the Uí Néill. Between the 5th and 7th c. the Uí Néill became lords of the whole N of the island, absorbing Ulster, which also included Armagh where, acc. to tradition, Patrick founded his church and where he was supposedly buried; acc. to other sources (hostile to the Uí Néill now lords of Ar-magh), Patrick was buried at Downpatrick. There is mention of three bishops who collaborated with Patrick: Secundinus (with his see at Tara), Auxilius (placed near Naas, the royal seat in Leinster) and Iserninus (finally established at Aghade, near Rathvilly, the seat of Crimthann king of Leinster). Patrick furthermore supposedly chose Baslick (Basilica Sanctorum), near Crúachu, capital of Connaught, as the see of a bishop for that church.

Even with the success of evangelization, pagan rites and beliefs persisted, such as the custom of the "marriage" of the king of Tara with his country (into the 5th–6th c.) or the rites of fertility for the inauguration of Emain Macha and of Crúachu. The canons of the Irish synods attest to the presence of druids (aruspices) in the Christian era also, and the veneration of St. *Brigid of Kildare seems to be linked with that of a homonymous local divinity (Cell Dara means "church of the oak"). According to tradition, Patrick also began a reform of the local legal system and fought against slavery (see his Epistola ad Coroticum), promoting the fusion between the victors and defeated whether in local battles or those with the British coasts. After the first forms of individual asceticism (masculine and feminine) attested already in the writings of Patrick, monasticism developed probably through the influence of Gallic monks (5th–6th c.). The first monastic settlements were small groups of cells, in an area on a circular plan, marked by a wall and with a cross at the entrance. In the Celtic ecclesiastical organization the monastery is the basis of the ecclesia Dei and the head of the church is often the abbot of the monastery (bishop or doctor); the bishop, when distinct from the abbot, sees to sacramental discipline and does not have a stable urban residence. The bishops were in fact above all itinerant, linked also by family ties to the population, just as the túath was more a tribal unity than a territorial one. In the 6th c. the clergy do not appear completely integrated within the local aristocracy, and in the next century it is primarily the abbots, not the bishops, who have jurisdictional power.

The different monastic foundations were often independent of each other and harmonized with civil institutions, as a city under the guidance of the abbot. The formation of monastic centers of enormous cultural and political, as well as religious, influence constituted the first presupposition for urban conglomerates: by their isolated position, in fact, some monastic centers continued to exercise a function as places of asylum even in the 12th c., during the Norman invasion; other population centers, in contrast, came into existence in connection with Scandinavian outposts (after the Viking invasions of the 9th c.).

Despite the variety, we can speak of an Irish monasticism, characterized by great austerity in its ascetic discipline, as is testified by the extant Penitentials. A reference point for Irish monasticism was St. *Finnian (d. 549), founder of Clonard; among his disciples were St. *Columba (d. 597), called Columb Cille (= "dove of the church"), missionary and founder of Derry, Durrow and Iona (Lat. Iova or Iona, a Scottish island, filial of Derry); St. Ciaran, founder of Clonmanoise (548); and the two *Brendans of Clonfert and Birr (1st half of the 6th c.). In the monastery of Bangor, founded by St. Congall (d. 601), St. *Columbanus was educated. Female monasteries were less numerous, but the foundation of St. Brigid of Kildare was famous (beginning of 6th c.): here, next to the female community, lived a male community under a bishop, and the two communities met for liturgical celebrations. The monasteries rose on islands or along uninhabited coasts or regions of the interior, and some of these developed important schools, presided over by a Fer Léginn (= man of doctrine), such as Clonmanoise and Clonard.

As late as the 7th c. a strong episcopal organization persisted, with a hierarchy of bishops under a "bishop of bishops" (in analogy with the hierarchy of the kings); in the 7th–8th c. Armagh had supremacy over all the churches and monasteries of Ireland. The episcopal sees were generally born around a pre-Christian center of religious attraction: so Armagh rose two miles from Emain Macha, a sanctuary of Macha, a pagan divinity, while Kildare was founded five miles from the pagan sanctuary of Knockaulin; in the same area there was also Kilcullen, indicated as the see of Iserninus, and not far away was Killashee, see of Auxilius.

The first Irish council of which we have mention is the so-called 1st Synod of Patrick, of 450 or 456, or acc. to others of the 6th c. This would have been presided by St. Patrick with the participation of Auxilius and Iserninus; it reflects a situation which might be that of the time of Patrick and offers disciplinary norms for clerics, monks and virgins (CPL 1102; Mansi VI, 513-520; L. Bieler, The Irish Penitentials, SLH 5, Dublin 1963, 54-59). Also the so-called 2nd Synod of Patrick (456–465, but probably later) dealt with ecclesiastical discipline (CPL 1791; Mansi VI, 521-522; L. Bieler, The Irish Penitentials, 184-197). Around 682–684 a council seems to have taken place, mentioned by *Adamnan (Vita Columbae 101 b); the canons of this council approved penalties for transgressors (Mansi XI, 1057-1060). Two conferences are also recorded, that of Druim Cett (575), with the encounter of two enemy kings in the presence of St. Columba; and that of Birr (697), at which the abbot of Iona, Adamnan, took part; to him is assigned the Cáin Adomnáin (Kenney 81), the oldest part of which dates back to the end of the 7th or the 8th c.: it was promulgated by the ecclesiastical and secular authorities together, to protect women, religious and children, in war and peace; it is established there that the fines for transgressions be sent to the community of Adamnan (cáin means "law" but also "tribute"). In the conference of Birr the Celtic church, through influence of the Northumbrian church, accepted the "Alexandrian" paschal calendar and the Roman tonsure observed by S Ireland, while the latter accepted the primate of Armagh over the whole island. Iona, however, accepted the Alexandrian cycle only in 716. The controversies over the tonsure and the date of Easter interfered for a long time with the missionary work of the Irish, esp. in N Britain. From the peregrinatio pro Christo Irish monasticism nevertheless developed a strong missionary dimension, esp. with Columba (from Iona to Britain) and Columbanus (from Bangor to the Continent) and with their disciples.

III. Culture. In general, there does not seem to have been opposition between Latin Christianity and Gaelic culture. The pre-Christian cultural tradition was preserved—between the 6th and 7th c.—in secular circles which were gradually becoming Christian (see Hisp. fam. 547-570), but distinct from the monastic schools. In these the filid, or poets/seers, were trained and active, and alongside them other intellectual figures such as the bard (another grade of poet), the brithen (judge), the senchaid (historian) and the druí (druid). In the 7th and 8th c. the filid reached an elevated position, with a hierarchy of seven ranks: custodians of the history of Ireland, they sang sagas, genealogies, encomiastic poems and myths, often rationalized in a Christian sense. In the Christian era it was possible to pass from the schools of the filid, marked by their erudite elitism, to the monastic ones and vice versa (see, e.g., Jonas, Vita Columbani 3,19-22). The Hisperica famina (lines 225-239), a work composed in a Celtic environment, probably insular (beginning 7th c.), shows students traveling through learned Irish circles (in Ireland or in the Scots colonies in N Britain), in search of good teachers of Latin rhetoric and hosted gratis by the Scots; the students were able to speak, not the Irish language, but the artificial catena Ausonica—i.e., a Latin language bound by grammatical rules and therefore not natural—while the native language of those students was perhaps the Celtic of Britain or Anglo-Saxon or even Frankish. For example, the Frankish prelate Agilbert studied biblical *exegesis in Ireland (see Bede, Hist. 3,7), before preaching to the Anglo-Saxons, and the first Latinization and Christianization of the Anglo-Saxons was promoted by the Irish (ibid. 3,3). They went to Ireland looking for monastic culture in a stable seat or else in search of secular culture while wandering (ibid., 3,27), like the groups of lectores who were still going to study Latin rhetoric in Ireland at the time of *Aldhelm of Sherborne (see Ep. 3 and 5), around 690.

A typical representative of "Christian druidism" is the aristocratic Columb Cille (St. Columba), member of a royal family of the NW: when he was still in Ulster, acc. to the legend, he copied the psalter of Finnian of Clonard in secret, and in the suit raised against him at Tara the king Diarmaid pronounced that just as a calf follows the cow, so every copy belongs to the owner of the original. A battle followed, but the Cathach (perhaps from the Irish cath, "battle") remained with Columba; today the MS, in Irish majuscule, is preserved in the Royal Irish Academy in Dublin (Lapidge-Sharpe 506). Like the Book of Armagh* (Lapidge-Sharpe 354-360)—work of the scribe Ferdomnach, who was at Armagh between 807 and 808—this is not a book conceived for communication but a symbol to keep, because in Ireland the tradition remained predominantly oral for a long time. So the evangeliarums of Durrow (end 7th c.; Lapidge-Sharpe 516) and above all that of Kells (8th c.; Lapidge-Sharpe 520), with their miniatures, had many details which could be understood only by the authors, while for the people they were an object of marvel and veneration; both are today preserved in Trinity College in Dublin.

The first evidence of writing belongs to the pre-Christian and paleo-Christian era (4th–6th c.), present in sepulchral inscriptions found in the SW of Ireland: they document an archaic Irish language, closed to British and Gallic influences, and are composed in the ogham alphabet, twenty characters in the form of notches grouped in various ways, acc. to a distinction which seems marked by a certain knowledge of Latin grammar cultivated in druidic environments. The introduction of the Roman alphabet, through the work of Christian missionaries in the 5th c., was aimed in contrast at popularization; this work of spreading literacy is witnessed by the tablets of Springmount (6th–7th c.; Lapidge-Sharpe 505). The Latin alphabet was used first in the transcription of texts in Latin (such as the writings of Patrick, 5th c.) and not before the 8th c., as far as we know, for works in Irish; some MSS, however, preserve archaisms dating back to compositions of the 7th and perhaps 6th c., when the flowering of the monastic scriptoria caused the substitution of a written literature for the ancient oral tradition.

On the occasion of the convention of Druim Cett (575) the filid, professional poets who had been banned by the kings of Ireland, acc. to tradition were defended by the intercession of Columb Cille, and the convention sealed their agreement with the church. A rígollam (poet of the 1st hierarchical rank), Dallán Forgaill, at the death of Columb Cille (597) composed his eulogy in rhythmic alliterative prose, the Amra Choluimb Chille (Kenney 212).

Irish culture therefore arose from the collaboration between monks and filid, and in the cultural synthesis (Gaelic and classical) that had developed in Ireland the peaceful enculturation of Christianity took place. The Latin acculturation of Ireland, which the filid had begun, continued. Next to the study of Holy Scripture the Irish monasteries demonstrated a notable commitment to intellectual work: they studied esp. the science of calculation (in order to calculate the date of Easter), grammar and rhetoric, with a Christianization of the traditional manuals. This culture reached Ireland in the 6th c. via contacts with insular Britannia and then also continental Britannia. The Irish monks accepted the profane authors with less diffidence than the monks on the Continent, who had had to combat Greco-Roman paganism; needing to learn Latin first of all as a means for knowing the Bible, the Irish monks went on to cultivate hymnography, history and rhetoric, without having to reject the latter out of respect for the sermo humilis of the Christian people, given that they spoke only the national language and not Latin. While in early Irish the oldest Latin loan words (5th c.)—concerning the semantic fields of navigation, commerce and the military—came from Latin as it was pronounced in Britannia, on the level of the written language the Hiberno-Latin offers a lexicon of rare words (Hellenisms, Hebraisms etc.) gathered from glossaries; it was constructed artificially on the basis of knowledge of grammar and rhetoric, giving rise to a Hiberno-British literary koine also called Hisperic Latin.

The scriptoria of the Irish monasteries spread books of instruction and prayer, and only later also texts in prose and verse (sagas, legal texts etc.) of indigenous literature; originally oral, this was received within monastic environments that, with the inevitable manipulations, transferred it to the written form typical of Christian culture or légend (Lat. legendum, i.e., tradition destined for reading rather than listening). The oldest Irish culture shows some characteristic traits, such as love for nature and for voyages, curiosity for mirabilia, the genre of the visio, the Penitentials, the genealogies, the loricae. In the genre of the visio, obscure but interesting is the Baile Chuind (= Ecstasy of Conn), with a list of the kings of Tara; it seems that it was composed during the reign of Fínsuechta Fledach (675–695) or a little before. Mixtures of paganism and Christianity can often be found in the Irish texts: this is so in the Audacht Moraind (= Testament of Morand), of the 7th c., which expresses the ancient pagan idea of the prosperity of the country being linked to the faithfulness of the king to the precepts of good governance, while a Christian text related to the tecosca or indigenous gnomic texts is the Aipgitir Crábaid, or "alphabet of piety" (Kenney 265), attributed to Colman moccu Béognai (d. 611), monk of Lismore. The loricae are enchantment formulas composed in imitation of ancient pagan compositions, pronounced by anyone who felt persecuted by enemies and Christianized with an initial invocation of the *Trinity. Famous among these is the Fáeth Fiada, or "cry of the stag" (Kenney 101), attributed to Patrick but not older than the 8th c.; the same pagan-Christian syncretism characterizes the oldest known lorica, that called "of Gildas" (inc. Suffragare, trinitatis unitas; CPL 1323), composed in Hisperic Latin by Laidcenn mac Baith Bannaig of Clonfertmulloe (d. 661). Like the Amra Choluimb Chille, the loricae are in rhythmic alliterative prose, called by the Irish retoric to indicate the foreign model of an elaborate idiom, imitated by the Irish writers in either Gaelic or Hisperic Latin; a typical example of this is the Hisperica famina.

The oldest proper meter, however, was probably—as in primitive Germanic poetry—that formed by alliterative hemistichs, while rhyme appeared in Irish poetry starting from the 7th c. In Latin syllabic poetry developed in Ireland at the end of the 5th c., in imitation of the Latin hymnography of the early Christian centuries, but much more variable in its metrical forms. The alphabetic hymn Audite omnes amantes (CPL 1101) might not be much later than Patrick; it was composed in his honor in rhythmic septenary trochaics and attributed to Secundinus (Sechnall); in Irish there is a biography of Patrick in verse attributed to the bishop Fíacc of Sléibte (inc. Génair Patraicc; Kenney 132): the hymn was composed perhaps in the 7th or 8th c. A Latin alphabetic hymn in octonaries is attributed to Columb Cille, the Altus Prosator (CPL 1131) and, with less likelihood, three other hymns (CPL 1132). Other poetic compositions are attributed to Columbanus (CPL 1113 and 1117-1118). The oldest remains of the Irish hymnography in Latin, in rhythmic verses with a predilection for bisyllabic rhythm, are preserved in the Antiphonarium of Bangor (Lapidge-Sharpe 532 and 572-577), written between 680 and 691; the book—brought to Bobbio and today preserved in Milan (Ambr. C. 5. inf.)—collects various texts (hymns, antiphons, collects) of the 6th and 7th c. in use at Bangor. Partially similar content is present in two MSS of the 11th c., preserved in Dublin, witnesses of the so-called Liber hymnorum (Lapidge-Sharpe 542-564 and 578-591): for preservation, liturgical texts both in Latin and in old Irish, composed in Ireland or at least in use in the local liturgy, were gathered within this collection; among them is the Celebra Iuda attributed to Cuimíne Fota (*Cummineus Longus; CPL 1136), abbot of Clonfert in the 1st half of the 7th c.

Since Latin culture was a necessary instrument for access to the biblical, patristic and liturgical texts, Christianization and Latinization went hand in hand. In the monastic schools the classics were also appreciated, while knowledge of Greek was rare. The classics were known generally secondhand: but not Virgil, commented on perhaps by Adamnan (Lapidge-Sharpe 1235), nor Horace, better known in Ireland than on the Continent. The monastic culture was, however, founded primarily on the Bible and on the Fathers, so well assimilated that only now the Irish origin is being discovered of many works falsely attributed to *Jerome, *Augustine, *Cyprian etc. The difficulty of the Celtic authors in writing Latin was attenuated with the passage of time, as can be seen in the evident progress from Patrick to Columbanus. The difficulty of learning Latin made necessary the use of glosses, like that of Würzburg to the Pauline letters (8th c. at the latest; Kenney 461). The flowering of grammatical interest in Ireland is also documented by the Versus cuiusdam Scotti de alfabeto (mid-7th c.; CPL 1562), a collection of riddles (in hexameters) on the individual letters of the alphabet.

The exegetical studies followed the *Alexandrian school (moral and *allegorical interpretation), while the *Antiochene method was less popular (literal and historical interpretation: Ir. stair, Lat. historia). Furthermore, interest for symbolic details was characteristic for the Irish, as that for apocryphal literature. To the Alexandrian current belong the ps.-Hieronymian Commentarius in Evangelium secundum Marcum (CPL 632) written perhaps by Cummianus (ca. 632), and the Ecloga de Moralibus in Job (CPL 1716), an epitome of *Gregory the Great, by the abovementioned Laidcenn of Clonfertmulloe (d. 661). To the Antiochene current belongs the De mirabilibus Sacrae Scripturae (CPL 1123) of the so-called Hibernian Augustine (ca. 655). The commentary on the Catholic Epistles preserved in the cod. Augiensis 233, copied from an Irish original (CPL 1123a), draws not only on patristic writings but also on learned Irishmen (Laidcenn and others). The ps.-Augustinian Liber de ordine creaturarum (CPL 1189) takes much knowledge of cosmology, anthropology, demonology, angelology and eschatology from Holy Scripture; it is attributed to *Isidore of Seville, but it is probably by an Irish author working around 650. The biblical cultivation of Jerome concerning the interpretation of Hebrew proper names is present in *Aileran the Wise (d. 665), monk of Clonard, who developed in an anagogic and moral sense the genealogy of Christ (CPL 1120), a genre much practiced in Ireland as an alternative to historiography in a stricter sense (annals, hagiography); see the Additamentum de S. Columbae discipulis et cognatis (CPL 1135).

Among the moral writings the De duodecim abusivis saeculi (CPL 1106) stands out, a treatise stigmatizing the customs of contemporary society (ca. 630–650), aimed particularly at laypeople; the anonymous author draws on both the Etymologiae of Isidore and on indigenous works, displaying similarity to texts in the vernacular. There are numerous writings from the 6th c. on the paschal calculation (see CPL 2302ff.); among these the De controversia paschali (CPL 2310), of ca. 632, is in the form of a letter addressed to Ségéne of Iona and to the hermit Béccén in defense of the Alexandrian cycle: the author, Cummian, perhaps abbot of Durrow, should not be identified with the Cuimíne Fota of Clonfert (d. 661–662), who is, however, the author of a Penitential (CPL 1882) and of the hymn Celebra Iuda, mentioned above. Perhaps from Irish authors are the anonymous Disputatio de sollemnitatibus et sabbatis (CPL 2278), attributed to Columbanus, and the De saltu lunae (CPL 2317), of a ps.-Alcuin, not earlier than *Bede.

The hagiographic production is abundant starting from the 7th c.; many Vitae were redacted at different times, leaving the final version extant. Especially the oldest Vitae do not offer much genuine information on the saint, but mostly hagiographic topoi and only accidentally historical information. The legend of St. Brigid is linked both to local druidism and to the veneration of Patrick, with the acceptance of the primacy of Armagh on the part of the S and the acceptance of the "Roman" observance on the part of the N; the most ancient text extant is perhaps the anonymous Vita s. Brigidae (CPL 2148), once attributed to Ultanus bishop of Ardbraccan, and today to Aileran: it probably depends on the same source (perhaps part of oral tradition) which Cogitosus drew on, when around 650 or a little later he wrote another biography of the saint (CPL 2147), maintaining, however, the primacy of the church of Kildare; traces of such a common source could be present in the biography in Irish (Bethu Brigte), written in the 9th c. Cogitosus serves as a model for Muirchú moccu Machténi (d. after 697), author of a life of Patrick (Lapidge-Sharpe 303) which was commissioned from him by Áed bishop of Sléibte, at the moment when the latter was transferring his church from the jurisdiction of the kings of Leinster and Kildare to that of Ségéne, bishop-abbot of Armagh: the work of Muirchú is based on the Confessio of Patrick and on oral traditions; the hagiographic material gathered by Ultanus is referred to by the Collectanea of Tirechán, composed perhaps between 660 and 670 and little by little completed with Notae suppletoriae and Additamenta and Notulae (Lapidge-Sharpe 301). Alongside these texts about Patrick there is, in the Book of Armagh (807), the Liber Angeli (Lapidge-Sharpe 360), composed—at least in its present form—perhaps in the 1st half of the 8th c.: it is a Latin text—even if with many Hibernicisms—which refers to a revelation made by an angel to St. Patrick concerning the prerogatives of the primatial see of Armagh, with a recognition of the authority of Rome. Only a fragment remains of the Vita of St. Columba (CPL 1133) written by Cummineus Albus (Cuimíne Ailbe, d. 669), seventh abbot of Iona: this is found interpolated into the Vita Columbae (1133a), which was written between 692 and 697 by Adamnan, ninth abbot of Iona.

Ireland, outside the influence of Roman law, enjoyed a great flowering of canon law. The canonists were probably educated in the lay juridical schools: in fact, the canons of the 7th c., generally respectful of the indigenous culture, reveal the effort of fusion between ecclesiastical law and secular law. The latter is represented—in its most ancient phase—by the "Great tradition" (Senchas Már): compiled at the beginning of the 8th c., this collects legal texts of the 7th c. or even older. The ancient Irish ecclesiastical legislation is gathered on the other hand in the Collectio canonum Hibernensis (CPL 1794), compiled at the beginning of the 8th c. by Cú-Chuimne of Iona and Ruben of Dairinis: it consists of canons promulgated by synods of the 6th–7th c. (synods of ecclesiastics, but in the 7th c. with the assistance of laymen), gathered by drawing on numerous written sources, among the most recent being Theodore and Adamnan. Furthermore the cána, laws generally attributed to some saint—like the above-mentioned Cáin Adomnáin—demonstrate a system of collaboration between ecclesiastical authorities and secular authorities, which would conclude with the beginning of the Viking invasion (ca. 830).

In the oldest Irish literature are texts in a mixed language, with phrases half-Latin and half-Gaelic. An interesting example of preaching to the people is the Sermon of Cambrai (Kenney 111), dated at the 2nd half of the 7th c. or else the beginning of the 8th c. (but preserved in a continental transcription): in this the biblical text is cited in Latin (probably there did not yet exist translations into Gaelic) as are the Fathers, while the commentary is done in the vulgar tongue.

Irish historiography expressed itself in the annalistic genre, which offered dates and names, but not an organic chronicle. The oldest extant annals are the Annals of Four Masters, of the 7th c., a little earlier than the more famous Annals of Ulster (Lapidge-Sharpe 592). In fact, in the first there is material perhaps from as early as the 2nd half of the 6th c., even if totally revised in the 9th; in the 2nd, the oldest part dates to the 7th c. Today one speaks of a Chronicle of Iona to indicate a material which must have entered the ancient Irish annals; this was probably written from 680 to 740, at the time of Adamnan, making use—for facts earlier than 680—of notes contemporaneous with the facts. The possibility is also considered today that there may have existed a Chronicle of Bangor, interested in the events of Ulster. These two chronicles could have furnished the oldest stratum of the Irish chronicles. In the Annals of Ulster there is also information from the Chronicle of Kildare, begun around 650. The historical data which can be found in the annals has been enriched with that of the genealogies, elegies and tributes composed by the filid in honor of their powerful protectors, and from the sagas with which they passed on the ancient indigenous legends. The cycle of Ulster collects material which is perhaps from the middle of the 7th to the beginning of the 8th c.; the oldest recension, born from the fusion of the two versions of the 9th c., is the version I, contained in a MS of ca. 1100 (Lebor na hUidre): this reports ancient oral traditions, perhaps from the beginning of the Christian era or, more likely, not earlier than the 4th c. AD.

Among the material, dating to the 7th c., contained in sagas in prose but above all in verse (ed. K. Meyer, Conall Corc and the Corco Luigde: Anecdota from Irish manuscripts 3 [1910] 57-63), the genealogies stand out: these are sometimes attributed to ancient and mythic poets, such as Find Fili or Laidcend mac Bairchedo, or else (with more verisimilitude) to authors of the 7th c., such as Luccreth moccu Cérai; the latter, e.g., wrote a long genealogy (dating back to Adam), in verse, of Cú Cen Máthair, king of Cashel (d. 664–666), drawing on the Etymologiae of Isidore. The history of Ireland is narrated as the succession of colonization of different groups in the Lebor Gabála Érenn, of which some parts are preserved in the Book of Ballymote and in the Book of Leinster: the most ancient version was already circulating in the 8th c., but later revisions were superimposed on this until the end of the 12th c.

Introduction to the sources: J.F. Kenney, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: I. Ecclesiastical, An Introduction and Guide, with addenda by L. Bieler, New York 21966; F.J. Byrne, Seventh-Century Documents: Irish Ecclesiastical Record 108 (1967) 164-182; T.P. Cross, Motif-Index of Early Irish Literature, New York 1969; M. Lapidge - R. Sharpe, A Bibliography of Celtic-Latin Literature, 400-1200, Dublin 1985; F. Kelly, A Guide to Early Irish Law, Dublin 1988; R. Sharpe, A Handlist of the Latin Writers of Great Britain and Ireland before 1540, Dublin 1997.

Editions and translations of the sources: Annals of Four Masters, ed. J. O'Donovan, 7 vols., Dublin ²1856; Ancient Laws of Ireland, 6 vols., Dublin-London 1865–1901; Cáin Adomnáin, ed. K. Meyer, Oxford 1905; Hymnodia Hiberno-Celtica saeculi V-IX (Anal. hymn., 51), ed. C. Blume, Leipzig 1908, 257-364; Lebor na hUidre, ed. R.I. Best - O. Bergin, Dublin 1929; Lebor Gabála Érenn (The Book of the Taking of Ireland), ed. R.A.S. Macalister, 5 vols., Dublin 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1956; Bethu Phatraic: Tripartite Life of Patrick, ed. K. Mulchrone, Dublin 1939; The Annals of Inisfallen (Ms. Rawlinson B. 503), ed. S. Mac Airt, Dublin 1951; L. Bieler (ed.), The Hymn of St. Secundinus: PRIA 55C (1953) 117-127; Sancti Columbani opera, ed. G.S.M. Walker, SLH 2, Dublin 1957 (1970); Adomnán's De Locis Sanctis, ed. D. Meehan, by G.S.M. Walker, SLH 3, Dublin 1958; Lebor na Cert, The Book of Rights, ed. M. Dillon, Dublin 1962; L. Bieler (ed.), The Irish Penitentials, SLH 5, Dublin 1963: Táin Bó Cúailnge, Recension I, ed. C. O'Rahilly, Dublin 1976; Jonas, Vita Columbani et discipulorum eius, ed. M. Tosi, It. tr. E. Cremona - M. Paramidani, Piacenza 1965; Hisperica famina, ed. M.W. Herren, I-II, Toronto 1974–1987; Bethu Brigte, ed. D. Ó hAodha, Dublin 1978; Corpus iuris Hibernici, ed. D.A. Binchy, Baile Atha Cliath 1978; Giraldus Cambrensis, Expugnatio Hibernica, ed. A.B. Scott - F.X. Martin, Dublin 1978; Bechbretha, ed. T.M. Charles-Edwards - F. Kelly, Dublin 1983; Annals of Ulster, ed. S. Mac Airt - G. Mac Niocaill, Dublin 1983; Adomnán's Life of Columba, ed. A.O. Anderson - M. Ogilvie Anderson, Oxford ²1991; D.R. Howlett, The Book of Letters of Saint Patrick the Bishop, Dublin 1994; Amra Choluimb Chille, ed. Th.O. Clancy - G. Márkus, Iona. The Earliest Poetry of a Celtic Monastery, Edinburgh 1995, 104ff.; G. Cambrense, Agli estremi confini d'Occidente: descrizione dell'Irlanda (Topographia Hibernica), ed. M. Cataldi, Turin 2002.

History: K. Hughes, The Church and Early Irish Society, Ithaca, NY 1966; L. Bieler, La conversione al cristianesimo dei Celti insulari e le sue ripercussioni nel continente, in La conversione al Cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'Alto Medioevo, 14-19 aprile 1966: Settimane di studio del Centro Italiano di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo 14 (1967) 559-580; M. De Paor - L. De Paor, Antica Irlanda cristiana, It. tr., Milan 1969; A. Gwynn - R. Neville Hadcock, Medieval Religious Houses: Ireland, London 1970; C. Thomas, Britain and Ireland in Early Christian Times, AD. 400-800, New York 1971; L. Laing, The Archaeology of Late Celtic Britain and Ireland c. 400-1200 AD, London 1975; J.F. Killeen, Ireland in the Greek and Roman Writers: PRIA 76 (1976) 207-215; P. Harbison, Pre-Christian Ireland: From the First Settlers to the Early Celts, London 1988; H. Mytum, The Origins of Early Christian Ireland, London-New York 1992; Ch. Harrington, Women in a Celtic Church: Ireland 450-1150, Oxford 2002.

Culture: L. Bieler, Ireland, Harbinger of the Middle Ages, London 1963; E. Knott - G. Murphy, Early Irish Literature, London 1966; E. Coccia, La cultura irlandese precarolingia. Miracolo o mito?: StudMed 8 (1967) 257-420; W. Meid, Dichter and Dichtkunst im alten Irland, Innsbruck 1971; Ch. Bowen, A Historical Inventory of the Dindshenchas: Studia Celtica 10/11 (1975/76) 113-137; D.A. Binchy, The Pseudo-Historical Prologue to the Senchas Már: Studia Celtica 10/11 (1975/76) 15-28; V. Law, The Insular Latin Grammarians, Woodbridge 1982; H. Löwe (ed.), Die Iren und Europa in früheren Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1982; M. Richter, Irland im Mittelalter: Kultur und Geschichte, Stuttgart . . . 1983; P. Ní Chatháin - M. Richter (eds.), Irland und Europa / Ireland und Europe. Die Kirche im Frühmittelalter / The Early Church, Stuttgart 1984; E. Malaspina, Patrizio e l'acculturazione latina dell'Irlanda, L'Aquila-Rome 1984; Id., Agli albori della cultura latina in Irlanda: StudRom 33 (1985) 1-10; J. Stevenson, The Beginnings of Literacy in Ireland: PRIA 89C (1989) 127-165; R. & V. Megaw, Celtic Art: From Its beginnings to the Book of Kells, London 1989; D. Ó hÓgáin, Myth, Legend and Romance: An Encyclopædia of the Irish Folk Tradition, London 1990; D. McManus, A Guide to Ogam, Maynooth 1991; L. de Paor (Eng. tr., comm.), Saint Patrick's World: The Christian Culture of Ireland's Apostolic Age, Blackrock 1993; D. ó Cróinín, The Irish as Mediators of Antique Culture on the Continent, in Science in Western and Eastern Civilization in Carolingian Times, ed. by P.L. Butzer - D. Lohrmann, Basel-Boston 1993, 41-52; D. R. Edel (ed.), Cultural Identity and Cultural Integration: Ireland and Europe in the Early Middle Ages, Dublin 1995; P. Ní Chatháin - M. Richter (ed.), Irland und Europa im früheren Mittelalter. Bildung und Literatur, Stuttgart 1996; B. Luiselli, La storiografia dell'Irlanda tardoantica e altomedievale: dalle tradizioni orali dei druidi alle tradizioni scritte degli intellettuali cristiani: Cassiodorus 3 (1997) 153-174; J.M. Higgins, The Dog in the Nighttime: Rome's Invasion of Ireland: Studies in Latin literature and Roman history 9 (1998) 401-410; B. Luiselli, I Celti dell'ultima Irlanda pagana e della prima Irlanda cristiana di fronte a Roma e all'Europa, in Memoria del passato, urgenza del futuro. Il mondo romano fra V e VII secolo. Atti delle VI giornate di studio sull'età romanobarbarica, Benevento 18-20 giugno 1998, ed. M. Rotili, Naples 1999, 7-16; M. Richter, Ireland and Her Neighbours in the Seventh Century, Dublin 1999; L. Pernet, Roma et Hibernia: le mobilier romain en Irlande et ses interprétations: Chronozones 6 (2000) 10-23; D. Edel, The Celtic West and Europe: Studies in Celtic Literature and the Early Irish Church, Dublin-Portland 2001; Ph. Freeman, Ireland and the Classical World, Austin, TX 2001; B. Luiselli, La formazione della cultura europea occidentale, Rome 2003, 76-108, 137-156, 223-236.

E. Malaspina

IRENAEUS of Harpassus (6th c.). The author of a treatise Contra synodum Chalcedonensem et tomum Leonis, about which we are informed only by a citation of the title in a Greek anthology Doctrina Patrum of the 7th c. Two fragments, quoted a little later in the anthology, of a work by *Cyrus of Edessa, probably written between 508 and 511, suggest that Irenaeus's treatise may be attributed to the same years.

CPG 7113; Diekamp, 312; E. Honingmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieur au VI^e^ siècle (CSCO 127, Subsidia 2), Louvain 1951, 124-125.

K. den Biesen

IRENAEUS of Lyons (130/140–after 198)
I. Life - II. Works - III. Theology.

I. Life. The biographical information on Irenaeus comes, for the most part, from his works themselves, from which it was gathered by *Eusebius (HE, esp. in book 5); the other sources, whether ante-Nicene or later, do not offer anything new. Irenaeus, a native of Asia Minor, as a youth had heard the elderly *Polycarp at Smyrna (Adv. haer. III, 3,4; Eus., HE 5, 20,6-7: letter of Irenaeus to Florinus) which suggests that he was born ca. 130–140; the acquaintance with Polycarp is a key point in his comportment and doctrine, as it allows him to reach far back in the transmission of doctrine (Adv. haer. III, 3,4; III, 1,1, V, 33,4; Ep. ad Flor.: Eus., HE 5, 20,6; Ep. ad Vict.: Eus., HE 5, 24,6). It seems that Irenaeus spent a certain period of time at Rome also; however, around 177 he was at *Lyons in *Gaul. This community sent him to Rome to its bishop, *Eleutherus, to bring him the Letter of the Martyrs of Lyons (Eus., HE 5, 4,2); in the accompanying letter Irenaeus is called "presbyter," a title which might also indicate, in his case, the episcopal office (cf. P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens des II^e^ et III^e^ siècles, Paris 1961, 43-49 and 93-95). In any case, on his return to Lyons, he was the successor of *Pothinus; during the pontificate of *Victor (189–198), he intervened to exhort him to patience and understanding with the bishops of Asia concerning the date of the celebration of Easter: this gesture is his last known act which can be dated in any way; we have nothing later. The report of his martyrdom is late.

II. Works. Two works of Irenaeus have reached us: (1) The Adversus haereses, preserved intact only in a literal Latin translation; an *Armenian translation of books IV and V; numerous fragments in *Syriac and different fragments in Greek which can be located through citations in later authors and in the catenae (Irenaeus was a widely read author). The intention of the work is "the unmasking and the refutation of the false gnosis" (as the title says in Greek); (2) the Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching, of which an Armenian translation was found at Erevan in Armenia only in 1904, published for the first time in 1907 (its existence was already known: see Eus., HE 5, 26). It is a short compendium of the Christian faith of a catechetical character. Two fragments of his letters also survive in Eusebius: to Florinus (HE 5, 20) and to Pope Victor (HE 5, 24). There is no precise information concerning other works.

III. Theology. The theology of Irenaeus is not born spontaneously, but in opposition to the heterodox. The heterodox, with mythic language and through a singular harmony of concepts, had developed the data of the Christian revelation: from the theological, prior to the generation of the Word and the creation of matter, to the cosmic and the Historia salutis. Irenaeus, as if forced by the *gnostics, and in particular by the *Valentinians, confronts almost all fields of revelation, but he does not try to know what God was doing before creating the world (II, 28,3), the manner of the generation of the Word (II, 28,6), the origin and manner of the creatio prima (II, 28,7), and other things of minor interest because, acc. to him, precise information is missing in the Scripture.

Doubtless, there are points of great importance where Irenaeus agrees with his adversaries. One preliminary point, formulated neither by them nor by Irenaeus, pertains to the constituent part of humanity called to salvation and gives us the key to their two antithetical constructions. Everything turns on the Salus hominis. The Word itself, together with the Spirit, is directed to the salvific mediation of humanity. God, known through vision, explains it and seals his destiny. The Historia salutis concerns the anthropos from his appearance in the world, across both Testaments, up to his maturity as perfected humanity through spiritual communion with God. To these themes, similar in Irenaeus and in the Valentinians, correspond two completely different conceptions.

On the one hand, gnosticism begins from the idea homo verus = homo spiritualis: the true anthropos consists only of that which is of the same nature as God. For this reason, only the physically divine homo is called to (true) Salus, through communion with God. The conception of Irenaeus, on the other hand, starts from the identity homo verus = caro: the true anthropos is only the body molded, from earth, to the image and likeness of God. For this reason, only the physically terrestrial homo (caro, plasma) is called to (true) Salus, through communion of the spirit with God. In the religio mentis of the Valentinians the Deus verus = Deus ignotus dominates; and, in a negative transposition, Deus verus = non Demi- urgus. The Demiurge of the material world and Plasmator of visible humanity, father of the seven archons and planetary heavens, is the instrument of a higher Wisdom. The OT, dominated by him, is ignorant of the true God. According to Irenaeus, Deus verus = Demiurgus; there is no other God than Yahweh. The Oeconomia salutis, in acc. with its extreme poles—humanity and God—naturally has a different result. No one questions the Scripture.

For the gnostics, behind the immediacy of the letter, there is the meaning given in secret by the Wisdom of the unknown God. Both meanings of the revelation are true: the literal, which responds to the inspiration of the Demiurge; the spiritual, to that of the Wisdom. The gnostics, however, in their lifestyle (and also for their final *exegesis), remain faithful to the spiritual meaning and leave to the ecclesiastical crowd (successors of Israel) the immediate meaning. Accustomed to parallel double exegesis, they interpret the Scripture in their own way, without scruples, even making of the Demiurge himself an "animal" image of the true God, and find in their acts the image of the other superior spiritual beings.

In the exegesis of Irenaeus, against the Valentinians, one must always distinguish between its real value as an expression of Irenaeus's thought and its effectiveness faced with the gnostic doctrine, in most cases practically nonexistent. The relationship between humanity and its archetype takes on importance for the relationship between humanity and God. For the Valentinians, the truly spiritual homo was made in the image and physical (= consubstantial) likeness of the Only-Begotten; the visible homo was simply modeled by the Demiurge and by his archons in material substance. The homo spiritualis, having entered into the homo materialis, must submit to the laws of the latter, until he opens, in the fullness of time, to the gnosis of the Father, through the work of the Only-Begotten made man. For Irenaeus, in contrast, one and the same being was made in the image and likeness of God, and was modeled by the Demiurge (Gen 1:26-27 = Gen 2:7): the homo-caro, whose archetype is the substantial image of God—the Word—and also the substantial Likeness of God—the *Holy Spirit—visible in the glorious flesh of Jesus.

The Valentinian Adam was formed in the image of the preexisting divine Anthropos; that of Irenaeus in the image of the future second Adam. The glorious flesh of Jesus is not only the future paradigm of the first Adam, homo = caro, it is also physical mediator between the Demiurge (Deus spiritus) and humanity (caro): the Word, consubstantial with God the Father, and flesh, consubstantial with Adam. To the personal communion of Verbo/carne, the glorious Christ adds the physical (qualitative) communion of Spiritus/carne, through the dynamic perfection (qualitas Spiritus) of his flesh: thus, fully deified, he becomes the one who deifies, capable of pouring into his brothers and sisters (secundum carnem) the Spirit received at his anointing in the Jordan for their benefit. Both mysteries, the *incarnation and the glorification of the Word acc. to the flesh, can be seen in the formation and the destiny of Adam, read in the light of St. Paul. It does not matter that the image is prior in time to the paradigm. It certainly is not so in the predestination of God. Therefore, even before the drama of Paradise, faced with the simple human caro, issued from the two hands—Son and Spirit—of God, Irenaeus proclaims the great sacraments of the historia salutis: (1) Trinitarian: unlike other creatures, including the angels, made by the order of the Creator, humanity was modeled from virgin earth with the help of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, corresponding to the image and likeness of the Father; a work of clay, humanity resumes in the flesh, from the beginning to the end of the oeconomia, the works of God: opera autem Dei plasmatio est hominis (V, 15,2). (2) Christological: Adam announces in his flesh the two highest perfections of Christ the paradigm, the personal—Word made flesh—and the natural—flesh clothed in Spirit—synthesized as in the divinely perfect Anthropos in the glorious flesh of the Lord (IV, 20,2). (3) The history of the world: to bring out from the initial mud the body made God through the physical communion with the Spirit of the Father, the primordial plasis is not enough; because of the congenital incapacity of the caro to live acc. to the Spiritus Patris, a continual gradual plasis is needed, with the same two divine hands which began it in Adam: the Spiritus Sanctus, prophetic, in the OT shapes the caro and makes it capable of receiving, in the fullness of time, the Word, Son of God; the Spiritus adoptionis, that of the Son glorified in the flesh, in the NT carries on the formation of the caro so that in the final consummation it may receive the Spiritus Patris in its totality, and enter into perfect communion of life with the Creator. (4) Salvific: acc. to Mt 11:27, no one reaches salvation—immediate knowledge of the Father—apart from the mediation of the Son; nor does the Son intervene effectively in the salvation of humanity, unless he is first incarnated; nor is the incarnation of the Word enough to save his brothers and sisters if he is not deified in the body, through communion of the Spirit (i.e., the divine Life) with the Creator. Only then, and that is only when he is so glorified with the glory which he had before the creation of the world, the same Caro gloriosa which was presented to the eyes of the Creator as an archetype of Adam, becomes the origin—through the effusion of his Spirit—of the deification of humanity, and is constituted mediator between God and humanity, between the Spiritus Deus and the homo caro; like one who receives secundum carnem from the Father the Spirit which he then pours into that of human beings, his brothers and sisters, disposing them toward the divine heights of his own life. (5) Salus carnis: what meaning has the Salus spiritus? The spirit, although within the person, is not the subject but the agent of salvation. Per se, not even the Salus animae is relevant, although in the composite human being salvation includes also that of the soul. Important above all is the Salus carnis, the effective fruit of the mediation of Christ. Since it is clear that salvation consists in the communion of life with God, it is clear that humanity will be saved first of all secundum carnem. Despite its terrestrial nature, the caro, rendered apt through history for the immediate vision of the Father, will see him with its own powers and sentiments (II, 30,7), in the summits, where the caro gloriosa of the Lord lives, above the angels (V, 36,3) who are not made in the image and likeness of God. His Demiurge, then, will finish the plasis begun in Adam, anticipated, as in its paradigm, in the glorious body of Jesus.

As the foundation of their Oeconomia salutis, an axiom was strongly perceived among the gnostics, but never formulated: ὅμοιον τῷ ὁμοίῳ. In an economy of Salus-gnosis, if the object of the salvific knowledge is pure Spiritus, this can only be obtained by the spiritual. The divine from the divine. To this is added their respect for physical laws (II, 14,4). Without any difficulty in admitting—in a transitory phase—miracles of the natural order, these do not break, in the definitive phase, the harmony of the elements: to the spiritual corresponds the region of the Spiritus; to the animal, that of the Anima; to the material, that of the Hyle.

As for the principle homo = anima, from the times of *Justin, many ecclesiastics proceeded on another axiom, half formulated: anima = imago Spiritus, and therefore, homo = imago (naturalis) Dei. *Origen first, and later *Augustine, emphasized the affinity of substance between the psyche and God: as if the soul ordered itself in some way to its destiny of salvation through the vision of God; and a contrario as if the height of the beatific knowledge were put in danger by bringing in homo = plasma, or if that resulted in an anthropomorphism which would make of the Logos and the Holy Spirit—respectively image and likeness of God—the paradigm of the human caro.

Irenaeus reasons in an entirely different way. Closeness of substance compromises the liberality of the divine dispensatio, the implicit postulate of which is: the more the substance of humanity is distant in nature from the divinity, the more the divine will shine in the human economy, and the more this will be worthy of God. There is no consubstantiality (gnostic thesis), no affinity of any kind (Origenian thesis) between humanity and God, but antithesis and absolute diversity between the caro, called to salvation, and the Father—Spiritus Patris—who is its author. In the dispensatio caro, Spiritus, the power, wisdom, liberality and goodness of the Creator, shines better than in the others (spiritus—Spiritus and anima—Spiritus). The one who lifts up the flesh to gnosis of the Spirit reveals greater power than the one who does the same with spirits (Valentinian gnosis) or with rational souls (Origen and partisans of the salus animae): nam virtus in infirmitate perficitur (2 Cor 12:9). In the same way, through ways which can only be explained divinely, more wisdom shines in the deifying plasis of the earthly mud. In this way the munificence of God is realized better. The (personal and natural) embrace in Christ between the Spirit and the flesh is greater than, as Origen would have it, between the Spirit and the intellect (see Orig., De princ. II, 6,3). The same should be said of the final embrace, for the elect, between the flesh and the Spiritus Patris. He would be wrong who, in order to insist on the three components (see 1 Th 5:23) of the perfect human—Spiritus-anima-corpus—attributes to them an equal individual weight. Everyone admits in abstract the threefold division in this world. However, the Valentinians put the accent on the Spiritus, particular to the true human (homo = spiritus); the partisans of the salus animae do the same for the soul (homo = anima); Irenaeus, however, put the emphasis on the plasma (homo = caro). The gnostic anthropology is more pneumatology: soul and body accompany for now the Spiritus, but are alien to it. Origenian anthropology is more psychology: the Spiritus and the caro, united in the intellect (νοῦς), are alien to its essence. For the homo = caro of Irenaeus, the soul and the spirit are of the human, but they are not the human. One should never lose sight of this while reading Irenaeus, or before propositions like these: Haec enim gloria hominis, perseverare ac permanere in Dei servitute (IV, 14,1). He who perseveres in the service of God has already been and will soon be glorified by him in carne with his own glory. And in IV, 20, 7: Gloria enim Dei vivens homo, vita autem hominis visio Dei. God establishes his glory by raising up humanity—secundum carnem—to his own Life and Glory, making of the contemplation of God the life of the human caro, at present inchoate, but in the end complete through the five senses.

Everything is governed by the perfect economy, which unites the two natures most distant from each other—the divine, or Spiritus, and the human, or caro (= material)—uniting them into a deified flesh, acc. to the standard of the caro gloriosa of the second Adam.

The grand lines of the dispensatio, founded by God on the human caro, surpass a priori the entire created being. The Creator does not force things, nor can a divine comportment be expected from the rational and free plasma. He raises the human to Paradise, to a temporary state, equidistant from the athanasia of God and from the corruption congenital to matter; and he grants humans preternatural gifts, which help them reach their destiny easily. To educate them to meritorious obedience, he gives them a commandment under penalty of death. The temptation of the enemy arrives. Adam disobeys God, submits to the will of the enemy, incurs death and is chased from the place and condition of Paradise. God, however, preserves him in his first blessing, curses the enemy, who brought him to sin, and announces the victory of the seed of the woman—the second Adam—over him.

The first sin reflects various aspects. Toward God: rebellion against his will, manifested in his commandment, and submission to the will of the enemy, manifested in his temptation; it is not an apostasy, but inexperience and ingratitude. The Creator does not castigate human beings by removing them definitively from himself; he castigates them with kindness, with the death which, by destroying them, renders it impossible for them to remain in sin. Toward the enemy: victory of the evil angel over humanity, doubly unjust, both because founded on a lie and because he enslaves a creature who belongs only to God; the fruit at the same time of his envy of humans and of his apostasy toward the Creator. Toward the human race: sin of nature; it is not the person who sinned, but the caro; the whole human race sinned, became hostile to God and submitted to the enemy. The last consequence of the transgression of the commandment of God (Gen 2:17) was death—mors carnis—from which the Creator had gratuitously exempted humanity. The consequence of the victory of the enemy was the capture of Adam and of his race under the power of the devil.

More than the relationship of the creature toward his Creator, Irenaeus, in the crime of Adam, underlines the victory of the enemy: directly over the preferred work of God and indirectly over his own Creator. He is not content only to rehabilitate humans alone before God; he intends also to rehabilitate them with a just and definitive victory over the enemy. Humanity—the caro—trespassed the commandment of God; and the caro will remedy the transgression by obeying the commandment of God. Humans fell from the state of life to that of death; humans will raise themselves from the state of death and pass to that of life. The same human race that had passed into the power of the enemy will liberate itself from this enemy, gaining the victory.

For all this, God could have employed other ways. He chose, rather, a very simple one, which fulfilled what had been announced in Gen 3:15, without modifying any of the great lines of the historia salutis, traced from the formation of Adam. God did not suddenly offer the remedy to sin, nor even to its consequences; he only announced this for an established time. Humans had to experience in their flesh the consequences of their error, or better, their condition as creatures, generously destined by the Creator, from their formation, to divine heights.

The prediction of Gen 3:15 did not introduce a new mediator into the world. To the ephemeral victory of the enemy over humanity corresponds the definitive triumph of humanity over the devil. The archetype of the protoplasm will also become humanity's reconciler before God and their redeemer from the slavery of the devil. A paradigm a contrario of the first Adam, the second will bring humans back to their original friendship with God, strip the prey from the enemy and finish with death: everything, through his obedience alone in carne up to the death on the cross.

God did not introduce a new mediator, but enriched with new aspects the ancient salvific mediation for humanity, having entered into the death and slavery of the evil one to be this. The aspects of the reconciling death on the cross, preceding the glorification of Christ in the flesh, leave intact the primordial lines of the mediation; they only serve to bring to light the highest perfections. The doxa which, in the case of the dispensatio of the nonguilt of humanity, had covered the flesh of Jesus from the moment of baptism in the Spirit, without having to undergo death on the cross, in the economy of sin makes itself known as teleiōsis linked to the passion and death on the cross (see Heb 2:9-10). The present economy takes nothing away from the first, but adds to it. God, by choosing death on the cross for the reconciliation of humanity, keeps present the antithesis between the tree of perfect knowledge and that of the cross; their external form is the same. The Logos, invisible preserver (σωτήρ) of the world by way of his efficacy in restraining (συνοχή) evil, had to die on a cross to indicate in front of all the universal efficacy of his death, in obedience to the Father, similar—in the human salvific order—to the universal efficacy which, crucified in the cosmos, he exercises on the four parts of the world. The plasma had made itself an enemy of the Plasmator, and this plasma had to return to friendship with the Plasmator. However, for this the reconciliation with the Son by way of the incarnation was not enough. The flesh of Jesus does not enter into the sin of Adam, because it is virginal flesh; and for this reason it does not need to be reconciled. Rather, because it is caro iusta (V, 14 and 15), it can merit for its brothers and sisters both reconciliation with the Father, through obedience to him in the death on the cross (in corpore carnis eius: Col 1:22) and redemption, through the shedding of his blood; in this way the caro iusta reconciled with the Father the iniusta of Adam and his children. And at the same time it redeemed it, removing it at once from the power of death and the enemy.

Critics of Irenaeus have created great confusion in explaining his doctrine of redemption. In an anthropology like that of Origen (homo = anima), the dominion (slavery) of the devil over souls in hell is understandable. It is different in Irenaean anthropology (homo = caro). It can be understood in two ways: (1) The devil demonstrates his dominion over humans by bringing them all, based on his victory over Adam, to physical death, breaking the communion caro-anima, and preventing their conduct secundum spiritum toward God; (2) by his dominion over Hades, the devil keeps souls apart, preventing them from reuniting in the future with their respective bodies.

Human redemption can also be understood in two ways: (1) The Lord goes to physical death, separating the soul from the body, and offering his body for the redemption of the bodies "dead since Adam," and also his soul for the redemption of souls; Christ made this offering to the Father on behalf of his brothers and sisters; (2) shedding his blood, before death, the Lord presents it to the Father as the price of the redemption of bodies and souls, so that both may be reunited and, through the resurrectio carnis, he established the state of being necessary for human salvation. These two ways of understanding are perfectly compatible and correspond fully to Irenaeus's anthropology. The same should be said for the manner of understanding the domination of the devil over humans. There is no presumed domination of the devil over Hades (i.e., over the separate souls); and no redemption of these souls, apart from Christ, via a price: blood, offered to the devil and accepted by him (!). Expressions like (V, 2,1): Non aliena in dolo diripiens, sed sua propria iuste et benigne assumens: quantum attinet quidem ad apostasiam, iuste suo sanguine redimens nos ab ea; quantum autem ad nos qui redempti sumus, benigne, given the unjust aggression, on the part of the devil, against what does not belong to him, accentuate the just return of humanity from the hands of the apostate (and death) to those of the Creator, assuring definitively, with the pouring out of the blood of Christ (death and resurrection following), the restitution of Adam—in body and soul—to human salvation.

The sign of the complete triumph of the Redeemer over the enemy (i.e., over sin and death) is the personal resurrection of Christ, firstfruits of the dead, which is not the simple restitution of the human composite, but is a new and definitive plasis on the part of the Spiritus Dei, with absolute dominion of the divine life (athanasia, "incorruption, eternity") over the substantia carnis. This triumph consecrates Christ before the Father and humanity from two points of view: as the archetype of the first Adam, in divine flesh; as firstborn of the dead and conqueror of sin (the enemy, death). He unites two economies: the spontaneous one of Yahweh, preceding the decree of the redemption; and the complementary one, after this. God, with the parenthesis of the death and resurrection of his Son, remedies the fall of humanity and perpetuates forever the state of life to which humanity had been destined from the beginning. Far from correcting one economy with another, he enriches it with new profiles.

These are, in synthesis, the grand ideas of Irenaeus. Ideas notable for their simplicity, in an anthropology which is also simple, of Johannine flavor—affirmed with emphasis in the homo-caro—alien and also contrary to Hellenism, ideas developed with singular coherence in antithesis to the opinion of the Valentinians (and also of the ecclesiastics who defended the salus animae). It is not the theology of the unknown God, nor that of God the Father; but the theology of the Demiurge (of the material world) and Plasmator of earthly humanity. Nor is it even a theology of Christ, mediator between God Spiritus and spiritual human beings, nor between the God of the angelic intelligences and rational human beings; but it is the theology of the caro Christi, mediator between the Plasmator and his plasma: it is not the salus spiritus nor the salus animae, but the salus carnis. The work of God does not aim to create, nor to sanctify angels; still less to angelize humanity by eliminating the caro; but to perpetuate with eternal life the humble plasis begun in Adam. In the end, as a conclusive synthesis, the great paradox Caro = Deus is articulated, anticipated, as in an archetype, in the firstborn of creation and of the dead.

Despite the powerful coherence of Irenaeus, and despite the fact that he, on the basis of the salus carnis, exemplifies the immense scope of the revelation, he clearly manifests, now and then, disparate ideologies, or at least tendencies. The stages into which he sometimes divides the OT correspond poorly to the linear vision of history (IV, 38,1ff.) as progress from the imperfect and infantile to the perfect and adult: the glorious patriarchal era of the friends of God, with the Decalogue carved in their hearts; the time of the (Mosaic) law, hard as the tables of the law itself and the people for whom they are adapted; the prophetic era (see III, 11,8). In the number of the Antichrist (666), in which the apostasy of the world is gathered in toto, Irenaeus sees three parts (V, 29,2): the times of Noah, encoded in the number 600; the times of pagan idolatry, encoded into the number 60; and those of the persecution of the prophets, encoded in the number 6. There is no space and time for encoding the apostasy of the NT: as if defection, very common in antediluvian times, diminished later, to vanish completely at the time of the gospel. The physical immortality of the soul, defined dangerously in II, 34,1—perhaps influenced by Justin (Dial. 5,1)—is presented better and definitively in V, 7,1. The decisive attitude of Irenaeus (V, 24,4) about the nature of the devil (unus ex angelis his qui super spiritum aeris praepositi sunt) and his apostasy through envy toward humanity: invidens homini [see Wis 2:24], apostata a divina factus est lege [cf. Plato, Laws IV, 715; cf. III, 25,5]: invidia enim aliena est a Deo [cf. Phaedrus, 247 a] contrasts with his reserve as to the nature and the fall of the angels (in II, 28,7). In an author so radically biblical and Johannine, the recourse to Plato concerning the apostasy of the devil a divina lege is disconcerting.

These anomalies, however, disappear before the absolute maturity and control concerning other issues, which were as complex as they were unexplored by prior tradition. Much of this is due to the rapid assimilation of the Johannine content—concerning the caro Christi—inherited from the presbyters; much also to the teaching of Justin. But the organic development of the revealed data, carried out against the Valentinian doctrine starting from the exegesis of Gen 1:26 and 2:7, is the very personal contribution of Irenaeus, which—for his instinctive adherence to Scripture, for his independence from Hellenistic postulates and for his profoundly human theology—deserved that continuing influence that history reserved for other less clear and profound theologies.

Editions: CPG 1306-1320; Adv. haer.: R. Massuet, PG 7; H.H. Harvey, Cambridge 1857; A. Rousseau and L. Doutreleau, SC 263 and 264 (I); 293 and 294 (II); 210 and 211 (III); 100 (IV); 152 and153 (V) with Fr. tr.; Armen. vers.: E. TerMinassiantz, TU 35,2; Ch. Renoux, PO 39, 1-164. Eng. tr.: ANF I, 309-589; It. tr.: E. Bellini, Milan 1980; Adv. Haer.: Eng. tr. D.J. Unger, rev. J.J. Dillon, New York 1992; Dem.: ed. E. Romero Pose, Madrid 1992; ed. A. Rousseau, SC 406, Paris 1995. Demonstratio: K. TerMekerttschian and S.G. Wilson, PO 12, 655-746 with Eng. tr., Fr. tr.: J. Barthoulot, PO 12, 747-802; L. Froidevaux, SC 62; It. tr.: U. Faldati, Rome 1923 and Milan 1980; V. Dellagiacoma, Siena 21968; E. Peretto, Rome 1981; Eng.: J.P. Smith, ACW 16. Lexicon: B. Reynders, CSCO 141.142/subs. 5.6 (Adv. haer.); Id., Chevetogne 1958 (Dem.)

Studies: F. Loofs, Theophilus von Antiochien Adversus Marcionem und die anderen theologischen Quellen bei Irenaeus (TU 46,2), Leipzig 1930; S. Lundström, Studien and Neue Studien zur lateinischen Irenaeusübersetzung, Lund 1943 and 1948; F.M. Sagrard, La gnose Valentinienne et le témoignage de saint Irénée, Paris 1947; A. Houssiau, La christologie de saint Irénée, Louvain 1955; A. Benoit, Saint Irénée. Introduction à l'étude de sa théologie, Paris 1960; G. Joppich, Salus carnis. Eine Untersuchung in der Theologie des hl. Irenäus von Lyon, Münsterschwarzach 1965; N. Brox, Offenbarung, Gnosis und gnostischer Mythos bei Irenäus von Lyon, Salzburg 1966; J.T. Nielsen, Adam and Christ in the Theology of Irenaeus of Lyons, Assen 1968; J.I. González Faus, Carne de Dios. Significado salvador de la encarnación en la teología de san Ireneo, Barcelona 1969; A. Orbe, Antropología de san Ireneo, Madrid 1969; G. Jossa, *Regno di Dio e Chiesa. Ricerche sulla concezione escatologica ed ecclesiologica dell'*Adversus haereses di Ireneo, Naples 1970; A. Orbe, Parábolas evangélicas en san Ireneo, I-II, Madrid 1972; H.J. Jaschke, Der Heilige Geist im Bekenntnis der Kirche. Eine Studie zur Pneumatologie des Irenäus von Lyon, Münster 1976; P. Bacq, De l'ancienne à la nouvelle Alliance selon S. Irénée, Paris 1978; A. Orbe, ¿San Ireneo adopcionista? En torno a Adv. Haer. III,19,1: Gregorianum 65 (1984) 5-52; S. Lundström, Die Überlieferung der lateinischen Irenaeusübersetzung, Uppsala 1985; A. Orbe, Teología de San Ireneo. Comentario al Libro V del "Adversus haereses," 3 vols., Madrid 1985-1988; A. Orbe, Introducción a la teología de los siglos II y III, Rome 1987; A. Orbe, Deus facit, homo fit. Un axioma de San Ireneo: Gregorianum 69 (1988) 629-661; A. Orbe, Espiritualidad de San Ireneo, Rome 1989; A. Orbe, Gloria Dei vivens homo (análisis de Ireneo Adv. Haer. IV,20,1-79): Gregorianum 73 (1992) 205-268; Y.M. Blanchard, Aux sources du canon: le témoignage d'Irénée, Paris 1993; R. Noormann, Irenäus als Paulusinterpret: Zur Rezeption und Wirkung des paulinischen und deuteropaulinischen Briefe im Werk des Irenäus von Lyon, Tübingen 1994; A. Orbe, El Espíritu en el bautismo de Jesús (en torno a san Ireneo): Gregorianum 76 (1995) 663-699; A. Orbe, Teología de San Ireneo IV. Traducción y comentario del Libro IV del "Adversus Haereses," Madrid 1996; R.M. Grant, Irenaeus of Lyon, London 1997; R. Polanco, El concepto de profecía en la teología de san Ireneo, Madrid 1999; D. Wanke, Das Kreuz Christi bei Irenäus von Lyon, Berlin 2000; E.F. Osborn, Irenaeus of Lyon, Cambridge 2001; M. Aróstegui Esnaola, La amistad del Verbo con Abraham según san Ireneo de Lyon, Diss. Pont. Univ. Gregoriana, Rome 2003.

A. ORBE

IRENAEUS of Sirmium (d. 304). Bishop of *Sirmium, in Pannonia, he suffered martyrdom during the persecution of *Diocletian and *Maximian. According to the texts preserved in the Passio, Irenaeus was married and had children. Arrested by the governor Probus, he resisted pressure, threats and the cruel tortures inflicted upon him. Although the people, with whom he was very popular, and his wife and children begged him to apostatize, he did not yield and was finally condemned to decapitation 6 April 304. On that date his memory is celebrated today in the Roman martyrology (formerly it was fixed on 25 March). The Passio has reached us in both Greek (BHG 948-951) and Latin (BHL 4466), but neither of the two recensions seems original: for Tillemont the Latin text imitated the minutes of the tribunal; for Simonetti the original text, today lost, was in Greek. Recently a church built in his honor has been discovered in Sirmium (the modern Sremska Mitrovica in Serbia).

Editions (of the Passio): Passio (or Acta) Irenaei in AASS, Mart. 3 (Venezia 1736) 555-557; R. Knopf - G. Krüger - G. Ruhrback, Acta Martyrum, Tübingen 41965, 103-105; H. Musurillo, The Acts of the Christian Martyrs, Oxford 1972, 294-301.

Studies: S. Le Nain Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'historie ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles, Paris 1639-1712, 5, 250-254; DCB 3, 279-280; AB 68 (1950) 269-284; M. Simonetti, Studi agiografici, Rome 1955, 55-75; BS 7 (1963) 899-900; BBKL 2 (1990) 1326; F. Dolbeau, Le dossier hagiographique d'Irénée, évêque de Sirmium: AntTard 7 (1999) 205-214 (new ed. of the Passio).

M. Maritano

IRENAEUS of Tyre (d. after 448). Bishop of *Tyre, 5th c. He was a layman throughout his career, up until his episcopal election. A count of the empire, he accompanied his friend *Nestorius to *Ephesus (431) as a private individual. There he sought to oppose the summary procedure of the Cyrillians and traveled, in the name of the Eastern bishops, to *Constantinople to defend their counter-council before *Theodosius II. After many uncertainties, the emperor ratified the depositions brought by both parties. In 435, the year of Nestorius's exile, Irenaeus too was exiled to *Petra, after confiscation of his goods. Between 443 and 446, after the long exile, he was chosen by the bishops of Phoenicia as the metropolitan of Tyre, in a regular election, despite his prior condemnation and his double marriage. He was consecrated by Domnus of Antioch, but the hard opposition of the party of Dioscorus turned Theodosius II against him again. An edict of 17 February 448 deposed him, reducing him to the lay state. He always had the support of *Theodoret. During his exile he wrote the Tragoedia, a historical work on the first phase of the Nestorian controversy, lost, of which there survive extracts in bad Latin compiled by an anonymous partisan of the *Three Chapters (6th c.).

CPG 6471-6475; PG 84, 613-616; 84, 802-803; LTK³ 5, 585; DTG 7, 2533-2534; DHGE 25, 1480-1481; PLRE 2, 624-625; BBKL 2, 1326.

E. Prinzivalli

ISAAC of Amida (d. ca. 461). Among the nearly 200 homilies attributed to Isaac, and generally to "Isaac of Antioch," P. Bedjan has attempted to bring together 67 passages which should belong to an older Isaac. Originally from Amida, Isaac lived in *Antioch and also went to *Rome. According to the testimony of diverse Syrian historians, he composed many pieces about the secular games (ludi saeculares) which were celebrated in Rome in 404 and about the taking of Rome by Alaric in 410. As Baumstark shows, it would have been Isaac who wrote, too, about the earthquake of Antioch in 459, but in 461 he was surely already dead. Isaac, who was the student of *Zenobius, a disciple of *Ephrem at *Edessa, was ordained and withdrew to *Antioch. His homilies were inspired by *Eutyches and by *Nestorius. They contain, in addition, information on the ancient cult of the stars in Antioch. The *Trinity, the *incarnation and morals, however, remain his preferred themes. The attribution of the homilies proper to each of the Isaacs is not yet definite. The index of the homilies of Bedjan was augmented by S. Brock in 1987.

P. Bedjan, Homiliae S. Isaaci syri Antiocheni, 1, Paris 1903, I-XXII; S. Brock, The Published Verse Homilies of Isaac of Antioch, Jacob of Serugh and Narrai: Index of the incipits: Journal of Semitic Studies 32 (1987) 279-312.

M. van Esbroeck

ISAAC of Antioch (5th c.). A Syrian *monophysite author of the 2nd half of the 5th c., sometimes called Isaac the Great. The *Jacobite patriarch John bar Shushan (d. 1073) attributes to Isaac almost 60 metrical discourses and their parts, which in reality should be ascribed to three different Isaacs. James of Edessa, by the 7th c., already distinguished between one *Isaac of Amida, from the beginning of the 5th c., and two other Isaacs, both born at Edessa, one of whom was a monophysite, while the other was at first a monophysite, but then became "*Nestorian," or *Chalcedonian. (Isaac of Antioch was also confused with the Nestorian *Isaac of Nineveh by Arab translators and by compilers.) Isaac of Antioch was sometimes designated as Isaac of Edessa in virtue of his place of origin, but we, as does James of Edessa, call him the monophysite Isaac of Antioch lest we confuse him with the other of the same name from Edessa, who lived during the time of the bishops Paul (512) and Aesclepius (522), and is probably identifiable with the archimandrite Isaac, an author of homilies who lived in the era of *Nonnus, bishop of Edessa and who, so says Michael the Syrian, became a "heretic," or more precisely, a Chalcedonian. Isaac composed at Antioch a famous poem in 2,136 verses about a parrot capable of reciting the Trisagion with the added phrase, qui passus est pro nobis typical of the *theopaschite doctrine which is datable to the end of 470. The intent was to show that even animals render praise to God in the right form. In a corpus of more than 200 poetical works attributed to Isaac of Antioch, it is very difficult to distinguish his from those of Isaac of Edessa and of Isaac of Amida; Ducros even maintains that Isaac's entire corpus should be divided between Isaac of Antioch and Isaac of Amida, so that none would be attributed to Isaac of Edessa; nevertheless, the correct division will be possible and advantageous only when a complete and critical edition of the corpus is at our disposal.

G. Bickell, S. Isaaci Antiocheni doctoris Syrorum opera omnia, I, Giessen 1872, 84-175 for the poem on the parrot; P. Bedjan, Homiliae S. Isaaci Syri Antiocheni, I, Paris 1903, iii-x; E. Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur, Bonn 1922, 63-66; S. Kazan, Isaac of Antioch's Homily Against the Jews: OrChr 45 (1961) 30-53; 47 (1963) 89-97; M. van Esbroeck, The Memra on the Parrot by Isaac of Antioch: JTS 47 (1966) 464-476; A. Abuna, Adab al-lughat al-aramieh (Letteratura aramaica), Beirut 1970, 202-204; Fr. Graffin, DSp VII, 2010-2011; L. Petit, DTC VIII, 8-10; LTK[2] 5, 772; X. Ducros, Cath VI, 116-118; Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, II, 1013; E.G. Mathews, On Solitaries. Ephrem—or Isaac: LM 103 (1990) 91-110; S. Abouzayd, Isaac of Antioch on Learning and Knowledge, in VI Symposium Syriacum 1992, ed. R. Lavenant, OCA 247, Rome 1994, 215-220; R. Aubert, s.v. I. D'Amid; I. d'Antioche and I. d'Édesse: DHGE, XXVI, Paris 1997, 74-75 and 80; E.G. Mathews Jr., A Bibliographical Clavis to the Corpus of Works Attributed to Isaac of Antioch: Hugoye 5,1 (2002) 1-5.

I. RAMELLI

ISAAC of Edessa (5th–6th c.). Chronologically, Isaac is the third among the authors included in the works of Isaac "of Antioch." According to James of Edessa, he lived at the time of bishops Paul, in 512, and Aesclepius, in 522. In the beginning he was a *monophysite, later on he became a *Nestorian, which means—acc. to James—a *Chalcedonian. Michael the Syrian mentions the archimandrite Isaac, under Nonus the 31st bishop of Edessa, as the author of homilies, and states that he became a "heretic," i.e., a Chalcedonian. P. Bedjan points out that the third Isaac mentioned by James of Edessa is the same person of whom Michael the Syrian speaks and that he would have accepted the Council of Chalcedon in 451. It remains extremely difficult to distinguish which homilies of the corpus Isaac(h)ianum belong to Isaac of Edessa rather than to Isaac of Antioch.

P. Bedjan, Homiliae S. Isaaci syri antiocheni, I, Paris 1903, III-XXII.

M. VAN ESBROECK

ISAAC of Nineveh (the Syrian) (middle of the 7th c.). Monk and *Nestorian spiritual author. We do not know the dates of his birth or death. He was originally from Beth Qatraye (perhaps Qatar along the Persian Gulf) and was consecrated bishop of Nineveh by Catholicos George I (d. 680); but after five months in the episcopate he withdrew to the solitude of Beth Huzaye and, later, to the monastery of *Rabban Shabur. He practically went blind due to his intense study and ascetic practices, and he died at an advanced age. The controversy which arose at his death, regarding some of his affirmations—judged to be heterodox—did not prevent Isaac's writings from obtaining an immense success in *Nestorian monastic circles and even among *Jacobites. Beginning in the 9th c., his writings were translated from *Syriac into Greek and Arabic and found favor among other Eastern Churches, and thereafter in the Slavic world and in Latin countries. Isaac of Nineveh's work has been passed down to us in three series: (1) the First Series, 82 chapters or treatises (in Syriac memrē) published by P. Bedjan; (2) the Second Series, containing 41 chapters, the third and longest of which contains four "centuries" of headings or chapters; chapters IV-XLI have been edited and translated by S. Brock (see bibl.); some extracts of the four "centuries" and a treatise on the contemplation of the mystery of the cross have been published by Bedjan in an appendix to the 82 treatises; (3) the Third Series, containing 17 chapters (14 of which are new), translated into Italian by S. Chialà, with an English translation underway from S. Brock.

The spiritual doctrine of Isaac of Nineveh is linked to two sources of principal inspiration: *Theodore of Mopsuestia for dogmatic theology, and *Evagrius of Pontus (in his expurgated version) for the theory of contemplation. One also notes the very clear influence of John the Solitary. Numerous borrowings in vocabulary and a specific terminology testify amply, among other things, to the tripartite division of the steps of spiritual progress into the somatic, psychic and pneumatic.

Editions of the 82 treatises: P. Bedjan, Mar Isaacus Ninivita, De perfectione religiosa, Paris-Leipzig 1909. Eng. tr.: A.-J. Wensinck, Mystic Treatises by Isaac of Nineveh, Amsterdam 1923, repr. Wiesbaden 1967; Fr. tr.: J. Touraille, Isaac le Syrien, Œuvres spirituelles, Paris 1981. Edition of the second series, chaps. IV-XLI: S. Brock, Isaac of Nineveh (Isaac the Syrian) "The Second Part," Chapters IV-XLI, CSCO 554 (edit.), vol. 555 (tr.) 1995. It. tr.: P. Bettiolo, Discorsi ascetici, 1984; Id. Discorsi spirituali, 1985. Edition of the third series: S. Chialà, ed. and tr. (It.), Isacco di Ninive, Discorsi ascetici, Terza collezione, Magnano 2004.

Studies: Ortiz de Urbina 145-146; DSp 7, 2041-2054; K. Deppe, Die Logoi asketikoi des Isaak von Nineveh, in P. de Lagarde und die syrische Kirchengeschichte, Göttingen 1968, 35-57; D.A. Lichter, Tears and Contemplation in Isaac of Nineveh: Diakonia 11 (1976) 239-258; P.T. Mascia, The Gift of Tears in Isaac of Nineveh: A Transition to Pure Prayer and the Virtue of Mercy: Diakonia 14 (1979) 255-265; S. Brock, The Wisdom of Saint Isaac the Syrian, Fairacres Publications 128, Oxford 1997; S. Chialà, Dalla ascesi eremitica alla misericordia infinita: ricerche su Isacco di Ninive e la sua fortuna, Florence 2002; Œuvres spirituelles, II, 41 Discours récemment découverts, ed. A. Louf, Abbaye de Bellefontaine 2003; I. Alfeyev, La forza dell'amore. L'universo spirituale di Isacco il Siro, Magnano 2003.

R. Lavenant

ISAAC of Persia (4th–5th c.). Syro-Eastern catholicos of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon between 339 and 410. He reorganized the Church of Persia after the persecutions of the 2nd half of the 4th c. and, with the help of *Maruta of Maiferqat, obtained recognition of Christians on the part of *Yazdegerd. Isaac, according to the acts of the Synod of Dadisho of 424, received "the principality of the priesthood over the divine people" after the see had remained vacant for 22 years. In 410 he called a synod in the capital, which laid the foundations for the autonomy of the Persian Church, with precise hierarchical and territorial structures, which is also recorded in the *Chronicle of Arbela, 67 K.: "Mar Yahballaha the patriarch invited all the bishops to come to him and to unite themselves for ecclesiastical affairs. Before this they had been brought together once during the time of Mar Ishaq and they had established that the see of Arbela would be a metropolitan and would oversee the numerous other sees," which are then listed in a detailed manner.

EC 7, 231-232; P. Kawerau, Die Chronik von Arbela, Louvain 1985, CSCO Syri 468 t. 200, 2: 67 and 92 n. 13-18; R. Aubert, Isaac de Séleucie-Ctésiphon: DHGE, XXVI, Paris 1997, 90-91; I. Ramelli, Il Chronicon di Arbela: presentazione, traduzione e note, Madrid 2002, 62-63.

I. Ramelli

ISAAC the Jew (d. after 378). A Jew who converted to the Christian faith, at *Rome he favored the side of *Ursinus against Pope *Damasus, against whom he filed a lawsuit, the motivation for which is unknown. Since he was unable to prove his accusations, he was exiled to *Spain by *Gratian (Coll. Avell. epist. 13,5). In 378 it was said that he had returned to Judaism (see the relation of the Council of Rome in Ambr., Ep. extra coll. 7,8-9; Mansi III, 626; see also Jer., In Tit. 3,9). *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 26) holds him to be the author of a work on the *Trinity and on the *incarnation, which Sirmond in 1630 identified in the Fides Isaatis ex Iudaeo, which had been discovered in a MS of Pithou and published for the first time: the Fides Isaatis, however, constitutes an extract, perhaps, of the work mentioned by Gennadius. On the basis of the linguistic, stylistic and doctrinal affinities between the Fides Isaatis and the works of *Ambrosiaster, Morin hypothesized in 1899 that the latter should be identified with Isaac, whose biographical affairs contain events corresponding to the data which emerge from the Commentarii and the Quaestiones. Following this identification—which obtained a notable success among scholars at the time, but which Morin later set aside and today holds little credibility—there has been the attempt to attribute to Isaac numerous other anonymous writings (see Bardenhewer III, 525).

CPL 189-190; CPPM II/A 15; 15a; 1065; PG 33, 1541-1546; CCL 9, 335-343; PLS 1, 654-655; G. Morin, L'Ambrosiaster et le juif converti Isaac, contemporain du pape Damase: RHL 4 (1899) 97-121; H. Zeuschner, Studien zur Fides Isaatis. Ein Beitrag zur Ambrosiasterfrage: Kircheng. Abhand., Breslau 8 (1909) 97-148; DTC 8, 1-8; A. Souter, Fides Isaatis ex Iudaeo: A New Edition: JTS 31 (1929–1930) 1-8; A. Hoepfner, Les deux procès du pape Damase: REA 50 (1948) 288-304; PCBE 1, 1159-1160.

A. Pollastri

ISAAC the Persian. Legendary founder, in the locality of Mâr Behnam (in Mesopotamia, 35 km [21.7 mi] to the SE of Mosul), of the convent of Beth Gubba, "House of the Grave," in Arabic Dayr al-Gub, visited by Muslims as the tomb of Hidr, Muhammad's father. It was a rather late site for pilgrimage and healings. According to one legend, not earlier than the 10th c., analyzed by Fiey, during the time of Queen Shirîn, a rich Persian merchant, Isaac, went on pilgrimage toward *Jerusalem with his sick servant, who was healed in the vicinity of Mâr Behnam. The merchant constructed a convent there which took the name of the grave which lay between the convent itself and Mâr Behnam, and which was situated "a stone's throw" from the martyrium of St. Behnam, a victim of the Persian persecutions of the 2nd half of the 4th c. At the origin of this legend there seems to have been not so much a convent as a hostel for pilgrims which was run by some monks.

J.M. Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, II, Beirut 1965, 579-581 and 607; S.P. Brock, Notulae Syriacae. Some Miscellaneous Identifications, LM 108 (1995) 69-78; R. Aubert, Isaac le Persan: DHGE, XXVI, Paris 1997, 89.

I. Ramelli

ISAIAH of Scete (and Gaza) (d. 491). An ascetic author with this name, who was present (in passing?) at Scetis in 431, is known through various Palestinian *monophysite sources. His biography was written by *Zacharias Scholasticus (ed. E.W. Brooks, CSCO 7/8, Paris 1907). There is good reason to attribute the Ascetic Discourses to him (ed. Augustinos, Jerusalem 1911, Volos ²1962; PG 40, 1105-1206; ancient Syriac translations, R. Draguet, Les cinq recensions de l'Ascéticon syriaque d'Abba Isaia: CSCO 289-290 and 293-294, Louvain 1968; tr. by the monks of Solesmes, Abbé Isaïe. Recueil Ascétique, Bellefontaine 1970: other translations in Eastern languages, cf. CPG 5555/CPG/Suppl. 5555 with add.). Draguet, in his introduction to the *Syriac translation (see RHE 63 [1968] 843-857), wanted to distinguish between two authors: an Egyptian monk of the 4th c., still immune to the influence of *Evagrius, and a Palestinian monk (the editor of the whole?); critics hesitate to follow him in this partition. Isaac is the heir of the monasticism of Scetis, in particular of Poemen, and it is through him that the tradition of the *Apophthegmata of the Fathers—in part—has come down to us, also probably through his disciple and editor Peter. It is worth highlighting the fact that the collection of his discourses, quickly translated into Syriac, had included components borrowed from Evagrius and *Macarius. According to D.J. Chitty (JTS 22 [1971] 47-72), the Egyptian informants of Isaac are to be placed between the years 430–450. His work was used at Gaza (Barsanuphius and John) in the 6th c., and later by many Byzantines, Syrians (R. Draguet has published two commentaries [CSCO 326-327 and 336-337, Louvain 1972 and 1975]) and others. The Latin world does not know much of him. He represents a point of equilibrium and continuity.

CPG 5555-5556; outstanding article by L. Regnault: DSp 7, 2083-2095; R. Draguet, Les cinq recensions de l'Ascéticon d'Abba Isaïe, CSCO 289, 290 (Script. Syri 120, 121) Louvain 1968; L. Perrone, La Chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 287-295; Patrologia V, 277-278; Isaia di Gaza, Ascetikón, Naples 2003.

J. Gribomont

ISHAI (6th c.). Teacher at the school of *Nisibis and then, by the design of Mar *Aba (and thus before the latter's death in 552), "interpreter," or rector, of the school which Mar Aba had founded or restored in the capital of the *Sassanid Empire, *Seleucia-Ctesiphon. He wrote an Explanation of the Martyrs, which pertains to a literary genre that had somewhat spread in the schools and monasteries of the Eastern Church between 500 and 700. It seems that it was *Narsai at Nisibis who was the initiator of this new type of "explanations" or "causes," i.e., of theological treatises which illustrate the reasons for a certain liturgical or ecclesiastical celebration. The Explanation (of the Commemoration) of the Martyrs, celebrated on the Friday after Easter, is the only writing of Isaac which has come down to us. He was, otherwise, a man of the church, authoritative, well-esteemed, and he seems to have taken part in the Persian embassy to the court of *Justinian in 546/547.

DSpir 7, 2082; Patrologia V, 474-475; A. Scher, Isaï, Traité sur les martyrs, text with Fr. tr., in Traités d'Isaï le docteur et de Hnana d'Adiabène sur les martyrs (PO 7/1), Paris 1911, 15-52.

K. den Biesen

ISHO'BAR NUN (d. 828). Born ca. 744 at Bēt Gabbārē, near Mosul, Isho'bar Nun was a disciple of *Abraham bar Dashandad at the school of Bashosh in *Adiabene, taught briefly at the school of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon and became a monk in the monastery of *Abraham of Kashkar on Mt. *Izla, N of Nisibis. Later he lived at Baghdad and, for a fairly long period, in the monastery of Mar Elia at Mosul. It is not clear if he should be identified with Isho'dad bar Nun, bishop of Ram Hormizd, who is mentioned in the letters of the patriarch *Timothy I. On 6 July 823 Isho'bar Nun was consecrated catholicos of the Church of the East. He died 1 April 828. The extant writings, of which only a small part have been published, include a work which deals with questions concerning both OT and NT, a collection of canons, a grammatical work, some letters and fragments of some sermons.

Baumstark, 219; BO III/1, 165-166; E.G. Clarke, The Selected Questions of Ishō bar Nūn on the Pentateuch, Leiden 1962; E.

Sachau, Syrische Rechtsbücher, II, Berlin 1908, 119-177; M. Rendel Harris, Fragments of the Commentary of Ephrem Syrus, London 1895, 96 (fragment of a commentary on the Scriptures in two vols.); D. Bundy, The "Questions and Answers" on Isaiah by Išhō'bar Nūn: OLP 16 (1985) 167-178; C. Molenberg, An Eighth-Century Manual: Išhō'bar' Nūn's Questions and Answers on the Whole Text of Scripture as a Representative of a Genre, in IV Symposium Syriacum (OCA 229), Rome 1987, 44-45; C. Molenberg, The Interpreter Interpreted: Išo'bar Nun's Selected Questions on the Old Testament (diss. Groningen, 1990), cf. A. de Halleux: Muséon 104 (1991) 208-210.

K. den Biesen

ISHOBOKHT of Rev-Ardashir (7th–8th c.). We know practically nothing about the personality of Ishobokht, beyond that which has been passed down to us by means of the MS of his legal books. He was consecrated by a Bishop *Henanisho without the specification of whether this meant Henanisho I (686–693) or II (694–701), even though critics today hold it most probable that it was the former. In the correspondence of the catholicos of Seleucia, *Isho'yahb III (647–657/658), mention is made of the autonomist tendencies of Rev-Ardashir, situated in Persia properly so-called, to the SE of the mouth of the Tigris. *Timothy I, catholicos (780–823), the first catholicos resident at Baghdad, had a translation made from the Persian into *Syriac of the six legal books of Ishobokht on matrimony, inheritance and contracts. The intent of this initiative was certainly to bring back to the Catholic world a church that had become perceptibly autonomous. Interest in Ishobokht's legal books is based on the fact that he draws heavily from *Pahlavi books of *Sassanid law, particularly the Makitān-i-hazar dātestān, adapting it directly to Christianity with scriptural citations: the triple law Terisutha in word, thought and work takes up the categories of Avesta: hukhta, humata, hvarsta. Even the distinction between dinā and nāmōsā is connected to the Pahlavi dïn, closer to knowledge than to religion (din in Arabic) in comparison with nomos. Ishobokht also wrote a book on the universe, of which only extracts remain, and he wrote another on meteorological criteria. He also occupied himself with *Aristotelian logic and with the concept of possibility. His attacks against marriages of consanguinity and against the teaching of the magi were so virulent that it prevented him from writing under the Sassanid regime. The allusions to Islam are, to the contrary, very rare. Ishobokht is an exceptional testimony of a Pahlavi Christian community which vanished completely.

E. Sachau, Syrische Rechtsbücher, III, Berlin 1914, VIII-XVIII and 1-201; E. Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur, Bonn 1922, 215-216; J.M. Fiey, Diocèses syriens du Golfe Persique, in Memorial Mgr. G. Khouridis, Louvain 1969, 189-190; R. Aubert, Isho'bokht: DHGE, XXVI, Paris 1997, 175.

M. van Esbroeck

ISHO'DNAH of Basra (9th c.). Metropolitan of Prat d-Maishan (Basra) and author of a History of the Founders of Monasteries in the Territories of the Persians and the Arabs, also called Liber castitatis, a work written around 860. It is a collection of 140 short accounts on the life of the founders of Syro-Eastern monasteries which stretch from the 4th to the middle of the 9th c. Chapter 125 (126) contains one of the only biographical accounts of *Isaac of Nineveh.

Brockelmann, 234; Duval, 222-231; J.B. Chabot, Le livre de la Chasteté composé par Jésudenah, évêque de Baçra, Rome 1896 (Syriac text with Fr. tr.); P. Bedjan included this text in his Liber superiorum seu historia monastica auctore Thoma, episopo Margensi, Paris-Leipzig 1901, 437-517, with the title Historia fundatorum monasteriorum; J.-M. Fiey, Išo'dnaḥ, métropolite de Basra et son oeuvre: OS 11 (1966) 431-450.

K. den Biesen

ISHO'YAHB I, catholicos (d. ca. 595). Patriarch of the church of the East, originally from Bēt 'Arābāyē (the ecclesiastical province around the metropolitan see of *Edessa which also included the *Armenian areas S of Lake Van). He studied at the school of *Nisibis, of which he was rector from 569 to 571, when he became bishop of Arzōn. In 581–582 Isho'yahb was named catholicos through the wishes of *Hormisdas IV (579–590), after the election finished with dissent and discord. Threatened by the opposition of *Chosroes II (590–628), in 595 he tried to take refuge with the Arab king Nu'man of Hīrtā, who had just converted to the Christian faith, but died in Bēt Qūšī and was buried in one of the monasteries founded by the sister of the king, Hind. In the second of the 31 canons of the Synod of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon of 585, he defended the authority of the writings of *Theodore of Mopsuestia; furthermore, the collection of the synodal acts of the church of the East has preserved a letter of Isho'yahb to Jacob bishop of Darai on the principal island of Bahrain, which contains 20 important canons and a confession of faith (see Chabot, Synodicon Orientale for all these texts). In the letter he mentions his work, Questions Concerning the Mysteries of the Church, which he wrote while at the school of Nisibis and in which he comments, word for word, on the texts of the baptismal and eucharistic liturgy.

Baumstark, 126; BBKL 2, 1365-1366; BO III/1, 108-111; Duval, 349; J.B. Chabot, Synodicon Orientale, Paris 1902, 130-196; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis (CSCO 226), Louvain 1965; J.-M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'église en Iraq (CSCO 310), Louvain 1970; J.-M. Fiey, Nisibe, métropole syriaque orientale et ses suffragants des origines à nos jours (CSCO 398), Louvain 1977; S.Y. Hermiz Jammo, La structure de la messe chaldéenne du début jusqu'à l'Anaphore, Rome 1979.

K. den Biesen

ISHO'YAHB II, catholicos (d. 644/646). Isho'yahb, born at Gdālā in Bēt 'Aramāyē, not far from Mosul, as a youth went to *Nisibis to study at its famous school. He left, probably in 596, when three hundred from the teachers and students abandoned the school in protest against the teaching of *Henana of Adiabene. He became a teacher and later rector of the school of Balad and despite being married was named bishop of that city. In 628, Isho'yahb became catholicos of the church of the East, after the see had remained vacant for 19 years. In 630 he encountered the emperor *Heraclius at *Aleppo, as leader of a Persian delegation called to negotiate peace with the victorious *Byzantine emperor. He offered him a profession of faith which was approved by *Sergius patriarch of *Constantinople and which won for him the invitation to celebrate the liturgy and give Communion to the emperor. This event excited lively criticism on the part of intransigent bishops, who considered it a betrayal of the theological tradition of the church of the East. Nonetheless, his future successor, *Isho'yahb III, then bishop of *Nineveh and particularly intransigent in his orthodoxy, wrote letters full of praise for the conduct of Isho'yahb II in this circumstance. He died in 644 or 646 in Karkā d-Bēt Slōk, where he had retired before the advance of the Arab armies. Isho'yahb was the author of a commentary on the Psalms, of hagiographic and monastic histories, mēmrē and letters. Extant is only a dogmatic letter to a certain Rabban Abraham of Bēt Madai, which adheres strictly to the doctrine of the church of the East, and an Arabic translation of the profession of faith which he presented to Heraclius.

Baumstark, 195-196; BBKL 2, 1366; BO II, 416-418 and III/1, 105-107; Duval, 369-70; E.A.W. Budge, Thomas of Marga, Book of Governors, London 1893, I, 35 and II, 4; A. Scher, Histoire Nestorienne II (PO 13/4), Paris 1918, 576-579; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis (CSCO 226), Louvain 1965; J.-M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'église en Iraq (CSCO 310), Louvain 1970; Id., Nisibe, métropole syriaque orientale et ses suffragants des origines à nos jours (CSCO 398), Louvain 1977; L.R.M. Sako, Lettre christologique du patriarche syro-oriental Īšo'yahb II de Gdālā (628-646). Étude, traduction et édition critique, Rome 1983; Id., Īšo'yahb II's Syro-Oriental Terminology and Its Significance: Christian Orient 5 (1984) 134-141.

K. den Biesen

ISHO'YAHB III the Great, catholicos (d. 659). Born toward 580 in a village of *Adiabene, son of a great Persian landed proprietor, Isho'yahb studied at the school of *Nisibis. He entered the monastery of Bēt 'Abē, where he lived until 628, when *Isho'yahb II consecrated him bishop of *Nineveh and Mosul. The catholicos included him in the Persian embassy of 630 to the emperor *Heraclius. Around 637 he became metropolitan of *Arbela and in 649 catholicos of the church of the East. He was confronted with numerous difficulties, both inside and outside the church. Thus, he had to resolve the problem of the traditional separatist tendencies of the ecclesiastical province of Persia: he personally visited the metropolitan Simeon of Rewardashir, leader of a revolt against the see of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, and succeeded in reestablishing the peace of the church. He sought to impede, probably in vain, the conversion of Arab tribes in the S of Mesopotamia and Oman and Bahrain to Islam; due to problems with the new Islamic authorities he even had to leave Seleucia-Ctesiphon and move his residence to the monastery of Bēt 'Abē. His attempt to found a theological school in the monastery failed because of the resistance of the monks to his academic aspirations. Therefore, a few months before his death in 657–658, Isho'yahb returned home. Great liturgical reforms are attributed to him, in particular of the calendar; he limited the number of anaphoras to the three still in use, those of the apostles *Addai and Mari, of *Theodore and of *Nestorius. A collection of 106 of his letters has been preserved; it is divided into three parts, which faithfully reflect his activities as bishop, metropolitan and catholicos. This epistolary is a very important source for our knowledge of the life of the church of the East in the first years of the Arab domination. He died in 659.

Baumstark, 197-198; BBKL 2, 1366-1367; BO III/1, 113-143; Duval, 370; E.A.W. Budge, Thomas of Marga, Book of Governors, London 1893, I, 24 and 31; II, 4-5 and 7-10; R. Duval, Iso'yahb Patriarchiae III liber epistolarum (CSCO 11 and 12), Louvain 1904-1905; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis (CSCO 226), Louvain 1965; J.-M. Fiey, Isho'yaw le Grand. Vie du Catholicos nestorien Isho'yaw III d'Adiabène (580-659): OCP 35 (1969) 305-333 and 36 (1970) 5-46; Id., Jalons pour une histoire de l'église en Iraq (CSCO 310), Louvain 1970; Id., Nisibe, métropole syriaque orientale et ses suffragants des origines à nos jours (CSCO 398), Louvain 1977; J. Moolan, The Period of Annunciation—Nativity in the East Syrian Calendar, Kottayam 1985, 167-168.

K. den Biesen

ISIDORE, gnostic (2nd c.). Son and disciple of *Basilides, he continued the work of his father. He wrote a treatise On the Adherent Soul (see Clem.

Alex., Strom. III, 20,113), where he distinguishes two parts of the *soul, one superior and one inferior; the passions, with their perverse inclinations, are attached to the inferior soul and push it toward evil; but, humanity is able to fight back against this situation by means of the superior soul, which can control and dominate the inferior. He also wrote an Ethica (see Clem. Alex., Strom. III, 1,2) and an Exegesis of the Prophet Parchor (see Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 6,53), where he strains to demonstrate what the philosophers obtained from the prophets. (Parchor would be the source of *Aristotelian philosophy.)

W. Völker, Quellen zur Geschichte der christlichen Gnosis, Tübingen 1932, 38-44; M. Simonetti, Testi gnostici cristiani, Bari 1970, 91-98; A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig 1884 (repr. Hildesheim 1961), 195-230; H. Leisegang, Die Gnosis, Leipzig 1924, 196-256; M. Tardieu, "Basilide le gnostique," in DPhA, 2:87-88.

C. Gianotto

ISIDORE of Alexandria (d. 404). Presbyter and xenodochos (in charge of the house of hospitality) of the *Alexandrian church. A man of great culture and a lover of peace, he had lived in solitude in the desert of *Nitria for a certain period, and always preserved a strong *asceticism. He had accompanied St. *Athanasius to *Rome, where he was ordained a priest. He was the confidant of his successor, *Theophilus of Alexandria, whom he proposed as bishop of the see of *Constantinople against *John Chrysostom. In the last years of his life he suffered persecution at the hands of Theophilus himself (see Pallad., Dial. 6: PG 47, 22 s.). He died at the age of 85 in 404.

Palladio, Hist. Laus. 1; Dialogus 6; Sozomen, HE 8, 12; BS 7, 957-959; LTK 5, 787; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'église d'Égypte au IVe siécle (328-373), Rome 1996, 414, 728 and 758.

A. Di Berardino

ISIDORE of Chios (d. 251). According to the legendary passio (BHG 960) of the 1st half of the 5th c., Isidore, enlisted in the imperial fleet and denounced as a Christian, suffered martyrdom at Chios at the time of the emperor *Decius (250–251). *Gregory of Tours (De gloria mart. 101), on whom depends the saint's praise found in the Mart. Rom., narrates that his body was flung into a well on the island: thus the waters there acquired miraculous powers, and a basilica was built there in his honor. His relics were then transferred to *Constantinople by St. Marcian (BHG 1032-1033), priest and steward of Hagia Sophia, who placed them in the church of St. Irenaeus between 457 and 460. The most recent passio, composed at Constantinople, makes of Isidore a soldier born at *Alexandria and notes his provisional burial there by *Ammonius, and following that, the prodigious discovery on the part of a matron of *Ephesus. Isidore's Egyptian origin is rather probable, even judging by his name, and it is attested by other sources. In 1225 the Venetians transferred the relics that remained at Chios into the basilica of S. Marco, where the saint is still solemnly celebrated 16 April. From Venice they reached Zara and into Catalonia. Some inscriptions indicate the presence of Isidore's relics even in N Africa by the 5th and 6th c. His cult spread to *Rome, where a church in his honor existed in the 8th c. outside the Porta Tiburtina. The date of his martyrdom is recorded on 14 May by the Menaion and by the Greek synaxaries, by the Slavic Calendar, by those of the Sinai, of Rabban Sliba and of Silos, beyond those of the MS B of the Mart. hier.; the Mart. Rom. celebrates him 15 May, but mentions his memorial 5 February also, as do some Byzantine merologians. This last piece of information could be linked to the translation of his relics to Constantinople or to the dedication of one of his churches.

AASS, Maii III, 443-450 (Parigi); BHL 4478-4481; BHG 960-961; BS 7, 960-968; Cath 6, 151; LTK[3] 5, 617.

V. Novembri

ISIDORE of Pelusium (4th–5th c.). *Severus of Antioch, the oldest source who informs us regarding Isidore, speaks of him as a presbyter native to *Pelusium (see the letter of Severus to Zacharias of Pelusium, ed. E.W. Brooks, The Sixth Book of the Select letters of Severus, vol. 11/2 [translation], London 1904, 251) and, in the Contra impium grammaticum III, 39 (CSCO 102,182), he presents him as overflowing with divine wisdom and as a valiant exegete of Scripture. Isidore probably did higher studies at Alexandria, and it does not seem that he traveled beyond Egypt; he was a monk in a monastery of Pelusium, though it appears that he was not abbot. This title, of which there are no remains in Isidore's very numerous letters, was attributed to him for the first time in the Apophthegmata Patrum, which carry six sayings of Isidore, drawn from his epistolary; one must note, however, that in this case the label "abbot" indicates rather the function of teaching the monks in the spiritual life, and not specifically the leader of a monastery. Isidore died around 435. Nicephorus Callistus (HE XIV, 53) presents him as a disciple of *John Chrysostom, toward whom Isidore certainly displayed a fervent admiration (see, e.g., Ep. V, 32);

*Photius (Ep. 11, 44) cites Isidore among the Christian masters of epistolography, alongside *Basil of Caesarea and *Gregory of Nazianzus.

Notwithstanding some reservations expressed recently (see U. Riedinger, Neue Hypotyposen-Fragmente, 157), one should not place in doubt either Isidore's historical existence or the authenticity of his ample epistolary, which consists of two thousand letters, which are brief for the most part; these, which encompass a vast period, from 393 to 433, treat various matters and are addressed to different people.

The corpus of Isidore's letters comes from *Constantinople, where they were collected, between 450 and 550, in the monastery of the *acoemetae. *Facundus of Hermiane probably knew of this collection (see Defens. 11,4); the Roman deacon *Rusticus translated 49 of the letters into *Latin.

In the epistolary, Isidore deals chiefly with exegetical questions. Grounded in the historical-literal method, he refutes excessive *allegorizing (cf. Ep. IV, 117) and demonstrates his measured equilibrium (cf. Ep. IV, 203). Many letters confront ascetic and moral points. Isidore, who identifies the kingdom of God with the monastic life (Ep. I, 129), insistently exhorts all to observe the commandments and to practice the virtues, not depending on a purely exterior attitude, rather above all the interior (Ep. I, 162): the moral and spiritual renewal of the church was dear to his heart. From a doctrinal point of view, Isidore reaffirms with force the fullness of Christ's divinity against the *Arians, through an accurate analysis of scriptural texts, clearly going back to the Council of *Nicaea, which one must neither take from nor add to (Ep. IV, 99); he reasserts the real humanity of Christ against the *Manicheans. In regard to the *hypostatic union, he speaks frequently of the unity of the Son in two natures (see Ep. 1,23; 303; 323; 405).

The letters of Isidore are written in a pleasant style, careful and rather simple; he displays a knowledge of classical Greek literature and a preference for the Atticizing style. In his epistolary, Isidore alludes to two of his discourses, one addressed to the Greeks, and the other written about the nonexistence of fate (Ep. II, 137; 228; III, 253); these have been identified respectively with Ep. V, 186 and Ep. III, 154.

CPG III, 5557-5558; PG 78, 177-1645. Partial ed. of the epistolary in SC 422, Ep. 1214-1413; SC 454, Ep. 1414-1700, acc. to the progressive order of the letters as it is presented in the Greek MS tradition. Ample bibl. on Isidore in Quasten II, 182-187. Among the numerous studies we call attention to: N. Capo, De S. Isidori Pelusiotae epistularum recensione ac numero quaestio: SIFC 9 (1901) 449-466 (ed. of three letters which are missing in the PG); C.H. Turner, The Letters of Saint Isidore of Pelusium: JTS 6 (1905) 70-86; K. Lake, Further Notes on the Mss. of Isidore of Pelusium: ibid., 270-282; R. Aigrain, Quarante-neuf lettres de saint Isidore de Péluse, Paris 1911; L. Bayer, Isidors von Pelusium klassische Bildung, Paderborn 1915; A. Schmid, Die Christologie Isidors von Pelusium, Freiburg in der Schweiz 1948; U. Riedinger, Neue Hypotyposen-Fragmente bei Pseudo-Caesarius und Isidor von Pelusium: ZNTW 51 (1960) 154-196; G.J.M. Bartelink, Observations stylistiques et linguistiques chez Isidore de Péluse: VChr 18 (1964) 163-180; CM. Fouskas, Saint Isidore of Pelusium and the New Testament, Athens 1967; Id., Saint Isidore of Pelusium, His Life and His Works, Athens 1970; A.M. Ritter, Isidore de Péluse: DSp 7, 2097-2103; P. Evieux, Isidore de Péluse. La numérotation des lettres dans la tradition manuscrite: RHT 5 (1975) 45-72; Id., Isidore de Péluse. État des recherches: RecSR 64 (1976) 321-340; D.T. Runia, Philo of Alexandria in Five Letters of Isidore of Pelusium, Heirs of the Septuagint, Philo, Hellenistic Judaism and Early Christianity, Festschrift for Earle Hilgert, 1991, 295-319; P. Évieux, Isidore de Péluse, Paris 1995; M. Kertsch, Weitere Chrysostomos-Reminiszenzen bei Isidor von Pelusion: JOEByz 46 (1996) 45-61.

S. Zincon

ISIDORE of Seville (560–636). From a great Hispano-Roman family (his father was named Severianus) originally from the region of Cartagena, but probably "transferred" to Seville following the Byzantine disembarkment (552, perhaps not until 555 at Cartagena), Isidore is the last of four children who all became monks and/or clerics: his sister Florentina was a cloistered nun, his brothers *Leander and *Fulgentius became, respectively, bishops of Seville and of Écija in Baetica, the most Romanized of the Spanish provinces (contemporary Andalusia). Educated under the guidance of his brother Leander and probably in the episcopal school of Seville (but a period in a monastic school is not at all excluded), the young Isidore received an education which was both classical and Christian, monastic and clerical: this explains from the beginning the breadth and complexity of his culture. He saw King *Leovigild unify *Spain and try in vain to impose *Arianism on all his subjects. Isidore's brother Leander conspired with the Byzantines without success in opposing Leovigild with the help of Leovigild's son *Hermenegild, who was a Catholic convert; Hermenegild was captured and executed in 585. Leander, however, later successfuly obtained the conversion of Leovigild's second son, King *Recared, and of the Arian *Visigoths, to the Catholicism of the Hispano-Romans (3rd Council of Toledo, in 589). Finally Isidore saw King Suintila chase the last Byzantine occupiers out of the S tip of Spain (in 621). These military, political and religious events profoundly marked the personality of Isidore. It was first of all in order to complete the national unification of the kingdom of Toledo, now Catholic, and to reorganize the church of Spain after two centuries of disorder and persecutions (invasion of the peninsula by Suevi, Alans, Vandals and, immediately afterward, by the Visigoths starting from 409), that Isidore conceived and wrote his very diverse literary works. But he was at the same time a man of the church and of the state: that is clear from his visits to the ruling princes of Toledo, his literary friendship with King *Sisebut, his role as president and promoter of the 4th Council of Toledo, in 633, whose acts are a kind of ideal charter of the Visigothic church and of its relationship with the monarchy. He died in 636, leaving his largest work unfinished: the Etymologiae, which his friend and disciple *Braulio of Saragossa partially finished and published.

The Versus in bibliotheca which Isidore composed to serve as "legends" for the adornment of the bookshelves of his episcopal library could create a certain illusion as to the real extent of his classical and patristic culture. But the first of these distichs could be the point of departure for a just evaluation of his concept of culture: "Beyond many sacred works, behold many profane works: if you like some poetic composition, take it and read. See these fields full of thorns where roses abound: avoid the thorns and gather the roses." The sacred comes before the profane, but with an openness to poetic culture and an attitude of "anthologist" acc. to the traditions of Hellenistic erudition.

Thus we find an obsession with a "selection" of comprehensible texts, but also a taste for intellectual culture in itself—Medieval pragmatism and classical literary sense. (The first verse paraphrases a hexameter of Martial of Bilbilis [today Calatayud], a Spanish compatriot of Isidore.) It is less surprising, therefore, that the brother of Leander (to whom the friend *Gregory the Great had dedicated a prefatory letter for the Moralia, ending with an invective against the "rules of Donatus") was able to plan such a sizable profane work at that time. Isidore did it, furthermore, with the guidance of St. *Augustine and of *Cassiodorus, of the De doctrina christiana and of the Institutiones divinarum et saecularium litterarum (of which he knew only the second book).

The Differences and the Synonyms show the primacy of grammatical culture, instrument of good actions at the same time as eloquence. The Tractatus on Nature follows the lines of the ancient tradition of works on cosmography, of which it also follows the typical plan: but, faced with the phenomena, he adds to the profane scientific description their sacred allegorization, starting from exegetical and scriptural works. The Origin of the Goths is interwoven with the Chronicle, as a national history and a summary of universal chronology. It is the history, renovated from antiquity, of a people, providing the framework of a history of salvation in the footsteps of the Christian chronicles for which *Jerome had given the Latin prototype, translating and completing that of Eusebius. History, finally, of a Christian literature in Spain is found in De viris illustribus which carries on the works of Jerome and *Gennadius, but reducing the horizon to that of a province which became a nation.

The unfinished masterpiece of Isidore, which includes the sacred sciences on equal footing with profane knowledge, is his encyclopedia of Etymologiae in 20 books (the title Origins is due to modern editors). This compendium of ancient and paleo-Christian culture is organized from grammar to the most modest techniques, passing through the seven "arts" of the Hellenistic "encyclopedia," medicine, law, sacred knowledge and natural sciences. This immense material has, as its principle of division and presentation, that which could be called the four grammatical categories of the Isidorian understanding: gloss, analogy, difference and, esp., etymology, strengthened by the ancient (Varro) and biblical conviction that words offer the keys to things. The problem of the sources of the work is unresolved: it remains the primary problem, but it is partially unresolvable. These sources are biblical, patristic, classical, but in the latter case it is often a matter of different manuals, many of them irretrievably lost. This plurality of sources, minutely followed and combined, guarantees also the relative originality of their Isidorian "rewriting." Crumbs of knowledge? Yes, but in this way so much easier to understand by readers whose intellectual level was not often very high.

The "sacred" works are no less important than the "profane." The canonical collection Hispana, perhaps begun by Leander, and some liturgical sections demonstrate the almost technical contribution of Isidore to ecclesiastical reform and even liturgy. This orientation finds its complete expression in the treatise De origine officiorum ecclesiasticorum. The Isidorian ideal of pilgrimage to the sources is coherent here with that which animates the Etymologiae and the History of the Goths (ancient title still given by moderns to the De origine Gotorum). This goes along with the meaning of the definition in Etym. 1,20,1: etymologia est origo. But here this is applied to a properly Christian and also ecclesial object; from *Ambrose, this too is indirectly Ciceronian, as the variation of the title shows: De officiis ministrorum. The original moral sense has changed: here it is a matter of the ecclesiastical hierarchy and of the liturgy. These two meanings of officium were destined to a modern future. Next to a series of manuals which today would be called "biblical studies" (Prooemia, Allegoriae, Quaestiones on the two Testaments, De ortu et obitu patrum etc.), it is necessary to make a special place for the polyvalent manual of Synonyma sive lamentatio animae peccatricis. This offers at the same time a manual of rhetorical enrichment of vocabulary through the ancient scholastic exercise of the "synonymic variation"; of spiritual formation to penitence and to conversion through the synonymic repetition of the same sententia (biblical sources: Jeremiah; and patristic: Cyprian; and, sometimes, classical: Horace); finally of an aesthetic model of a synonymic prose often rhythmic and rhymed: the work would remain for the Medieval readers the archetype of a kind of new artistic prose which John of Garland would call stilus isidorianus.

But the largest treatise, and "sacred" parallel to the Etymologiae, consists of the three books of the Sententiae. Isidore unfolds there, often in the form of synonymic repetition, in a style sometimes elliptical to the point of obscurity, in rather careless language constellated with "pre-Romanisms"—esp. syntactical—a triple theology: dogmatic, spiritual, moral, of Augustinian inspiration both directly and indirectly (via the Moralia of Gregory). It is a doctrine and religious ethic for the entire Visigothic society, from the poor to the princes, from monks to bishops: reflection and reform of a hard, heterogeneous, nonegalitarian society, in a kind of interpretation, oriented and classified, of the great Gregorian ethical and spiritual themes. But Gregorian mysticism is here simplified often into a modest and all the more imperative moralism. Here the contradictions of Isidore's thought are the echo of those of his times, but aggravated by an interior dissent between the classical of yesterday and the "today of God" in the Visigothic world, and even the Medieval tomorrow, dimly perceived. This is proved by the immense success, particularly outside Spain, of the entire work of Isidore, but esp. of the Sententiae and of the Etymologiae, which became the vademecum of scholars of every kind. Codicology is beginning to make it possible to trace the concrete spread of these different works, isolated or united in different corpora, through W Europe of the early Middle Ages. Their impact on Carolingian culture is still too poorly known, but the number of exemplars copied in the 9th and 10th c. alone is already eloquent.

Was Isidore "the last philologer of antiquity" or "the founder of the Middle Ages"? A false dilemma. He is above all a Hispano-Roman bishop, who was close to the king of Toledo as a sort of "primate" of the Visigothic church, a responsible pastor eager to respond in a profound way to the needs of his times, a spiritual "cofounder" of the Hispano-Gothic kingdom: his Elogium of Spain, a lyrical preface in a refined artistic prose which opens the treatise On the Origin of the Goths, shows it eloquently. A man of action and of thought who wanted to stay faithful to antiquity, while adapting to a world which was about to become entirely Medieval.

CPL 1186-1229; Díaz 1, 101-134; PL 81-84; PLS 4, 1801-1866; MGH, AA, 11,2 (historical works).

Some recent editions: Etymologiae, ed. Lindsay, Oxford 1911. New ed. in publication in the series "Auteurs latins du Moyen Âge," book II, ed. P.K. Marshall, Paris 1983; book IX, ed. M. Reydellet, Paris 1984; book XII, ed. J. Andrè, Paris 1986; book XVII, ed. J. André, Paris 1981; De natura rerum, ed. J. Fontaine, Bordeaux 1960; ed. F. Trisoglio, Rome 2001; De viris illustribus, ed. C. Codoñer, Salamanca 1964; De origine Gothorum, ed. C. Rodríguez Alonso, León 1975; De origine ecclesiasticorum officiorum, ed. C. Lawson, Madrid 1982; De ortu et obitu patrum, ed. Chaparro Gómez, Paris 1982; Differentiae, ed. C. Codoñer, Paris 1992; Sententiae, ed. P. Cazier, Turnhout 1998; P. Throot, Isidore of Seville's Etymologies, 2 vols., complete Eng tr., Napa, CA 2006.

Studies: F. Arévalo, pref. to 1803 ed.: Isidoriana (repr. in PL 82; it remains fundamental); Miscellanea Isidoriana, Rome 1936; J. Fontaine, Isidore de Seville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique, 2 vols., Paris 1959 ([2]1983); Isidoriana. Estudios sobre San Isidoro de Sevilla en el XIV centenario de su nacimiento, León 1961 (contains, under the signature of J. Hillgarth, an analytical and critical bibl. of Isidorian studies from 1935 to 1959); H.J. Diesner, Isidor von Sevilla und das westgotische Spanien, Berlin 1977 (recension J.F., in Gnomon 1981); J. Fontaine, Cohérence et originalité de l'étymologie isidorienne, in Homenaje a El. Elorduy, Bilbao 1978, 89-106; Isidorus Varro christianas?, Homenaje a MC. Díaz y Díaz, Madrid 1982; J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville: DSp 7, 2104-2116; J.N. Hillgarth, Isidorian Studies: StudMed 31 (1990) 925-973; P. Cazier, Isidore de Séville et la naissance de l'Espagne catholique, Paris 1994; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, III: San Isidoro de Sevilla, Madrid 1998; M. Gorman, From Isidore to Claudius of Turin: The Works of Ambrose on Genesis in the Early Middle Ages: REAug 45 (1999) 121-138; L. Navarra, Interconnessioni letterarie e ideologiche di Cassiodoro e Isidoro storici dei Goti: SMSR 23 (1999) 251-263; J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville: genèse et originalité de la culture hispanique au temps des Wisigoths, Turnhout 2000.

J. Fontaine

ISIDORE the Younger (7th–8th c.). Schindel has published, from a MS of the 13th c. from the library of Basilea, a manual on linguistic defects and qualities, De vitiis et virtutibus orationis liber, passed down under the name of Isidorus Iunior, who is otherwise unknown. According to Schindel the manual was composed in *Spain between the 5th and 6th c.; the anonymous author drew examples both from the Bible as well as from Christian writers (*Augustine, *Dracontius).

CPL 1555[a]; Verzeichnis, 581; U. Schindel, Die lateinischen Figurenlehren des 5. bis 7. Jahrhunderts und Donats Vergilkommen- tar, Gottingen 1975, 209-241; Dizionario di letteratura cristiana antica, ed. by S. Döpp and W. Geerlings, Rome 2006, 522.

A. Di Berardino

ISOCHRISTS. The term means "equal to Christ." Within the *Origenist controversy, which broke out in the 1st half of the 4th c., a division arose: the monks of the laura of Firminus were branded by their adversaries as protoktistoi (believers in the preexistence of souls; Christ was created before the other beings: for this they were also called tetraditi [since they added another person to the *Trinity]), while those of the New Laura were referred to as isochrists, since they confessed that in the moment of the restoration (apokatastasis) all will be equal to Christ. The leader of this faction was *Theodore Askidas, who later became bishop of *Caesarea in Cappadocia and ordained different bishops in Palestine, among whom was *Theodore of Scythopolis (548). One of the members of the faction of the isochrists, *Macarius, was elected patriarch of Jerusalem. The opponents turned to the emperor *Justinian, who condemned the isochrists before the ecumenical council of 553. Thanks to the intervention of the emperor many of them abjured their doctrines; among these Theodore of Scythopolis, who for the occasion wrote the Libellus de erroribus Origenis (CPG 6993: PG 86, 232-236). The Christology of the isochrists, which was inspired by the *Alexandrian tradition, tended toward *monophysitism.

DTC 8, 112; F. Diekamp, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten im 6. Jahrhundert und das 5. allgemeine Concil, Münster i.W. 1899; B. Flusin, Miracle et histoire dans l'oeuvre de Cyrille de Scythopolis, Paris 1983; J. Patrich, Sabas, Leader of Palestinian Monasticism, Washington, DC, 1995, 239-240; D. Hombergen, The Second Origenist Controversy: A New Perspective on Cyril of Scythopolis' Monastic Biographies as Historical Sources for Sixth-Century Origenism, Rome 2001, passim.

A. Di Berardino

ITALY

I. Spread of Christianity - II. Archaeology.

I. Spread of Christianity. St. *Paul wrote (Rom 1:8), "Your faith is celebrated in all the world." The Christian community in *Rome was therefore known in the Christian world for its faith in the winter of 56–57, when Paul wrote perhaps from Corinth. There is just one anecdote about historical antecedents: the expulsion of the Jews from Rome on the order of Claudius, since they were involved in continual disorders "because of Chrestus" (Suetonius, Claudius 25). The first Roman Christians, as happened elsewhere, came from the synagogue, since the synagogue network offered a support to Christian missionaries. The text of Suetonius, if it really refers to Christ, is one of the most ancient and important documents, because it is a non-Christian testimony in which the name of Christ appears. The expulsion of the Jews is dated to 48–49 (Orosius, Hist. adv. paganos 7,6,15). *Eusebius writes that *Peter had arrived at Rome at the beginning of the reign of *Claudius (HE 2,14,6; 17,1), but this is not certain. In any case, Rome received the gospel in the years between 43 and 49 (Daniélou, Nuova Storia della Chiesa, I, 533). Paul arrived at Rome around the year 60. Peter and Paul, by the unanimous testimony of the sources, suffered martyrdom in the city. In 64 the victims of the persecution of *Nero were taken from the humblest social classes; but in the following persecution of *Domitian, in 95, there were members of noble and consular families, such as that of the *Acilli. But were they really Christians? Unfortunately the acts of the martyrs were written only after the middle of the 2nd c. (M. Sordi, La persecuzione di Domiziano: RSCI 16 [1960] 1-26; G. Penco, Storia della Chiesa in Italia, I, 19-21). A community of Christians prior to the arrival of Paul existed also at Pozzuoli (ancient Puteoli) and neighboring cities (Acts 28:13) (M. Adinolfi, S. Paolo a Pozzuoli: RivBib 8 [1960] 206-224; A. Maiouni, La Campania al tempo dell'approdo di S. Paolo, in S. Paolo a Pozzuoli, XIX Centenario, Naples 1961, 52-75). One can be certain that it was Rome which, with the arrival and through the death of the two apostles, constituted, in Italian territory, the determinant center for the spread of the Christian faith (G. Penco, Storia della Chiesa in Italia, I, 17). Rome was the meeting place for Christians from everywhere, esp. from the Eastern provinces, who often opened schools there and formed specific communities. The prestige of the Roman church shone not only in Italy but also in distant territories. At the beginning of the 3rd c. *Origen at the time of Pope *Zephyrinus (d. ca. 217) traveled to Rome to "see the most ancient church of the Romans" (Eus., HE 6,14,10).

When looking for Christian evidences outside the city of Rome, we must always distinguish between a Christian presence, for which we might have an archaeological or literary indication, and an organized community with a bishop. In some cases there might be only settled priests or missionaries. The existence of a martyr in a city is not always an indication of a community with a bishop at its head. The sixth canon of the Council of *Serdica established that "in general, it is not permitted to create a bishop in a village or a small city, in which a single priest is sufficient; in fact, bishops should not be created in these places so as not to devalue the name and authority of the bishop." We may now indicate some cities with the oldest Christian presence. The consultation of the archaeological entries for the principal cities or regions will serve as a complement and completion of these brief notes.

Christianity at *Ravenna is shown by inscriptions dating back to the end of the 2nd c. or, at least, the beginning of the 3rd (G.B. De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Chris., 3-4, 4 [1979] 101-104 and pl. VII). St. *Apollinaris martyr, the first bishop, is celebrated as the founder, or at least as the organizer of the Ravennan church (Peter Chrysol., Sermo 128, PL 52, 552-553). In 343 Severus, twelfth bishop in the order of succession, was present at the Council of Serdica (Hfl-Lecl I, 749). Ravenna became more important when *Honorius established the seat of the Western empire there in 404. During the episcopate of *Peter Chrysologus, around 431, some churches of Emilia (Forlì, Faenza, Bologna, Modena) were removed from the jurisdiction of *Milan and added to Ravenna, whose bishop thus acquired the authority of a metropolitan (Peter Chrys., Sermo 175, PL 52, 657-662). If Lucillus of Verona, present at Serdica (343), was considered the sixth in that see, its first bishop, Euprepius, must have been from the middle of the 3rd c. The sees of Brescia, with Clateus, and Padua, with Prosdocimus, must date back to the beginning of the 4th c.

Another important see was that of Milan. Mirocles, sixth bishop, is listed as present at the Synod of Rome (313) and *Arles (314) (Mansi 2, 437 and 476; Hfl-Lecl 1,277). The episcopal see of Milan had already been established, therefore, in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. (Fliche-Martin-Frutaz, I, 493), but a settled bishop (Anathelon, or Anatolius or else Anatolon) must not be much earlier than the middle of the 3rd c. In Piedmont, Christianity spread during the 4th c. with episcopal sees. Up until 378 N Italy was still considered as directly obedient to Rome. Owing to the personal activity of *Ambrose (373–397) the authority of Milan was established over the entire region (Daniélou, Nuova Storia della Chiesa, I, 363; Fliche-Martin-Frutaz, III, 690-692). With the transfer of the imperial seat to Ravenna (404), the influence of Milan diminished, and meanwhile *Aquileia too became a third center in N Italy. Hermagoras was named its first bishop (MGH, Scrip., 13, Series Patr. Aquil., 367). After the persecution of *Diocletian it became a center with strong ties to Venice and *Istria. *Theodore (ca. 308–319), fourth (or fifth) bishop in succession, appears in the list of the Acts of the Council of Arles (314) (Mansi 2, 476; CCL 148, 14). He had a basilica built with stupendous mosaics, a sign of the size and wealth of that community. About that church *Jerome writes: "The clerics of Aquileia are considered a group of saints" (Chronicle, year 374; GCS 47, 247). At the council of 381 the bishops were present from all N Italy (Bologna, Vercelli, Piacenza, Trento, Brescia, Emona [Ljubljana?], Lodi, Altino, Tortona, Genua, Pavia) (Hfl-Lecl II, 49-53).

In Naples the catacombs of St. Januarius have a hypogeum from the beginnings of the 3rd c.; therefore, the Christian presence must be somewhat earlier and was sanctioned by the sacrifice of many martyrs (G. Penco, 33ff., with bibl. for Campania, Calabria, Marche, Umbria, Puglia, Sicily). At Cimitile, near Nola, a Christian mausoleum of the 3rd c. with biblical scenes (*Adam and Eve, Jonah) proves the existence of a community. At Syracuse, in Sicily, a well-organized Christian community already existed in the middle of the 3rd c. with lapsi in the persecution of *Decius (see Cyprian, Ep. 30,5: CSEL 3, 2, 553); the testimony of various cemeteries suggests the existence of a large community. Chrestus, the first historically verified bishop, invited by *Constantine to participate in the Council of Arles of 314, with two priests, with authorization to use the cursus publicus (Eus., HE 10,5,21-24), was present there with his deacon Florus. Syracuse had its martyrs, but the information about them is not certain; however, Lucy died during the persecution of Diocletian. Around her tomb a cemetery developed, and her veneration spread outside of Sicily as well. The martyrs of certain cities (Catania, Palermo) indicate the existence of communities, even if small, but they are not well documented by literary sources.

A comprehensive view of all Italy shows us a rather restricted number of dioceses in the north, and many more in the center and south. In compensation the N dioceses seem larger. At the end of the 3rd c. 16 dioceses existed; in the 4th c. 55 new dioceses were born; in the 5th c. another 155 were created. At the beginning of the 600s, Italy (including the islands) reached the number of 258 dioceses (Daniélou, I, 535).

Beyond the fundamental works, well-known, of Ughelli, Savio, Lanzoni; a series of volumes ed. by A. Caprioli on the Lombard dioceses, Brescia 1986–1987; J. Daniélou - H. Marrou, Nuova Storia della Chiesa, I, Turin 1970 (Appendix of G.D. Gordini, 531-545); G. Penco, Storia della Chiesa in Italia, I, Milan 1978; R. Budriesi, Le origini del cristianesimo a Ravenna, Ravenna 1970; A. Scholtz, Il "Seminarium Aquileiense": Mem. stor. Forogiuliesi 50 (1970) 4-106; S. Tavano, Aquileia cristiana, Udine 1972; G. Bovini, Antichità cristiane di Milano, Bologna 1970; D. Mallarco, Storia antica della chiesa di Napoli. Le fonti, Naples, 1943; Id., Le origini della chiesa di Napoli, in Miscellanea P. Paschini, I, Rome 1948, 27-68; G. Bertelli, Le diocesi di Amelia, Narni e Otricoli, Spoleto 1985; Il cristianesimo in Sicilia dalle origini a Gregorio Magno, ed. V. Messana - S. Pricoco, Caltanissetta 1987; O. Otranto, L'Italia meridionale e Puglia paleocristiana, Bari 1991; Id., La cristianizzazione della Calabria e la formazione delle diocesi: VetChr 32 (1995) 339-378; R. Bratz, Il cristianesimo aquileiese prima di Costantino fra Aquileia e Petovio, Udine 1999; A. Campione - D. Nuzzo, La Daunia paleocristiana, Bari 1999; A. Campione, La Basilicata paleocristiana, Bari 2000; R. Lizzi, Christianization and Conversion in Northern Italy, in The Origins of Christendom in the West, ed. A. Kreider, Edinburgh-New York 2001, 47-95; RAC 18 (2002) 1160-1202; P. Lampe, From Paul to Valentinus: Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries, Minneapolis 2003; G. Otranto, L'Italia meridionale tra cristianizzazione del territorio e rapporti col mondo bizantino, in Ad contemplandam sapientiam, Studi in memoria di S. Lenza, Soveria Manelli 2004, 491-521.

L. Dattrino

II. Archaeology. 1. Venetia and Istria (Lat. Venetia et Histria). Monumental proofs of Christian life in the region during the 3rd c. are completely missing, but the flowering of martyrs in the persecution of *Diocletian (many have certain proofs) shows that at least in the 2nd half of the 3rd c. there were Christian communities in the region. The fulcrum of Christianity was *Aquileia, with the oldest monumental remains of the entire Po Valley. Two parallel rectangular basilicas without apses, built by the bishop Theodore, present at the anti-*Donatist Council of *Arles (314), are noteworthy for the large mosaic areas, rich in scriptural and didactic values. The oldest dated sepulchral inscription is from 336, and the cemeteries were arranged along the Via Gemina, Annia and that named Iulia Augusta, where, furthermore, sepulchral structures have been recognized, such as the rectangular memoria in honor of St. Protus, "teacher of the Canzian saints" (acc. to the Passio), excavated at S. Canzian d'Isonzo (4th c.). The fervid Christian life of Aquileia is reflected in a series of basilicas gradually built on the site of the early basilicas, in the baptistery with a quadrangle plan and angular internal niches from the first years of the 5th c. and in many suburban basilicas, such as the basilica of Monastero, for a community of Easterners, of which the entire mosaic surface and part of the elevation is preserved. It is also reflected in the basilica of alla Beligna at a pre-Christian worship location (Belenus, the local instance of Apollo) on a T-cross plan and perhaps dedicated to the apostles (rich apsidal mosaic with twelve lambs), and the basilica Sts. Felix and Fortunatus tripartite, above the tomb of St. Fortunatus, who was a martyr with Felix at the dawn of the 4th c. Next to Aquileia there is Grado, a coastal fortress, born on an island on the orders of the Aquileians during the invasions. Above a small funerary basilica of the end of the 4th c. is arranged the nucleus of the present Duomo (consecrated by the bishop Elia in 579), which, in addition to the intact architecture, preserves the entire mosaic floor of the 6th c. Basilicas datable to between the 5th and 6th c. are attested on the island and on other islands of the lagoon (S. Maria delle Grazie, Piazza della Vittoria, Barbana, S. Giuliano).

In neighboring Istria, Parenzo is prominent with some suburban sepulchral chapels and with the two oldest rectangular worship spaces without apse, which preserve the mosaic floors (end of the 4th c.), followed by others, these two parallel, of which the tripartite, aligned with an octagonal baptistery, became that of the bishop Euphrasius, which, unique on the E shore of the Adriatic, preserves the festive mosaic decoration in the central apse and partially in the side apses. Near Parenzo is Orsera, where Late Antique buildings, later reused as worship spaces, have been excavated. Also Cittanova, whose parish church seems to preserve traces of the paleo-Christian tripartite cathedral, which had an octagonal baptistery. Pola has lost the great basilica which *Maximian, bishop of *Ravenna (546–556), built there, and it only preserves a Latin-cross martyrium, but it has the tripartite Duomo of the 5th c., which had on the side a single-halled basilica and in front a baptistery in a Greek cross.

Outside the walls, in the countryside and on the island of Brioni there are ruins or remains of other basilicas; at Nesactium two parallel basilicas of the 5th c. (no bishop, however, is known there); at Samagher a small basilica has yielded a remarkable box in sculpted ivory (today in the Museo Archeologico of Venice). Trieste has the mosaic floor of a suburban basilica on a cruciform plan and part of the mosaic flooring of the cathedral (5th c., expanded in the 6th, Bishop Frugifer). Near Trieste is St. Giovanni del Timavo with a tripartite basilica, perhaps built over a pre-Christian chapel (5th c.). In the present Friuli two Roman centers, having become episcopal sees, have particular importance: Forum Iulii (Cividale), whose octagonal basilica is known (5th c.) and Iulium Carnicum (Zuglio), where a basilica is attested of Adriatic type whose mosaic floor is preserved and, on the ridge of St. Peter, epigraphic remains and the ruins of a small basilica from the era of the invasions. The castrum of Ibligo (Invillino) should also be mentioned, where on Zuca Ridge in the first years of the 5th c. a basilica of Adriatic type was built with geometrical mosaic flooring and a trichora chapel with a central polygonal apse; the place was perhaps in relationship with the fortified locality on the neighboring Santino Ridge.

In lower Friuli, at St. Canzian d'Isonzo, is another basilica, with the tomb of the Canzian saints (4th and 5th c.). Following the coast to the W, Concordia is the episcopal see richest with monumental presences: next to a small trichora perhaps from the middle of the 4th c. (worthy of note are the most ancient polygonal apses of the region), at the dawn of the 5th c. a tripartite basilica was built with internal apse; its mosaic floor is intact, while the trichora, elongated, became a martyrial basilica: the site has also yielded many sepulchral inscriptions and *sarcophagi. There follows Eraclea with a basilica (5th c.), and Equilium (Iesolo) with a basilica, which has yielded a mosaic floor with inscriptions from the first years of the 6th c., dedicated to the Madonna; then Torcello, which preserves from the ancient basilica the circular baptistery with two niches and a commemorative epigraph from 639.

In the interior, the see which shows the greatest vivacity is *Verona, with its episcopal basilicas: two, aligned, perhaps in succession, one from the end of the 4th c. (bishop St. Zeno), the other from the first years of the 5th, tripartite, with mosaics in the aisles and in the atrium and a long solea. The suburban basilicas are notable for their architectonic plan: that of St. Stephan built on a cruciform form, as perhaps the basilica of the apostles, which preserves the martyrium (chapel of Sts. Teuteria and Tosca) formerly on a Latin-cross plan. Also a suburban hypogeum, S. Maria in Stelle, should be mentioned, rich in frescoes and mosaics which should be dated to the 5th c.

Next, in terms of importance of its remains, is Vicenza. The suburban basilica of Sts. Felix and Fortunatus built on a funeral site—it preserves the body of St. Felix—first as a hall, then tripartite, with many mosaic sections (5th c.) has on the side the martyrium (chapel of S. Maria Mater Domini) with enclosed-cross plan, with figured wall mosaics from the end of the 5th c.; despite contrary opinions, the remains of a baptistery seem to point to it as the first cathedral see, later transferred inside the walls, as the slabs of mosaic floors with the dedications of the donors under the present Duomo attest.

The most certain paleo-Christian nucleus of Padua is the chapel on an enclosed-cross plan of St. Prosdocimus at S. Giustina, where the basilica, which was located here, seems to be completely lost (6th c.); another urban worship site is near city hall (mosaic inscription of Eutherius, 5th c.); perhaps a hypogeum was near the present St. Sofia; elements of sculpture from a paleo-Christian basilica dedicated to S. Maria are known at Ceneda (Vittorio Veneto), where the episcopal see of Opitergium (Oderzo) took shelter in the 7th c. Fragments of sepulchral inscriptions of the 5th c. come from here, which attest to the presence of a Christian community.

At Treviso a recent excavation has brought to light the mosaic floor of the circular baptistery (2nd half of the 4th c.) and at Feltria (Feltre) a circular baptistery in a suburban zone in front of the Duomo (5th c.).

Going up the valley of the Adige, at Tridentum (Trent), the cathedral rises outside the walls on the tomb of St. Vigilius (perhaps martyr in 405); it has revealed sepulchral epigraphs and mosaic floors assigned to the 6th c.; at Dos Trento, a refuge during the invasions, there is a basilica with a mosaic inscription (6th c.). At Bauzanum (Bolzano) a basilica of Adriatic type has been recognized below the Duomo. There are at least two paleo-Christian chapels in the Val di Non. As a result of a comprehensive examination, it can be affirmed that after the first architectonic and figurative expressions at Aquileia at the beginnings of the 4th c., few other sees have clear documentation of Christian art in the same century (Parenzo, Trieste, Concordia, perhaps Orsera, Verona, Treviso, S. Canzian d'Isonzo), while an intense presence was found in the 5th c. with activity attested in the 6th, when, in the 2nd half, favorable political conditions also animated the activity of the bishops of Aquileia-Grado, Parenzo, Trieste, Pola, and, in the interior of the region, Padua and Trent.

2. Liguria and Aemilia. Although the oldest monumental Christian remains in the Po Valley are at Aquileia, *Milan, from 285 capital of the Roman West, has a rooted tradition of a Christian community reunited in a cemeterial environment before the Constantinian edict.

The missionary action of Milan went in all directions, esp. in the time of Ambrose. Among the closest sees were Brixia, Laus Pompeia, Vercellae, Comum.

At Brixia (Brescia) two memorials built along the Via di Cremona, today below the church of S. Afra, in a funeral area, are perhaps the oldest attestation, but there are signs of other suburban worship centers. The first historically known bishop is Ursicinus, who signed at Serdica in 343, but from the mosaics we can tell that the double cathedral (S. Peter de Dom and S. Maria Maggiore) seems to be from the first years of the 5th c. On the axis of the N basilica is the baptistery, on a quadratic plan with eight deep internal niches. A basilica on Cidneo Ridge, S. Stefano in Arce, is perhaps *Longobard (Lombard), built around an older chapel. Brescia preserves precious ivories (the lipsanotheca of ca. 360, three ivory diptychs of the 5th c.), a purple evangeliarium of the 6th c., a fragmentary sarcophagus with columns and part of another on two levels in onyx with the passage of the Red Sea (4th c.).

At Laus Pompeia (Lodi Vecchio), the bishop

Bassianus built the cathedral and in 387 consecrated a suburban basilica to the apostles. At Vercellae (Vercelli) it is not clear if its first bishop, *Eusebius (middle of the 4th c.), exiled for his orthodox faith, is responsible for the cathedral constituted of two parallel basilicas, S. Maria Maggiore and the Trinity, which, in relationship with the dedication, had a triconch apse as in certain Egyptian basilicas. Near Vercelli is Desana, where a rich repository of goldwork from the 5th c. was found, including thirteen silver ligulae with Christian symbols.

At Comum (Como) the bishop *Abundius (d. 437) built the suburban basilica of the apostles, inspired by S. Simpliciano in Milan; almost contemporaneous is the cathedral of S. Euphemia, today under the Romanesque S. Fedele, which preserves on its axis the baptistery with niches spanned by curved arches and near which there was a mosaic (late 5th c.), perhaps of the catechumeneum.

Let us now follow the roads that start from Milan. To the N let us mention Modicia (Monza), which has Christian signs in the cruets of Palestinian pewter and in the phial with sanctified oil on the tombs of the martyrs in the catacombs of Rome sent by *Gregory the Great to queen *Theodelinda. Above Como, on the island Comacina, a refuge from the invasions, there remains a baptistery and a lost basilica of S. Euphemia, due perhaps to the bishop Agrippinus (6th c.); at Gravedona remains of a large quadratic baptistery with niches spanned by curved arch and slabs of mosaic flooring from the 5th c.; at Riva S. Vitale an intact baptistery on a quadratic plan with semicircular niches in the corners, which preserves many parts of the mosaic flooring of marble inlay. In the Val d'Olona, Castelseprio should be mentioned, with a basilica of Adriatic type, with an apse added later (6th c.), and an octagonal baptistery with fine walls; and on the foothills of the Alps, Bergomum (Bergamo), where the topographic documents are not very certain and center on a double suburban basilica on the tomb of St. Alexander (end 4th c.). In the territory of Bergamo there is Calcio, which reveals a mosaic of a basilica from the end of the 4th c.

Toward the W, Novara (ancient Novaria)—whose first bishop, *Gaudentius, is from the end of the 4th c.—has the most imposing paleo-Christian building of today's Piedmont: an octagonal baptistery with niches spanned by curved arches (beginning 5th c., Carolingian vault), which remained even after the ancient cathedral was replaced with the present one in the middle of the 19th c. Contemporaneous (397) is the episcopal see of Eporedia (Ivrea). In the S territory of the region, Ticinum (Pavia) has certain historical evidences, but modest monumental remains, due to the great vitality of the city in the Early Medieval period, and a few inscriptions (famous is that of *Ennodius, 521). There is certainly a double cathedral (S. Maria Maggiore and S. Stefano) and a basilica with triconch apse within the walls, to which many suburban basilicas should be added, such as S. Pietro in Ciel d'Oro and S. Giovanni Domnarum (6th c.). In the territory of Pavia, Laumellum (Lomello) preserves an octagonal baptistery with niches spanned by curved arches, the only paleo-Christian one (6th c.) well-preserved in the present Lombardy. At Cremona, under the Duomo there remains only a paleo-Christian mosaic, but the dedication of the cathedral (S. Maria and S. Stefano) suggests a double basilica. Before crossing the Po, at Mantua (Mantova) a mosaic of the 5th c., near the cathedral, attests a possible double cathedral (a contemporaneous sarcophagus, somewhat reworked, is in the present Duomo). Across the Po, Dertona (Tortona), one of the oldest dioceses of the region (Bishop Esuperantius is from the end of the 4th c.), has many sepulchral epigraphs, found along the road to Voghera, and it seems that an urban cathedral and a suburban basilica of the apostles have been attested. Going down along the Via Emilia we reach Placentia (Piacenza), whose first attested bishop is *Sabinus, present at the Council of Aquileia in 381: here the suburban basilica with a cruciform plan dedicated to Sts. Victor and Antoninus seems contemporaneous with him. At Fidentia (Fidenza) it can be said that the imported veneration of St. Domninus was consolidated in oratories of the 4th c. A noble attestation is given at Parma by a rich mosaic of the 5th c. excavated in front of the Duomo (and now in the crypt), documenting the existence of an urban cathedral of the city, while at Mutina (Modena) only a basilica of the 4th c. is attested, under the bishop *Theodulus. At Bononia (Bologna), the arrival of St. *Ambrose is recorded in 393, where its Bishop Eustasius enlivened worship with the transfer of the bodies of Sts. Vitale and Agricola to a suburban basilica, while to the bishop St. Petronius is due the constitution of that worship area of St. Stephan, called Nova Hierusalem, rebuilt multiple times. The urban basilica of S. Maria Maggiore seems later, in which only fragments from the 6th c. have been recognized.

In the extended region, which almost reaches the sea and is largely traversed by the main roads of the Po Valley, the Postumia and the Emilia, commercial exchanges and the imperial presence notably determined the Christian efforts. Beyond Medieval accounts, although there might have been Christian cemeterial structures prior to the Constantinian edict, it is in the 4th c. that the churches consolidated, often animated by the apostolic vigor of St. Ambrose, who certainly exercised great influence on the Christian construction within the entire region. Milan is the city of the valley which above all others preserves notable remains of architecture and is the only one in the region which has wall mosaics. Around Milan, Monza and Brescia preserve examples of goldwork and ivory of great importance. After the affirmations of the 5th c., the invasions and political necessities halted the erection of monuments as testimonies, which began again with vigor in the Longobard era.

3. Alpes Cottiae. Christianity may have extended to the farthest reaches of the Po Valley due to the energies expressed from Milan, but also certainly from those from the Rhone Valley (across the Col de Montgenèvre more than the Col du Mont Cenis), where at Lyons around 180 St. *Irenaeus was bishop and there were martyrs under *Marcus Aurelius. Turin had martyrs under *Diocletian, Octavius, Adventor and Solutor, but a diocese with a see in the city was created only at the end of the 4th c. with St. *Maximus. It is not clear if he is responsible for the double cathedral (S. Giovanni and S. Maria), suggested by the Early Medieval one. Given certain dedications, some other urban basilicas must be admitted as contemporaneous or only a little later, while in the nearby Collegno a tripartite basilica from the middle of the 5th c. can be seen in S. Massimo, and at S. Ponso Canavese the Early Medieval baptistery has paleo-Christian roots, an octagonal plan with niches spanned by curved arches and a hexagonal basin.

At Monteu da Po, in the Roman center Industria a basilica of St. John is attested. Also at Hasta (Asti) a double cathedral dedicated to St. John and St. Mary seems likely, while at Alba Pompeia (Alba) there are only attestations of a diocese in the 5th c.

In the territory of Alessandria, at Ticineto, in a rustic villa, a hall with apse has been recognized in a funeral area which should be dated to the 5th c. In the province of Cuneo the dedications of the church of Busca suggest paleo-Christian presences, while at Revello the oldest Christian inscription of the region, dated to 341, should be mentioned. Interesting sepulchral inscriptions are known at Aquae Statiellae (Acqui); at Augusta Bagiennorum (Bene Vagenna), in the portico of the Roman theater a tripartite basilica of the 5th c. can be seen.

Across the Apennines, Albintimilium (Ventimiglia) has an architectonically Ambrosian baptistery; Albingaunum (Albenga) (which has traces of the paleo-Christian basilica in the cathedral) a baptistery based on the Milanese octagonal, which is the most notable paleo-Christian monument of the coast, preserves the mosaic vault of the 5th c. including the radiato monogramma of Christ. The city also has a small basilica in a funeral area, S. Calogero, built, it seems, at the end of the 4th c. and rebuilt many times, a mainland dependence of the abbey on the island Gallinaria, attested at least from the 6th c.

The other signs of Christian antiquity are modest: at Taggia perhaps a baptismal font; in the parish church of Finalmarina remains of the single-aisled basilica with an inscription dated to 517; at Noli by S. Paragorio epigraphic attestations of a basilica and remains of a baptistery of the 6th c.

At Genua (Genoa) a Bishop Diogenes was known in the middle of the 4th c., but the two cemeteries, S. Sabina and S. Stefano, are certainly Christian where there is an inscription from 493. Here the presence of bishops who had fled from Milan seems to have reinvigorated the cultivation of the saints venerated at Milan: the apostles, St. Laurence, Sts. Nazarius and Celsus.

On the Italian Riviera small basilicas, datable to the 6th c., are at Portofino, at Portovenere (S. Pietro), one on the island of Tino and at Palmaria; older is the cemetery of the parish church of S. Venerio near Migliarina, which can be referred to the end of the 4th c.

In general it can be said that only recently has attention been paid to the excavated remains of the oldest antique Christian presence in the N part of the region. The intense life of the Middle Ages and later centuries along the Ligurian coast has scattered a great deal: the intact baptistery of Albenga is the most valuable attestation. The research on the presence of the emigrated bishops of Milan in Genoa and along the coast will be of notable importance.

4. Alpes Graiae. The most important see of the region is Augusta Praetoria (Aosta), which seems to have had a more decisive Christian presence due to *Maximus of Turin (end of the 5th c.). However, for now the monumental attestations are later: the suburban basilica of S. Lorenzo, on a Latin-cross plan, stands out certainly for its Ambrosian contribution (1st half of the 5th c.); it is the site of many tombs of Aostan bishops. There are good reasons for maintaining that in the area of the present cathedral there existed in the paleo-Christian era a double basilica while, from a careful excavation, a pre-Christian sepulchral area has been recognized outside the walls, to the W of the city; it was used also in the Christian era with two memoriae and a small basilica with extended apse, perhaps dedicated to St. Genesius.

In the parish church of the nearby Saint-Vincent a small funerary basilica (end 5th–6th c.) has been excavated above a bath area of a private villa.

1. Venetia and Istria: A. Gnirs, Zur Frage der christlischen Kultanlagen . . . im Österreichischen Küstenland: Jahreshefte des österr. archäolog. Institutes 19-20 (1919) Beibl. 185-196; P. Moro, Iulium Carnicum (Zuglio), Rome 1936; P. Verzone, L'architettura religiosa dell'Alto Medioevo nell'Italia settentrionale, Milan 1942; B. Molajoli, La basilica Eufrasiana di Parenzo, Padua 1943; M. Mirabella Roberti, La sede paleocristiana di Orsera: Annali Triestini 15 (1944) 31-120; Id., Indagini del Duomo di Pola: RivAC 23-24 (1947–1948) 209-229; var. aus., La basilica dei Santi Felice e Fortunato in Vicenza, Vicenza 1979; N. Rasmo, La basilica paleocristiana di Bolzano: Cultura Atesina 11 (1957) 7-12; G. Brusin - P.L. Zovatto, Monumenti paleocristiani di Aquileia e di Grado, Udine 1957; S. Tavano, Aquileia, guida dei monumenti cristiani, Udine 1977; M. Mirabella Roberti, La basilica paleocristiana di San Giusto, in Festschrift F. Gerke, Baden Baden 1962, 55-64; B. Forlati Tamaro, L'ipogeo di S. Maria in Stelle a Verona, in Stucchi e mosaici altomedioevali, I, Milan 1962, 245-259; Id., Padova da Costantino ai Longobardi, in Padova antica, Padua 1981, 285-289; G. Pavan, Un'interpretazione del complesso paleocristiano di S. Giustina: Boll. Musei Civ. Padova 57 (1968) 1-26; G. Cuscito, La basilica martiriale paleocristiana di Trieste: Atti e Memorie della Società Istriana di archeologia e Storia patria XVIII n.s. (1970) 37-68; M. Mirabella Roberti, Considerazioni sulla basilica suburbana di Trieste: Atti dei Civici Musei 6 (1969–1970) 101-112; R. Noll, Ein Reliquiar aus Sanzeno im Nonsberg und das frühe Christentum im Trentino: AAWW 109 (1972) 320-337; M. Mirabella Roberti, Il battistero paleocristiano di Cividale: AAAd 9 (1976) 91-101; var. aus., Iulia Concordia dall'età romana all'età moderna, Treviso 1978; G.P. Marchini, Verona romana e paleocristiana, in Ritratto di Verona, Verona 1978, 84-93; I. Rogger, La basilica paleocristiana di S. Vigilio: Studi Trentini di Sc. Storiche 53 (1974) 315-409; 54 (1975) 3-40; M. Mirabella Roberti, Iulium Carnicum centro romano alpino: AAAd 9 (1976) 91-101; Id., La basilica paleocristiana di San Giovanni del Timavo: AAAd 10 (1976) 63-73; F. Forlati - B. Forlati Tamaro, in Il Duomo di Vicenza, Vicenza 1976; S. Tavano, Grado, guida storica e artistica, Udine 1976; var. aus., Da Aquileia a Venezia, Milan 1981 (with contributions by Bertacchi, Cuscito et al.); G. Cuscito, La basilica paleocristiana di Iesolo. Per lo studio dei primi insediamenti cristiani nella laguna veneta, Aquileia 1983; Id., Testimonianze archeologiche monumentali del cristianesimo antico fino al secolo IX, in Le origini del cristianesimo tra Piave e Livenza da Roma a Carlo Magno, Vittorio Veneto 1983, 79-104; var. aus., Le tracce materiali del cristianesimo dal tardo antico al Mille, in Il Veneto nel Medioevo. Dalla "Venetia" alla Marca Veronese, coordinamento scientifico e grafico di S. Lusuardi Siena, disegni di P. Piva, Verona 1989, 89-328; var. aus., La Chiesa concordiese 389-1989, Pordenone 1989; P. Testini - G. Cantino Wataghin - L. Pani Ermini, La cattedrale in Italia, in Actes du XI Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne, I, Vatican City 1989, 5-229; var. aus., Il territorio tra tardoantico e altomedioevo. Metodi di indagine e risultati, ed. G.P. Brogiolo - L. Castelletti, Florence 1992; G. Cuscito, Opilione e le origini del culto martiriale a Padova, in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes. Miscellanea in onore di Mons. V. Saxer, Vatican City 1992, 163-181; Id., Ancora su Mauro "episcopus et confessor" e sul "locus duplicatus" di Parenzo, in Domum tuam dilexi. Miscellanea in onore di A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 185-210; var. aus., Archeologia in Piemonte. Il Medioevo, ed. L. Mercando - E. Micheletto, Turin 1998; G. Cantino Wataghin - C. Lambert, Sepolture e città. L'Italia settentrionale tra IV e VIII secolo, in Sepolture tra IV e VIII secolo, ed. G.P. Brogiolo - G. Cantino Wataghin: Documenti di Archeologia 13 (1998) 89-114; G. Cuscito, Recenti testimonianze archeologiche sulla cristianizzazione del territorio tra il Friuli e l'Istria: Aquileia Nostra LXX (1999) 73-104; G. Cantino Wataghin - S. Uggé, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Italia settentrionale (1993-1998), in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi. Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeologia Cristiana, Bordighera 2001, 7-37; var. aus., L'antica basilica di San Vigilio in Trento. Storia, archeologia, reperti, ed. I. Rogger - E. Cavada, Trento 2001; var. aus., Concordia Sagittaria. Tremila anni di storia, ed. P. Croce Da Villa - E. Balestrazzi, Concordia 2001; G. Cantino Wataghin, Istituzioni monastiche nel Friuli altomedievale: un'indagine archeologica, in Paolo Diacono e il Friuli altomedievale (secc. VI-X). Atti del XIV Congr. intern. di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 2001, 281-319; M. Sannazaro, Insediamenti rurali ed "ecclesiae baptismales" in Friuli: il contributo della ricerca archeologica, ibid., 253-280; G. Cuscito, Bronzi paleocristiani di Aquileia: AAAd LI (2002) 379-414; var. aus., Chiese e insediamenti nelle campagne tra V e VI secolo, ed. G.P. Brogiolo: Documenti di Archeologia 30, 2003; G. Cuscito, La cattedrale di San Giusto a Trieste, Trieste 2003.

2. Liguria and Aemilia: F. Frigerio - B. Nogara, Gli scavi e il mosaico della Soc. Bancaria Italiana in Como: Riv. Archeol. Comense (1912) fasc. 63-64; F. Reggiori, Dieci battisteri lombardi dal sec. V al sec. XII, Rome 1934; G. Nocca, Topografia di Ticinum all'epoca romana, Bologna 1934; G. Chierici, Il battistero di Lomello: Rendic. Pont. Accad. Romana di Archeol. 17 (1940) 127-142; P. Verzone, L'architettura religiosa dell'Alto Medioevo nell'Italia settentrionale, Milan 1942; G.P. Bognetti, Santa Maria di Castelseprio, Milan 1949; A. Calderini - G. Chierici - C. Cecchelli, La basilica di San Lorenzo Maggiore, Milan 1951; A. Caretta, Laus Pompeia, Milan 1954; Id., in S. Bassiano vescovo di Lodi, Lodi 1975; F. Reggiori, Il battistero di Riva San Vitale, Bellinzona 1955; M. Mirabella Roberti, Una basilica adriatica a Castelseprio, in VII Frühmittelalter Kongressakten, Vienna 1961, 24-37; Id., Un mosaico paleocristiano a Calcio, in Stucchi e mosaici altomedievali, Milan 1962, 229-244; G. Panazza, Le manifestazioni artistiche dal sec. IV all'inizio del sec. VII, in Storia di Brescia, I, Milan 1963, 363-391; U. Chierici, Il battistero del Duomo di Novara, Turin 1967; F. Soliani Raschini, Note sul battistero di Lomello: Boll. Soc. Pavese di St. Patria 57 (1967); V. Viale, Il tesoro di Desana, in Vercelli e il Vercellese nell'antichità, Vercelli 1971, 71-77; M. Mirabella Roberti - A. Paredi, Il battistero di San Giovanni alle Fonti, Milan 1974; L. Caramel, Le testimonianze paleocristiane, in Storia di Monza, IV, Milan 1976, 84-116; M. Mirabella Roberti, Un mosaico paleo-cristiano a Cremona: Quaderni ticinesi di numismatica e antichità classiche 8 (1979) 279-288; M.C. Profumo, Nota sulla topografia di Dertona paleocristiana, in Atti del V Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Cristiana, Rome 1982, 199-210; var. aus., Il territorio tra tardoantico e altomedioevo. Metodi di indagine e risultati, ed. G.P. Brogiolo - L. Castelletti, Florence 1992; var. aus., Chiese e insediamenti nelle campagne tra V e VI secolo, ed. G.P. Brogiolo: Documenti di Archeologia 30, 2003.

3. Alpes Cottiae: U. Formentini, Monumenti di Porto Venere: Memorie Accad. Cappellini 15 (1934) 29ff.; G. De Angelis d'Ossat, I battisteri di Albenga e Ventimiglia: Riv. Studi Liguri 2 (1936) 207-250; F. Savio, Revello e i suoi vescovi, Turin 1938; L. Cimaschi, Gli scavi all'isola del Tino e l'archeologia cristiana nel golfo della Spezia: Giorn. Storico d. Lunigiana 14 (1963); Id., La prima campagna di scavo alla pieve di S. Venerio: Giorn. Storico d. Lunigiana 12 (1961) 23-46; D. De Bernardi Ferrero, La chiesetta di San Massimo in Collegno: Palladio 8 (1958) 121-138; L. Pejrani Boricco, San Ponso Canavese, antica pieve e battistero, in Atti del V Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Cristiana, Rome 1982, 151-

161; M.M. Negro Ponzi, Villaro di Ticineto, op. cit., 211-225; C. Casartelli Novelli, Le fabbriche della cattedrale di Torino dall'età paleocristiana all'Alto Medioevo: StudMed 9 (1970) 622-623; N. Lamboglia, Albenga romana e medievale, Bordighera 1981; F. Bolgiani, La penetrazione del Cristianesimo in Piemonte, in Atti del V Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Cristiana, Rome 1982, 37-61; G. Wataghin Cantino, Problemi e prospettive dell'archeologia cristiana in Piemonte, op. cit., 67-81; var. aus., Il territorio tra tardoantico . . . , op. cit.; var. aus., Chiese e insediamenti nelle campagne . . . , op. cit.; M. Marcenaro, Il battistero paleocristiano di Albenga. Le origini del cristianesimo nella Liguria marittima, Genoa 1993; var. aus., Archeologia in Piemonte. Il Medioevo, ed. L. Mercando - E. Micheletto, Turin 1998.

4. Alpes Graiae: Ch. Bonnet, L'église cruciforme de Saint-Laurent d'Aoste, in Atti del V Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Cristiana, Rome 1982, 271-295; R. Mollo Mezzena, Il complesso cimiteriale fuori porta Decumana ad Aosta, op. cit., 319-333.

M. Mirabella Roberti

5. Etruria. There are numerous evidences of underground cemeteries esp. in the S part of the region (Tuscia romana). With some exceptions (e.g., cemeteries of Chiusi and Bolsena) they are hypogea of modest size which repeat for the most part common characteristics also present in S Lazio (see below) and in the residual evidence of the territory of the Sabines and Paeligni (see below), which can be summarized as: limited extension, irregularity of excavation, reutilization of preexisting structures, the prevalence of uncrowded burials and the typical closure of the niches with tiles covered in mortar. In many cases these hypogea are linked to the cult of one or more martyrs, which has often led to the building of a sanctuary above.

In the diocese of Lorium there are three cemeteries connected to the cult of martyrs: the first of Sts. Rufina and Seconda at the tenth milestone of the Via Cornelia in the area today called Boccea; above the cemetery rose a structure next to which already at the beginning of the 6th c. the bishop of Lorium usually had his own residence, so much that he was named episcopus St. Rufinae, or else episcopus ecclesiae Silvae Candidae from the name of the place of the martyrdom of the two saints; the second cemetery is named for S. Mario, Marta, Audifax and Habakkuk, at around twelve miles from Rome, still on the Via Cornelia; and the third, for St. Basilides, began at the twelfth milestone of the Via Aurelia.

In the diocese of Acquaviva, in the countryside of Capena, underground cemeteries remain near Morlupo, at Monte della Casetta and at Rignano, the last of a relatively larger development, dedicated to a S. Theodora.

The hypogea of Vulci and that in the area of Nazzano are the surviving cemeterial monuments of the diocese of Tarquinii, while in the diocese of Forum Clodii, out of three cemeteries mentioned by the sources only that of S. Alessandro is known, near Baccano, near which the remains of an altar have been found also. In the dioceses of Sutri and of Nepi remain, respectively, the catacombs of S. Giovenale and of S. Savinilla—or of Ss. Romano and Tolomeo—the first of which reuses rooms of the Etruscan era.

Three hypogea—that of S. Eutizio, a second, anonymous, near Bassano under the church of S. Maria de Luco, a third, indicated as Salvatore of Rosello—appear in the territory of Ferento, while two modern subterranean buildings, one in the locality of Le Grotte, the other in the ancient countryside of Sorrina Nova, join the much more important complex of S. Cristina in the diocese of Volsinii (today Bolsena). This consists of three nuclei, today in communication among themselves, located around the tomb of the martyrs, and thus the catacomb proper, the so-called grotto of S. Cristina, with its annexes, and, in the NW zone, the so-called Longobard area.

A cemetery dedicated to Ss. Felicissima and Gratiliano is indicated in the diocese of Falerii, and finally at Clusium (modern Chiusi) two underground cemeteries remain; the anonymous one in the locality S. Caterina, consisting of two principal galleries which start from a trapezoidal oratory and into which run side passages at right angles; and the other, much better known, of S. Mustiola, consisting of a series of galleries which today encircle a small underground basilica, and which, acc. to inscriptions and graffiti, was built, in its original nucleus, prior to the religious peace. As for the aboveground areas, for the late Roman era some tombs of various typologies were identified in the last century in the urban area of the present Civitavecchia, while a much larger sepulchral area, of ca. 80 tombs, has been found recently on the Pionta Ridge near Arezzo, with documented use from the mid-5th to the mid-7th c. The documentation for the Lombard era is more abundant.

Other than discoveries of scattered tombs, found more or less throughout the region, organized cemeteries have been found in the area of Chiusi at the foot of the Arcisa Ridge in the countryside near Portonaccio; at Fiesole, in the area of a Roman temple, under the present Via di Riorbico; near Grosseto, the necropolises of Grancia and of Casetta di Mota. They are, mostly, sepulchers of rectangular or trapezoidal (anthropomorphic) form, partially excavated in the earth and partly built with large stone slabs, sometimes paved with bricks, which has restored, in addition to native material, rich Longobard funerary goods.

Less rich is the documentation concerning the primitive worship buildings in the region. At Perugia, in an extraurban area the so-called temple of S. Michele Arcangelo is known, on a central plan, commonly dated to the 6th c. At Chiusi, although not yet investigated, the ruins of a worship hall remain above the catacomb of S. Mustiola—it has been proposed as the primitive cathedral. Likewise, the results are not yet known of the excavations undertaken below the present Duomo to identify the presence or absence of an older worship building to which the capitals reused in the later building would have belonged.

At Arezzo, besides the already-mentioned funeral area, excavations have recently produced a three-aisled basilica with three apses, considered the Medieval facies of the church of St. Mary and St. Stephen.

More important is the evidence that concerns Florence. In the outer-urban area, a basilica of grand dimensions of a funerary character, placed above a Roman funeral area, has been found near the present church of St. Felicita. In the urban area, important excavations under the church of S. Maria del Fiore have yielded the remains of the church of S. Reparata in which different phases have been recognized, starting from the paleo-Christian—three aisles with a large semicircular apse and polychrome mosaic flooring, whose date is generally put between the late 5th c. and the beginning of the 6th—to Early Medieval renovations. It remains to establish with certainty the moment in which the church of S. Reparata acquired the dignity of a cathedral, an aspect which can be clarified when it is possible to read with better accuracy the archaeological information offered in the past by the structures under the baptistery of S. Giovanni. Among the evidences of the Early Medieval city, finally, the apsed building found under the Medieval church of S. Pier Scheraggio should be mentioned, which should be dated, as it seems, to the Longobard era. As for Pisa, the only monumental remains concern an octagonal building found in the area of the monumental cemetery (Camposanto) and identified as the primitive baptistery, datable, in all likelihood, to an era earlier than the 7th c.; while at Lucca the excavations have brought to light the ancient episcopal complex under the church of S. Giovanni and Reparata. This consists of a worship hall, of which the entire apse and part of the hall have been found, datable to the 5th c., but perhaps inserted in a preceding Christian worship spot. The same hall shows renovations from the Longobard era. To the left of the church is the primitive baptistery, consisting in a quadriconch building with a central basin, datable to between the 5th and 6th c.

The new investigations concerning the territory of N Lazio and Tuscany have led to the acquisition of new information, in particular to a better definition of the cemeterial evidence, as in the case of the catacomb of S. Theodora at Rignano Flaminio, of which a new sector has been investigated, or of the catacomb found near Visentium, on the lake of Bolsena, used between the 4th and 5th c.; important discoveries have been made at the cemeteries of S. Savinilla at Nepi, of S. Gratiliano and Felicissima at Falerii Novi and of S. Giovenale at Sutri. Of great interest is also the proposal to locate the oldest known sanctuary dedicated to the archangel Michael in the zone of Castel Giubileo, on the Via Salaria. A paleo-Christian worship building belonging to a rural settlement of S Etruria investigated at Mola di Monte Gelato, in the Faliscan countryside, has been attributed to the beginning of 5th c. and is found in conjunction with a funeral area, evidently used by the local community, which should possibly be considered in conjunction with the castrum Capracorum; a small hall belonging to a similar context is found in the zone of Ischia di Castro and is datable to the 6th–7th c. on the basis of the grave goods of the tombs annexed to it; another rural church was present in the territory of Orte (locality Le Cese), and a final one has been identified at Cava Santi, along the Via Amerina. The territory of Bracciano, finally, has been the object of a complete reexamination, with all its paleo-Christian presences, while an important archaeological investigation has taken place in the territory of the suburban diocese of Silva Candida.

In Tuscany new research has allowed a more precise definition of the catacombs of S. Caterina and S. Mustiola at Chiusi, and has led to the recovery of a catacomb on the island of Pianosa, beyond the identification of certain burials of the Longobard era near the cathedral of Pisa. In the Arezzo territory, however, the settlement phases of the Medieval parish church of Retina have been traced, placing its origin between the Late Antique and the Early Medieval period, and that of Pieve di S. Pancrazio at Sestino. Further investigations have brought new light, finally, to the Early Medieval phases of the cathedral of Roselle and of related funeral areas, in the area of Grosseto.

6. Umbria and Picenum. At Ancona three funeral areas of non-Christian origin have been found to date; they were doubtless used by the community starting from the 4th c. Since 1879 an oratory has been known, dedicated, as it seems, to a Flavius

Evintius Veteranus, with mosaic flooring, datable to between the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c., around which there are tile-built tombs. A second area is that documented around and under the church of S. Maria della Piazza, with numerous tombs with walls of limestone sheets likewise covered with tile-built roofs, whose epigraphic and sculptural remains witness to its use up to the early Middle Ages. A third area is attested on the N face of the Astagno Ridge, with the discovery of ca. 60 tile-built tombs, all oriented N-S, perhaps to link to the memoria S. Stefani, known from the passage of St. *Augustine, whose location is still debated. To these three areas can be added the sepulchers discovered on Guasco Ridge in the area of the now-abandoned Roman buildings existing there, and certainly earlier than the basilica of St. Laurence (see below). At Osimo some finds consisting of sarcophagi and inscriptions, today preserved largely in the Duomo, have been linked to a funeral area connected to the memory of the martyr Florentius, mentioned in the Hieronymian Martyrology, perhaps also the site of the primitive cathedral.

At Tolentino the epigraph of the well-known sarcophagus of Fl. Iulius Catervius mentions a panteum cum trichoro built in honor of the deceased by his wife Severina—to whom the homonymous church was later linked. On a plan prior to the reconstruction work of the church in 1822 the monument is still visible. A memory of it remains in a small room called "prison of S. Catervio" dating to the Roman era, while scraps of a mosaic with the image of a peacock might be evidence of constructions of a Christian character linked to it.

In the ancient Cluana (today Porto Civitanova) around the church dedicated to St. *Maro—within which remains of mosaic floors datable to the 5th c. have been found—some sepulchers and epigraphic fragments indicate the presence of a Christian cemetery already in the 4th c. To the Longobard period belongs finally the necropolis of Castel Trosino which has yielded rich grave goods.

As for worship spaces, at Ancona the churches of S. Lorenzo and S. Maria della Piazza offer typical basilica iconography: the first, in the area of the Capitolium, after a period of abandonment indicated by the tombs already mentioned, is three-aisled, with apse, and coincides with the transverse arm of the present church of S. Ciriaco; it had an entrance at the level of the current chapel of the Crucified and an apse in that of the Madonna. The remains of the mosaic floor put it in the context of the 6th c. The other, in an area next to the port and within—very close to—the city walls, is also three-aisled, with an original apse in the central nave and a second added later to the right aisle. The abundant flooring remains document the double constructive phase in the context of the 5th and 6th c.

At Fano, under the present cathedral dedicated to the Virgin, during restoration work (1934–1938) a three-aisled building was found, with apse and intercolumns, perhaps an elevated presbytery and narthex. The mosaic decoration of the apse flooring offers a cantharos flanked by two peacocks from which acanthus branches issue, topped by a christological monogram, to be dated to the 5th or 6th c.

At Ascoli Piceno, in the constructions which make up the present episcopal complex, there have been attempts to read, although with sensibly different chronologies, earlier phases which, for the baptistery, isolated from the worship building, can be better concretized in the discovery of the ancient baptismal basin and in some profoundly rebuilt structures belonging to a probable apse.

At Teramo (Interamnia Praetuttianorum), in the area of the present church of S. Maria dei Pompetti (medieval S. Getulio), the remains of a triforium which reuses classical elements have been attributed to the ancient cathedral of S. Maria Aprutiensis, datable to the 6th c.

Remains of rooms with polychrome mosaic floors have been found recently at Monte Giove, in the town of Penna S. Andrea, and have been assigned with likelihood to a worship building dedicated to St. Peter, known from local tradition.

For the oldest era, as far as is known currently, Umbria does not permit us to define the extension and character of the located funeral areas. These, except for the small hypogeum barely seen below the church of St. Victor at Otricoli, and for that larger one—which even recent studies reveal as characterized by a notable duration in time and by a crowding of the burials—existing next to Villa S. Faustino (Massa Martana), are all, in the few identified, above ground.

At Narni the scarce evidence is linked to the burial of St. Juvenal and to that of the later bishop Cassius close to the urban walls and in the area below the present cathedral; while at Terni excavations of the 17th c. seem to have brought to light earthern tombs and sarcophagi connected with the memory of the martyr Valentinus. At Spoleto, on the other hand, different cemeterial nuclei witness to the presence of multiple areas with different functions around the circuit of the walls. From that of St. Peter, along the Via Flaminia, to the other of St. Gregory, considered the biggest of the city, to the burials linked to the traditional memory of St. Con-cordius and St. Pontianus, to the supposed paleo-Christian areas around the church of St. Thomas, to that connected with the church of St. Sabinus, to that, finally, under the Church of the Holy Apostles, which has yielded sixteen stone sarcophagi with peaked roofs and others made of terracotta and in which the bishop Spes and members of the Spoletine church were buried.

At Foligno, below the contemporary cathedral of St. Felician, the discovery of tile-built tombs witnesses to the presence of an ancient funeral area linked to the memory of the martyr.

To a later era belong the necropolises of Nocera Umbra. The first, already known, is a vast Longobard cemetery, found at the end of the previous century, which yielded expensive funerary furnishings that can be assigned to a chronological range which goes from the late 6th c. to the entire 7th. To the same era another cemeterial nucleus can be assigned, in the present Piazza delle Medaglie d'Oro, which has been destroyed: a third, finally, in the area of Pettinara, is preserved for about a third of its extension and, although of the same period, should be assigned to the native population.

The architectonic evidence of the region is notoriously linked to the two famous monuments of the Spoletine diocese: the St. Salvatore of Spoleto and the so-called Temple of Clitunnus. The first—a three-aisled building with transept and apse closed by side chapels—is the result of various constructive actions, the first of which seems to date back to a period included between the end of the 4th and the 5th c. The other, although of debated date and purpose, offers an unusual typology which echoes that of a temple in antis. Still at Spoleto, the Church of the Holy Apostles should also be mentioned, with three aisles divided by pilasters and a transept with triple apse, and the room related to the monastery of St. Mark, of which the remaining mosaic floors agree with the chronology at the end of the 6th c. attested by the letters of Gregory the Great. As for the remaining territories, there are few surviving evidences of paleo-Christian monuments, whether in ruins or identifiable in later buildings. Thus at Otricoli, in the Podere Civitella, there remain ruins likely of an apse belonging to a building which an inscription from the 7th c. mentions as connected to a baptistery with a dedication by a Marcellus. Still at Otricoli, more ancient structures are evident in the church of the Madonna del Buon Consiglio, while in that already mentioned of St. Victor, near the course of the Tiber, today completely restructured, the only evidence remaining is the altar slab with inscription of the bishop Fulgentius and a cross between two lambs, which can be attributed to the mid-6th c. At Pesaro, finally, below and almost inside the perimeter itself of the present cathedral, the excavations have brought to light some structures and remains of mosaic flooring which have been attributed, although with much uncertainty, to the 6th c.

In the Marche the number of known tombs has grown, enriched by the identification of a small funeral area in the zone of Attiggio, near Fabriano (Ancona), attributed to the 6th–7th c. and similar in typology to the tombs of the necropolis of Castel Trosino; by the tombs of Esanatoglia (Macerata), which very likely was part of a cemetery linked to a worship building, and by the analysis of the cemetery of S. Emidio alle Grotte at Ascoli Piceno. New investigations have led to a better understanding of the Church of Holy Martyrs at Osimo, for which an origin might be linked to one or more venerated tombs; excavations have extended also to the monuments of the zone of Pesaro, where in addition to new and preexisting acquisitions of the cathedral, a paleo-Christian basilica has been identified at Colombarone, which probably should be recognized as the basilica of S. Cristoforo ad Aquilam. At the same time the reexamination of the evidence concerning the sarcophagus of Flavius Iulius Catervius at Tolentino has made it possible to identify some remains of the wall of the mausoleum in which it was originally kept, obliterated by the 19th-c. reconstruction of the cathedral, and to reconstruct its circular plan endowed with three grand niches. Next, of great interest is the recognition of a Late Antique phase which brought the fortification of the amphitheater of Ancona, which probably should be seen in connection with the events of the Greek-Gothic war. Near the same city, furthermore, at Montemarciano, an apsed building of the 3rd c., certainly destined to a worship function in the paleo-Christian era, was later occupied by burials, a clear indication of the presence of a settlement.

In Umbria, however, understanding concerning the catacomb of the Villa S. Faustino at Massa Martana has been enriched by the discovery of a small worship building, built at the same time as the funeral area in the 4th–5th c.

7. Sabines and Paeligni. The discovery, at Rieti, of some funerary epigraphs in the area of the present cemetery, outside the ancient Interocrina Gate, has suggested the presence of a funeral area also of a Christian character, in which the cult of St. Eleutherius developed, to whom a basilica, already known at the end of the 8th c., was dedicated.

A martyrial cult is documented from the 5th c. also at Amiternum (Mart. hier., 24 July), where furthermore the monumental location is very explicit. Here (today S. Vittorino) around the tomb of the martyr Victorinus, deposited in a mausoleum, developed, starting from the 4th c., an underground cemetery which was frequented without interruption and linked to the sanctuary above ground. In the hypogeum an intensive burial zone with the character of retrosanctos stands out, opposed to another with family rooms and isolated tombs. An aboveground cemetery is also documented in the suburban area of the ancient Forcona (today Civita di Bagno) near the primitive cathedral of the city dedicated to S. Massimo; and also at Corfinium, in the area of the so-called chapel of S. Alessandro—which was part of the complex of the cathedral of Valva—a group of burials on multiple levels which had developed around a mausoleum has recently been brought to light.

A catacomb which offers very similar characteristics to the hypogea of Lazio is known finally at Castelvecchio Subequo. This developed in two orthogonal arms, with burials in loculi and arcosolia closed by plastered brickwork, as well as formae on the floor. The epigraphic and ceramic finds place this hypogeum—perhaps not the only one—in the 4th c.; it is conjoined with an aboveground area, only partially identified, through the presence of earthen tombs marked off by walls and covered, in general, with large tiles.

As for the architecture, up to today monumental evidence earlier than the Middle Ages is scarce. Recent investigations of the area of the amphitheater of the ancient Amiternum have restored an apsed room with remains of mosaic flooring and evident traces of use on the part of the Christian community. At Casalbordino, in the diocese of Chieti, excavations conducted in recent years have brought to light a basilica consisting of an apsed hall with three aisles and mosaic floor, redone many times over the years and linked with the monastery of S. Stefano ad rivam maris. The initial chronology of the basilica seems to be located in the 4th c., with a first reconstruction datable to the 2nd half of the same century.

There are numerous updates concerning the funeral areas found in Abruzzo in recent years, among them the catacomb completed with an aboveground funeral area at Castelvecchio Subequo and the burials connected with the Benedictine monastery near the Abbey of Monte Santo at Civitella del Tronto; another burial nucleus characterizes the area of the church of S. Giovanni in Venere at Fossacesia, in association with ceramic materials of the 6th–7th c., while at Lanciano some tombs witness to a *Byzantine and Longobard habitation. In the early Middle Ages other cemeteries occupied the area next to the cathedral of Teramo and a zone of Penne, this too probably linked to the paleo-Christian cathedral. Remains belonging to an articulated ecclesiastical complex have appeared at Loreto Aprutino, in an area characterized by burials arranged outside a room which in the 6th–7th c. must have had worship functions, and other buildings, one of which was used as a baptistery; also the necropolises of Petrano and Santangelo, in the province of Chieti, used until the 8th–9th c., are likely an indication of the presence of an important worship complex. Other investigations have witnessed to the paleo-Christian phases of Alba Fucens, with testimonies concerning both worship buildings and funeral areas; the understanding of the episcopal complex of Corfinium has been increased, while at Sulmona the identification of a fresco attributed to the 8th c. contributes to the reconstruction of the building stages of the church of S. Gaetano. Attention has been paid, in particular during the most recent decades, to monastic settlements in Abruzzo, such as in the case of the investigations in the complex of St. Stephan in Rivo Maris at Casalbordino (Chieti), or for the reconstruction of the Late Antique and Early Medieval phases of the monasteries of S. Pietro at Campovalano and of S. Clemente at Vomano.

New evidence comes, finally, from Molise, where the most important intervention, still in progress, is studying the important monumental complex of S. Vincenzo at Volturno. Early Medieval cemeteries have come to light at S. Maria di Casalpiano near Casacalenda, where the tombs occupy the structures which belonged to a villa, and at Larinum, within the Roman amphitheater. Other investigations underway concern an ecclesia baptismalis at Monteroduni, near Isernia (M. Raddi).

8. Latium and Campania (see also *Rome). The oldest ancient witnesses to Christianity in Campania, as furthermore in general for the orbis christianus antiquus, are of a cemeterial nature both above and below ground. The former appear as a continuity in the use of preexisting funeral areas of a non-Christian character. In this sense it is naturally not possible to speak of innovations as to the typology of the burials, except in the symbolism of the decoration and in the epigraphic formulas belonging to them as, e.g., the discoveries of Ostia (S. Ciriaco at the 7th milestone of the via Ostiense; area of S. Ercolano; area of S. Aurea), of Portus and of Cimitile (Nola) demonstrate. As for the underground cemeteries, it is necessary to proceed acc. to a regional distinction depending on some local typologies.

In S Lazio, recent research has revealed a series of small subterranean cemeteries, presumably linked to rural communities—Vico Moricino (Anagni), S. Ilario ad Bivium (Colleferro), Paliano, Subiaco—characterized by modest size, reuse of preexisting structures esp. the hydraulic ones, burials in closed loculi with structures covered in plaster, datable in most cases to an era not earlier than the 4th c. Next to these, some hypogea of the suburbicarian dioceses (S. Alessandro, in the diocese of Nomentum, cemetery of Zotico and Ad decimum for the diocese of Labicum, and of S. Senatore at Albano) offer a more articulated and complex iconography with the presence, sometimes, of venerated tombs (S. Alessandro, Zotico and S. Senatore) which modified their original structures and prolonged their life considerably.

Much more extensive are the cemeterial networks of the catacombs of *Naples, which offer a much more evolved aspect.

The continuity of life of the cemeterial complexes, even for many centuries after their original use, is connected furthermore to the insertion in them of a worship building of a martyrial character which modifies their nature and aspect, frequently giving life to very articulated settlements—presence of monasteries, libraries, baths, xenodochia etc.—goals of pilgrimage and sometimes even cathedral sees which were later urbanizing factors in the formation of the Medieval city. This is the case, e.g., of the basilica discovered at Pianabella (Ostia) which testifies, in the present state of research, to a building of martyrial character with burial typologies which recall those of the basilica in honor of the martyr Agapitus at Palestrina, this too built in a funeral area and invested in all likelihood with the dignity of a cathedral; and those of the complex, also at Ostia, built around the memoria of S. Aurea, which gave rise to the Medieval burg of Gregoriopolis, which still exists. Also at Portus, on the borders of the noted necropolis of Isola Sacra, the complex linked to the cult of the martyr *Hippolytus would rise, later an episcopal see in the early Middle Ages, where a primitive memoria of a single aisle and apse, built in preexisting rooms, developed into a larger building with three aisles and probable annexes and, in the Medieval phase, a baptismal basin within the left aisle. (Excavations are in progress.) The sanctuary built above ground at the already-mentioned cemetery of S. Alessandro on the Via Nomentana was articulated over multiple venerated memoriae which conditioned its iconography and construction phases, which stretched into the Middle Ages. But the most spectacular example is constituted by the complex of Cimitile, near Nola, in whose cemeterial area *Paulinus, starting from the first memorial place of worship—the so-called E basilica—and by a grand apse to the W, built a grand complex around the tomb of the martyr *Felix. It was composed of a basilica with trilobate apse, the so-called basilica of the Holy Martyrs, the basilica of S. Calionio and that of S. Tommaso and of S. Stefano, as well as monastic buildings and various annexes. At *Capua the remains of four worship buildings can be recognized, starting from the so-called basilica Apostolorum, built under *Constantine, which lately has been identified with an apsed edifice with three aisles, in the center of the ancient city, near the Via Appia. Also urban is the church of S. Maria Maggiore, whose current plan on five aisles repeats perhaps the original, datable, based on the mosaic decoration, to the 2nd half of the 6th c. On the other hand, the church of S. Stefano Maggiore, with three aisles and three apses, rose in an extraurban zone, even if its use as a cemetery remains even today uncertain. Finally, above a funeral area, perhaps next to a primitive cella memoriae, rose a basilica dedicated to S. Prisco, with three aisles, which preserves, in the chapel of S. Matrona, large traces of the original mosaic decoration, generally dated to the end of the 5th c.

Of debated chronology within the context of the Longobard era—although with probable older original nuclei—are the complexes of Atripalda and Prata built above the funeral areas of the ancient Abellinum (Avellino). A basilica with five aisles, built above a Greek temple, offers, at Cuma, a baptistery with circular basin built in replacement of the apse. Finally, the baptistery of Nocera Inferiore is commonly dated to the 2nd half of the 6th c. It is on a circular plan with an apse to the W, an ample ambulatory divided from the central hall by fifteen paired columns, and a basin, which is circular within, octagonal outside, richly decorated and topped by a baldachino.

As for the territory of Lazio, S of Rome, in addition to the new information on the already-known monumental complex of S. Ilario ad Bivium (Valmontone), numerous investigations concerning the territory of Ostia appear to be of particular importance; among them is the recent identification of a large-scale basilica endowed with an annex of circular form, in which it has been proposed that the Constantinian cathedral with the related baptistery is discernible. Excavations have made it possible to discern precisely the phases of the catacombs of S. Senatore at Albano Laziale, while the localization of the martyrial basilica of Sts. Primus and Felician at Nomentum and that of the paleo-Christian cemetery of Velletri were made possible thanks to the reexamination of the archival documentation. In contrast, at the catacomb of S. Quirico, near Paliano, stood a small church of which the remains have been found.

Also Campania was enriched with new paleo-Christian presences, such as the phase linked to the origins of the church of S. Paride at Teano and the architectonic complex next to the church of S. Vito at Sele (Salerno), where an ecclesiastical building datable to between the end of the 5th and the 6th c. can be identified. To the same chronological range can be assigned a funeral area attached to the basilica of S. Biagio, at Castellamare di Stabia. Further, a necropolis found in the area of a maritime villa at Torre del Greco (district of Sora) dates to the 2nd half of the 5th c., while another vast funeral area connected with a worship building which can be attributed to the 4th c. has been discovered at Atripalda. At Frigento, in contrast, information has been acquired on the Early Medieval phase of the church of S. Maria Assunta and in general on the settlement which belonged to it. Great attention has been paid also to the paleo-Christian activities of ancient *Capua (the present S. Maria Capua Vetere), in particular to the environs of the original baptismal building, the episcopal church and the catacomb of St. Augustine.

New investigations consistently add important contributions related to already-known monuments, such as the Neapolitan catacombs of S. Gennaro and of S. Gaudioso or the complex of S. Felice at Cimitile. Finally, at Naples again, in an area very close to the Duomo, the investigation of the complex of Carminiello ai Mannesi, a Roman insula which continued to be active into the 5th–8th c., is of great interest.

9. Apulia and Calabria. Although, for what concerns funeral areas, the observations formulated for the preceding region are valid, particular characteristics, also connected to the different geological nature of the terrain, are shown by a series of small hypogea located in Apulia (It. Puglia). Along the arc of the Gargano coast are different groups of subterranean cemeteries with technical and morphological characteristics in the excavation and in the construction of the tombs which recall examples from *Sicily and *Malta: loculi and arcosolia in natural cavities and in rock walls connected to aboveground areas with formae and sepulchers in rock with curved ribs, simple rooms and monumental areas with sarcophagi, sometimes furnished with a "baldachino" (e.g.: Siponto, sites Capparelli and Iunitite near Manfredonia; Mattinata, site Salatella near Vieste; Monte Pucci; Ischitella; Cagnano Varano). The same characteristics can be found also in some hypogea of the Matera area and of Canosa, where the complex of S. Sofia, which takes its name from the homonymous cemeterial church above, is articulated on two levels.

At Venosa (ancient Venusia), furthermore, next to Christian hypogea, the discovery of subterranean Jewish cemeterial nuclei offers interesting problems for the cultural relationships between the two religious communities.

Later, starting from the last quarter of the 6th c., the funeral areas linked to the presence of Longobard settlements (e.g., the necropolis of Benevento) acquire notable interest, for the particular typology of the burials and esp. for the custom of burying the deceased with personal grave furnishings, sometimes rather expensive. Further, these are alongside others, which recent studies are bringing ever more to light, belonging to native communities (e.g., cemeteries of Ruvo, Canne, in the territory of Matera, of Calle near Tricarico, Boscosalice near Pisticci and the locality of St. Peter Mandurino near Taranto).

As for the urban worship buildings, at Ventaroli the church of S. Maria in Foro Claudio, with three aisles and a triforium on the façade, seem to date to the 8th c.; the building, in contrast—consisting of a large apsed space with two lateral wings—seems to belong to the Longobard era (end 6th c.) and is today incorporated into the cathedral of Benevento. In the same city, the church (with two aisles and apse) of S. Ilario a porta Aurea ought to be assigned, it seems, to the 7th c. At Siponto a recent hypothesis proposes locating the baptistery, perhaps on an octagonal plan, on the site of the present church of S. Maria, on the axis with the homonymous cathedral basilica whose origin is commonly held to date to the end of the 4th c. In the late Roman era the presence of some small apsed oratories with tombs within, in the area around the forum of Herdonia, witnesses to the reuse of Roman public buildings.

At Canosa (ancient Canusium) the grand baptistery of S. Giovanni is known, on a dodecagonal plan, with four chapels on the axes and a curved atrium; it has a double ambulatory marked out by columns with a circular internal peribolus and a heptagonal basin, and seems to be datable, in this mature phase, to the 1st half of the 6th c; no monumental trace, however, is known from the hall of the cathedral, whether this is identified with that of S. Salvatore, which the sources place in front of the baptistery, or with the other nearby church of S. Maria, this too mentioned by literary texts. The religious topography of Canusium is completed with the church of S. Leucio, perhaps in the area of the ancient Capito-lium, whose mosaic floor decoration is datable to the 6th c., and with the churches of S. Pietro and of S. Giovanni e Paolo, mentioned by the sources, and with that of S. Sabino in which reemployed paleo-Christian material abounds.

To the Longobard phase should be dated the abbey of the Holy Trinity at Venosa, completed by the presumed guesthouse partially attached to the façade of the church. At Trani, excavations have brought to light, under the present Duomo, a basilica of the 6th c. dedicated to the Virgin. It is a building with three aisles, with paired columns and mosaic floor, which shows various reconstructive interventions starting from the Longobard era. At Bari the investigations have also revealed a phase prior to that of the present cathedral. As for Egnathia, the episcopal complex with the basilica named for Bishop Rufentius was built in the urban center along a crossing of the Via Traiana. This consists of a basilica with three aisles preceded by a narthex. The baptistery, inserted in a complex of rooms annexed to the basilica and which, like it, reuses preexisting constructions, recalls, in its square layout and in the basins in the center, which join a rectangular basin with a semicircular bowl, typologies which not only are found at Salona but also are spread throughout Illyricum and the Greek Orient between the 5th and 6th c., a chronology which furthermore is confirmed by the remains of mosaic flooring of the hall. Still at Egnathia, the excavations have restored another worship building in two phases: the first with a single-aisled apsed hall, whose Christian character remains uncertain, datable to between the end of the 4th and the 5th c.; the second with three aisles and oriented apse, belonging to the centuries of the early Middle Ages.

A cruciform baptismal font and traces of contiguous buildings of uncertain definition is what remains at Belmonte near Altamura, while remains of a paleo-Christian basilica—which is perhaps the ancient cathedral—with fragments of flooring and columns, are present at Cannae. At Crepacore, near Oria, the church of S. Pietro is, acc. to a recent chronology, the church of a Byzantine castrum, which has been compared to some Sicilian churches and which shows analogies, in Apulia, with the crypt of the Annunziata at Erchie, the church of Seppannibale and with the Centopietre of Patù.

Perhaps the mosaics surviving in the vault and cupola of the church of S. Maria of Casaranello should be dated to the middle of the 5th c. This building, in the light of the latest discoveries, turns out to have had a cruciform plan with a remarkable extension of the nave, later flanked by two side aisles.

The church of S. Giovanni al Sepolcro at Brindisi dates back to a paleo-Christian building, later modified in the Romanesque era, while the church of S. Pietro at Otranto, on a cruciform plan inserted in an quadrangle, dates to the epoch of Byzantine domination. In Apulia some important discoveries have joined the already rich panorama of known paleo-Christian structures, as in the case of the architectonic complex of S. Giusto (Lucera), which can be attributed to the end of the 5th to the 6th c., which was made up of a basilica for worship, another with a funerary purpose, a baptismal building and other rooms, perhaps related to an episcopal see. Another worship building, however, active during the period between the 5th and 10th c., marked an area near Vaste (Lecce). An important find also took place at Faragola, a short way from Ascoli Satriano (Foggia), where together with conspicuous remains of the entire settlement a church emerged whose identity, it has been proposed, is that of the paleo-Christian basilica linked to the cult of S. Potito and the episcopal see of Ascoli. The results of the research conducted in the church of S. Maria of Siponto and in the cathedral of Barletta, furthermore, have made it possible to identify the paleo-Christian phases, as also for the church of S. Pietro at Crepacore (Brindisi) and the attached cemetery, today dated to the 7th c. A hypogeum characterized by arcosolium tombs and graves was, on the contrary, built between the end of the 4th and the 5th c. in the historic center of Taranto (in the area of the Palazzo delli Ponti). The remains of the basilica of the Savior at Canosa have also been identified, found in the area before the baptistery, while at Bitonto the paleo-Christian cathedral has been discovered below the Medieval one, and also the church of S. Apollinare at Rutigliano has yielded traces belonging to the Early Medieval phase. At Belmonte, near Altamura, finally, it has been possible to throw new light on the situation of an ecclesia baptismalis attested from the 5th to the 8th c.

Passing to Calabria, beyond various attestations of Early Medieval necropolises which have come to light in the province of Croton, at Bova Marina a settlement has been investigated which is attested up to the 6th–7th c., among whose buildings a Jewish synagogue has been recognized, datable to the 1st half of the 4th c.; at Catanzaro, however, a rustic villa of Late Antique era was occupied in the 6th and 7th c. by a necropolis which later in turn would give place to the church of S. Maria di Zarapotamo. In the zone of Castrovillari (località Sassone) an Early Medieval settlement is attested by the presence of a worship building and a necropolis with a monumental tomb; a church assigned to the Byzantine era and a cemetery of the 7th c. have been found at Presinace di Nocara, while at Taureana (Palmi) another small Early Medieval church is evident from some remains. Rooms have been investigated near Vibo Valentia, at the site of Piscino di Piscopio, belonging, it has been suggested, to an ecclesiastical complex in the 4th c. The presence of structures related to two worship buildings built from the 7th c. in the area of the cathedral of Rossano Calabro, finally, permits revising its date backward.

10. Lucania and Brutium. There are few monumental evidences of Christianity in this region: in the funerary context, the best known complex today remains the sub divo cemetery of Tropea, which developed, as it seems, around a surviving cubiculum, excavated in the rock, extensively rebuilt and enclosed in the present Palazzo Toraldo, formerly the castrum of the 4th c. From this area come the numerous epigraphs which constitute the Toraldo collection. In the same area, notes taken in the last century on the occasion of the demolition of the castle record the existence of a small single-aisled worship building, of an underground room and of a well with graffiti, including christological monograms.

The two trichorae of Policastro Busentino and of Padula seem to have had a sepulchral character, both reused successively in later worship buildings, the former being completed with a rectangular hall, apparently only in the Norman era. As for architecture, at Paestum the church of S. Annunziata has revealed, in the latest restoration (1962), a paleo-Christian phase represented, perhaps, by an iconography of three aisles with elevated presbytery—at least in a second phase—and annexed funeral area.

At Sala Consilina, the so-called baptistery of S. Severina, behind the present cathedral, is on a central plan with four rectangular arms on the principal axes, and recently it has been proposed to redate it back to the 4th c. The remains of a baptistery of S. Giovanni in Fonte, mentioned in a letter of *Cassiodorus (Ep. 8,33), are found in the ancient Marcellianum (today S. Giovanni in Fonte). It is a single-aisled room, with an avant-corps and apse, containing a large basin framed with pilasters which support a cupola, perhaps datable to the 4th c. At Padula, finally, the above-mentioned trichora was completed with a rectangular hall, therefore becoming the presbytery of the church of S. Nicola delle Donne.

In Basilicata new investigations have focused on the Late Antique settlement of Metaponto, with the worship complex earlier than the middle of the 4th c., constituted of the basilica and the annexed baptistery.

In general: For an overall view on paleo-Christian monuments, see P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, repr., Bari 1980, with updated bibl.; Id., La cultura artistica in Italia nella Tarda Antichità, in La cultura in Italia nella Tarda Antichità e nell'Alto Medioevo, Rome 1981, 787ff..; A.M. Romanini, La cultura artistica in Italia nell'Alto Medioevo. Stato e prospettiva della ricerca, ibid., 817ff. For S Italy in general: E. Bertaux, L'art dans l'Italie méridionale, Paris 1903, with update vols., Rome 1978. A. Venditti, L'architettura bizantina nell'Italia meridionale, Naples 1967; P. Testini - G. Cantino Wataghin - L. Pani Ermini, La cattedrale in Italia, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Lyon - Vienna - Grenoble - Genève et Aoste, 21-28 settembre 1986), I, 1989, 5-229; La storia dell'Alto Medio Evo italiano (VI-X secolo) alla luce dell'archeologia, ed. R. Francovich - G. Noyé, Florence 1994; G. Bertelli, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana nell'Italia meridionale e insulare (1993–1998), in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 111-144 (with updated bibl.); D. Mazzoleni, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana a Roma e nell'Italia centrale (1993-1998), in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 39-62 (updated bibl. here).

5. Etruria: G. Maetzke, Resti di basilica cimiteriale sotto S. Felicita: Not. Scav., 1957, 282ff.; I. Belli Barsali, La diocesi di Lucca, Corpus della scultura altomedievale, I, Spoleto 1959; F. Liverani, Le catacombe e antichità cristiane di Chiusi, Siena 1872; E. Stevenson, Intorno alle escavazioni fatte in un ipogeo cristiano di Bolsena: Not. Scav. 81 (1880) 30ff.; G. Maetzke, Scavi e scoperte nel campo dell'archeologia cristiana negli ultimi dieci anni in Toscana e in Sardegna, Atti del II Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Rome 1971, 311ff.; O. von Hessen, Primo contributo all'archeologia longobarda in Toscana, Florence 1971; M. Salmi, Problemi dell'alto medioevo a Lucca, Atti del V Congr. Int. di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1973, 449ff.; R. Farioli, I mosaici pavimentali della cattedrale di Firenze, Atti del III Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Trieste 1974, 373ff.; Id., Note sulla primitiva cattedrale di Firenze: il problema dell'intitolazione, Annali della Scuola Normale Superiore di Pisa, s. III, 5, 1975, 535ff.; F.K.B. Toker, Scavi del complesso altomedioevale di S. Reparata sotto il Duomo di Firenze: Archeologia Medievale 2 (1975) 161ff.; O. von Hessen, Secondo contributo all'archeologia longobarda in Toscana, Florence 1975; F.K.B. Toker, A Baptistery Below the Baptistery of Florence: Art Bullettin 58 (1976) 175ff.; G. de Marinis, Lucca, scavo del battistero: Archeologia Medievale 4 (1977) 247ff.; A. Fatucchi, La diocesi di Arezzo, Corpus della scultura altomedievale, IX, Spoleto 1977; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, La catacomba di Monte della Casetta nell'Agro Capenate: RivAC 55 (1979) 7ff.; A.M. Giuntella, La catacomba cosiddetta di Teodora a Rignano Flaminio, ibid., 273ff.; J. Raspi Serra, Abitati e cimiteri cristiani nella Tuscia, Atti del IX Congr. Int. di Archeol. Crist., Vatican City 1979, 417ff.; A.M. Giuntella, Note per la topografia di Sutri: Archeologia Laziale, III (1980) 219ff.; var. aus., Atti del Convegno "Il paleocristiano nella Tuscia," Viterbo 1981; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, I cimiteri paleocristiani del Lazio 1, Etruria meridionale (Monumenti di antichità cristiana, 2a serie, 10), Vatican City 1988; T.W. Potter - A.C. King, Scavi a Mola di Monte Gelato presso Mazzano Romano, Etruria Meridionale. Primo rapporto preliminare: Archeologia Medievale 15 (1988) 253-311; F. Marazzi - T.W. Potter - A.C. King, Mola di Monte Gelato (Mazzano Romano - VT): notizie preliminari sulla campagna di scavo 1986-1988 e considerazioni sulle origini dell'incastellamento in Etruria Meridionale alla luce dei nuovi dati archeologici: Archeologia Medievale 16 (1989) 103-119; C. Carletti - V. Fiocchi Nicolai, La catacomba di S. Cristina a Bol- sena (Catacombe di Roma e d'Italia, 2), Vatican City 1989; N. Christie, Three South Etrurian Churches: Santa Cornelia, Santa Rufina and San Liberato (Archaeological monographs of the British School at Rome, 4), British School at Rome-London 1991; A.C. King - T.W. Potter, Mola di Monte Gelato in the Early Middle Ages: An Interim Report on the Excavations 1986-89, in Papers of the Fourth Conference of Italian Archaeology, 4, New Developments in Italian Archaeology, Part 2, Oxford 1992, 165-176; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, La catacomba di S. Savinilla a Nepi (Catacombe di Roma e d'Italia, 4), Vatican City 1992; Id., Una nuova catacomba presso "Visentium" sul lago di Bolsena: Rend. PARA 65 (1992–1993) 23-40; Id., Monumenti paleocristiani del territorio di "Forum Clodi," in Antichità tardoromane e medievali nel territorio di Bracciano, Viterbo 1994, 243-274; Id., La catacomba di S. Teodora a Rignano Flaminio (Catacombe di Roma e d'Italia, 5), Vatican City 1995; Id., I monumenti paleocristiani della via Flaminia (territorio laziale) nelle più recenti scoperte archeologiche, in Domum Tuam Dilexi. Miscellanea in onore di A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 313-350; Id., Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana nel Lazio dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, I, 309-331 (bibl.); G. Bartolozzi Casti, La catacomba di Pianosa: stato della ricerca, in Atti del Convegno di studi "Pianosa: passato, presente, futuro" (Isola di Pianosa, 16-17 maggio 1997), Portoferraio 1997, 79-86; G. Guidoni, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Toscana dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983–1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, I, 249-266 (bibl.).

6. Umbria and Picenum: R. Mengarelli, La necropoli barbarica di Castel Trosino: Monumenti antichi della R. Accademia dei Lincei 12 (1912) 145ff.; G. Annibaldi, Scavi e scoperte nel campo dell'Archeologia cristiana di Ancona, Atti del II Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Rome 1971, 91ff. For an updated bibliographic synthesis, see also: L. Pani Ermini, Ecclesia "cathedralis" e civitas nel Piceno altomedievale, Atti Congr. di Studi su Istituzioni e Società nell'Alto Medioevo marchigiano, 1981; P. Pasqui - R. Paribeni, Necropoli barbarica di Nocera Umbra: Monumenti antichi della R. Accademia dei Lincei 25 (1916) 139ff.; M. Salmi, La basilica di S. Salvatore di Spoleto, Florence 1961; B. Toscano, Aspetti urbanistici di Spoleto fra l'età paleocristiana e l'Alto Medioevo, Atti del I Convegno di Studi storico-ecclesiastici, Spoleto 1976; L. Pani Ermini, Il culto di S. Giovenale nell'Italia centrale. Le testimonianze monumentali, Bollettino della deputazione di Storia patria per l'Umbria 75 (1978) 1ff.; C. Pietrangeli, Otricoli, Rome 1978; O. von Hessen, Il cimitero altomedioevale di Pettinara casale Lozzi (Nocera Umbra), Florence 1978; R. Giordani, Scavi nell'ipogeo cristiano di Villa s. Faustino presso Massa Martana (Perugia): Rend. PARA 57 (1984–1985) 145-168; R. Farioli Campanati, La datazione del mosaico pavimentale della seconda fase della Cattedrale di Pesaro: l'identificazione del committente, in Atti del III Colloquio AISCOM (Bordighera, 6-10 dicembre 1995), Bordighera 1996, 457-466; A. Nestori, Il mausoleo e il sarcofago di Flavius Iulius Catervius a Tolentino, Vatican City 1996; M. Luni, La basilica cristiana di Iohannis riscoperta a Pesaro, in Domum Tuam Dilexi. Miscellanea in onore di A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 529-542; P.L. Dall'Aglio, Colombarone (PS), in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 86-92; G. De Marinis - P. Quiri - L. Palermo, Montemarciano (AN). Loc. Marina Alta, in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 104-107; G. De Marinis - M. Silvestrini, Esanatoglia (MC). Loc. Crocifisso, in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 107-109; M. Nanni, La necropoli di Attiggio. Fabriano (AN), in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 96-99; M.C. Profumo, Pesaro. Cattedrale: aula basilicale, in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 77-86; A. Nestori, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana nelle Marche e in Umbria dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, I, 283-290 (bibl.).

7. Sabines and Paeligni: G. De Angelis d'Ossat, Cimiteri antichi della via Valeria e del bacino del fiume Aterno: RivAC 26 (1950) 86ff.; A. Ferrua, Di una piccola catacomba a Superaequum dei Peligni, ibid., 53ff.; var. aus., La cattedrale basilica di Valva, L'Aquila 1971; L. Pani Ermini, Contributi alla storia delle diocesi di Amiterno Forcona e Valva nell'Alto Medioevo: Rend. PARA 44 (1971–1972) 257ff.; M. Moretti, Architettura medioevale in Abruzzo, Rome n.d.; V. Santa Maria Scrinari, Note di archeologia paleocristiana abruzzese, Atti del IX Congr. Int. di Archeol. Crist., Vatican City 1978, 457ff.; L. Pani Ermini, Il santuario di S. Vittorino in Armiternum. Note sulla sua origine: Rivista di Archeologia 3 (1979) 95ff.; San Vincenzo al Volturno 1. The 1980-86 excavations. Part I, ed. R. Hodges (Archaeological monographs of the British School at Rome, 7), The British School at Rome-London 1993; L'anfiteatro di Larinum. Iscrizioni, monete, sepolture, ed. G. De Benedittis - A. Di Niro, Campobasso 1995; San Vincenzo al Volturno 2. The 1980-86 excavations. Part II, ed. R. Hodges (Archaeological Monograph of the British School at Rome, 9), The British School at Rome-London 1995; A. Staffa, Una terra di frontiera: Abruzzo e Molise fra VI e VII secolo, in Città, castelli, campagne nei territori di frontiera, sec. VI-VIII, Atti del 5° Seminario sul Tardo Antico e Alto Medio Evo in Italia Settentrionale, Montebarro 1994, ed. G.B. Brogiolo, Mantua 1995, 187-238; var. aus., Le valli della Vibrata e del Salinello. Documenti dell'Abruzzo Teramano IV, S. Atto di Teramo 1996; A. Staffa, I Longobardi in Abruzzo (sec. VI-VII), in L'Italia centro settentrionale in età longobarda, Atti del Convegno, Ascoli Piceno 6-7 ottobre 1995, ed. L. Paroli, Florence 1997, 113-165; A. Saladino, I monasteri benedettini nell'Abruzzo interno: insediamenti, infrastrutture e territorio tra VIII e XI secolo (Tardoantico e medioevo: studi e strumenti di archeologia), Rome 2000; San Vincenzo al Volturno 3. The Finds From the 1980-86 Excavations, ed. J. Mitchell - I.L. Hansen (Studi e ricerche di archeologia e storia dell'arte, 3), Spoleto 2001; D. Aquilano, Histonium: testimonianze di edilizia tardoromana e paleocristiana, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 602-606; A.M. Giuntella, Dieci anni di ricerche, nel campo dell'archeologia cristiana, in Abruzzo, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 571-596 (bibl.); L. Tulipani, Il complesso cultuale di S. Stefano in Rivo Maris a Casalbordino (Chieti), in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 597-601.

8. Latium and Campania: beyond the updating of Bertaux, op. cit., see: P.-A. Février, Ostie et Porto à la fin de l'antiquité. Topographie religieuse et vie sociale: MEFRA 70 (1958) 295-330; R. Calza, La scultura e la probabile zona cristiana di Ostia e di Porto: Rend. PARA 37 (1964–1966) 155-257; P. Testini, Strutture murarie e fasi costruttive del santuario dei martiri nella catacomba di S. Alessandro a Roma, Akten d. VII Intern. Kongr. f. Christl. Archaeologie, Vatican City-Berlin 1969, 711ff.; M. Rotili, La basilica dell'Annunziata di Prata monumento d'età longobarda, Atti del II Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Rome 1971, 401ff.; M. Marinone, La decorazione pittorica della catacomba di Albano: RIA 19-20 (1972–1973) 10ff.; P. Testini - M.L. Veloccia Rinaldi, Ricerche archeologiche all'Isola Sacra, Rome 1975, 41ff.; var. aus., Atti del Convegno: Il Paleocristiano in Ciociaria, Fiuggi 1977; R. Giordani, Scavi nella basilica cristiana di Pianabella (Ostia Antica): Archeologia Laziale II (1979) 240ff.; S. Episcopo, Saggi di scavo presso S. Aurea ad Ostia: Archeologia Laziale III (1980) 228ff.; R. Giordano, Scavi nella tenuta di Pianabella di Ostia Antica 1976-1977: La basilica cristiana: Memorie Pont. Acc. Rom. Arch. 14 (1983) 77-78; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Scoperta della basilica di S. Ilario "Ad Bivium" presso Valmontone: Rend. PARA 61 (1988-1989); L. Pani Ermini et al., Recenti indagini nel complesso martiriale di S. Felice a Cimitile: RivAC 69, 1-2 (1993) 223-313; Il complesso archeologico di Carminiello ai Mannesi, Napoli (scavi 1983-1984), ed. P. Arthur, Galatina 1994; N. Ciavolino et al., Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Campania dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 615-664 (bibl.); V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana nel Lazio dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, I, 309-331 (bibl.); Cimitile e Paolino di Nola, la tomba di S. Felice e il centro di pellegrinaggio: trent'anni di ricerche, Atti della giornata tematica dei Seminari di Archeologia Cristiana (École Française, 9 marzo 2000), ed. H. Brandenburg - L. Ermini Pani, con la coll. di P. Barbini, Vatican City 2003.

9. Apulia and Calabria: beyond the works already cited in Bertaux, see: A. Quacquarelli, Note sulle origini cristiane di Canosa di Puglia, S. Leucio e la catacomba inedita di S. Sofia, Atti del VI Congr. Int. di Archeol. Crist., Vatican City 1965, 321ff.; F. Schettini, Due monumenti paleocristiani inediti del Vulture e loro riflessi sull'architettura medioevale: Archivio Storico Pugliese 19 (1966) 93ff.; W. Hermann, Archeologische Grabungen und Funde in Bereich der Superintendenzen von Apulien, Lucanien, Calabrien und Salerno von 1956 bis 1965: AA (1966) 255-367; D. Adamesteanu, Scavi e scoperte paleocristiane in Basilicata, Atti del II Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Rome 1971, 19ff.; C. Colafemmina, Apulia cristiana. Venosa. Studi e scoperte, Bari 1973; C. Carletti - M. Salvatore, Ruvo di Puglia (Contr. Patanella): Saggi di scavo, Bari 1977; M. Rotili, La necropoli longobarda di Benevento, Naples 1977; M. Salvatore, Antichità altomedievali in Basilicata: La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, Rome 1981, 947ff.; C. Carletti, Antichità paleocristiane e altomedievali in Puglia alla luce dei recenti ritrovamenti (1974–1979), ibid., 837ff.; A. Felle - D. Nuzzo, Testimonianze paleocristiane in Puglia: recenti studi e ritrovamenti: VetChr 30 (1993) 307-353; San Giusto. La villa, le ecclesiae, ed. G. Volpe, Bari 1998; F.P. Maulucci, Faragola. Ascoli Satriano (FG), in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 147-149; A. Coscarella, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Basilicata e Calabria dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 781-792 (bibl.); L. Costamagna, La sinagoga di Bova Marina (RC): una proposta di interpretazione delle strutture, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 795-808; C. D'Angela, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Puglia dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 725-732 (bibl.).

10. Lucania and Brutium: In addition to the works cited in Bertaux, see: P. Toraldo, Un ipogeo cristiano ritenuto distrutto nel cimitero di Tropea: RivAC 12 (1935) 329ff.; Id., Una basilichetta cimiteriale a Tropea, ibid., 13 (1936) 155ff.; V. Bracco, Marcellianum e il suo battistero: RivAC 34 (1958) 193ff.; W. Hermann: AA (1966) 255ff.; G. de Rosa, La chiesa della SS. Annunziata a Paestum: Rivista di Studi Salernitani 29 (1968) 181ff.; E. Arslan, Recenti scavi a Botricello e Roccelletta, Atti del II Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Rome 1971, 107ff.; L.G. Kalby, Contributi e note su nuove documentazioni paleocristiane nella Campania meridionale, ibid., 244ff.; Venosa: un parco archeologico e un museo: come e perché, ed. M. Salvatore (Mediterraneo tardoantico e medievale. Scavi e ricerche, 2), Taranto 1984; L. Spera, Die Entstehung des frühen Christentum in der Basilicata nach den jüngsten archäologischen Funden: RQA 88 (1993) 36-58; M. Salvatore, La dinamica insediativa in Basilicata tra tardoantico e altomedioevo, in Studi in onore di M. D'Elia, Spoleto-Matera 1996, 66-74; L. Bubbico - F. Caputo - A. Maurano, Monasteri italogreci e benedettini in Basilicata, 2 vols., Matera 1996-1997; A. Coscarella, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Basilicata e Calabria dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 781-792 (bibl.).

L. Pani Ermini - R. Giordani - A. Milella

11. Sicilia. The island is marked by an abundance of surviving monuments, by the variety and novelty of the typologies which reflect the multiple cultural experiences typical of the Mediterranean basin which flowed together and evolved here. The particular nature of the soil has certainly favored, from the earliest era, the use of underground burials, so much so that, for its size and variety, the subterranean cemeterial network of Sicily can be in some degree compared to the Roman, even if it differs from the latter in some particular characteristics.

In addition to *Syracuse, true and proper catacombs are found, above all, in the coastal zone, starting from the E coast where, in the territory of Augusta, in the district called Grotte del Monaco at the mouth of the Molinello, there is a grand catacomb whose origin is prior to the religious peace. Further S, along the S coast, in Cava d'Ispica, the catacomb of Larderia is marked by its ample extension, in a zone which also has numerous small hypogea and rock sanctuaries (see below). Proceeding to the W, on the Ereo plateau, nuclei different in their dimensions and articulation are found first in the area of Modica, then at Agrigentum, with the Fragapane catacomb, and again at Marsala and at Palermo, where the catacomb of Ponta d'Ossuna stands out as the largest structure, which for its size and type of excavation recalls the cemeteries of Syracuse.

Characteristic of the island is nevertheless a myriad of small hypogea which are spread with great concentration above all in the SE corner, both on the coast and in the interior: from the buildings of the E coast (Messina, Taormina, Catania, Lentini, Canicattini Bagni), to the group of Mount Lauro (Monterosso Almo, region of Vizzini-Mineo-Grammichele, Licodia Eubea, Chiaramonte Gulfi), to those of the S coast (Cugni di Cassaro, Avola, Noto, Cittadella, Pachino, Rosolini, Cava d'Ispica, Scicli), the Ereo plateau (Ragusa), the valley of the Ippari (Comiso), the Camarina region (S. Croce Camarina), the plane of Gela and the region of Caltagirone. Less common is evidence in the remainder of the territory, which is divided between central Sicily (Mussomeli, Caltanissetta, Serra di Falco, Palma di Montechiaro, Naro and Agrigentum), the SW region (Selinunte, Mazara, Marsala), the NW coastal strip (Carini, Palermo) and the Aeolian archipelago (Lipari).

Most of these, even if with very varied articulations and developments, consist of large quadrangular rooms, sometimes also cruciform (e.g., Cittadella), which are characterized by a rich typology of burials among which the sepulcher with baldachino stands out for its originality and monumentality. This is constituted of a sarcophagus carved into the rock and joined with the vault of the room through four pilasters in correspondence with the corners. This type is very widespread in the hypogea scattered in the region between Ragusa and Noto on the SE tip of the island, apart from an exception, not yet clarified, with regard to Syracuse. Other types are constituted of sepulchers with sarcophagi carved in the rock and linked one to another, and of arcosolii, both of traditional type and of grandiose multiple tombs which are buried in depth in the walls so much as to constitute true and proper short ambulatories. A particular type of tomb, finally, is called "Siculian," excavated on the front of the rock, with an arcaded or rectangular opening.

Next to the underground cemeteries, Sicily has also produced, naturally, documentation of open-air funeral areas which do not present particular characteristics except in the mountainous areas through the use of the already-mentioned tombs of Siculian type and of the so-called Campanian type, this too carved into the rock.

The same reasons of historical and geographic order, which have been seen to determine the varied typology of the cemeterial structures, also influence the experience of the sacred architecture of the island.

In the basilicas on a longitudinal plan, although the iconography repeats substantially traditional floorplans in the building found at Salemi—of which only conspicuous remains of the mosaic flooring, in multiple phases, remain—elsewhere particularities in the final solutions can be found, such as in the polygonal apse of the church of Zitone, near Lentini, datable to the 5th c., or the triconch apse of the church of S. Pancrati at Cava d'Ispica and of S. Pietro ad Baias at *Syracuse that suggest rapport with the Greek and Egyptian environments. As for the connection with the external space of the building, the usual solution of the quadriporticus finished the church of Nesima near Catania, while an open problem is left by the four basilicas of S. Pietro of Ortigia (end 4th c.), S. Focà of Priolo (4th–5th c.), S. Giovanni of Palagonia (5th c.), S. Maria della Pinta at Palermo (6th c.), believed until a few decades ago to belong to a particular architectural type which shows the open flank of arches set on pilasters. Recent observations, however, suggest that this solution is only relevant to the basilica of Palagonia which, of a funerary character, would in that case find analogy with some cemeterial buildings of Georgia. As for the rest, the insertion of worship buildings above the cemeterial buildings, whether underground or open-air, finds many comparisons on the island, with a multiplicity of forms and typologies.

There are also various constructions on a cruciform or central plan. Among them, the two churches of S. Croce Camerina, named Vigna di Mare and Bagno di Mare (or S. Nicola), with rudimentary cupola constituted by conches arranged in rows on a Latin-cross plan, and the church of the Salvatorello—or Buonaiuto chapel—at Catania, on a central plan with projecting quadrifolium and vault placed on angular brackets (5th–6th c.); that of La Favorita, near Noto, quadratic on the outside and circular on the inside, with a cupola placed directly above the perimeter walls, or also that of S. Lorenzo at Pachino, a Byzantine rebuilding of a Greek temple, which uses the solution of pendentives in the joints of the cupola, offer evident Eastern and African influences; the latter reappear in the trichorae of Malvagno, Maccari and S. Teresa, near Syracuse, whose cupolas are placed on pendentive joints, with a date now from the late 6th c.

In the framework of the still surviving ancient architecture of the island enter also, naturally, the structures cut in the rock, of disputed date, but nevertheless in general rather later.

Research in Sicily has made it possible in particular to increase our knowledge of the cemeterial occupation of the island, as in the case of the private hypogeum Manomozza III, near Priolo Gargallo (Syracuse), used in the middle of the 5th c., or the necropolis of Lardia, with numerous Christian furnishings, used between the 4th and 5th c., and to which a small worship building was annexed in the 6th c.; next, a church, still of reduced dimensions, was identified in the late Roman-Byzantine settlement of Giarranauti. More cemeterial evidence has emerged in the territory of Ragusa: a hypogeum and an aboveground sepulchral area attributed to the 3rd c. at Modica are joined to burials at S. Croce Camerina, whether near the church of Mezzagnone or close to Castello, which can be attributed, on the basis of the discovered funerary furnishings, the former to the 5th c. and the others to the 6th–7th c., the latter in connection with the remains of a worship building and of late Byzantine settlement. To the same chronological and cultural period belong also the grave furnishings found in the cemeterial nucleus of Chiaramonte Gulfi, while the 7th c. marked the abandonment of the cemeterial church of Kaukana, attributed to the era of *Justinian. Next, new investigations have focused on the sites of Sophiana (Caltanissetta), characterized by a necropolis with undisturbed monumental tombs which can be attributed to the 5th–6th c., and of Eraclea Minoa (Agrigentum), where above a necropolis of the 4th c. a cemeterial basilica was built, next to which other burials and a building also occupied with tombs have been identified. In the same province, at Fragapane, two hypogea, used between the 4th and 5th c., show traces of reuse in the Medieval period, when a furnace was installed in one while the other became a storeroom for materials. Interesting discoveries have also taken place at Marsala, where beyond a stretch of the necropolis of Lilibeo, with a splendidly decorated hypogeum where the tomb of Crispia Salvia found a place, three catacomb nuclei have been investigated in the latomia of S. Maria della Grotta, these too decorated, which show traces of use between the end of the 2nd and the 4th c. However, the construction of a large open-air cemetery at Piana degli Albanesi (Palermo), in the S. Agata district, characterized by burial mounds dates back to the 5th c. Less rich are the discoveries linked to worship edifices, among which stand out the discovery of a tessellated mosaic floor, dated to the 5th–6th c., which evidences the existence of an older basilica under the Cefalù cathedral of Roger II.

11. Sicilia: O. Garana, Le catacombe siciliane e i loro martiri, Palermo 1961; S.L. Agnello, Bibliografia archeologica della Sicilia paleocristiana e bizantina: Archivio Storico Siracusano 3 (1957) 143ff.; 5/6 (1959-1960) 203ff.; 7 (1961) 143ff.; 9 (1963) 143ff.; 10 (1964) 173ff.; 13/14 (1967-1968) 215ff.; Id., Scavi e scoperte negli ultimi dieci anni in Sicilia, Atti del II Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Rome 1971, 45ff.; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, op. cit., 271ff., 692ff. and bibl. 809-810.: Id., La cultura artistica in Italia nella Tarda Antichità, in La cultura in Italia . . . , op. cit., 810ff.; E.G. Picone, L'ipogeo Manomozza III presso Priolo Gargallo: Quaderni dell'Istituto di Archeologia della Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia dell'Università di Messina 9 (1994) 141-163; L. Calabrese, Kaukana e altri monumenti tardo antichi nel ragusano, Ragusa 1994; M.R. Sgarlata, Frühchristlichen Archäologie in Sizilien. Neue Forschungen und Entdeckungen: RQA 90 (1995) 147-182; R.M. Bonacasa Carra, Agrigento paleocristiana. Nuove scoperte: Kokalos XLII (1996) 59-74; G. Di Stefano, Scavi in alcune necropoli del Ragusano, in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 145-147; R. Giglio, Lilibeo (Marsala). Recenti rinvenimenti archeologici, in L'edificio battesimale in Italia. Aspetti e problemi, Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Bordighera 2001, I, 149-154; S.L. Agnello, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Sicilia dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 809-819 (bibl.); R.M. Bonacasa Carra, Recenti scoperte nell'area delle catacombe di Marsala, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 821-827.

L. Pani Ermini - R. Giordani

12. Sardinia. The near-total absence of literary sources for the paleo-Christian and Early Medieval periods restricts research to only archaeological documentation. From this emerges, first, the conclusion that in the territory of the seven dioceses, into which the island was divided at the time of *Gregory the Great, no monument is older than the end of the 3rd, or better, the beginning of the 4th c.; the earliest evidence found is in fact from the fragmentary front of a sarcophagus from Olbia with scenes of the sacrifice of Isaac and of *Daniel among the lions, produced in all likelihood by Ostian workshops. All the other monuments of the island, from the cubiculi of the cemetery of Bonaria to the sepulchers of the area of S. Saturno at Cagliari, to the catacombs of S. Antioco in the Sulcis peninsula, to the hypogeum of Bonorva, to the cemeteries of Tharros and of Cornus, up to those of Forum Traiani, of Porto Torres and of Olbia, have not yielded constructive elements, nor epigraphic materials or furnishings which might allow a date earlier than the epoch mentioned above.

The types of burials are varied, both in the underground and aboveground areas. The former have created, next to true and proper catacombs such as that of S. Antioco, individual cubiculi carved into the rock by joining several Punic chamber hypogea with galleries, such as in Bonaria Ridge at Cagliari or articulated as at Forum Traiani, at Porto Torres and at Bonorva, here also with the reuse of preceding sepulchers. Opposed to the communitarian character of the cemetery of S. Antioco is the familiar and private character of the other structures, acc. to what it seems can be inferred from the few burials in arcosolii which are regularly opened in the rock walls. The fresco decoration, still surviving in some hypogea, shows in general stylistic characters and themes in agreement with the contemporaneous pictures of Roman environments with a predilection for floral motifs, acc. to a taste common in the orbis christianus of the 4th c., but also an independence in the iconographic elaboration of the same themes. Around the aboveground burials, the areas of S. Saturno and of Bonaria at Cagliari have produced, next to non-Christian mausoleums, at least in their original phase, tombs in brick covered with slabs or flat roof tiles, sarcophagi, "barrel" tombs and simple tile-built burials. The same typology is in the area of S. Gavino at Porto Torres, united with tumulus tombs with mosaic coverings which recall African examples and also at Cornus, where recent excavations have documented the presence of mensae for the refrigerium. Still in the cemeterial context the rich epigraphic material should be mentioned.

Not many places of worship prior to the 9th c. have been found on the island. The original nucleus of S. Saturno at Cagliari, which has a domed body adorned with cross arms, has been compared with the first construction phase of S. Giovanni in Sinis in the suburbium of Tharros. In addition to these structures (which show designs of a funerary and martyrial character) and the small church of S. Maria of Mesomundo near Siligo (also built on a central plan but subordinated to the iconography of the Roman bath in which it was built), the halls of Cornus, the basilica found under S. Gavino at Porto Torres and the church of S. Andrea Pischinapiu in the countryside of Narbolia (which too was built in a former bath building) are evidence of the only examples known today of buildings erected on a longitudinal plan. In particular, the two parallel and contiguous halls of Cornus, the second of which was transformed at a later time into a baptistery, show an iconography which reflects African characteristics, esp. in some phases of restoration whose execution has been tentatively attributed to the orthodox bishops who were refugees from Africa under the reign of Thrasamund (496–523). The baptismal pool in masonry, of octagonal form on the outside and cruciform on the inside, was topped by a baldachino as was that of the baptistery of Tharros, where unfortunately there are no remains of the episcopal basilica connected to it.

Also in Sardinia the recent finds in particular permit updating the framework of the information concerning the cemeteries: at Porto Torres, beyond a hypogeum and a columbarium, a paleo-Christian necropolis has been investigated in piazza Mameli and a late phase of a necropolis in the basilica of S. Gavino has been identified. In the territory of Sassari another necropolis of vast proportions has been discovered in the Montalè region, which can be dated between the 2nd and 4th c. and perhaps can be linked to an Early Medieval rock church; at Padria, on the other hand, a church was founded above a barrel tomb inside a space which would later be used for the insertion of earthern graves. Important results have emerged from the investigations of the archaeological area of Cornus, where in addition to much information on the cemetery and its worship complexes, new understanding concern the insula episcopalis has been achieved. A series of other important investigations, finally, has allowed us to specify the events in the construction of several monuments, such as for the sanctuary of S. Maria of Bonaccattu in the province of Oristano, built between the 6th and 8th c. in the area of a civil building; the ecclesia baptismalis of Nurachi, also in the same province, datable to the 6th c.; and the church of S. Nicola at Orroli (Nuoro) built in the Early Medieval era with a cruciform plan and a raised presbytery. For the original phase of the sanctuary of S. Antioco at Sulci, a date in the 5th c. has been proposed and the hypothesis has been advanced of a cathedral function. Specifications of the succession of phases have also been made concerning the sanctuary of S. Lussorio at Fordongianus, the church of S. Saturnino at Cagliari, and the church of Nostra Signora at Mesumundu in the province of Sassari.

12. Sardinia: R. Delogu, L'architettura del Medioevo in Sardegna, Rome 1953; P. Testini, Il battistero di Tharros, Atti del XIII Congr. di Storia dell'Architettura, Rome 1966, 191ff.; G. Maetzke, Scavi e scoperte nel campo dell'Archeologia Cristiana negli ultimi dieci anni in Sardegna e in Toscana, Atti del II Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Rome 1971, 311ff.; P. Testini, Il complesso paleocristiano di Cornus (regione Columbaris) in Sardegna, Actas del VIII Congr. Int. de Arqueología Cristiana, Vatican City-Barcelona 1972, 537ff.; L. Pani Ermini - M. Marinone, Museo Archeologico Nazionale di Cagliari. Catalogo dei materiali paleocristiani e altomedievali, Rome 1981; L. Pani Ermini, Antichità Cristiana e Alto Medioevo in Sardegna attraverso le più recenti scoperte archeologiche, in La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, Rome 1981, 903ff. (with bibl.); A.M. Giuntella - G. Borghetti - D. Stiaffini, Mensae e riti funerari in Sardegna: la testimonianza di Cornus (Mediterraneo tardoantico e medievale. Scavi e ricerche, 1), Taranto 1985; Il suburbio delle città in Sardegna: persistenze e trasformazioni, Atti del III Convegno sull'archeologia tardoromana e medievale (Cuglieri 28-29 giugno 1986), Taranto 1986; L'archeologia romana e altomedievale nell'oristanese, Atti del Convegno di Cuglieri (22-23 giugno 1984), Taranto 1986; Ampsicora e il territorio di Cornus, Atti del II Convegno sull'archeologia romana e altomedievale nell'oristanese (Cuglieri, 22 dicembre 1985), Taranto 1988; Le sepolture in Sardegna dal IV al VII secolo, Atti del IV Convegno sull'archeologia tardoromana e medievale (Cuglieri 27-28 giugno 1987), Oristano 1990; L. Pani Ermini - P.G. Spanu, Aspetti di archeologia urbana: ricerche nel suburbio orientale di Cagliari, in La "civitas christiana": urbanistica delle città italiane fra tarda antichità e alto medioevo: aspetti di archeologia urbana, Atti del I seminario di studio, Turin 1991, ed. P. Demeglio - C. Lambert (Mediterraneo tardoantico e medievale. Quaderni, 1), Turin 1992; Materiali per una topografia urbana: status quaestionis e nuove acquisizioni, Atti del V Convegno sull'archeologia tardoromana e altomedievale in Sardegna (Cagliari-Cuglieri 24-26 giugno 1988), Oristano 1995; P.G. Spanu, La Sardegna bizantina tra VI e VII secolo (Mediterraneo tardoantico e medievale. Scavi e ricerche, 12), Oristano 1998; A.M. Giuntella, Cornus I, 1. L'area cimiteriale orientale (Mediterraneo tardoantico e medievale. Scavi e ricerche, 13,1), Oristano 1999; Id., Cornus I, 2. L'area cimiteriale orientale: i materiali (Mediterraneo tardoantico e medievale. Scavi e ricerche, 13,2), Oristano 2000; P.G. Spanu, Martyria Sardiniae: i santuari dei martiri sardi (Mediterraneo tardoantico e medievale. Scavi e ricerche, 15), Oristano 2000; L. Pani Ermini, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Sardegna dal 1983 al 1993, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia, Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist., Cassino 2003, II, 891-920 (bibl.).

L. Pani Ermini - A. Milella

ITHACIUS of Ossonuba (4th c.). Together with *Hydatius of Mérida, he was among the most implacable adversaries of *Priscillianism from the Council of *Saragossa in 380. Having turned to the imperial authorities, together with Hydatius, he obtained from *Gratian a decree against the Priscillianists, accused of *Manicheism. Later he acted against *Maximus in order to have Priscillian condemned; following the reaction to the killing of Priscillian and of some of his followers, Ithacius was deposed from his episcopal rank.

H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976; V. Burrus, The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1995, passim.

S. Zincone

ITINERARIES. The Christian custom of pilgrimage to the Holy Places continued the Hebraic one to the tombs of the prophets in Palestine. Centers of Christian pilgrimage were the sanctuaries of the terra sancta and the tombs of the martyrs in the churches and catacombs of *Rome (edition: CCL 175-176), but there were places of pilgrimage across the entire Christian world. Only pilgrims coming from far away needed the written itineraries. Starting from the 4th c. voyages multiplied, giving rise to a specific literary genre: the travel guides and diaries, which have a particular interest for paleo-Christian topography. It is necessary to distinguish in this literature the purely geographic descriptions (the onomasticon of *Eusebius of Caesarea in the 290s [CPG 3466; CPL 581a]; the Tabula Peutingeriana, redacted from the 2nd to 5th c.; the mosaic map of Madaba of the late 6th c.; Ravennatis Anonymi Cosmographia of the 7th c.; other writings of the Byzantine era) from the works whose character is more hagiographic (Prudentius, Perist. [CPL 1443]; Paulinus of Nola [CPL 203] and Venantius Fort., Carmina [CPL 1033]), in which information of a topographic character is secondary.

1. Latin Palestinian itineraries. Authentic itineraries: (1) The Itinerarium anonymum Burdigalense* of 333. (2) The Itinerarium seu Peregrinatio ad loca sancta of *Egeria of the years 381–384. (3) Letter 108, in which *Jerome describes in 404 the voyage which he took together with *Paula in 385. (4) An *anonymous writer, in the past called Antoninus of Piacenza (or Antoninus Placentius), took a trip with some companions in ca. 570; he wrote the account in his Itinerarium. There are two recensions of it: in both, the voyage begins at *Constantinople and stops abruptly at the Euphrates.

Descriptions of countryside and itineraries were compiled from the writings of earlier authors: (5) The De situ Hierosolymae of Eucherius, which certainly depends on Jerome and on Ps.-Hegesippus; if the author should be identified with Hegesippus of Lyons, the work is datable to between 444 and 450; otherwise it can be dated around the middle of the 7th c. (6) The De situ Terrae Sanctae of 518–ca. 530, attributed to a MS of a certain Theodosius who is believed to be of African origin because he calls the *Arians Vandals. (7) The Breviarius de Hierosolyma of the beginning of the 6th c. (8) The De locis sanctis, of the Irish abbot *Adamnan of Iona (ca. 624–704), written in ca. 687–688, which recounts the voyage taken by a bishop of *Gaul named Arculf before 680, comparing his accounts with other earlier writings on the Holy Land. (9) The De locis sanctis of the Venerable *Bede, redacted around 702–703, using similar works of Jerome, ps.-Hegesippus, Adamnan and doubtless also ps.-Eucherius, is a description of the entire Near East, including Constantinople.

2. Greek Palestinian itineraries. The Greek itineraries of the Holy Land begin with that of Epiphanius Hagiopolites of the 8th–9th c.

3. Roman itineraries. (1) The Depositiones episcoporum et martyrum* of 336; these are not itineraries in the strict sense; however, the locations of the tombs of popes and martyrs are reported in them, and for this reason they were useful also for pilgrims. (2) The Notula de olea sanctorum martyrum of the presbyter John who, commissioned by the Bavarian queen *Theodelinda, under the pontificate of *Gregory the Great, collected relics in Rome. It is not an itinerary, but a list of ampules containing oil taken from the tombs of the Roman martyrs. (3) The Cymiteria totius Romanae urbis, of the beginning of the 7th c., which describes only the 17 cata-combs known at that time (see DACL 7, 1904–1905). (4) The Notitia ecclesiarum urbis Romae, probably written between 625 and 649 (n. 36-43 middle of the 8th c.); the mentioned churches are the suburban ones of the martyrs, classified clockwise acc. to the streets which they flank, from the Porta Flaminia to the Via Cornelia. A single urban church, that of Sts. John and Paul, is added at the beginning. (5) The De locis sanctis martyrum, redacted between ca. 635 and 645, lists the sanctuaries dedicated to the martyrs starting counterclockwise from the Via Cornelia, from the tomb of Peter; the work is completed with a list of 21 urban churches. (6) The Itinerarium Malmesburiense, which dates to ca. 648–682, inserted by William of Malmesbury in his Deeds of the Kings of England. In this work, too, the list begins from the Porta Cornelia, but proceeds normally clockwise. (7) The Itinerarium Einsidlense, written after 687 (the last part, the Descriptio murorum, under *Hadrian I [772–795]), so called from the MS in which it is preserved (Einsiedeln 326, 9th–10th c.). It contains different documents of an epigraphic and historical character, important for the history of Rome; the collection dates to the 8th c. (F.A. Bauer, Stadt, Platz und Denkmal in der Spätantike, Mainz 1996, pl. 18; Roma dall'antichità al medioevo, Milan 2001, 154-159; Kunst und Kultur der Karolingerzeit 2, Mainz 1999, 607-609; Christiana Loca 2, Rome 2001, 248-249).

CPL 2324-2348; Verzeichnis 583-585; PWK 9, 2308-2363; RAC 19, 1-31; LMA 5, 772-775; LACL³ 363-365; Krumbacher, 409-427; J. Zettinger, Die Berichte über Rompilger aus dem Frankenreiche bis zum Jahre 800, Rome 1900; P. Thomsen, Loca sancta. Verzeichnis der im 1. bis 6. Jahrhundert n. Chr. erwähnten Ortschaften Palästinas, Leipzig 1907; G. Bardy, Pèlerinages à Rome vers la fin du IVᵉ siècle: AB 67 (1949) 224-235; J. Wilkinson, Jerusalem Pilgrims Before the Crusades, Warminster 1977; D. Baldi, Enchiridion locorum sanctorum. Documenta s. evangelii loca respicientia, Jerusalem ²1982; F. Morgan Nichols - E. Gardiner, The Marvels of Rome: Mirabilia Urbis Romae, New York 1986; V. Saxer, I Santi e i santuari antichi della via Salaria da Fidene ad Amiterno: RivAC 61 (1990) 245-305; P. Testini, Archeologia Cristiana, Bari ²1980, 25-63; A. Külzer, Peregrinatio graeca in Terram Sanctam, Frankfurt a.M. 1994; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, "Itinera ad sanctos." Testimonianze monumentali del passaggio dei pellegrini nei santuari del suburbio romano: Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Vatican City - Münster 1995, 763-775; P. Maraval, Récits des premiers pèlerins chretiens au Proche-Orient, Paris 1996; N.R. Miedema, Die Mirabilia Romae, Tübingen 1996; H.R. Drobner, Die Palästina-Itinerarien: Augustinianum 38 (1998) 293-354; M. Miglio, Pellegrinaggi a Roma, Rome 1999; D. Feissel, Les itinéraires de Procope et la métrologie de l'antiquité tardive: Antiquité Tardive 10 (2002) 383-400.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

ITINERARIUM BURDIGALENSE. The oldest Christian *itinerary for the Holy Places was composed by an anonymous author from *Bordeaux. He reports a voyage, which took place in 333–334, from this city to *Jerusalem: passing through N *Italy on the way, then through the valley of the Danube, he reached *Constantinople and from there continued through Asia Minor and Syria and finally arrived in Jerusalem: he remained many months in Palestine, visiting various biblical sites. On the way back, he traversed Macedonia, landed in Italy, passed through Rome and halted at *Milan. The author lists the different mutationes (post stations), the mansiones (inns) and the different distances; here and there he inserts biblical reminiscences and local traditions. It is more of a topographical list than a narration. The text is written in a simple and clear Latin, typical of the Roman Itineraria, and it is important for the topographical references and the traces of Jewish and Christian memories.

Editions: CPL 2324; PL 8, 784-796; Geyer: in CSEL 39 (1898) 3-33 (repr. 1964) = CCL 175 (1961) 1-26; O. Cuntz, Itineraria Romana, I, Leipzig 1929, 86-102.

Studies: H. Leclercq: DACL 7 (1927) 1853-1858; H. Leclercq: DACL 14 (1939) 76-78; B.K. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa, Münster-Regensburg 1950, 89-110; 345-354; R. Gelsomino, L'Itinerarium Burdigalense e la Puglia: VetChr 3 (1966) 161-208; Patrologia III, Turin 1978, 532; C. Milani, *Strutture formulari nell'*Itinerarium Burdigalense (a. 333): Aevum 57 (1983) 99-108; TRE 16 (1987) 619-620 (s.v. Jerusalem. IV); L. Douglass, A New Look at the Itinerarium Burdigalense: JECS 4 (1996) 313-333.

M. Maritano

IZLA (Izala), Mount. Mount Izla (Izlo; Gr. Izala)—the name still used—is found in the S part of the mountain massif (Mons Masius) in SE Turkey, not far from the borders with Syria and Iraq, and to the NE of *Nisibis, in the area of the Mons Gaugalion (Sozomen 3,14,30). In the E part of the plateau is Tur'Abdin. It belonged to the province Mesopotamiae, whose capital was Nisibis. Through the defeat of *Julian in 363, E Mesopotamia was ceded to the *Sassanids (Ammianus 25,7-9 [commentary by J. Fontaine, Paris 1977, 257-258]; Lenski 161-162); the capital of the reduced province became Amida (today Diyarbakir); Nisibis was abandoned by the Romans and passed to the Sassanids. The border which was established, as it seems, was to the W of the River Mygdonis, to the W of Nisibis, on the Mons Masius (the entire mountain chain with Tur'Abdin) and on the River Nymphius (Bohtan Su) (see Palmer, XX-XXI). This border remained for a long time, practically until 520. The border limits did not prevent the Christians from communicating among themselves, from traveling or from having a common spiritual and theological sentiment. The territory of Upper Mesopotamia was conquered by the Arabs in the course of the 7th c.

According to a tradition, in the 4th c. the Egyptian monk *Eugenius (Awgin) founded monasticism on Mount Izla; in later times a monastery with that name perpetuated his memory up to today (at 26 km [16.2 mi.] from Nisibis at 6 km [3.8 mi] from the village Girmeli). His nephew Malka (Malkē) founded another monastery to the N of the preceding monastery; another disciple, John the Bedouin (Arab), or Mar Yohannan, founded a third monastery 3 km (1.9 mi) farther N: *Jacob of Nisibis, later bishop of that city at the beginning of the 4th c., had a period of solitary life in the area. The region was inhabited by monks from then on, among whom there were also followers of *Severian theology, when the great monastery was founded before 570 between the two latter monasteries and N of Mirab. For his prestige and influence, Abram was considered founder of the great monastery and author of the Rule. It begins thus: "Because, ever since we began to live in this spot, the brothers who live here have worked and toiled excavating grottoes and building cells in which to live"; for these reasons they had decided to write the norms of behavior. This monastic Rule, the oldest preserved of Syro-Eastern Christianity, written in 570 (the monastery in those years was under Sassanid domination), was born as the fruit of an experience lived on the part of the community and would inspire later monasticism in the Mesopotamian world. The monastery became an important center of spirituality and theological culture, from which numerous founders of other monasteries would emerge (Chialà, 134-139), some sent by *Abraham himself (d. 586). The system of life in the great monastery resembled that of the Palestinian lauras. Abraham, through his efforts, came to be considered the "father of the monks of the entire Persian Empire." He was succeeded by *Dadisho (d. 604) and *Babai (d. 628), severe men who would write collections of Rules. Already with Babai the Great the monastery lost prestige, even if there always remained a community up to the first decades of the 20th c.

DIP 5 (1978) 286-287 (Vööbus); DHGE 26 (1997) 493-494 (Fiey); J.M. Fiey, Nisibe, métropole syriaque orientale et ses suffragants, des origines à nos jours, CSCO 388, Subs. 54, Louvain 1977, 134-171; S. Brock, Notes on Some Monasteries on Mount Izla: Abr Nahrain 19 (1980/1) 1-19, in part. 3-4 (repr. in Syriac Perspectives on Late Antiquity, London 1984, ch. XV); A. Palmer, Monk and Mason on the Tigris Frontier: The Early History of Tur 'Abdin, Cambridge 1990; N. Lenski, Failure of Empire: Valens and the Roman State in the Fourth Century, Berkeley, CA 2002; D.A. Johnson, Monks of Mount Izla: Origins of Christian Monasticism East of the Euphrates from the 4th to 6th Centuries from Aramaic Sources, Napa, CA 2004; Sabino Chialà, Abramo di Kashkar e la sua comunità, Magnano 2004.

A. Di Berardino

J

JACOB (iconography). Cemeterial pictures illustrating the deeds of Jacob are found in a unique cubicle of the hypogeum of Via Dino Compagni at Rome. The three scenes represented—Jacob arriving in Egypt with his sons (Gen 46:5-27; Ferrua 1990, fig. 44), the blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen 48; Ferrua 1990, fig. 50) and the vision of Bethel (Gen 28:10-16; Ferrua 1990, fig. 48)—are located in a context of the 2nd half of the 4th c. Contemporaneous or a little earlier are some reliefs on *sarcophagus fronts in which the following scenes have been identified, but with little certainty: the blessing of Jacob by Isaac (Gen 27:1-42; Ws 116,1), the patriarch in sacred vestments (Ws 186,1) and Jacob with Rachel at the well (Ws 194,3). In the illustrations of the Genesis of Vienna (6th c.) the following scenes are depicted: Esau sells his birthright to Jacob (Gen 25:34), Isaac and Abimelech (Gen 26:8-12), Jacob and Rachel (Gen 29:15-30), the flight of Jacob and the fight with the angel (Gen 31:1-21), the destruction of the idols (Gen 35:2), the birth of Benjamin (Gen 35:16), the burial of Rachel (Gen 35:19) and the death of Isaac (Gen 35:27-29). The mosaic cycle of the right wall of the Roman basilica of S. Maria Maggiore (WMM 11-15) should be dated to the middle of the 5th c. The following scenes are recognizable: Isaac blesses Jacob (Gen 27:1-42), the dream of Jacob (Gen 28:10-16), Jacob before Laban (Gen 29:1-4), service in the house of Laban (Gen 29:18-21), marriage with Rachel (Gen 29:15-30), the division of the flocks (Gen 30:25-43), the departure (Gen 31), the fight with the angel (Gen 32:23-30), the encounter of Jacob with Esau (Gen 33:1-16), the rape of Dinah (Gen 34:1), the pact with the people of Shechem (Gen 34:5-19) and the sons of Jacob showing the bloody tunic (Gen 37:18-35).

LCI II, 370-383; W. von Hartel - F. Wickoff, Die Wiener Genesis, Vienna 1895; C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Rome 1956; G. Stemberger, Die Patriarchenbilder der Katakombe in der via Latina im Lichte der jüdischen Tradition: Kairos 16 (1974) 19-78; var. aus., The Place of Book Illumination in Byzantine Art, Princeton, NJ 1975; E. Kitzinger, The Role of Miniature Painting in Mural Decoration, in The Place of Book Illumination in Byzantine Art, Princeton, NJ 1975; L. Kötzsche-Breitenbruch, Die neue Katakombe an der via Latina in Rom, Münster 1976; J. Wilpert - W.N. Schumacher, Die römischen Mosaiken der kirchlichen Bauten vom IV. bis XIII. Jahrhundert, Freiburg i.B. [2]1976; 99-142; B.A. Al-Hadmani, The Iconographical Sources for the Genesis Frescoes Once Found in S. Paolo f.l.m.: Atti del IX Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana, Roma 21-27 settembre 1975, II, Vatican City 1978, 11-35; G. Matthiae, Pittura romana del Medioevo. Secoli IV-X, with bibl. update by M. Andaloro, Rome 1987; A. Ferrua, Catacombe sconosciute. Una pinacoteca del IV secolo sotto la via Latina, Florence 1990; D. Nuzzo, TIP, 188-190.

F. Bisconti

JACOB BARADEUS (d. 578). Jacob Burde'ân, the "ragamuffin," transformed through Greek and Latin into Jacob Baradeus, lived in the 6th c. and died 30 or 31 July 578. The "*Jacobite" church of *Antioch received its name from him. Son of a priest of Tulla, he withdrew to the monastery of Pesilta on Mt. *Izla. Toward 527–528 he was sent to *Constantinople with the priest Sargis to take care of the interests of the *monophysites. But in 542–543 Hârith ibn Gabala requested the empress *Theodora to attend to the pastoral difficulties among the monophysites. Both were ordained by *Theodosius of Alexandria, exiled like them, one as bishop of *Bostra and Jacob as bishop of *Edessa. It seems that immediately upon the death of Theodosius in 566, Jacob took upon himself the objectives of the patriarch. He effected a great number of ordinations: the later chronicles speak of 27 bishops and of thousands of priests. Theodora had in the meanwhile died, after 547, while Hârith passed away in 570. The tendency of some modern historians has been to present the Jacobite church and the activity of Jacob as that of a commissioned subversive, the founder of a new church, obeying the incitement of intrigues of the court of Theodora. This exaggerated picture does not correspond to the scarce documentation that we have. One can ask if Jacob himself realized that he was the founder of a church. He simply responded to a pastoral emergency as a pastor. Nothing remains that can be attributed to him with certainty but a few letters, and some of these were written collectively. The profession of faith preserved in Ethiopian has not yet been certified as his. The homily on the Annunciation seems to be an autograph of Nūh Libaniota. One must limit oneself, therefore, to the later sources. The body of Jacob was transferred to the convent of Pesilta.

D.D. Bundy, Jacob Baradeus: The State of Research, a Review of Sources and a New Approach: Muséon 91 (1978) 45-86; J. Teixidor, Bardesane d'Édesse: la première philosophie syriaque, Paris 1992, 23, 138.

M. van Esbroeck

JACOB of Edessa (ca. 633–708). Jacob was born around 633 in the village of ʿEndebā, situated in the diocese of *Antioch. He studied Greek and the Holy Scriptures at the monastery of Qennešrīn, under the direction of Severus Sebokot and afterward went to perfect his Greek and Hellenistic culture at *Alexandria. He was named bishop of *Edessa by the patriarch of Antioch Athanasius of Balad (684–686). After failing in his attempt at reforming the monasteries of his diocese, Jacob abandoned his episcopal see after only four years and retired to the monastery of St. Jacob of Kaysūm (diocese of Antioch), where for eleven years he taught the Holy Scriptures, on the basis of the Greek text. But there too he had some difficulties with the monks and moved to the monastery of Tell ʿAddā, where he stayed nine years, employed above all in the revision of the *Syriac translation of the OT. At the death of Ḥabīb, who had succeeded him in the see of Edessa, Jacob took up possession of his first episcopal charge, but four years later, having returned to Tell ʿAddā to retrieve his books, died there 5 June 708. Worthy of note was his friendship, among others, with George, a bishop of the Arab tribes. Jacob surpassed the other authors of his time as much through the breadth and variety of his knowledge in different fields as through his great talents as a writer. As an eminent polymath—theologian, philosopher, exegete, historian and grammarian—he renovated, it can be said without exaggeration, Syriac studies in all these areas.

It is impossible to enumerate here with precision and detail all the works of Jacob and the editions and studies to which they have given rise. It is sufficient to note his principal works: the revision of the Syriac translation (*Peshitta) of the OT (it is the first systematic work of the Masorah of the Jacobites. Jacob added numerous marginal glosses to the text), comments and scholia on the Scriptures known thanks to the catenae of Severus. Although his Hexameron* has been preserved, there are no more traces of his treatise on "the first cause, creative, eternal, omnipotent and not created which is God, preserver of all things." Jacob revised the Chronicle of *Eusebius of Caesarea and continued it (from the 20th year of *Constantine until 692). He made a new translation of the Cathedral Homilies of *Severus of Antioch, already translated by *Paul of Callinicum, and of the Oktoiches of the same Severus, this too already translated previously by the bishop *Paul of Edessa. Perhaps he also revised the Syriac translation of the works of *Gregory of Nazianzus, due to a certain abbot Paul, who must be distinguished from the Paul mentioned above. Jacob translated directly from Greek the apocryphal story of the Rechabites and composed a canonical treatise on the degrees of relationship that constitute an impediment to marriage (whose authenticity, however, has been questioned) as well as monastic canons.

In the field of *liturgy, many texts have reached us under his name: a revision of the liturgy of St. James, an ordo of baptism and of matrimony, a calendar, as well as various homilies (of which some are polemical in character). It is necessary, finally, to mention the activity of Jacob as a grammarian and lexicographer: a Syriac grammar (preserved only in fragments), letters to George, bishop of Sarug, on orthography, an Enchiridion (a catalog of technical terms of philosophy). It is easy to understand how Jacob earned, in the later tradition, the epithet philoponos.

ʿAbdīšōʿ, Cat. Libr. Syrorum, 165, ed. J.S. Assemani, BO 3, I, Rome 1725, 229 (gives only Annales and Chronicon: it is true that Jacob is not a Nestorian); Duval 374-376; Baumstark 248-256; Chabot 84-88; Ortiz de Urbina 177-183; DTC 8, 286-291; DB 3, 1099-1102; W. Baars, Ein neugefundenes Bruchstück aus der syrischen Bibelrevision des Jakob von Edessa: VT 18 (1968) 548-554; A. Vööbus, The Discovery of New Cycles of Canons and Resolutions Composed by Jacob of Edessa: OCP 34 (1968) 412-419; E.J. Revell, The Grammar of Jacob of Edessa and the Other Near Eastern Grammatical Traditions: PdO 3 (1972) 365-374; F. Graffin, Jacques d'Edesse réviseur des Homélies de Sévère d'Antioche d'après le ms. syriaque B.M. Add. 12159: Symposium Syriacum 1976 (OCA 205), Rome 1978, 243-255; S.P. Brock, Jacob of Edessa's Discourse on the Myron: OC 63 (1979) 20-36; TRE 16, 468-70; LTK² 5, 839-840; S.P. Brock: PdO 4 (1973) 429; 10 (1981-82) 353; 14 (1987) 324; A. Salvesen, Spirits in Jacob of Edessa's Revision of Samuel: Aram 5 (1993) 481-490; W. Adler, Jacob of Edessa and the Jewish Pseudepigrapha in Syriac Chronography, in Tracing the Threads: Studies in the Vitality of Jewish Pseudepigrapha, ed. J.J. Reeves et al., Atlanta 1994, 143-171; A. Salvesen, The Purpose of Jacob of Edessa's Version of Samuel: Harp 8/9 (1995-96) 117-126; J.M. Fiey, Jacques d'Édesse: DHGE 26, Paris 1997, 663-664; D. Kruisheer - L. van Rompay, A Bibliographical Clavis to the Works of Jacob of Edessa: Hugoye 1, 1 (1998).

J.-M. Sauget

JACOB of Nisibis (d. 338 or a little later). First bishop of *Nisibis, from 308 (acc. to the chronicle of Elias of Nisibis, d. 1049) to 338. He built his church from 313 to 320 and in 325 was present at the Council of *Nicaea, where, acc. to *Athanasius, he was very active in the condemnation of *Arius. It seems that at Nicaea he was accompanied by *Ephrem, whom he established upon their return as interpreter of the Scriptures in his episcopal city. Ephrem praises him as a model bishop in the Carmina Nisibena, and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus wrote his biography in his Philotheos historia. We do not possess, as it seems, any of his authentic writings. Since Nisibis in the 3rd c. was included in Armenia, the Armenians consider Jacob as one of their own. They attribute to him the Armenian translation of the works of *Aphraates and have composed a legendary Vita, attributing to him, e.g., the discovery of the remains of Noah's ark. Even his friendship with *Gregory the Illuminator and his role in the evangelization of Armenia are controversial. The *Chronicon of Arbela, 48 and 51-52 K., also speaks at length about Jacob: "At this time a God-fearing man was patriarch of the City of the Borders, Jacob, who performed miracles like the apostles and wonders like the prophets. Thus, many times he passed entire nights in prayer like his Lord. And his vigils and his fasts were famous in every place. And he was truly a godly man"; when *Shapur II (309–379) besieged Nisibis in 332, Jacob—acc. to information from Ephrem—saved it: "He ascended onto the walls of the city and took up asking of the Lord that he either make him to die or save his people from the hands of pagans and from slaughter": the Lord sent a swarm of locusts which put the Persian army to flight. After his death, he still protected the city at the time of the third siege in 350. In 363, when Nisibis was ceded to the Persians by Jovian, after the defeat of *Julian the Apostate, his relics were transferred to Amida; the emperor John Tzimiskes (969–976) brought them to *Constantinople. The Syro-Eastern Church commemorates him the first Friday of the summer, and again 13 January or 17 April; the Armenian, 13 December; the Mart. hier. and the Latins, 14 July.

AASS Iulii IV 28-44; Mart. hier. 374 n. 16; Mart. Rom. 389 n. 8; Syn. Eccl. Const. 388-390; BHO 406-409; BHG I n. 769; P. Peeters, La Légende de Saint Jacques de Nisibe: AB 38 (1920) 285-373; P. Krüger, Jacob von Nisibis in syrscher und armenischer Überlieferung: LM 81 (1968) 161-179; J.M. Sauget, BS VI 411-412; J.M. Fiey, Nisibe, Louvain 1977, CSCO 388, Subs. 54, 21-26; P. Kawerau, Ostkirchengeschichte, I, CSCO Subsidia 451, Louvain 1983, 115-116; P. Kawerau, Die Chronik von Arbela, Louvain 1985, CSCO Syri 468 t. 200, 2: 48, 51-52; 70 n. 40; LTK[2] 5, 844; S.P. Brock, From Ephrem to Romanos, SP 20, Louvain 1989, 139-151; D. Bundy, Jacob of Nisibis as a Model for the Episcopacy: LM 104 (1991) 235-249; A. Salvesen, Spirits in Jacob of Edessa's Revision of Samuel: Aram 5 (1993) 481-490; H.J.W. Drijvers, Nisibis: TRE XXIV, 573-576; J.M. Fiey, Jacques de Nisibe: DHGE XXVI, 706; I. Ramelli, Il Chronicon di Arbela: presentazione, traduzione e note, 'Ilu Anejos VIII, Madrid 2002, 53-55.

I. Ramelli

JACOB of Sarug (ca. 450–ca. 521). Feast: 29 November among the Syrians, 5 April among the *Maronites. One of the greatest Syriac doctors, a native of Hawra, district of Sarug, in the outskirts of *Edessa, where he attended the famous school, which at the time of *Narsai (exiled in 471) was of a *Nestorian tendency. Like so many others, Jacob adhered to the faction of *Cyril of Alexandria and broke with the school. Despite numerous controversies about his orthodoxy, it is certain that he adhered to the views of *Severus of Antioch and that, after having been periodeuta (overseer of clergy), he was promoted to bishop in 519, just at the end of his life, as a moderate *monophysite, fit for reconciling Christians. His letters (to the monks of Mar Bass) show that he had to justify himself when confronted with criticisms of the more combative monophysites, but that he did so by adopting their point of view. He was a fertile poet, whose works (esp. mēmrē or rhythmic homilies) are even yet poorly studied. He knew Greek, but wrote only in *Syriac. P. Bedjan published five large volumes of his in rapid succession, Homiliae selectae Mar Jacobi Sarugensis, Paris-Leipzig 1905–1910, not counting other texts distributed in other editions: S. Martyrii qui et Sahdona quae supersunt omnia, Paris-Leipzig 1902, 614-865; Acta Martyrum et sanctorum, I, 131-136; III, 665-679; IV, 471-499, 650-655; VI, 650-689, Paris-Leipzig 1890-1896. The Epistolae quotquot supersunt were published by G. Olinder: CSCO 110, Louvain 1965; the Homilies Against the Jews by M. Albert: PO 38,1, Turnhout 1976; the work on the creation by P. Gignoux: PO 34, Paris 1968. Certain Arabic texts were printed at Cairo in 1905: Kitab Maiamir. Poetic texts are attributed to him in all the Syriac liturgical books, *Jacobite, Uniate or Maronite. The list of writings translated by various authors since 1852 would be long (e.g., in the Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, in "Orient Syrien"). A Vööbus (Handschriftliche Überlieferung der Memre-Dichtung des Ja'qōb von Serūg: CSCO 344-345, 421-422, Louvain 1973–1980) has undertaken a general inventory of the MS tradition. According to the tradition, Jacob composed 763 mēmrē, not to mention his letters. The problems of authenticity have hardly been faced, still less those of the chronology of his works.

Jacob was essentially inspired by the Bible, acc. to the Syriac tradition; he saw Greek theology above all through the school of Edessa. He tries to understand the mysteries of the revelation of the Son. His *Christology is interesting in order to complete our Western vision: it is based on an *anthropology, a conception of creation and of salvation. The study of R.C. Chesnut (Three Monophysite Christologies, Oxford 1976) is less successful on Jacob than on *Severus and *Philoxenus: themes are considered there as *gnostic which others would see as popular, perfectly normal within Syriac theology.

DSp 8, 56-60 (bibl.); LACL 370; TRE 15, 470-474; BBKL 2, 480-482; C. Vona, Omelie mariologiche, Rome 1953; T. Jansma, Encore le Credo de J. de S.: OrSyr 19 (1965) 75-88, 193-236, 331-370, 475-510; Id., Die Christologie J. von S.: Muséon 77 (1965) 5-46; P. Krüger: OS 1-6, 13 and 21 (1952-1972); OrSyr 2, 6 e 8 (1957–1963); F. Rilliet (ed.), Jacques de Sarough: Six homélies festales en prose (PO 43), Turnhout 1986; P. Sony Behnam, La doctrine de Jacques de Saroug sur la création et l'anthropologie, Rome 1989; Th. Kollamparampil, Select Aspects of the Economy of Salvation in Christ According to Jacob of Serug, Rome 1997; Id., Salvation in Christ According to Jacob of Serugh: An Exegetico-Theological Study on the Homilies of Jacob of Serugh (451-521 AD) on the Feasts of Our Lord, Bangalore 2001.

J. Gribomont

JACOB'S LADDER (iconography). The most ancient representation of this event, recorded in Genesis 28, is a picture in the synagogue near *Dura Europos dating back to the mid-3rd c. In a cemeterial area, only one example exists, namely, in the hypogeum of the Via Dino Compagni at Rome (Ferrua, Via Latina, pl. XCVII). Jacob lies on a pile of rocks; the field is indicated by trees. The angels are young, beardless and dressed in tunic and pallium. Lacking is the figure of God at the top of the ladder. The hypogeum is dated from the years 322–360. In miniature form there is only one example, attested in the Pentateuch of *Tours at the beginning of the 7th c., and for the sumptuary arts there is only one example, in the reliquary of Brescia from the 6th c.

J. Kollwitz, Die Lipsanothek von Brescia, Berlin 1933, 28, pl. 2; C.H. Kraeling, The Excavations at Dura Europos, The Synagogue, New Haven 1956, 344, pl. XLIX; J. Porcher, in Id. - J. Hubert - W.F. Volbach, L'Europa delle invasioni barbariche, It. tr., Milan 1968, 128.

A.M. Di Nino

JACOBITE CHURCH. The term "Jacobite," which was originally coined by the Arabs, has today been replaced by neutral names such as "Syrian Orthodox," or, more appropriately, "Syriac Orthodox." Heirs of a rich cultural tradition, the Christians of *Syriac tradition were divided for the first time when the E Syrian region, situated in the interior of the *Sassanid Empire, rejected the results of the Council of Ephesus (431), in which *Nestorius and his *Christology were condemned. The western Syrians, principally situated in the east of the Byzantine Empire, formed their own doctrinal identity in rejecting the conclusions of the Council of *Chalcedon (451), and its definition of the two natures united in the hypostasis of the Word. The Christology formulated at Chalcedon appeared to them to contradict that theorized by *Cyril of Alexandria, of which their two most eminent theologians, i.e., *Severus of Antioch (d. 538) and *Philoxenus of Mabbug (d. 523), were convinced proponents. Thus, as opposed to the other Eastern churches of a national character (Copt, Armenian, Ethiopian, Georgian), the demand for autonomy on the part of the Syriac Orthodox Church was not immediately and essentially the expression of a national sentiment or of a cultural appurtenance, given that Severus had had a Greek education and did not even know Syriac. Paradoxically it was precisely the Hellenization of these Syrian Christians which pushed them to concern themselves with the christological discussions of the Byzantine schools. The periods of peace and prosperity known by the Orthodox Syrians have been obscured by hard trials that mark their history. At certain times the politics of the emperors protected the miaphysites, whether by approaching their christological doctrine, as does the Henoticon of *Zeno (482), or by nominating Severus to the see of *Antioch (512), done by the emperor *Anastasius, who showed himself ready to accept, under the influence of Severus himself, the formula "out of two natures," or, later (531, 535–536), when *Justinian convened two theological conferences to discuss the union, and then when he called the Council of Constantinople II (553), which chose a Neochalcedonian policy. Nevertheless, the pro-Western policy that Justin had adopted starting from his ascension to power (518–527) had been full of consequences for the Syriac Orthodox, since Severus was deposed (518), the greater part of his bishops were exiled and, starting from 521, the monks faithful to him were expelled from their monasteries.

From his exile in Egypt Severus continued to occupy himself with the problems which his followers had to face, establishing a permanent synod with some of the exiled bishops of his faction. The contacts that he had with his followers gathered in the mountains near Mardin had the goal of creating a permanent miaphysite hierarchy. This decision was taken after the failure of the two theological conferences organized by Justinian, when Severus permitted John of Tella to ordain bishops and not only priests and deacons.

The situation risked becoming catastrophic, and the Syriac Orthodox were menaced with true extinction after the deaths of John of Tella (537) and Severus (538), given that the diocese of Antioch had no more bishops. At this point, through the urging of *Arethas, the Arab king of the Ghassanids, and under the pressure of *Theodora, wife of Justinian, the exiled patriarch of *Alexandria, *Theodosius, consecrated *Jacob Baradeus bishop of *Edessa (542–543), and Theodore bishop for the region of the Arabs. Jacob Baradeus was able to give his successors a hierarchical structure, creating thus an autonomous church, which would later (8th–9th c.) carry his name. A convinced proponent of the miaphysite cause, he ordained more than 27 bishops, and a great number of priests, but above all he named *Sergius patriarch of Antioch (557/558–561).

Already during the life of Jacob Baradeus, in the initial period of its existence, the Syriac Orthodox Church was lacerated by schisms. Thus, the successor of Sergius, Paul the Black (Bet Ukkamâ, 564–577), showed sympathy for Chalcedonian orthodoxy, inciting a schism with the Copts. The schism would last for decades and would not be overcome except thanks to the efforts of the patriarch Athanasius I, who, in 615–616, proposed a unified miaphysite theology of Severian inspiration. He founded two metropolitans at Tikrit and Mosul, which he then united into a single one, whose titular bore the name mafrian (which means "fecundator," probably for his power of ordaining bishops and of blessing the myron), and this thanks to the support of Shirin, wife of the king *Chosroes II (d. 628), and of the king's private teacher.

Another schism took place between the followers of Severus and those of *Julian of Halicarnassus and ended in 726, following the decline of the followers of Julian in Syria. After that, there were several schisms of short duration, the first, in the 8th c., following the creation of a rival patriarch to the legitimate one, and the second one, in the 9th c., due to a controversy about the fraction of the eucharistic bread. Even Michael the Great himself (1166–1199) had to tolerate the existence of a rival patriarch for more than a third of his reign. Under the reign of the patriarch Ignatius II (1222–1252) there was a conflict with the patriarch of Alexandria about some legal questions at *Jerusalem, but a compromise was found which allowed the coexistence of two bishops in the same city. Nevertheless, the longest schism, which lasted about two centuries (1292–1499), began out of the territorial division of the patriarchate, and brought about as a consequence the simultaneous existence of three, and later four, patriarchs.

Beyond these internal and interconfessional schisms, the Syriac Orthodox Church has suffered constrictions and pressures from the outside. Persecuted and deprived of legal status by the Byzantines, the Syriac Orthodox welcomed the Arabs, in the 7th c., as liberators. With the new conquerors, they were able to expand freely toward the E, as far as E Asia, to acquire new faithful. They also enjoyed an advantage due to their distance from the cities, which preserved them from the conversion imposed on the Chalcedonians by the Arabs. The latter, although demonstrating at first a tolerant attitude, did not delay in changing their policy, using coercive measures to force Christians to conversion. Thus some churches were transformed into mosques, extra taxes were imposed and the duties which were due from Muslims were doubled for the Christians. The fatal blow was inflicted by the conversion of the Mongols to Shiite Islam (13th c.) and by the invasions of Tamerlane (14th c.); the policy of extermination which followed provoked a great number of conversions of Christians to Islam. The Syriac Orthodox Church lost its literary tradition, and its places of worship and its monasteries were destroyed. At the end of the 16th c. the church did not have more than twenty dioceses and there were only 50,000 families in all. It did not yet enjoy an autonomous status on the legal and civil level, but depended on the Armenian Church of Constantinople until 1882, the date in which it was recognized as an autonomous entity. Nevertheless, despite all the exterior pressures, the Syriac Orthodox knew, in the 9th and 10th c., great personalities on the literary level, and in the 12th c., that which has been called the "Syrian Renaissance," with Dionysius bar Salibi (d. 1171), Michael the Great (d. 1199) and, later, bar-Hebraeus (d. 1286).

The relationships of the Syriac Orthodox Church with the Latin West were established by crusaders, by diplomats, and by missionaries and remained friendly. The first attempts to bring this church back to a union with Rome, including the Council of Florence (1442), were unsuccessful. Even the latest in time, which was organized with the metropolitan of Aleppo, Andrea Akidjan (1662–1677), had no result. Only with the patriarch Michael Jarweh (1783–1800) was a Syriac Catholic Church born with its own separate and permanent hierarchy. Starting from the 19th c. other communities, Protestant and Anglican, converted a small number of Syriac Orthodox Christians. This loss has been compensated by the acquisition of many Mar Thomas Christians from India, of Syro-Eastern confession (1665), even if difficulties of a jurisdictional kind have since arisen between them and the patriarchate from 1902, and these difficulties were resolved only after the initiative of the patriarch Ignatius Jacob III (1958). But again, from 1975, after the nomination of a mafrian from the East, who entered into conflict with the representative of the patriarch, the Christians of India split into a Malankara Syriac Orthodox Church linked to the patriarch, on the one hand, and an autocephalous Malankara Church, on the other. At present the two communities are represented at the World Council of Churches.

The Syriac Orthodox Church has been engaged since 1960 in ecumenical dialogue; it participates with the other non-Chalcedonian churches in the dialogue with the different Christian churches and communities. This dialogue has permitted the formulation of declarations on Christology together with the Catholics (esp. in 1971, 1973, 1988), with the Orthodox (esp. in 1989, 1990, 1993), with the Lutherans (1994) and with the Anglicans (1994). Official declarations on Christology crowned the encounters of the patriarchs of this church with the popes (Paul VI and Ignatius Jacob III, 1971; John Paul II and Ignatius Zakka Iwas, 1984). The Syriac Orthodox Church still maintains dialogue with the Chaldean Church (agreement in 1997) and with the Assyrian Church of the East (1997), and also with all the churches of Syriac tradition, which have been holding common meetings since 1994. The two Syriac Orthodox communities of India conduct on their own and separately a dialogue with Rome and with the Protestants and Anglicans. Presently the patriarchal residence is at Damascus (since 1959), after having known different seats: first in various monasteries, then, in 1924, at Homs. The patriarchs were able to reside at Antioch only for brief periods (in the 8th and in the 13th c.). From 1292 the patriarch bears the name "Ignatius." The church possesses bishoprics in the Middle East (Syria, Iraq and Lebanon) and in Turkey and a patriarchal vicariate in Jerusalem. After emigration to the United States, Canada, Australia and Europe, the church has instituted metropolitans, archbishops or vicars general. It is difficult to make a precise estimate of the number of the faithful, since the statistics presented by the sources vary from 150,000 to 430,000. There are around a million Syriac Orthodox in India, while the Syriac Catholic Church, whose patriarchal residence is in Beirut, counts around 110,000 faithful.

TRE 16, 482-485. E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VIe siècle (CSCO 127 = Sub. 2), Louvain 1951; Id., Le couvent de Barsaumâ et le patriarcat jacobite d'Antioche et de Syrie (CSCO 146 = Sub. 7), Louvain 1954; A. van Roey, Les débuts de l'Église jacobite, in Das Konzil von Chalkedon, II, Würzburg 1953, 339-360; P. Kawerau, Die jakobitische Kirche im Zeitalter der syr. Renaissance. Idee u. Wirklichkeit (BBA 3), Berlin 1960; Id., Ostkirchengeschichte, I, Das Christentum in Asien u. Afrika bis zum Auftreten der Portugiesen im Indischen Ozean (CSCO 451 = CSCO Sub 70), Louvain 1983; W. Hage, Die syr.-jakobitische Kirche in frühislamischer Zeit nach orient. Quellen, Wiesbaden 1966; Fr. Heiler, Die Ostkirchen, Munich-Basel 1971, 336-344, 550-553; D.D. Bundy, Jacob Baradaeus: The State of Research, a Review of Sources and a New Approach: LM 91, 45-86; P. Chalfoun, L'église syrienne catholique et le patriarche Michel Giarvé sous le gouvernement ottoman au XVIIIe siècle: PdO 9 (1979-1980) 205-238; C. Selis, Les Syriens orthodoxes et catholiques, Turnhout 1988; A. de Halleux, Orthodoxes orientaux en dialogue: Irén 64 (1991) 332-357; Id., Lointaines et proches: les Églises non chalcédoniennes: Revue Cath. Intern. Communion 17 (1992) 51-66; LTK[3] 9, 1207-1211 (Chr. Cannuyer).

T. Bou Mansour

JAIRUS (iconography). The miracle of the resurrection of the daughter of Jairus (Mt 9:18-26 // Mk 5:21-43 // Lk 8:40-56) finds rare expression in paleo-Christian monuments. However, the very compromised fresco in the so-called cubiculum clarum of the Roman cemetery of Priscilla (Wp 123,2 = Nestori 1993, 26, n. 25) seems to refer to this episode. One can still make out the lower half of Christ in the act of performing the miracle on the girl, a strip of whose clothing can be seen descending from the sickbed; the piece seems to date back to the 1st half of the 4th c. On the front of a *sarcophagus of *Arles (Ws 1,38) two moments of the event are represented: the servants of Jairus, who announce the death of the girl, and the resurrection. A feminine personage at the feet of Christ can be identified as the mother or, less likely, as the woman with an issue of blood. The scheme is repeated in a very similar way in a sarcophagus in the Museo Pio Cristiano (Ws 123,3 = Rep. 7) and in the ivory casket in the museum of Brescia (J. Kollwitz, Die Lipsanothek, fig. 3). These monuments should be situated in the course of the 4th c.

Wp 296-297; Ws 303-304; J. Kollwitz, Die Lipsanothek von Brescia, Berlin 1933, 23-35; C. Rizzardi, La pisside eburnea del tesoro della cattedrale di Pesaro, Atti del VI Congr. Naz. di Archeologia Cristiana, Pesaro-Ancona 19-23 settembre 1983, Florence 1986, 609-620; C. Joslin Watson, The Program of the Brescia Casket: Gesta International Center of Medieval Art 20 (1981) 283-298; D. Calcagnini, Una scena poco attestata nelle testimonianze del IV secolo: la resurrezione della figlia di Giairo: Studi e Materiali di Storia delle Religioni 59 (1993) 225-245; D. Calcagnini, TIP, 269-270.

F. Bisconti

JAMES the Great. Saint, apostle. Brother of *John the Evangelist, son of Salome (Mt 27:56; cf. Mk 15:40, 16:1) and Zebedee (Mt 10:2 and par.), whose profession as fisherman he followed (Mt 4:21-22), native to Bethsaida Julias (Jn 1:44). Zebedee and his two sons had formed a fishing consortium in the Lake of Gennesaret with the group headed by Simon *Peter (Lk 5:10). They also had dependents (Mk 1:20). The abandonment of the activity of fishing and the renunciation of the business, in which their father Zebedee was a key spokesman, took place after the miraculous catch narrated in Lk 5:4-11, clearly intended to justify the expression, "From now on I will make you a fisher of men." After the choice of Jesus, James appears in certain important scenes: he is present with Peter and John at the resurrection of the daughter of Jairus (Lk 8:51), at the Transfiguration on the mountain (Mt 17:1 and par.) and is very close to Jesus when he suffers in the garden (Mt 26:37 and par.). The last mention of James is in Acts 12:1-3. Herod Agrippa, wanting to suffocate the new Christian sect, but perhaps, more likely, to bind the Sanhedrin more closely to himself, agreed to the physical elimination of James and the imprisonment of Peter. This took place before Easter, around the end of March or the beginning of April in the year 42. The fact that James and Peter were targeted proves that the two were figures of the first rank of Christianity in *Jerusalem. James is the protomartyr of the apostles. According to J. Blinzler (Novum Testamentum 4 [1962] 191, 206), from the reading of Acts 12:1-3 and Jewish documents, the death of James was decreed by the Sanhedrin, of Sadducean inclination, with King Agrippa conniving, on the accusation of mass sedition. Therefore he was not decapitated, but run through with a sword (see Dt 13:15).

Legend has taken possession of the figure of James, but to a lesser degree than the other apostles, given the shortness of his life. *Clement of Alexandria (Hypotyposes, VII, in Eus., HE 11,9) relates the oldest legend: while he was being led to the tribunal for the trial, he converted the slave who accompanied him, with whom he then shared the grace of martyrdom. In the division of the world for evangelization Lydia fell to him (or Lydda in Palestine?). The oldest apocryphal literary testimonies which we possess are the Acts and the Passion of Pseudo-Abdias. These, guided by the gospel, narrate the calling of James; the conversion of two magicians, Hermogenes and Philetus, was suggested by 2 Tim 1:15; 2:17; they relate a long speech filled with biblical citations which partially agree and partially disagree with the Vulgate; the tone and content are polemical. The conjunction of these elements fixes the date of composition around the year 400. The first document which alludes to the preaching of James in *Spain is the Latin version of the Byzantine Breviarium Apostolorum (7th c.). It is an evident interpolation: the Greek original does not contain the information (Lipsius-Bonnet, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, 1884, II, 2, p. 214). The future legendary developments are grafted onto this interpolation. The first document which refers to the translation of the mortal remains of James to Compostella, on the other hand, is the Martyrologium of Florus (808–838) (see Ado [850–860]: Libellus de festivitatibus SS. Apostolorum, PL 123, 183).

BS 6, 363-388; Enc. bibl., Turin 1970, 3, 1012-1015; Cath 6, 252-253; Erbetta II, 541-548; O. Cullmann, Courants multiples dans la communauté primitive. À propos du martyre de Jacques fils de Zébédée: RecSR 60 (1972) 55-68; G. Schneider, Gli Atti degli apostoli, II, Brescia 1986, 127-143.

E. Peretto

JAMES the Great (apocrypha). James son of Zebedee and brother of *John the Evangelist, called the Great, is one of the most important apostles, often named in the books of the NT and the only one whose death (ca. 44) is described in the NT (Acts 12:1-3); *Eusebius also speaks about this event, citing Clement (HE 2,9); this information is taken up again by the writers of the Byzantine area; we find other information in Hippolytus of Thebes and in Epiphanius the Monk. The apocryphal tradition is rather thin. There is a Latin tradition (a Passio maior, independent or integrated into the fourth book of ps.-*Abdias and with some additions in the Liber Calixtinus). The Greek tradition is late and worthless. The Eastern tradition can be reduced to a group of Coptic, Arabic and Ethiopian texts on his apostolate with Peter, and the Armenian is late, with some reference to *Spain (CCAp 3, 267-288). The tradition of the apostolate of James in Spain has its most ancient witnesses in the Breviarium of the Apostles (7th c.) and in *Aldhelm; the rest of the texts, even if there are reminiscences of the patristic authors (to a Pope Leo?), come from the High Middle Ages.

CANT 272-273; BHG 767-768; BHL 4056-4085; BHO 415-422; Gr. text: J. Ebersolt, Paris 1902; It. tr.: Erbetta II, 541-548; Moraldi 2, 575-583; Lipsius 2, 2, 201-228; BS 6, 364-388; LCIK 23-39; R. Plötz, Der Apostel Jacobus in Spanien zum 9. Jahrhundert: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kulturgeschichte Spaniens 30 (1982) 19-145 (bibl.); A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 432-3; M. Starowieyski, Legenda ęw. Jakuba Wiśkszego Apostoła: Warszawskie Studia Teologiczne 8 (1995) 39-96 (bibl., Pol. tr. of the texts on James); Id., La légende de saint Jacques le Majeur: Apocrypha 7 (1996) 193-203; Écrits apocryphes chrétiens. II, ed. P. Geoltrain - J.-D. Kaestli, Paris 2005, 773-778; 935-978.

M. Starowieyski

JAMES the Less. One of the twelve apostles, so called (Mk 15:40) to distinguish him from James the Great, son of Zebedee and of Salome and brother of John (Mt 4:21; Mk 1:19; Lk 5:10) and called before him to the apostolate. Elsewhere "James" is said to be son of Alphaeus (Mt 10:3; Mk 3:18; Lk 6:15), brother of the Lord (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3; Gal 1:19), a pillar of the church of Jerusalem together with Peter and John (Acts 15:13; 21:18; Gal 2:9). Some evangelists (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40, cf. 16:1) mention among the women present at the crucifixion of Jesus a Mary, mother of James and Joseph. The identifications above pose the problem of whether they all refer to the same person. While the Western Fathers identify James with the brother of the Lord, the Greek ones and also *Jerome distinguish him (Eus., HE I, 12; II, 1,2-5; 23,4-20; Epiph., Haer. 88,3; Greg. Nys., Oratio III de Resur.; Jer., Comm. in Is. V, 18,5-6). Gal 1:19 is the oldest testimony which puts the identification in doubt. The title of "brother of the Lord" is never found united to that of "apostle"; the Gospel says that "not even his brothers believed in him" (Jn 7:5). Now, it is not believable that there were also apostles among these "nonbelievers," despite the imperfection of their faith. If that is true, not all of the passages concerning James, brother of the Lord, can be referred to James (Mk 6:3; Mt 13:55; Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; 1 Cor 15:7; Gal 1:19; 2,9; Jas 1:1; Jude 1:1). It was therefore the "brother of Jesus" who enjoyed great authority in the church of Jerusalem and was its head, perhaps in the absence of Peter. Well-liked in the city because of the rigorous observation of the law, he was not disturbed in the persecutions against the Christians. In *gnostic literature James the "brother of Jesus" plays a role of the first rank in particular in the Gospel of Thomas and in the two Apocalypses which bear his name. Jewish-Christian gnosticism discovered in him the perfect gnostic, who reveals what is just. Flavius Josephus (Antiquities XX, 9,1) and Eusebius (HE 2, 23,4-20) identify both the brother of the Lord and the apostle in the James whom Annas had stoned in the year AD 62 during the interregnum between the death of the procurator Festus and the assumption of power by Albinus.

DB 3, 1084-1088; S. Lyonnet, Les témoignages de S. Jean Chrysostome et de S. Jérôme sur Jacques, le frère du Seigneur: RecSR 29 (1939) 335-351; J. Bonsirven, Jacques (Epître de): DBS IV, 783-795; BS VI, 401-410; DACL VII, 2109-2116; Cath VI, 252-257; E. Peretto, La Giustizia, Rome 1977, 10-12, 74-77; var. aus., Le lettere minori (NT, 8), Brescia 1980, 32-34; P.-A. Bernheim, Jacques, frère de Jésus, Paris 1996; C. Gianotto, Giacomo e il giudeocristianesimo antico, in G. Filoramo - C. Gianotto, Verus Israel, Brescia 2001, 108-119; James the Just and the Christian Origins, ed. B. Chillon - C.A. Evans, Leiden 2000.

E. Peretto

JAMES the Lord's Brother (apocrypha). Brother of the Lord, perhaps son of Alphaeus (see *James the Less). James played an important role in the *Jewish-Christian community of *Jerusalem, esteemed by both Jews and Christians, mentioned by St. *Paul, who calls him "pillar of the church" (see Gal 1:19; 2:9; as well as Acts 12:17; 15:13-21—role at the "council of Jerusalem"). He is the author of one of the Catholic Epistles, about whose canonicity certain ancient authors had some doubts (it belonged, acc. to them, to the antilegomenona). His death is described by Hegesippus (Eus., HE 2, 23). The apocryphal tradition about James, which is rather thin, can be divided into two parts: biographical texts and other writings. There is an unpublished Greek passion (BHG 763y). In the 6th book of ps.-*Abdias there is a Latin passion; another passion exists in Coptic (in fragments), Arabic and Ethiopian; there is, furthermore, a Passio in Armenian and another in Georgian. Next to these biographical texts we have the famous infancy Gospel, the Protevangelium of James (Birth of Mary); it is not known exactly why this is attributed to James. There is an Apocalypse of James Brother of the Lord in Coptic and Arabic; a correspondence between James and Clement serves as the introduction to the ps.-Clementine books; another letter of James is found in the 1st codex of the writings of *Nag Hammadi; there is a letter of James to Quadratus in *Syriac; finally we have a Dialogue Between John and James on the Soul.

CANT 274-279, 23, 184, 209, 279; BHG 252-254; BHL 4086-4099; BHO 399-404; BS 6, 401-411; G. Cantinat: Catholicisme 6, 252-259; LCIK 7, 47-51; Lipsius 2, 29-257; var. aus., S. Giacomo Minore, primo vescovo di Gerusalemme, Jerusalem 1962; K. Beyschlag, Das Jakobus-Martyrium: ZNW 56 (1965) 149-178; W. Pratscher, Der Herrenbruder Jakobus und die Jakobus-Tradition, Göttingen 1987; R. Voorst, The Ascents of James. History of a Jewish-Christian Community, Atlanta 1989.

M. Starowieyski

JANUARIAN (4th–5th c.). Concerning the priest Januarian, a contemporary of *Evodius, we know that he wrote a letter to the abbot Valentinus, who had sent some of his religious to consult Januarian on the question of grace. In his letter, Januarian held that both the inchoatio and the perfectio of good works come from God; only the grace of the Redeemer separates anyone from the massa perditionis*. From a trinitarian point of view, his affirmation that the Spirit proceeds from the Father is interesting, even if a little further on Januarian says that the Holy Spirit is of the Father and the Son. Also noteworthy in this letter is the attribution to *Paul of the letter to the Hebrews.

CPL 392; PLS 2, 335-341; PCBE 1, 581-2; G. Morin, Lettres inédites de S. Augustin et du prêtre Januarien dans l'affaire des moines d'Adrumète: RBen 18 (1901) 241-256.

S. Zincone

JANUARIUS and companions (d. 303). Januarius, patron of Naples, was bishop of Benevento under *Diocletian acc. to his passion, and suffered martyrdom with other Christians at Pozzuoli 19 September 303 acc. to the Carthaginian calendar and the Mart. hier. Numerous passiones, composed at different times, narrate the events of the martyrdom. He was supposedly decapitated together with the deacon Sossius (Sosso), and with Festus, Procolus, Desiderius, Eutyches and Acutius. The multiplicity of the topographic indications (Benevento and Pozzuoli) is doubtless indicative of the early spread of the cult of the saint, and perhaps conflates different persons who really existed, but lived in different times and places, all from Campania: at the Council of *Serdica (343) a Januarius, bishop of Benevento, participated, but he is not to be identified with our Januarius. The most ancient source, the letter of the priest Uranius (432), presents him as "bishop and martyr, glory of the church of Naples" (PL 53, 861). The name is inserted in the Mart. hier. (1st recension). The relics, discovered in 432, were transferred to Capodimonte by *John I, bishop of Naples, and gave the name to the catacomb; from there they passed in 831 to Benevento, in 1154 to Montevergine, in 1497 again to Naples. They are famous for the "miracle of St. Januarius" (liquefaction of the blood), attested since 1389.

BS 6, 135-151; DACL 7, 2125-2145; Vies des SS. 9, 395-398; LTK³ 4, 747-773; Cath 6, 345-347; BHL 4115-4119; LCI 7, 54-59; Uranius Presbyter, Epistula de obitu S. Paulini: PL 53, 861a; Gesta episcoporum neapolitanorum: G. Waitz, MGH Scriptores rerum langobardicarum et italicarum saec. VI-IX, Hannover 1873; H. Delehaye, Hagiographie napolitaine: AB 57 (1939) 6-64; D. Mallardo, S. Gennaro e compagni nei più antichi testi e monumenti, Naples 1940; D. Mallardo, Il calendario marmoreo di Napoli, Rome 1947; U.M. Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975; Studi Ianuariani: Campania Sacra 20 (1989) 177-481; Atti del Convegno di studi sulle reliquie di san Gennaro del 16 dicembre 1989, Naples 1990; G. Grieco - M. de Priete, Gennaro, il santo di Napoli, Corle 1992.

V. Saxer

JEROME (ca. 347–419)

I. Life - II. Works.

The first quality of Jerome, as prince of translators, is having transmitted to the West the richness of Greek and Hebrew literature. A second quality, connected to the first, is to have possessed and communicated a literary culture very different from that of the other Latin Fathers. A third quality, not to be overlooked, is a spiritual exegetical and monastic, sensibility, a splendid Origenian inheritance, even if Jerome probably would have been irritated by such a definition. Finally, we remark on the human quality of an impassioned soul, excessive in his likes and dislikes, but certainly out of the ordinary.

I. Life. Eusebius Hieronymus was born on the borders of the Latin world, at Stridon, a Dalmatian fortress (destroyed by the *Goths around 376). His insistence, in his last years, on his own advanced age has caused it to be long maintained that he was born before 331, but this long chronology appears unlikely. After brilliant literary studies at *Rome, where he was also baptized, Jerome sought his fortune at *Trier, at the imperial court. It was there that he allowed himself to be conquered by the Eastern monastic ideal, the echo of which *Athanasius, in his Gallic exile, had conveyed to him. Toward 370, after having renounced a career as a functionary, he joined a group at *Aquileia which shared the same ideal: *Rufinus, *Bonosus, *Chromatius, *Heliodorus. In these years he personally recopied the great Christian classics, *Tertullian, *Cyprian, *Hilary, just as before he had assembled a literary Latin library which would remain one of his resources. The group, however, failed in integrating itself into the local church and dispersed. While Rufinus headed to the Egyptian desert and then with *Melania moved to Jerusalem, Jerome accompanied *Evagrius of *Antioch into Syria and profusely tested his strength in the desert of Chalcis. He practiced Greek, dedicated himself to Hebrew and made the acquaintance of powerful exegetes. But by adhering to the "little church" of *Paulinus, within which he accepted the priesthood (on the condition of not losing his own monastic freedom), he made his own life impossible, whether in the desert or in Antioch. With Paulinus and *Epiphanius of Salamis, his protector, he went to *Constantinople in the hopes of obtaining recognition of the "little church" from the council of 381. Here he entered into friendship with *Gregory of Nazianzus, a peaceful thinker above the partisan battles. Finally they continued in the direction of Rome, to seek the support of *Damasus there. The quick pen of Jerome, his knowledge of the East, his biblical knowledge, his adaptability in supporting the policies of the apostolic see won him the favor of Damasus, who made him his secretary. Meanwhile his monastic and Origenian spirituality opened access to the pious meetings of a group of women of the high nobility, whose donations allowed him from then on to work without material preoccupations. For *Marcella and *Paula, as for Damasus, he saw himself constrained to deepen his familiarity with the Latin, Greek and Hebrew Bible and to make it his specialty.

Jerome had linked himself too much to Damasus and had made too many enemies for him to stay in favor under *Siricius after the death of Damasus: therefore, he departed again, this time for Bethlehem, after a long voyage in the company of Paula, with stops at *Cyprus, Antioch, a systematic visit of the Holy Land, then of monastic and learned Egypt (*Didymus, at *Alexandria). Jerome derived enormous benefit from the library of *Origen and *Eusebius, accessible at Caesarea. He sought further to continue a dialogue, already undertaken at Rome, with some rabbis. Bishop *John of Jerusalem had embraced an Origenist theology: this linked him to Melania and Rufinus, who had established themselves on the Mount of Olives, but opposed him to *Epiphanius and, as a result, to Jerome. The tension grew continually. Around 395 Jerome found himself in a difficult situation, practically excommunicated by the bishop of Jerusalem, menaced with expulsion by the prefect of the praetorium and almost without powerful friends. Nevertheless, he succeeded in reversing the situation, in causing Rufinus to return to the West, in finding support at Rome and esp. at Alexandria, where he made himself useful to *Theophilus, not only against Origenism, but also against *John Chrysostom, involved soon enough in the affair. The bonds of Jerome with Paulinus had always hindered him from sympathizing with *Theodore of Mopsuestia and with his exegetical school, certain qualities of which he must have appreciated. Nor did he offer any sympathy toward *Pelagius and his group, although they had shown in Rome a great interest in his works: when they took refuge in Palestine after 410, their relations with John of Jerusalem were enough to vex Jerome.

These years were darkened by the death of Paula and then of her daughter *Eustochium, by the fall of Rome, by the arrival of the refugees, and by his isolation as an old man. At least his relations with *Augustine, difficult at first due to his sensitivity, became more friendly, as they did with a good number of Western ecclesiastics, who paid homage to his knowledge.

II. Works. 1. Biblical translations. In a timely enough manner the literary education of Jerome caused him to turn his attention to the Bible, and he realized that the existing Latin translations needed a systematic revision. With the support of Damasus (but without an official mandate, as it seems; in any case, this did not concern the entire Bible), he corrected, at Rome, the four Gospels (this is the text of the Vulgate) and the translation of the Psalter (the text has been lost). In Bethlehem he undertook a revision of the Greek Hexapla (the critical text fixed by Origen) of the Psalter (this is the so-called Gallican recension, included in editions of the Vulgate), then of the books of Solomon, Job, the Chronicles, perhaps of others too. But his examination of the erudite labors of Origen and Eusebius, of the translations of Aquila and *Symmachus, and, to a certain degree, of the Hebrew original, led him to go beyond this stage of criticism and to hazard himself on a terrain in which, as a Christian, he found himself entirely alone: a direct translation from the Hebrew original, with the help of the Jewish translations of Aquila and Symmachus. In 393 the Psalter (iuxta hebraeos) and Kings were finished, the Prophets in progress; Ezra, the Chronicles and the books of Solomon would follow. The Octateuch was completed only around 404, Esther the year later. Tobias and Judith were translated with a certain imagination, to please certain friends, but the other Deuterocanonicals he dismissed with a certain disdain. As for the NT outside of the gospels, Jerome did not return personally to his revisions from the Greek (in the absence of a fixed original?), and it was one of his disciples, perhaps *Rufinus the Syrian, who finished the edition which became the Vulgate, adopting the criteria of the teacher and respecting them with even more coherence.

Jerome, in fact, did not always keep to the same method of translation. He adhered to the original particularly in the difficult points, taking inspiration from the translation of Aquila; he took greater liberty in the narrations; he respected the vocabulary and formulas of the Septuagint (through old Latin translations) to a greater degree in more sacred passages, such as prophecies or prayers. Certainly he did not know Hebrew well enough to understand by himself the difficult passages, but he enjoyed excellent guides, lost for us, in the Hexaplar version, which relied faithfully on the Jewish schools. His Latin, already in itself of good quality, had the privileged position to become over time the biblical model for the entire West, to be absorbed and assimilated. It is not possible to understand the influence of the Bible through the centuries unless we know the traditional Greek and Latin translations.

2. The erudite works. Greek culture had prepared indispensable tools. Jerome put many at the disposal of the Christian West, esp. the Chronicle of Eusebius, which had supplied ecclesiastical history with its structural models, in a comparison between sacred history and an awareness of the specifically Mediterranean past. Jerome adapted and continued it up to the year 378. Eusebius, after Origen and others, had also composed Onomastica, dictionaries of names of people and places, with the etymological interpretation so important then. Jerome produced from them a Liber locorum and a Liber nominum. Finally, from the Ecclesiastical History of the same Eusebius he created a De viris illustribus, or guide to Christian literature.

3. Biblical commentaries and theological syntheses. It seems that by his first stay in Antioch Jerome had discovered the Greek exegetes, esp. Origen. The influence of *Gregory of Nazianzus, then the requests of his disciples, reinforced his admiration, and there was a time when he entertained the ambition of translating all of Origen. The controversies with Rufinus and the discovery of the veritas hebraica cooled his enthusiasm, leading him to no longer emphasize his exegetical borrowings and to attack some of the doctrinal theses of Origen. But until the end, his commentaries took a great deal of material from translations of Origenian exegesis.

Starting from 381 he published some homilies of Origen on Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah; at Rome he offered to Damasus, with a lyrical preface, the homilies on the Song of Songs. Toward 390, he translated the homilies on Luke, to discredit *Ambrose's commentary (nourished by Origen); the same motive led him to the translation of Didymus on the Holy Spirit, in 387–390, in confrontation with the analogous treatise of Ambrose. The Treatises on the Psalms of Jerome are also (as V. Peri has recently demonstrated) a translation, even if a little adjusted, of the Selecta in Psalmos of Origen, but we are already post-400 and the name of the author is not mentioned. Other commentaries, at the beginning of the stay in Bethlehem, entail a great deal of adaptation as well as new materials, including commentaries on the letters to Philemon, the Galatians, the Ephesians, Titus and then on Ecclesiastes. The Hebraic Questions on Genesis, dependent to a large part on the Hexaplar material provided by the Origen, took on, around 392, a more Hebraizing orientation and displaced the center of attention. The commentaries on the Prophets, which would later keep Jerome occupied until his death (in an order which was not that of the sacred books: the Twelve Prophets, e.g., do not form a unity; Daniel, which is not based on a commentary but the erudite Stromateis of Origen himself, has an entirely distinct character) combine a textual study based on the Vulgate (supposedly identical to the Hebrew) and Hexaplar translations, with a spiritual study, whose principal source remains Origen. The commentary on Matthew, written rapidly in 398, is rather quite dry and preserves the record of numerous lectures. That on the Apocalypse (uncertain date) does not have a Greek original, and he limits himself to adapting the Latin commentary of *Victorinus of Petovium (d. 304). The homilies on Mark, on the other hand, seem to be a simple adaptation of Origen. A good number of letters, esp. among the older ones, aim at the edification of the addressees and are also inspired from the same Alexandrian sources.

4. Translations of polemical works. Certain letters, dating to the Origenist crisis, also appear to be translations of documents related to current affairs, letters of *Epiphanius of Salamis or, even more, of *Theophilus of Alexandria.

5. Monastic works. On the model of *Athanasius's Life of Anthony, translated by his friend *Evagrius of Antioch, Jerome conceived numerous ideal lives of holy monks: that of *Paul, the mythical predecessor of Anthony; of *Hilarion, a Palestinian disciple of Anthony; of Malchus, a romance which takes place in the desert of Chalcis. The Pachomiana (Coptic rules and catecheses, translated in a rush from a Greek version, after the death of Paula in 404) are on the contrary faithful documents, but not literary.

6. Correspondence. Jerome's gifts made him a brilliant letter writer, rich in biblical erudition and the spiritual treasures of the East, delicate with friends, caustic with enemies, fascinating, given to extremes, brilliant in his versatility. From him around 150 letters survive, beyond numerous others in the form of prefaces to his writings or translations. In the MS tradition these do not constitute a unity. Rather often the traits are forced, but many pages are anthology pieces, which have very often inspired painters.

7. Polemical treatises. From 382, despite the bonds which united the "little church" of Paulinus to *Lucifer of Cagliari, Jerome felt obligated to distance himself from this extremist and published the Altercatio Luciferiani et Orthodoxi. The defense of virginity and of monasticism took place in the Contra Helvidium first, then in the two books Contra Iovinianum, and in both cases, without moderation. Later the Origenist controversy offered the occasion for two works of large scale, also dictated by passion and often unjust: Against John of Jerusalem and Against Rufinus. Finally, in old age, Jerome, champion of monasticism, wrote Against Vigilantius, and then Against the Pelagians. The satirical weapons of all these works are often taken from earlier writers, without necessarily touching on the exact positions of his adversaries.

CPL (ed. 1995) 203-226 [580-642]; PL 22-30; CCL 72-78 (with bibl.); S. Hieronymi presbyteri Opera, 3, Opera polemica. 4, Altercatio Luciferiani et orthodoxi, ed. A. Canellis, Turnhout 2000; CSEL 49 and 54; B. Jeanjean, Saint Jérôme et l'hérésie, Paris 1999; Commentaires de Jérôme sur le prophète Isaïe: Livres XVI-XVIII, texte établi par R. Gryson et C. Gabriel, Freiburg i.B. 1999; Biblia sacra iuxta vulgatam versionem . . . recensuit R. Weber, Stuttgart [2]1975; Patrologia III, 203-233 (with bibl.); Obras completas: edición bilingüe, BAC, Madrid; Studies: TRE 15, 304-315 (Nautin); RAC 15, 117-119 (Hagendahl/Waszink); BBKL 2, 818-821; F. Cavallera, S. Jérôme, Louvain 1922; F.X. Murphy, A Monument to St. Jerome: Essays on Some Aspects of His Life, Works and Influence, New York 1952; P. Nautin, RHE 56 (1961) 33-35; 69 (1974) 365-394; 74 (1979) 5-12; REAug 18 (1972) 209, 218; 19 (1973) 69-86; 20 (1974) 251-284; J. Steinmann, Hieronymus, Ausleger der Bibel, Cologne 1961; P. Antin, Recueil sur saint Jérôme, Brussels 1968; J.N.D. Kelly, Jerome. His Life, Writings and Controversies, London 1975; V. Peri, Omelie origeniane sui Salmi, Vatican City 1980; P. Hamblenne, Jérôme et le clergé du temps: idéaux et réalités: Augustinianum 37 (1997) 351-410; E. Prinzivalli, "Sicubi dubitas, Hebraeos interroga": Girolamo tra difesa dell'"Hebraica veritas" e polemica antigiudaica: AnSE 14 (1997) 179-206; A. Fürst, Augustins Briefwechsel mit Hieronymus, Münster 1999; A. Canellis, Les rapports de Paulin de Nole avec Jérôme au-delà de 400: la "Lettre" 39 de Paulin et le "Commentaire sur Joël" 1, 4 de Jérôme: Augustinianum 39 (1999) 311-335; R.E. Heine, Recovering Origen's Commentary on Ephesians from Jerome: JTS 51 (2000) 478-514; G. Folliet, Tertullien, Jérôme et Augustin témoins latins de versions grecques différentes de Ps. 71, 18-19 (LXX): RBen 110 (2000) 181-198; B. Clausi, Ridar voce all'antico padre: l'edizione erasmiana delle "Lettere" di Gerolamo, Soveria Mannelli 2000; B. Conring, Hieronymus als Briefschreiber: ein Beitrag zur spätantiken Epistolographie, Tübingen 2001.

J. Gribomont

JEROME of Jerusalem (beginning 8th c.). From the works of Jerome, described as a priest of Jerusalem, two fragments have reached us: one from a dialogue on the Trinity between a Jew and a Christian, and another in defense of the veneration of the Cross. The second fragment is preserved by John of Damascus in the florilegium in his third treatise in defense of icons, and in the florilegium attached by Pope Hadrian I to his letter to the Byzantine emperor, in response to his invitation to the seventh ecumenical council. The brief fragment on the veneration of the Cross does not reveal a particularly coherent discussion, but refers to the veneration of liturgical objects in the OT.

CPG 7815; PG 40, 847-865; Mansi, 12, 1070-1072; B. Kotter, Die Schriften des Iohannes von Damaskos III (PTS 17), Berlin 1975, 194; H.G. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre (TU 139), Berlin 1992, 364. Translations: Ger.: H.G. Thümmel, op. cit., 144; Eng.: D. Anderson, St John of Damascus, On the Divine Images, Crestwood, NY 1980, 103-104; It.: V. Fazzo, Giovanni Damasceno, Difesa delle immagini sacre, Rome 1983, 185-186; Vedere l'invisibile, Nicea e lo statuto dell'immagine, ed. L. Russo, Palermo 1997, 23. Studies: P. Battifol, Jérôme de Jérusalem d'après un document inédit: Revue des questions historiques 39 (1886) 148-255 (argues for a single treatise); H.G. Thümmel, op. cit., 144-145 (argues against a single treatise); E. Amann in DTC 8 (1924) 983-985.

A. Louth

JERUSALEM

I. History of the Christian community - II. Liturgy - III. Patristic interpretations - IV. Archaeology - V. Councils.

I. History of the Christian community. Conquered by the Romans in 63 BC, Jerusalem experienced a period of particular prosperity under the reign of Herod the Great, who built there a theater, his royal palace, the Antonia fortress, parks and fountains, and began the rebuilding of the temple, which was completed AD 63 (Flavius Josephus, Ant. 20,9,7; Jo 2,20). From texts of the NT themselves it is clear that the first Christian community began its preaching at Jerusalem and suffered the first persecutions there: a first, in which Stephen was martyred (Acts 8:1), probably under the prefect Marcellus (ca. 36–37), and a second, under the king Herod Agrippa (ca. 44), in which James son of Zebedee met his death (Acts 12:1-19). While the first persecution, aimed esp. against the Hellenist members of the community, led to the evangelization of Judea and of Samaria by Christians who had fled from Jerusalem (Acts 8:1-8), the second probably provoked the definitive departure of Peter (Acts 12:17). While Tiberius Julius Alexander was procurator (46–48), the famine which struck the Mediterranean world (Acts 11:28) perhaps gave the occasion to Barnabas and Paul to go up to Jerusalem to bring the collection gathered at Antioch (Acts 11:29-30; 12:25). After the death of Herod (44), the leadership of the community passed to *James, until he too was martyred in 62 as a result of the persecution unleashed against him by the high priest Annas in a moment in which the post of Roman governor was vacant because of the death of Festus.

This early Jerusalem community consisted of the apostles, seven members dedicated to "service" (a term with which a rather broad activity is indicated, which embraced the fields of charity and of evangelization: Acts 21:8), the presbyters (Acts 11:30), assistants of the apostles also in taking decisions (Acts 15:2) and in liturgical activity (Jas 5:14), and prophets (Acts 15:32). In the summer of 49 the encounter among the apostles and the elders took place in which it was decided that the Christians coming from paganism did not need to undertake circumcision and the observance of the Mosaic law, as had been proposed by Paul and Barnabas (Acts 15:2-12; Gal 2:1-10): this meeting is known as the "Council of Jerusalem."

The first open revolt of the Jews of Palestine against Rome broke out under Nero (66–70), and acc. to *Eusebius (HE 3,5,3) it was in this period that the Christians of Jerusalem fled to Pella in Perea. They were not in the city, therefore, when it was besieged by *Titus in the spring of 70: the temple was destroyed the 10th of the month of Ab (August) and the entire city sacked and razed to the ground in September (Flavius Josephus, De bel. iud. 6,4,3-7), only three towers remaining erect. The priestly class disappeared. Jerusalem remained under the control of a Roman garrison (X Fretensis), but little by little a few Jews and Christians returned to live there, as shown by the evidence offered by ossuaries and tombs of the time. The Sanhedrin, in any case, was transferred to Jamnia. A second revolt (132–135), provoked either by the plan of *Hadrian to build a Greco-Roman city on the site of Jerusalem and to replace the temple with a sanctuary in honor of Jupiter (Dio Cassius, Hist. Rom. 69,12,1-2) or by an edict, also from the emperor, which prohibited circumcision (Vita Hadriani 14,2), led to the definitive destruction of Jerusalem, which gave way to a Roman colony named Aelia Capitolina of the province Syria Palaestina, a Hellenistic-Roman city in honor of the emperor Aelius Hadrian (Chron. Pasch.: PG 92, 615). It was further decreed that no Jew could even enter the zone around the city anymore, in order that none would be able to see it even from far away (Tertull., Adv. Iud. 13,3-4; Eus., HE 4,6; Praep. ev. 7,8,40). It seems that the edict of Hadrian was not always completely obeyed by the Jews, who managed on various occasions to make pilgrimages to Jerusalem and also to remain there. These must have been isolated cases, however, if *Origen still mentions how, at his time, the Jews did not inhabit Jerusalem (Hom. 21,1 in Ios.; cf. also Tertull., Adv. Iud. 13,28; Jer., In Matth. 23,38; 24,15; Aug., Civ. Dei 16,21; En. in ps. 124,3). Jewish religious life no longer took place at Jerusalem. The historic fact of the destruction of the temple and the fall of Jerusalem is often mentioned in Christian contexts, esp. in relation to the NT prophecies which refer to it: Orig., Hom. 38 in Lc.; Cyr. Jer., Catech. 10,11; Jer., In Matth. 24,1-2; John Chrys., Comm. in Gal. 2,6; Hom. 76 in Matth.

After 70, the Christian community had meanwhile returned to live in Jerusalem, but information is scarce. Eusebius gives the list of bishops who succeeded until Hadrian (ca. 132), mentioning their common origin from Judaism: Simon, Justus, Zacchaeus, Tobias, Benjamin, John, Matthias, Philip, Seneca, Justus, Levi, Ephrem, Joseph, Judas (HE 4,5; Cyr. Jer., Catech. 14,15; Epiph., Haer. 20). According to the witness of Hegesippus (Eus., HE 4,22) Simon was a cousin of the Lord and was martyred probably because of the accusations raised against him by certain Judaizing heretics (HE 3,22). After the destruction of Jerusalem by Hadrian and the following prohibition for Jews to return there, the bishops were all of ethno-Christian origin. It is again Eusebius who reports the list (HE 5,12): Marcus, Cassian, Publius, Maximus, Julian, Gaius I, Symmachus, Gaius II, Julian, Capito, Valens, Dolichianus, Narcissus. With Narcissus the data become more precise and more rich with details: his presidency, together with *Theophilus of Caesarea, of the episcopal meeting held in Palestine toward 190 on the occasion of the Easter controversy is mentioned (HE 5,23-25), as are miracles he performed and his abandonment of his episcopal see to dedicate himself to ascetic and to avoid certain calumnies which later turned out to be unfounded. Thus Dios was consecrated in his place, who was succeeded by Germanio and Gordius. Under the latter Narcissus reappeared; he was invited to return to his charge but, because of old age, wanted to associate to himself Alexander (HE 6,11-12), who died in prison at Caesarea, where he confessed the faith under *Decius (HE 6,39). He was succeeded, before the persecution of *Diocletian, by Mazabenes, Hymenaeus (HE 7,14), Zambdas and Hermon (HE 7,32). From 132 to 135 Jerusalem was officially a pagan city (Jer., Ep. 58,3), and it remained thus until the arrival of *Constantine, when it began to acquire a more properly Christian appearance (Cyr. Jer., Catech. 13,7): basilicas were built on the most important sites which recorded precise moments of the life of Christ and of the first community, the liturgy began to acquire a central post in public life, and pilgrimages became more frequent. Monasteries were built in Jerusalem itself, beyond those, already numerous, which existed around the city and in all Palestine.

An outline of the situation of the church of Jerusalem with respect to doctrinal aspects is found in the synodal letter sent in 400 from the bishops of Palestine to *Theophilus of Alexandria concerning the measures to be adopted during the Origenist controversy (Jer., Ep. 93; Mansi III, 989), while other details can be gleaned from the reports of the conference which was called at Jerusalem in 415 by the bishop John to calm the polemics raised by *Orosius and *Jerome concerning the preaching of *Pelagius (Oros., Apol. 3-7; Aug., Gest. Pelag. 55; Mansi IV, 307). The position of the bishop, who had never been a metropolitan but nevertheless enjoyed a particular dignity, was acknowledged by can. 7 of the Council of *Nicaea, where, however, the superiority of the metropolitan of Caesarea was declared (Mansi I, 670). Later, the orthodox faith maintained during the *Arian crisis by the bishops Macarius (who had taken part in the Council of Nicaea) and Maximus —who, although he had signed the condemnation of *Athanasius at Tyre in 335 (Ruf., HE 1,7), reconvened a synod at Jerusalem in 346 to receive him with solemnity (Athan., Hist. Ar. ad mon. 28; Mansi III, 174)—in contrast to the pro-Arian tendencies of the metropolitans Eusebius and Acacius, and the fame of Cyril besides, certainly contributed to the growing authority and prestige which the church of Jerusalem enjoyed also with respect to Caesarea. Jerome reprimanded *John II, who succeeded Cyril in 386, for wanting to possess an independent apostolica cathedra (Ep. 72,10), but it was above all *Juvenal who tried to make the church of Jerusalem autonomous, ordaining bishops on his own initiative in Phoenicia and in Arabia. In 431 he unsuccessfully presented apocryphal documents to the Council of Ephesus which were intended to demonstrate the validity of the rights claimed for his church (Leo M., Ep. 119); later, in 451, at Chalcedon, he renewed the request to ascend to a patriarchate, and he obtained this, freeing himself from the jurisdiction of Antioch and annexing the three provinces of Palestine: *Caesarea, *Scythopolis and *Petra. Having returned to his see after the council (452), Juvenal clashed with the monks, a part of the clergy and the laypeople, who accused him of having adhered to the "apostasy" of Chalcedon and betrayed communion with Alexandria (Zacc. Rhet., HE 3): constrained to take refuge at *Constantinople, leaving the see to the usurper Theodosius, Juvenal was able to return there only in 453 thanks to a decree of *Marcian. But Juvenal was succeeded in 458 by Anastasius, openly *monophysite, who signed the encyclical of condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon (Evagr., HE 3,5) circulated by the emperor *Basiliscus for all the bishops to sign, above all to restore peace with the monastic environment. Pushed by the same motives, his successor Martyrius agreed to adhere to the Henoticon (Evagr., HE 3,16), and this position seems to have been followed by the bishop Sallustius, who succeeded him in 486. After the death of the latter, however, his successor *Elias renewed relationships with Constantinople (Cyr. Scyth., Vita Sab. 50) and, although officially adhering to the Henoticon, showed a faith close to that of Chalcedon. This led him to refuse communion with *Severus of Antioch, successor of Flavian and a fervent monophysite. The latter succeeded in getting him exiled in 516 to Aila (op. cit., 56), and in his place John III was named (Theophanes C., Chron.: PG 108, 368), who, after having agreed, as a condition for his consecration, to anathematize the Chalcedonian Creed, was convinced by the monks Sabas and Theodosius not to keep his promise and, despite a period in prison, succeeded in bringing the faith of Chalcedon back to Jerusalem thanks to the strength demonstrated by the monks, almost all of whom had by then returned to orthodoxy (Cyr. Scyth., op. cit., 56). After the synod called at Constantinople in 518 by the emperor *Justin to restore Chalcedonian orthodoxy, a synod of approbation was held at Jerusalem 6 August (op. cit., 60). Another took place 19 September 536 under the patriarchate of *Peter, successor to John, to adhere to the newly antimonophysite conclusions of the synod called at Constantinople by *Justinian on 2 May (Mansi VIII, 1164-1176). Later, when Justinian in 543 wanted to have his edict of condemnation of the so-called *Three Chapters approved, the patriarch Peter refused, in as much as he found it contrary to Chalcedon (Facund., Defens. 14,4), and only because he was constrained did he finally sign it. Peter died in 552 in the middle of the *Origenist crisis. The faction of the Origenist monks had split into two and the sect of the *isochrists had elected Macarius (552), whom, however, Justinian almost immediately replaced with Eustochius. The latter sent three representatives to the Council of Constantinople of 553 and later had its decrees approved in a synod which was held in Jerusalem that same year (Cyr. Scyth., op. cit., 90).

During the pontificate of *Gregory the Great the church of Jerusalem was governed by Isaac (having succeeded *John IV, responsible for an attempt at rapprochement between the Armenian Church and orthodoxy). Isaac, the addressee of various letters from the pope, was exhorted by him to eliminate simoniacal practices that had become routine, and, thanks to frequent economic aid which Gregory sent, he built a hospice at Jerusalem for the pilgrims who were visiting Palestine in ever-greater numbers, going as far as Sinai (John Deac., S. Greg. papae vita 2,52). In 609 *Zacharias succeed him, under whose patriarchate, while *Heraclius was emperor, the Persian invasion took place. Led by Shahrbaraz, the Persians reached Jerusalem and besieged it: the city was taken 5 May 614, partially through the help provided by the Jews. Zacharias was led into exile in Persia (Chron. Pasch.: PG 92, 988), and the abbot *Modestus was installed in his place; furthermore, the relics of the cross which were preserved in Jerusalem (Cyr. Jer., Catech. 13,4) were taken into Persia, and only in 630, with the liberation from Persian domination, were they led back by Heraclius into the city with a solemn ceremony (Niceph., De reb. post Maur. Gest.: PG 100, 913; Rab. Maurus, Hom. 70). Jews were again forbidden access to Jerusalem (Theophanes C., Chron.: PG 108, 677). After the death of Modestus there were three years of sede vacante, and thereafter the monk *Sophronius was elected patriarch, a strenuous opponent of *monoenergism. The list of patriarchs given by Nicephorus finishes with him (PG 100, 1036-1040). He convened a synod at Jerusalem in the last months of 634, during which a letter was composed to send to *Honorius, a true and proper profession of faith affirming the doctrine of the two natures (Mansi XI, 831-853). During the Arab invasion the cross was transported from Jerusalem to Constantinople. The caliph Omar, who had besieged the city, was able to enter peacefully in 638, thanks to the mediation of Sophronius (Theophanes C., Chron.: PG 108, 693).

DHGE 27, 1074-1145; DACL 7, 2304-2346; RAC 17, 32-718; Fedalto 2, 999-1013; J. Verheyden, The Flight of the Christians to Pella: EThL 66 (1990) 368-384; The Book of the Acts in Its First Century Setting, IV. Palestinian Setting, ed. R. Bauckham, Grand Rapids, MI 1995; G. Alon - G. Levi, The Jews in Their Land in the Talmudic Age, Cambridge, MA 1984; K. Armstrong, Jerusalem: One City, Three Faiths, New York 1997; J. Wilkinson, Gerusalemme la Città Santa, Rome 1999; G. Acquaviva, La chiesa-madre di Gerusalemme. Storia e risurrezione del giudeocristianesimo, Casale Monf. [2]2000; N. Belayche, The Pagan Cults in Roman Palestine, Tübingen 2001; J.W. Drijvers, Cyril of Jerusalem: Bishop and City, Leiden 2004.

D. Stiernon

II. Liturgy. The sources, not numerous, for knowledge of the liturgical life of Jerusalem are diverse and from different times, reflecting its evolution. Among the principal sources, the following should be mentioned: the homilies of *Origen given at Jerusalem before 250, the Catecheses of Cyril and John, and the Peregrinatio Egeriae, the *Armenian and *Georgian liturgical MSS (5th–8th c.), the liturgical sermons of *Hesychius and *Sophronius (d. ca. 638) and the Syro-Palestinian lectionary. Some of these texts put in especial relief the most specific aspect of the Jerusalem liturgy: the reenactment of the salvation history celebrated in the same places where that history took place (Cyr. Jer., Catech. 13,4,38-39; 14,22; 16,4; Peregr. Eg., CSEL 39, 82-86). Thus we have the appearance of basilicas wherever it was thought that a certain episode of the life of Christ or of other personages of the OT and the NT had taken place. The basilica of the Holy Sepulchre, built by *Constantine and inaugurated 13 September 335 under the bishop *Maximus (335–348), the date also of the tricennalia of Constantine, was important: the feast lasted eight days, and its development was influenced by Jewish traditions. Further, following the numerous discoveries of bodies of prophets and martyrs which took place in the 5th c., places of worship and occasions for individual liturgical celebrations were multiplied. Among these discoveries, the uncovering of the remains of *Stephen at Kefar Gamala, on the outskirts of Jerusalem, aroused extraordinary interest (Aug., Tract. in Jo. 120,4) thanks also to the description which the priest Lucian made of it, translated into *Latin by the priest *Avitus (Gennad., Vir. ill. 47). Often even theological controversies had repercussions on the liturgy: thus it seems that the feast of the *Theotokos, 15 August, was born after the Council of *Ephesus; *Juvenal of Jerusalem (424–457) introduced the feast of Christmas on 25 December certainly before 453, when he was deposed. The *monophysites opposed it for doctrinal motives, and it was in fact abolished, leaving only that of *Epiphany. In the feast on 25 December the human birth of Christ is celebrated, while at Epiphany the divine one; that meant separating the two natures in Christ and admitting two sons and hence falling into *Nestorianism. In the 6th c. there was still no Christmas at Jerusalem: there is the evidence of Nicephorus, Cosmas Indicopleustes and *Abraham of Ephesus, who in a homily of 553 talks about the Annunciation (see M. van Esbroeck: AB 86 [1968] 351-371). Many liturgical practices, in which pilgrims had taken part, spread also in their home regions.

DACL 7, 2374-2391; RAC 17, 706-712; H. Leeb, Die Gesänge im Gemeindegottesdienst von Jerusalem (vom 5. bis 8. Jahrhundert), Vienna 1970; G. Winkler, Einige Randbemerkungen zum österlichen Gottesdienst in Jerusalem vom 4. bis 8. Jahrhundert: OCP 39 (1973) 481-490; S. Janeras, À propos de la catéchèse XIV[e] de Cyrille de Jérusalem: Ecclesia Orans 3 (1986) 307-318; J.F. Baldovin, The Urban Character of Christian Worship: The Origins, Development, and Meaning of Stational Liturgy, Rome 1987; Id., Liturgy in Ancient Jerusalem, Bramcote 1989; J. Schwartz, The Encaenia of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Temple of Solomon and the Jews: TZ 43 (1987) 265-281; G. Kretschmar, Festkalender und Memorialstätten Jerusalems in altkirchlicher Zeit: Zeitsch. der Deutschen Palästina-Verein 87 (1971) 167-205; Id., Jerusalemer Heiligtumstraditionen in altkirchlicher und frühislamischer Zeit, Wiesbaden 1988; G. Winkler, Ungelöste Fragen im Zusammenhang mit den liturgischen Gebräuchen in Jerusalem: Handes Amsorya 101 (1987) 303-315; E. Bermejo Cabrera, La proclamación de la Escritura en la liturgia de Jerusalén. Estudio terminológico del "Itinerarium Egeriae," Jerusalem 1993; Ch. Renoux, Origène dans la liturgie de l'Église de Jérusalem: Adamantius 5 (1999) 37-52; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Anaphora of Catecheses Mystagogicae 5 and the Birkat ha-Mazon: A Study in Development: Augustinianum 45 (2005) 309-347.

Armenian Lectionary of Jerusalem: A. Renoux, Le codex arménien Jérusalem 121. I. Introduction aux origines de la liturgie hiérosolymitaine, lumières nouvelles, PO 35,1, Turnhout 1969; A. Renoux, Le codex arménien Jérusalem 121. II. Édition comparée du texte et de deux autres manuscrits, Turnhout 1971; C.

Renoux, Les lectionnaires arméniens, in La lecture liturgique des Épîtres catholiques dans l'Église ancienne, ed. C.-B. Amphoux - J.-P. Bouhot, Lausanne 1996, 53-74; C. Renoux, Le lectionnaire de Jérusalem en Arménie: Le Čašocʻ, 3 vols., Turnhout 1989-2004.

Georgian Lectionary of Jerusalem: M. Tarchnischvili, Le grand lectionnaire de l'Église de Jérusalem (Ve-VIIIe siècle). I-II (CSCO 188-189, 204-205; Iber. 9-10, 13-14), Louvain 1959-1960.

Syro-Palestinian Lectionary: A. Smith Lewis, A Palestinian Syriac Lectionary, Containing Lessons from the Pentateuch, Job, Proverbs, Prophets, Acts, and Epistles, with critical notes by E. Nestle and a glossary by M.D. Gibson (Studia Sinaitica 6), London 1897; F.C. Burkitt, The Old Lectionary of Jerusalem: JTS 24 (1923) 415-424.

D. STIERNON

III. Patristic interpretations. The name Jerusalem is interpreted in Jewish contexts as "God has seen" (Gen 22:14; cf. also Jub. 18,10; Gen. Rab. 56,10; Tos. Berakot 1,15) or, referring to Gen 14:18, "vision of peace" (Joseph., Ant. I, 180; VII, 67). It is above all this second meaning which is taken up by the patristic tradition (Orig., Hom. 13 in Ier.; Aug., Civ. Dei XIX, 11) and referred either to the church (Greg. M., In Ezech. 8,6) or to the individual soul (Orig., Com. Jo. 10,28,174.176; Hom. 13 in Ier.; Prosper of Aquitaine, Exp. Ps. 124,5; Greg. M., In Ezech. 12,25). Its name "Daughter of Zion" (Is 1:8) is explained by *John Chrysostom in a purely geographic sense: "Since it is set at the base of the mountain," while that of "city of justice, faithful metropolis" (Is 1:26), never historically attributed to it, is justified in view of its future condition (Com. Is. I, 4.9). The destruction of the temple and the fall of the entire city are often interpreted in both Jewish and Christian contexts as punishments willed by God because of the sins of Israel, which for the Jews are the neglect of the sabbath and the recitation of the Shema (Shab. 119b), greed for money, failure to practice justice (Strack-Billerbeck, I, 366.937; II, 253), while for the Christians they are summarized in the refusal to accept Christ (Tertull., Adv. Iud. 13,26-28; Adv. Marc. 3,23; Orig., Hom. 13,1 and 19,14 in Ier.; Didymus, In Zacch. 4,190-192; Jer., In Matth. 23,38; Ep. 46,5; John Chrys., Hom. 76,1 in Matth.; Aug., Civ. Dei XVII, 10); the saying of Mt 12:25-26 is also understand allegorically as a referrence to the destruction of Jerusalem (Chrom., In Mat. tract. 49,5). The prophecies relative to the destruction of Jerusalem could, however, also refer to the persecutions suffered by the Christians (Cypr., Fort. 11) or to the soul in sin (Orig., Hom. Lc. 38,3-4). But it is above all the referrences to the "new Jerusalem" (Rev 21:2) or the "celestial Jerusalem" (Heb 12:22), which suggest to the Fathers the connection with the church, whether in its earthly dimension (Prosper of Aquitaine, Exp. Ps. 121,7), or in its eschatological one (Quodvultdeus, Liber prom. 3,3). Most of the prophetic texts which mention Jerusalem are referred by Christian interpreters to the church when it is a matter of salvation, to the historic city when they announce its punishment: thus Is 1:1-4 (John Chrys., Com. Is. II, 1), Is 54:1, cited in Gal 4:27 (John Chrys., Com. Gal. 4,4), Ez 16:4 (Chrom., In Mt. tract. 18,2, where Jerusalem is compared to the synagogue), numerous passages from Zechariah (Cyr. Alex., Com. Zac. 15.92-93.96). The Jerusalem named in the OT, since it is earthly, belongs to the OT, but as an image of the celestial Jerusalem belongs to the NT (Aug., Ser. 4,9). *Tertullian mentions a tradition, which he also knows from pagan testimonies, acc. to which, during the expedition of *Septimus Severus against the Parthians (197–198), a city remained suspended in the sky for 40 days, in Judea, which he identifies with the Jerusalem seen in a vision by Ezekiel (48:30-35) and by John (Rev 21:10): this is supposed to be the church, which will descend from the sky after the resurrection in the millenaristic kingdom (Adv. Marc. 3,24,3-5). The "new Jerusalem," as a figure of the church which receives believers coming from every race, is symbolized by the cloth which Peter saw come down from the sky acc. to Acts 10 (Chrom., Serm. 3,6), while the "Jerusalem from above" (Gal 4:26) represents God the Father and the celestial world of the souls which Jesus leaves when from the "divine condition" he becomes human (Orig., Com. Mt. 14,17; Hom. Ier. 10,7). *Augustine clarifies in how many ways the scriptural passages concerning Jerusalem must be interpreted: these can refer sometimes to the terrestrial Jerusalem, sometimes to the celestial one, sometimes to both; but while he gives examples of the first and last case (resp. 2 Kgs 12:1 and Jer 31:31-33), he does not offer any example for the second, suggesting that everything which is said of the terrestrial Jerusalem means something which through allegorical interpretation can also refer to the celestial Jerusalem (Aug., Civ. Dei XVII, 3). The double Greek transcription of the Hebraic name Jerusalem attested in the Gospels, Hierosolyma and Ierousalēm, is interpreted by the gnostic *Heracleon as referring to the two natures, psychic and hylic, a distinction which Origen reflects, although in an orthodox sense (C. Io. 10,131.210).

G. Fohrer - E. Lohse, Σιών κτλ: TDNT 7, 292-338; F.-M. Abel, Histoire de la Palestine, Paris 1952; J. Wilkinson, Jerusalem Pilgrims Before the Crusades, London 1977; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980 (with extensive bibl., 17-32); G. Sgherri, Chiesa e sinagoga nelle opere di Origene, Milan 1982, 407-414; Gerusalemme: Misc. C.M.

Martini, Brescia 1982; B. Lifschitz, Jérusalem sous la domination romaine: ANRW 2, 8, 444-489; Y. De Andia, Jérusalem, cité de Dieu, dans l'Adversus Haereses d'Irénée de Lyon, in Pleroma. Miscelanea en homenaje al p. Antonio. Orbe, ed. E. Romero Pose, Santiago de Compostela 1990, 281-298; P.W.L. Walker, Holy City, Holy Places?: Christian Attitudes to Jerusalem and the Holy Land in the Fourth Century, Oxford 1990; var. aus., L'idea di Gerusalemme nella spiritualità cristiana del medioevo, Vatican City 2003.

F. Cocchini

IV. Archaeology. The present city occupies the plan decided on by Hadrian in 135, when he changed its name to Colonia Aelia Capitolina. Some investigations undertaken in the locality called Golgotha or Calvary and on the hill of Zion have revealed remains prior to the 4th c., when the construction of different sanctuaries began. On the occasion of restorations at the Holy Sepulchre a small cave was discovered on the E side of Golgotha, which ancient documents put in relation with the veneration of Adam already from the first centuries. In excavations in front of this cave there has been confirmation of the report of the sources concerning Hadrian's confiscation of the area in order to substitute pagan myths for Christian worship: pagan objects have been recovered, among them a small altar (Bagatti - Testa, Il Golgota, 35-40). On Zion, the traditional "tomb of David" had a second story; thanks to a small survey, it has been verified that it was built in the Constantinian era on the remains of a 1st-c. building. The arrangement on two levels calls to mind the two separated areas of *Dura Europos: one for the recitation of ritual prayers and baptism, the other for the eucharistic meal (Bagatti, Alle origini della Chiesa. I, 124-129). Of the buildings built in the Constantinian era, the most imposing was that built over the tomb of Christ. From the complex, which stretched from the Cardo Maximus of the city to the tomb of Christ and which included a basilica of five aisles, a portico which enclosed Calvary and the "rotunda" of the Anastasis, there remains part of the latter with a narthex to the E and three apses to the E, S, and W extending from the perimeter, which was polygonal in shape outside and circular inside. The building enclosed the Tomb of the Lord, today almost invisible, and was well lit by large windows arched at the top. Today there remains a stretch of wall reused in the Constantinian edifices, which from the cardo allowed access to the basilica of the martyrium, visible only in a small fragment of the apse (Corbo, Il Santo Sepolcro). On the Mount of Olives the Constantinian church of the Eleona, on a rectangular plan, has been rediscovered at the level of wall foundations (Vincent - Abel, Jérusalem, 337-360; Ovadiah, Corpus, 82-83), having risen above a cave which for centuries was the object of veneration (Testa, Grotte dei Misteri: SBF 14 [1964] 106-108; 117-8; 138-141). The church has, on the side, a room decorated with a mosaic of geometric designs and, in the middle, a quadratic basin which could be considered a baptistery contemporaneous to the church itself. At Gethsemane there are plans and remains of churches built in the 4th c., including the first example of a three-aisled basilica with three apses (Ovadiah, Corpus, 84-5), and at Bethany, where the hall with three aisles, adorned with mosaic flooring in geometric designs, appears rebuilt on the same spot in the 6th c., displaced 13 m [42.7 ft] toward the E and with almost the same plan, near the tomb of Lazarus. An atrium divided the two holy places, much like at the Holy Sepulchre. The tomb had been venerated beforehand as well. The Church of the Ascension, contrary to what has been thought, had a circular plan with radial reinforcements, while the octagonal plan derives from the Middle Ages (Corbo, Ricerche, 97-114). On the S flank, a little oratory rises next to a tomb which is thought to be that of *Melania. To the 5th c. should be attributed also the churches of St. Stephen, on a rectangular plan with polygonal apse (Vincent - Abel, Jérusalem, 743-804; Ovadiah, Corpus, 77-78); St. John the Baptist, with a three-apse plan preceded by the narthex, above which in the Middle Ages was built another on the same plan (Vincent - Abel, Jérusalem, 642-668; Ovadiah, Corpus, 78-79); and the Tomb of the Virgin, which might go back as far as the 4th c., with apse toward the W and tomb of Mary in the center. A second apse was added to the E in the 6th c., when another church, later completely destroyed, was built above (Vincent - Abel, Jérusalem, 821-831; Bagatti - Piccirillo - Prodomo, New Discoveries). To the 1st decades of the 5th c. one must date the Church of the St. Sion, which bordered or enclosed the building of the Last Supper. The basilica of Shiloah goes back to the 6th c. (Vincent - Abel, Jérusalem, 860-864), as does that of the bath of Bethesda, built partly above a cave which supposedly had been used for the veneration of Solomon already for centuries. The church is bordered by a chapel adorned with a mosaic of a jeweled cross. From the large Church of St. Mary (the Nea), commissioned by *Justinian and dedicated in 543, only the apse and the SE corner remain and, nearby, cisterns which were part of the installations built around the church and an inscription which speaks of Justinian. On the SW slopes of Mount Zion there are the remains of a monastery and of a Byzantine church, built on the remains of that which is traditionally considered the house of Caiaphas where Jesus was brought and where the episode of the triple denial of Peter also took place. Tombs excavated on the slope of the Mount of Olives in the period of the 1st–2nd c., on the basis of inscriptions and signs made on the ossuaries, used in the second burial, are believed to belong to the primitive church (Bagatti - Milik, Dominus Flevit, I; Testa, Simbolismo, 125-144, 426-513; Finegan, Archaeology of NT, 243-249; Cornfeld, Archaeology of the Bible, 285). Certain funeral chapels have mosaic floors with scenes of daily life (Orpheus, birds etc.), and one, on the Mount of Olives, has birds and crosses painted on the walls in a style dated to the 3rd c. Many Christian funeral inscriptions of the Byzantine period are collected in DACL VII, 2357-2374, to which one, in Latin, can be added, found at the Holy Sepulchre which reflects the spirituality of the pilgrims (Manns, Une ancienne prière: Augustinianum 20 [1980] 233-241).

Ain-Karem, the traditional birthplace of John the Baptist, took part in the life of Jerusalem. In the excavations in front of the church a statue of Venus was found. Since the village was Jewish a presence of the cult of Venus is unthinkable except as a reaction of pagans against earlier venerations. The example of Jerusalem, which saw Calvary confiscated and the establishment of the worship of Venus to supplant that of Christ, renders plausible a similar event in the village of Ain-Karem, where John the Baptist was venerated. Two Byzantine chapels remain here, and one in front of two tombs with mosaic floor with birds and a dedication to the martyrs. Another Byzantine chapel is found on the opposite ridge, called "the mountain." An intermittent excavation at Bethany has revealed a cistern transformed into a venerated cave, much visited by the faithful as the graffiti which covers the walls attests. The results of the excavation suggest that veneration began before the 4th c. and finished in the Byzantine era. Probably one of the final suppers of the Lord was commemorated there (Testa, Grotte dei Misteri: SBF 14 [1964] 128-131, 142-144).

H.L. Vincent - F.M. Abel, Jérusalem nouvelle, Paris 1914–1926; S. Saller, Discoveries at St. John's, Ein Karim, Jerusalem 1946; B. Bagatti, Il santuario della Visitazione, Jerusalem 1948; S. Saller, Excavations at Bethany, Jerusalem 1957; B. Bagatti - J.T. Milik, Gli scavi del "Dominus flevit," I, Jerusalem 1958; E. Testa, Il simbolismo dei Giudeo-cristiani, Jerusalem 1962; Id., Le "Grotte dei Misteri" giudeo-cristiane: SBF 14 (1964) 65-144; V. Corbo, Ricerche archeologiche al Monte degli Ulivi, Jerusalem 1965; J. Finegan, The Archaeology of the New Testament, Princeton, NJ 1969; A. Ovadiah, Corpus of the Byzantine Churches in the Holy Land, Bonn 1970; C. Coüasnon, The Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, London 1974; B. Bagatti - M. Piccirillo - A. Prodomo, New Discoveries at the Tomb of Virgin Mary in Gethsemane, Jerusalem 1975; Jerusalem: EAEHL 2, Jerusalem 1976, 579-647; G. Cornfeld, Archaeology of the Bible: Book by Book, New York-London 1976; B. Bagatti - E. Testa, Il Golgota e la croce, Jerusalem 1978; A. Battista - B. Bagatti, La Caverna dei Tesori, Jerusalem 1979; Id., Il Combattimento di Adamo, Jerusalem 1981; F. Manns, Une ancienne prière au Saint-Sépulcre de Jérusalem: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 233-241; B. Bagatti, Alle origini della Chiesa. I, le comunità giudeo-cristiane, Vatican City 1981; V. Corbo, Il Santo Sepolcro. Aspetti archeologici dalle origini al periodo crociato, Jerusalem 1981; D. Bahat - C.T. Rubinstein, The Illustrated Atlas of Jerusalem, Jerusalem 1990; Jerusalem: NEAEHL 2, Jerusalem 1993, 698-804; Ancient Jerusalem Revealed, Jerusalem 1994; J. Wilkinson, Gerusalemme la Città Santa, Rome 1999; M. Biddle, Il mistero della tomba di Cristo, Rome 2000; G. Avni - J. Seligman, New Excavations at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre Compound, in One Land—Many Cultures: Archaeological Studies in Honour of Stanislao Loffreda OFM, Jerusalem 2003, 153-162.

B. Bagatti - C. Pappalardo

V. Councils. 1. The meeting held around the year 49 with the participation of Peter, James, Paul and Barnabas, on the conditions of admission of the converts from paganism.

2. A first synod was held around 190, presided over by *Theophilus of Caesarea, to resolve the question of the date of Easter.

3. The bishops, including *Eusebius of Caesarea and *Eusebius of Nicomedia, who a few days before had finished the Council of Tyre to the detriment of *Athanasius, met on 17 September 335, on the occasion of the inauguration of the basilica of the Holy Sepulchre in the presence of *Constantine. A letter was read in which Constantine affirmed that he had personally interrogated *Arius and his followers and had verified their correct faith, confirmed by a profession of faith attached to the letter. He suggested, therefore, readmitting them into the churches. The council adhered promptly to this request and sent notice of it to the churches of *Alexandria and Egypt, inviting them to put an end to the divisions within the church.

4. In 400 an episcopal meeting with regard to the *Origenist controversy (Mansi 3, 989).

5. In 415 concerning the *Pelagian question raised by the presence of *Orosius and *Jerome (Augustine, De gestis Pel. 55).

6. A local synod on 6 August 518 to approve the decisions of the Council of *Constantinople of the same year to restore *Chalcedonian orthodoxy (Cyr. Scyth., Vita Sab. 56; Perrone, 176-177).

7. In 536, with the patriarch Peter, to accept the antimonophysite decisions of *Justinian (Mansi 8, 1164-1176).

Hfl-Lecl 1, 666-667; Simonetti 128-129; DHGE 27, 1136-1145; RAC 17, 690; Palazzini 2, 126-132; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche. Dal concilio di Efeso (431) al secondo concilio di Costantinopoli (553), Brescia 1980; M.-É. Bo-ismard, Le "concile" de Jérusalem (Act 15,1-33). Essai de critique littéraire: EThL 64 (1988) 433-440; The Book of the Acts in Its First Century Setting, IV. Palestinian Setting, ed. R. Bauckham, Grand Rapids, MI 1995.

M. Simonetti

JESU CHRISTO DEO ET HOMINE, De. This is a poem composed of 137 hexameters. It begins with a dedication to Christ: Verbum Christe Dei, Patris caelestis imago. . . . Actually, the whole life of Christ is reduced in the poem to four phases: the *incarnation and birth, the miracles, the redemption and the ascent into heaven. The poem lacks true inspiration, and yet where the description leads the author to the subject of nature, he loses himself in overblown rhetoric (see verses 22-26; 92-102). The author is still unknown. In the footsteps of Hartel, Hamman (PLS 3, 1135), with much uncertainty, refers to a "Victorinus or Victor, certainly distinct from Claudius Marius Victor": "Utrum existiterit saeculo V alter Victorinus aut Victorius qui a Claudio Victore differat, an illi assignanda sint De ligno vitae et De Jesu Christo, certum non est. Ita censet W. Hartel" (CSEL III, 3,30).

CPL 1459; ICL 17097; PLS 3, 1135-1139; Schanz IV, 1,159; EC 4, 1333. C. Magazzù, Una nota al carme De Iesu Christo Deo et homine, in Hestíasis, Studi offerti a S. Calderone, V, Messina 1988 (1995) 285-293.

L. Dattrino

JESUS CHRIST (iconography). Because of its function as a vehicle of ideas and means for affirming ideological and political directions, which it moreover shares with the entire artistic production of Antiquity, the art of the ancient Christian communities could not help but gravitate to the figure of Christ; and in this sense it is therefore entirely of a christological and christocentric character. This does not mean that the figurative culture of Christianity attempted the physiognomic representation of Christ from the beginning; rather, the human image of Jesus enters relatively late into the iconographic repertory of the community, and in rapport with the elaboration of themes primarily of a historical and narrative character. The theandric image appears having long been preceded by the almost exclusive use of symbols as, e.g., a passage of the Paedagogus of *Clement of Alexandria (III, 11,59-60) indicates; and nevertheless these symbols always allude to Christ's work in redemption.

However, at the basis of the lack of interest in the divine face, it seems one must suppose almost everywhere the Jewish heritage of aversion to sacred images which must have prevented from the beginning the transmission of a portrait of Jesus Christ; esp. significant in this regard is an order (can. 26) of the Council of *Elvira (ca. 306) in which the representation of images on the walls of churches is categorically forbidden: placuit picturas in ecclesia esse non debere; ne quod colitur et adoratur in parietibus depingatur; and a letter of *Eusebius to *Constantia (Ep. II ad Const. Aug.) concerning a representation of Christ, and in particular the peremptory tone with which the practice of representing divine images is declared in this letter, without qualifications, to be idolatrous. It is certain, in any case, that the ancients did not know the physical appearance of Jesus. Evidence expressing lack of knowledge about this is found in various Christian authors: the most ancient, such as *Justin, Clement of Alexandria, *Tertullian, *Ephrem the Syrian and *Origen, tend to support the thesis (which has remained without any reflection in the iconography) of the physical ugliness of Jesus, inspired essentially by Is 53:2, in which, however, the ugliness of the Messiah is nothing but an allegory of the sufferings which he would endure. Those writers belonging to a more recent era (*Gregory of Nyssa, *John Chrysostom, *Theodoret, *Jerome), however, referring to Ps 44(45):3, which alludes to the triumphs of the future Messiah, considered him to be handsome.

The oldest evidence for representations of Christ comes, therefore, from literary sources which mention images of Jesus Christ deriving from heterodox contexts, in particular Carpocratian *gnostics, and even pagan: the report is well known (it should, however, be considered scarcely reliable) acc. to which the image of Jesus Christ was preserved in the lararium of Alexander Severus, alongside the images of the best of the emperors and of Orpheus, Apollonius of Tyana and Abraham (Hist. Aug., Alex. Sev., 29,2). As for orthodox contexts, images of the Good *Shepherd traced in gold leaf on the bottom of glass chalices are mentioned in a passage of the De pudicitia of Tertullian (X, 12), and images of the Good Shepherd (a widely known theme in the artistic culture of Classical Antiquity, but taken up by the figurative culture of the Christian communities, who charged it with a new meaning) also offer the first figurative representations which have reached us (e.g., the painting of a sepulcher in the arenarium of the cemetery of Priscilla, the decoration of the vault of cubicle Y of the so-called crypt of Lucina, among the catacombs of Callistus, the reliefs of the so-called philosophical sarcophagi etc.), in which, however, the repetition of the image excludes any possibility of an interpretation as a portrait and underlines rather its symbolic character. Meanwhile, its frequent association with that of the Orans (= the redeemed *soul, now in the condition of celestial beatitude) tends to recall to the minds of the faithful the two poles between which the process of salvation takes place: the Good Shepherd (Christ) who is its subject and the human soul which constitutes its object.

The mosaic representation of Christ-Helios which decorates the vault of the small mausoleum M, or "of the Julii" (dating to the end of the 3rd or beginning of the 4th c.) in the necropolis under the Vatican basilica, certainly brings back the idea of the artistic product as an instrument of ideological and political propaganda, and it seems it should be viewed on a polemical axis as a sharp opposition to the development of the veneration of the Sol invictus which, starting from the decades around the middle of the 3rd c., had encountered, for different reasons and with different intentions, particular favor in the environments of the court.

Sensitive, therefore, to the echoes and suggestions of the contemporaneous culture—on a religious level, a hierarchical monotheism was developing through the elaboration of a solar theology—the Christian culture reacted to this new and perhaps also dangerous orientation of pagan religiosity, and periodically contradicted it, appropriating in a certain way its very patterns, whether conceptual or iconographic, yet nevertheless opposing the invincible sun with the Christ-Helios, the Sol salutis, which leads to eternal salvation.

Likewise, connected to the development of the contemporary official iconography, and with obvious polemical intention, is the elaboration of the theme of Christ magister among the apostles. Between the end of the 3rd and beginning of the 4th c., *Diocletian, in an effort to restore solidity and compactness to the empire, definitively brought to its conclusion the long process of divinization of the emperor which had begun at least a century before. This new conception of the sovereign, from that point on completely assimilated by the ancient culture, found immediate echo and at the same time support on the figurative plane, where it appeared in monuments of an official character (see, e.g., the sculptural decoration of the Arch of Galerius, at *Thessalonica). In this way the iconographic repertory of the Christian community was enriched with a new theme, precisely that of Christ among the apostles, in competition with these directions of imperial propaganda as expressed by official art. Elaborated, as has been observed (Testini), as a further development of the concept of philosophy, into a concept of true philosophy and the true philosopher (Jesus the teacher) as the depository of that doctrine, this theme is born, as it seems from the oldest examples known to us at the present day (frescoes in the catacombs of Marcellinus and Peter, of Nuntiatella etc.), in funeral environments, from which it passes later to decorate halls of worship. In it Christians see the continuity and immutability of the divine law, before which they will present themselves at the moment of death; but besides this essentially eschatological content, the theme is explicitly opposed to the imperial iconography—of which it closely imitates the pattern—in an extremely meaningful moment which takes its place within the climate connected to the last great persecution: and after the religious peace, in connection with the political events and ideological orientations which result from it, the concept of the royalty of the Master will dominate there more and more.

This theme would later have, as will be seen, important developments. Meanwhile, still at the end of the 3rd c., in a perhaps more rigorously catechetical prospective, and coherent with the new tendencies matured in society, the theme of Christ the miracle-worker, of scriptural inspiration, was being developed; an image which spread rapidly both in painting and in funeral reliefs and would have particular success above all in the decoration of the continuous frieze *sarcophagi. Among the most ancient monuments in which this theme is represented should be mentioned sarcophagus 119 of the Museo Pio Cristiano in the Vatican and the celebrated polychrome slabs of the National Roman Museum, the latter of which—in which the Christ, for the first time at Rome, is of the bearded type—nevertheless remain in certain aspects a unicum without further developments. In this image Christ, dressed in tunic and pallium (the costume of sacred personages), is of youthful aspect without beard, of the type called Apollonian, of Hellenistic derivation—and therefore in surprising contradiction with the idea of a Messiah of disagreeable appearance widespread in the more-or-less contemporary literary culture—and is shown in the act of performing miracles, whether by the gesture of the imposition of hands (e.g., miracle of the multiplication of bread and fish, restoration of sight to the blind man) or by means of the virga thaumaturgica (e.g., miracle of Cana, again the multiplication of bread and fish acc. to a different design, resurrection of Lazarus).

The changed relationships, after the religious peace, between the political power and the church—the new role which the latter, as a result, comes to play within the state, and the new motives for conflict which were quickly revealed between these two institutions—left evident traces in the iconography, which became a faithful mirror of this situation. In this context the already-mentioned motif of Christ teaching undergoes new elaborations: still in the Constantinian era, the motif of the celestial basileus surrounded by the apostolic college developed in imitation of the emperor surrounded by his consistorium and was furnished with the same attributes. A few years later the scene of Christ giver of the law to Peter (sometimes to Paul: e.g., sarcophagus of Pietro degli Onesti, in S. Maria Porto Fuori, in Ravenna) was formulated, of which the first examples seem to have come out of the Roman sarcophagus workshops. As for mosaics, the decoration of a niche in the mausoleum of Constantia at Rome should be mentioned, with a representation of the Traditio Legis (in the opposite niche is the theme of the Traditio clavium). However, probably because of the funeral context in which it stands and perhaps also because of its imperial commission—and if, as moreover now seems certain, this particular has not been altered by the numerous interventions undergone in the past by the monument—the expression Dominus pacem dat is substituted for the formula Dominus Legem dat, which normally appears on the volumen which Christ is handing to the prince of the apostles; so it should be referred to more as Largitio pacis than a Traditio Legis.

In the course of the 4th c. representations of Christ among the apostles—shown in their entirety or in a reduced number, imago brevis of the entire college—multiply in a notable variety of themes, among which should be mentioned that of Christ acclaimed by the apostolic college, Christ who receives the offer of the crown of martyrdom from the apostles, or Christ kosmokrator, enthroned, on the symbolic image of Coelus (see, e.g., the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, in the Museum of St. Peter's Basilica, datable by the inscription to 359); while that of Christ teaching surrounded by the twelve apostles still survives, such as is found in the right apse of the octagon of S. Aquilino, in S. Lorenzo Maggiore, in Milan (to be dated to the end of the 4th or, perhaps more likely, to the beginning of the 5th c.), in which it is above all the large capsa filled with books which suggests precisely a teaching scene. It is represented in the foreground in front of the figure of Christ who, Apollonian, haloed and beardless, and dressed in tunic and pallium, raises his right hand in the gesture of prayer. It is in this period when the type of the bearded Christ, the so-called Syro-Palestinian type, also begins to become more common.

Alongside these themes and in connection with the spread, now, of scenes of the Passion, a symbolic and noniconic representation of Christ likewise develops, understood as victor over death. Christ is symbolized by the christological monogram enclosed in a crown and completed on the sides by the apocalyptic letters (see, e.g., sarcophagus 171 of the Museo Pio Cristiano, the mosaic of the vault of the baptistery of Naples). By this point, the immediacy and simplicity of the older figures had been abandoned for some time, and the theological content of the christological representations also became more and more complex. It seems to reach its peak in the mosaic decoration of the apse of the basilica of S. Pudentiana in Rome (of controversial date between the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c.), where, along the same vertical axis, a triple representation of Christ is found, which proceeds from the Agnus Dei below to the bearded Christ-Logos—custodian of the law who is the Ancient of Days of the Johannine Apocalypse, represented as the emperor in his council—and finally reaches the jeweled cross, token of victory and symbol of the triumphant Christ, which is flanked by the symbols of those who witness to his words via the Scriptures (i.e., the evangelists).

The long route taken by the image of Jesus Christ from the era of the first representations, of an allusive and symbolic character, is illustrated, finally, by two monuments which in fact refer in a certain way to those representations in their own themes: the so-called Good Shepherd in single vestment, up to today a unique example, in a mosaic floor panel of the oratory of *Aquileia; and the image of Christ the shepherd, in the lunette above the entrance of the mausoleum of Galla Placidia in Ravenna. Especially in the latter representation Christ, haloed and leaning on a high cross of gold, is dressed in a way—in a long purple tunic and pallium, recalling a regal vestment—that suggests the manifestation of the shepherd of the nations, guarantor of the salvation which he assures for humanity, just as he, as a shepherd, is the defender and custodian of his flock. The great shepherd and king has definitively abandoned the humble pastoral dress that, in a now-distant cultural and ideological context, characterized him in the oldest iconography.

If, in this *Ravenna mosaic, Christ retains in some way—even if profoundly modified—at least the echo of his original connotation as shepherd, in the contemporaneous (and rather heavily restored) mosaic of the triumphal arch of S. Paolo Fuori le Mura, in Rome—which is the oldest surviving composition of an apocalyptic tone—the biased diversity of the patrons (Pope Leo, together with Galla Placidia) who were inspired by different programs, gives rise to a new interpretation of the image of Jesus Christ, who is represented in the aspect of the judge; a type destined for great success.

To the 1st half of the 6th c. and to the reign of *Theodoric (and therefore to be referred to an *Arian context), belong the two series of thirteen mosaic panels each, in certain respects rather unique, which decorate the highest part of the central nave of the basilica of S. Apollinaire Nuovo in Ravenna. Here in the sequence on the left wall miracles and parables of Christ are represented. With his head surrounded with a cross-bearing halo, he wears a purple tunic and pallium and is of Apollonian type, young and beardless. In the opposite series, however, certainly contemporaneous but equally certainly due to different artists, episodes of the Passion (excluding however the crucifixion) and the resurrection are suggested. Here Christ, haloed and also dressed in purple, the emperor's own color, is in contrast constantly bearded (for the first time in Ravenna) and of an apparently more-advanced age, as if the ancient allegories of Is 53:2 and of Ps 44(45):3 had found their explicit figurative transposition in this series of panels in Ravenna. The motif, already mentioned above, of Christ the judge is found, now completely defined, in the decoration of the apse of the basilica of Sts. Cosmas and Damian in Rome, from the time of Felix IV (526–530), whose iconographic scheme, destined to have durable success, would return again (to be sure, as is natural, with different stylistic characteristics) in the apses of the Roman basilicas of St. *Praxedis and of St. *Cecilia, from the era of Pasqual I (817–824) and in that of St. Mark, from the time of Gregory IV (827–844); while, in parallel, the transposition of the fashions of imperial iconography into the theme of Christ as emperor, now specified in all particulars, spreads ever further and grows richer and richer. An example of this is the almost contemporaneous decoration of the apsidal basin of the basilica of St. Vitale in Ravenna, where, on a gold background, Christ, here of "Hellenistic" type, with the head surrounded by a halo in which the jeweled cross is inserted, and dressed in a tunic clavata and purple pallium, is seated on the throne and hands with the right hand the crown of martyrdom to *Vitalis—who, as the court ceremony demands, receives it with veiled hands—while in the left he holds the scroll with seven seals. The throne of Christ is here flanked by two angels of the angelic legion, just as the soldiers of the imperial guard flank the throne of the emperor. The theme of Christ who crushes the lion and the dragon, an iconographic transposition of Psalm 91(90):13, which appears, e.g., in the famous mosaic, largely restored, of the archepiscopal chapel of Ravenna (6th c.), in lamp decorations, or in numerous ivories, ought to be attributed, it seems, to anti-Arian, or more generally antiheretical, polemic.

Starting from the 5th c., the Christian iconographic repertory was meanwhile enriched by a new theme in the figurative arts: the crucifixion, up till then avoided by the artistic culture of the community, certainly because of the shameful quality connected in general with the punishment of the cross.

This theme was preceded (and in a certain way prepared for), in the course of the 4th c., esp. in cemeterial contexts, by scenes which represent the moments immediately prior in time to the act of the crucifixion, such as the Judgment of Pilate (e.g., the sarcophagus called "of the two brothers," in the Museo Pio Cristiano, in the Vatican, datable to around the middle of the 4th c., in which nevertheless the figure of Jesus Christ before the procurator is allegorically replaced by that of Isaac ready for his own sacrifice with which the immediately adjacent figurative theme of the monument, the sacrifice of Abraham, finishes; sarcophagus 171 of the same museum, a little later than the former). The theme is also represented by the coronation with thorns, and the episode of Simon of Cyrene, who takes on the weight of the cross (for both of these themes, see again sarcophagus 171 of the Museo Pio Cristiano), without, however, arriving yet at a representation of the crucified Christ. The step toward overcoming this true and real obstacle of psychological and moral character is constituted by the elaboration and spread, around the middle of the century, of a particular class of sarcophagi—called "of the Anastasis"—in which, in the center of the front and inserted in the context of the Passion, is the representation of the empty tomb of Christ, obtained by the representation of the triumphal cross, surmounted by the crown of martyrdom which surrounds the Christogram, and flanked by sleeping soldiers. From now on, therefore, the cross thus ascends to symbol of victory, which therefore cancels whatever ignoble or shameful associations were implied in its representation as an instrument of martyrdom, and opens as a result the way to the iconographic theme of the crucifixion.

Soon this would gather strength from the *monophysite polemic as well. It appears for the first time on a small ivory case preserved in the British Museum, but in provenance from N *Italy, and datable to around 420–430 (and it would not be by chance that it is still represented on an object for private use and therefore not destined to be shown to the public), and is immediately followed in time by the almost contemporaneous wooden relief of the door of St. Sabina in Rome. Beardless in the first case, bearded in the second, Christ is naked and covered only by the subligaculum in both monuments. Dressed in a red colobium without sleeves, nailed with four nails to the cross, the Christ of the evangeliary of Rabbula, composed in Syria in 586, shows a wound in the side, sign of his death, and has the eyes open, symbol of the triumph over it. Finally, in the later majestic crucifixion executed acc. to a Syro-Palestinian iconographic scheme around 750, under the pontificate of Pope Zacharias, which decorates the chapel of the primicerius Theodotus (to the left of the presbytery of S. Maria antiqua in the Roman Forum), Christ, with short beard, haloed and dressed in the usual red colobium, clavatum and without sleeves, is represented alive between Mary and John, who are standing on the sides of the cross; while on an improbable second plane and in a smaller area the figures of *Longinus and of another soldier who offers the sponge are seen in relief.

R. Garrucci, Storia dell'arte cristiana nei primi otto secoli della Chiesa, 8 vols., Prato, 1873-1881; H. Bergner, Der gute Hirte in der altchristlichen Kunst, Berlin 1890, G.B. de Rossi, Musaici cristiani e saggi dei pavimenti delle chiese di Roma anteriori al secolo XV, Rome 1899; J.E. Weis- Liebersdorf, Christus und Apostelbilder, Freiburg i.B. 1902; G. Wilpert, Le pitture delle catacombe romane, Rome 1903; DACL, s.v.; RBK, s.v.; LCI, s.v.; G. Wilpert, Die römischen Mosaiken und Malerein der kirchlichen Bauten vom 4.-13. Jh., Freiburg i.B. 1916; G. Stuhlfauth, Die ältesten Porträts Christi und der Apostel, Berlin 1919; J. Sauer, Die ältesten Christusbilder, Berlin 1920; A. Grabar, L'Empereur dans l'art byzantin, Paris 1936; J. Kollwitz, Christus als Lehrer und die Gesetzübergabe an Petrus in der konstantinischen Kunst Roms: RQA 44 (1936) 45-66; G. Wilpert, I sarcofagi cristiani antichi, 3 vols., Rome 1929–1936; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1952, [2]1976; F. Gerke, Christus in der spätantiken Plastik, Berlin 1940; J. Kollwitz, Das Christusbild des 3 Jh., Berlin 1953; P. Thoby, Le Crucifix: des origines au Concile de Trente. Étude iconographique, Nantes 1959 (Supplément 1963); Ch.R. Morey, The Gold-Glass Collection of the Vatican Library, with Additional Catalogues of the Other Gold-Glass Collections, ed. G. Ferrari, Vatican City 1959; P. Testini, Osservazioni sull'iconografia del Cristo in trono fra gli apostoli, RIA 11 and 12 (1963) 230ff.; G. Matthiae, Mosaici medievali delle chiese di Roma, Rome 1967 (update, vol. I, secoli IV-X, ed. M. Andaloro, Rome 1987), Fr.W. Deichmann - G. Bovini - H. Brandenburg, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage, I, Rom und Ostia, Wiesbaden 1967; A. Quacquarelli, Il leone e il drago nella simbolica dell'età patristica, Bari 1975; W.N. Schumacher, Hirt und "Guter Hirt." Studien zum Hirtenbild in d. römischen Kunst von 2 bis zum Anfang des 4. Jh. unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Mosaiken in d. Südhalle vom Aquileja: RQA Supplementheft 34, Rome-Freiburg-Vienna 1977; G. Matthiae, Pittori committenti e fruitori nell'Italia altomedievale, Rome 1978; R. Giordani, Motivi cristologici nell'antica iconografia musiva: Academia card. Bessarionis, Quaderno 2 (1981) 71ff.; Enciclopedia dell'arte medievale, 5, Rome 1994, s.v. Cristo and Crocifisso.

R. Giordani

JEWISH CHRISTIANITY. It is not easy to define what is meant by "Jewish Christianity," both because of the diversity of opinion among scholars and by the social-religious difficulties of the phenomenon itself. We can attempt to enumerate the various proposals by proceeding in a series of concentric circles, starting from the largest. For Daniélou all the midrashic inheritance of the church of the first centuries is included in Jewish Christianity. A smaller circle, but still very large, would include all the believers in Jesus the Messiah coming from Judaism, without distinction. A little smaller would be the area, within which Marcel Simon moves, of those converted Jews who observed the ceremonial Torah de facto, without imposition. Others, however, insisted on an observance de jure as necessary for salvation and wanted to impose it on the converted Gentiles also; their attitude was decisively anti-Pauline. From a doctrinal point of view we have those converted Jews, still observing the Torah, who accepted Christ as the Son of God, born of a virgin, as, presumably, the Nazarenes did, acc. to Pritz; while others restricted their faith to Jesus as Messiah, or else as the Prophet, awaited by their compatriots, but did not make the step to a *Christology or *soteriology "from above." The smallest circle is that of the *Ebionites, studied by H.-J. Schoeps. One should also mention *gnosticizing sects like the *Elkesaites. For clarity we will call "orthodox" those groups which later would be absorbed in the "great church" even if some, like the Nazarenes, were sometimes listed among the heretics.

This enumeration is not merely theoretical, because small groups of every type probably coexisted in the first two centuries within the Christian movement, still searching for its own identity faced with Judaism and paganism. It is obvious, therefore, that the sources for studying the Jewish Christian phenomenon are classified acc. to the above-mentioned varieties. First of all come the various writings of the NT, representing the different currents of the apostolic church, and in particular the book of Acts. The patristic witnesses follow, which go from *Justin to *Epiphanius and beyond, whether because they speak directly of the Jewish Christians or because they reflect their traditions. Direct sources are scarce. Three (or two) Jewish Christian gospels are known of which some fragments exist: According to the Hebrews, the Nazarenes and the Ebionites. Among the apocrypha the Gospel of Peter, the Letter of the Apostles, the Ascension of Isaiah and, in particular, the Pseudo-Clementine Romance are usually pointed out. Finally there are archaeological and iconographic sources.

Obviously all of the earliest believers came from Judaism, and as far as we can tell, the principal currents were represented among them: Pharisees (Acts 15:5), Sadducees (Acts 6:7), Hellenists (Acts 6:1) and, perhaps, Essenes also (see 2 Cor 6:14-18), all with their own forma mentis and a baggage of customs and traditions in practical life. The Jews called them Nazarenes (Acts 24:5), and at the beginning considered them as another sect next to those which already existed. They continued to live as Jews in all ways since they had no sense of leaving Judaism, just one of having entered into possession of the promises made to the fathers. They lived in koinonia acc. to the ideal of the Essenes; they attended the temple and were observant of the Torah and the halakah. But they preached that Jesus risen from the dead was the promised Messiah; they broke bread in private houses (Acts 2:42-48).

Even if the assertion that Jesus had risen from the dead and would return to judge the living and the dead excited wonder among the listeners, in the Pharisaic and apocalyptic environment of those times it was still acceptable. The source of polemic with Judaism and the birth of conflicts among the faithful themselves was, above all, the development of Christology and soteriology, based on the words of Jesus himself, on the reinterpretation of the OT and on the charismatic experience of the new community. The title of kyrios was attributed to Christ, which the Septuagint reserves for Yahweh. Furthermore, when converted Gentiles also began to take part in the community, mostly "God-fearers" who already attended the synagogue, the problem was immediately posed of the lawfulness of sitting down with those who were eating impure foods and, even more important, the question whether they could be considered members of the eschatological Israel without being circumcised. Some of the believers did not want to lose their Jewish identity, put at risk by the acceptance of these kinds of compromises; therefore, though remaining Nazarenes, they began to form the "right wing" of the new community and opposed both the activity and the theology of *Paul. Other groups, perhaps those coming from the Diaspora, with a more open mindset, but also observant Jews, opened up both to the "high" Christology in development and to the acceptance of faith in Christ as the only valid means of salvation for all. There would have been others too who were still undecided and sought clarity in the entire question. We can include *Peter among these (see Gal 2:11-16). This is the Sitz im Leben of the so-called Council of Jerusalem described by Luke in Acts 15 and by Paul in Gal 2. In his account, the author of Acts put together the radical decision of the meeting, i.e., the nonnecessity of the observance of the Torah and of circumcision, and certain later decisions made by the church of Jerusalem and circulated among the churches of Judea concerning the abstention from blood, from strangled meat, from meat sacrificed to idols and from immodesty (Acts 15:20). These clauses reflected the requests made to foreigners resident in Israel in Lev 17 and 18. We find echoes in Rev 2 and 3 and in the Fathers up to the 3rd c. Paul shows himself more flexible and uses the criterion of charity toward the "weaker brother" as a practical principle (1 Cor 8; Rom 14-15).

As the mission to the Gentiles grew stronger, the Jewish-Christian reaction began to change; the Jerusalemite "right wing" began a real persecution against Paul, while others, like the community of Matthew in Syria, while distancing themselves from the domination of the Pharisees after the year 70, reflected an open Jewish Christianity which gave a spiritual interpretation to the Torah on the model of Jesus' preaching. They accepted both the virgin birth and the divine Sonship of Christ. The Jewish Christianity reflected in the letters of Jude is apocalyptic; in the letter of James which speaks of "royal law" and "law of liberty" (1:25; 2:8) hints of polemic are found against certain Pauline assertions interpreted in a libertine sense. But extent to which a Jewish-Christian mind could rise to a high Christology and a vicarious soteriology emerges in the letter to the Hebrews, which includes a midrash of *Alexandrian type to convince a community, certainly of Jewish origin, to remain strong in the faith, which did not sacrifice anything inherited from the OT but rather completed and elevated it. 2 Peter, of the Petrine current, reconciles the Jewish Christianity of Jude with a prudent recommendation of the Pauline letters (2 Pet 3:16) and therefore has a high "canonical" value.

In the meantime the reaction of the synagogue against the Christian movement was becoming violent. James was killed, and the accusations made against Stephen in Acts 7, those of antinomianism and contempt for the temple, mirror the preaching of the Hellenists, first object of the persecution. The culmination was reached when, in the 90s, the twelfth of the eighteen blessings was rewritten to include the cursing of the minim and the nozrim. Such an action caused confusion among the believing Jews who felt themselves formally excluded from the synagogue, and some even returned there.

This situation is reflected well in the Fourth Gospel, the principal document of the Johannine community, which was primarily Jewish Christian, at least initially. The diffidence toward Jesus shown by the "Jews who had believed in him" (Jn 2:23-25; 8:31-37) and his insistence to "remain in me" (8:31, 56; 15:4, 7) probably indicate either those of the community who had trouble accepting the high Johannine Christology or those who, shocked by the birkat ha-minim, had gone back to the synagogue. In fact, after the discourse on the bread come down from heaven in ch. 6 it is said explicitly that some found these words too hard and did not walk with him any more (6:60-70). It was "Peter and the Twelve" (the Great Church) who saved the situation. There were, however, other Jews who, like Nicodemus, were attracted to Christianity, partly because of the miracles which they saw, but were afraid to take the last step and receive baptism (3:3-8). This transition in both directions continued throughout the 2nd c. Therefore, while the Pauline scandal for the Jewish Christians was the nonnecessity of the law for salvation, the Johannine scandal was his Christology. However, an overly exaggerated Paulinism led to *Marcion, and Johannism taken too far finished in *docetism and *gnosticism. The most closed-minded Jewish Christians finished in Ebionitism.

One may ask, therefore, what the criterion was of the absorption of the moderates into the principal current of Christianity; or must we speak only of "Christianities" in the 1st c.? It is undeniable that different theologies existed, but if there were trajectories which finished in heterodoxy, there was also a kerygmatic backbone common to all the currents of which the terminus ad quem was the regula fidei announced by *Irenaeus, *Tertullian and others. The fact of the formation of the canon of the NT is not only a fact of history but also, and more so, theological. Assembling these books, of both Jewish-Christian and ethnic origin, presupposed a criterion of selection and parameters acc. to which a practice or a doctrine was or was not acceptable for the church. That is to say, a mutual relationship exists between the canonical selection and the rule of faith. In the 1st c. the ecclesial faith was still in development: one might run too far, remain behind or turn aside. The Ebionites suffocated in their rigidity, while the Nazarenes, although still insisting on a strict observance of the law, succeeded in keeping pace, avoiding the exclusivity of the former. Why, then, does *Epiphanius (Panarion 29) list them among the heretics even without accusing them of any erroneous doctrine? The most likely response, which is also valid for the Fathers prior to Epiphanius who reveal themselves dissatisfied with the Jewish Christians, is found in the fact of the continued attraction of the synagogue, with its symbolic rites, for the Christians, even those of Gentile origin. Much of the so-called anti-Semitism of the Fathers, even that of *John Chrysostom, was directed toward those Christians who were sitting on the fence and finished by being neither Jews nor Christians. Justin (Dialogue 47) expressed a moderate personal judgment on those who still practiced the law, but also mentions that others have a different opinion. And while the abstinence from meat sacrificed to idols prescribed in Acts 15 remained in vigor for the Fathers up to the Apostolic Constitutions, the observance of the Torah was so disapproved that even St. Thomas Aquinas, in his era, considered it a grave sin (ST 1-2, q 103, a 4).

H.-J. Schoeps, Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums, Tübingen 1949; M. Simon, Verus Israel. Étude sur les relations entre Chrétiens et Juifs dans l'Empire Roman, Paris 1964; A.F.J. Klijn - G.J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects, Leiden 1973; R. Murray, Defining Jewish-Christianity: Heythrop Journal 15 (1974) 303-310; S.K. Riegel, Jewish Christianity: Definitions and Terminology: NTS 24 (1977-78) 410-415; F. Manns, Bibliographie du Judéo-Christianisme, Jerusalem 1978; R.E. Brown, Not Jewish-Christianity and Gentile-Christianity but Types of Jewish/Gentile Christianity: CBQ 45 (1983) 74-79; R.A. Pritz, Nazarene Jewish Christianity, Jerusalem 1988; LTK[3] 5, 1049-1051; S.C. Mimouni, Le Judéochristianisme ancien, essais historiques, Paris 1998; F. Manns, L'Israele di Dio, Bologna 1998; G. Filoramo - C. Giannotto (ed.), Verus Israel, Brescia 2001; F. Blanchetière, Enquête sur les racines juives du mouvement chrétien, Paris 2001; var. aus., Le Judéo-Christianisme dans tous ses états. Actes du colloque de Jérusalem 6-10 juillet 1998, Jerusalem 2001; var. aus., Il giudeocristianesimo (Ricerche storico bibliche), Bologna 2002.

P. Grech

JOB

I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. Although it seems that the figure of Job is almost absent from the works of the Fathers of the first two centuries (Clem. Rom., Corinth. 26 names him as a witness to the resurrection), with *Clement of *Alexandria in the East and *Cyprian of *Carthage in the West, the references to this personage, and therefore to the biblical book which bears his name and tells his story, begin to become frequent. Clement uses Job 28:22 to support the faith in the *descent of Christ to hell (Strom. VI, 45,1-2), while Cyprian presents Job above all as an example of humility, patience, generosity and endurance of sufferings understood as tests for the just (Testim. III, 1,6,14,54; Op. et. elem. 18). This use of the text and personage will return in other Fathers (Basil., Ep. 2,3; Hom. 20,7; Hom. De grat. 6; Hom. Quod Deus 5; John Chrys., Hom. 10,4 in I Cor. and the entire work of Ambrose Interpell. Job et Dav.). Along these lines is the work in 35 books of *Gregory the Great, Moralia in Job, a true and proper manual of ascetic theology where Job also becomes a "type" of Christ and of the church. *Origen, from whom no complete commentary on the book of Job remains (an echo of his interpretation seems to be found in the very few fragments of a Tractatus in Job of Hilary, see Jer., Vir. ill. 100), abundantly cites numerous passages from it. Job 14:4-5 occupies a special place in his works, always cited to demonstrate the difference between Christ and other humans concerning sin (Hom. 8,3 in Lev.; Hom. 3,2 in Num.; Hom. 3,2 in Is.; Hom. 14 in Lc.; Comm. Rom. 5,1.5.9; 7,18). This verse was taken up again by *Augustine, who found support here for his anti-*Pelagian doctrine on the universality of sin in every human being (Cont. Jul. V, 13,49; VI, 24,78; 26,83; Cont. duas epist. pel. IV, 4,4; 10,27; 11,31. On Job see also the Adn. in Job: CSEL 28/3, 509-628).

The discovery of the papyri of Tura has allowed the recovery of the first part of the commentary of *Didymus on the book of Job, relating to chaps. 1-11, even if it is filled with lacunae (see Didymos der Blinde, Kommentar zu Hiob, 3 vols., Bonn 1968) (see *Wisdom books).

DSp 8, 1218-1225 (with large bibl.); R. Draguet, Un commentaire grec arien sur Job: RHE 20 (1924) 38-65; G. Folliet, Le fragment d'Hilaire "Quas Job litteras . . .". Son interprétation d'après Hilaire, Pélage et Augustin, in Hilaire et son temps, Paris 1969, 149-158; D. Hagedorn, Der Hiobkommentar des Arianers Julian, PTS 14, Berlin 1973; G. Pani, Una citazione di Lutero dal libro di Giobbe: SSR 2 (1978) 367-380; W. Geerlings, Hiob und Paulus. Theodicee und Paulinismus in der Theologie am Ausgang des vierten Jahrhunderts: JbAC 24 (1981) 56-66; M. Spanneut, Le stoïcisme dans l'histoire de la patience chrétienne: MSR 39 (1982) 101-130; J. Doignon, Blessure d'affliction et blessure d'amour (Moralia 6,42); une jonction de thémes de la spiritualité patristique de Cyprien á Augustin, in Grégoire le Grand, Paris 1986, 297-303; J. Ziegler, Iob 14,4-5a als wichtigster Schriftbeweis für die These "Neminem sine sorde et sine peccato esse" (Cyprian, Test 3, 54), bei den lateinischen christlichen Schriftstellern, Munich 1985; var. aus., Le Livre de Job chez les Pères, Strasbourg 1996; M. Perraymond, La figura di Giobbe nella cultura paleocristiana tra esegesi patristica e manifestazioni iconografiche, Vatican City 2002; Job: ACCS OT 6, ed. M. Simonetti - M. Conti, Downers Grove, IL 2006.

M.G. Mara

II. Iconography. The biblical personage, protagonist of the homonymous book of the OT, occurs in the paleo-Christian figurative repertoire as a prototype of every virtue and, in particular, a symbol of patience, of resignation to divine will and of the resurrection. The scene appears in about twenty Roman cemeterial pictures (some now lost) and in one in the mausoleum of the Exodus in El-Bagawat in Egypt. The oldest known example seems to be from the 2nd half of the 3rd c. (Wp 56), while the majority of the other frescoes date to the course of the 4th c. (only that of El-Bagawat dates to the 5th c.). Often the patriarch is alone, resigned and covered in sores, seated on the dunghill (Job 2:8), which usually resembles a rock or a bench. Sometimes his wife flanks him, covers her nose with the edge of her garment (Job 19:17) and pushes food to him with a cane (though this detail is unknown to the biblical text). Only at El-Bagawat are the three friends who come to visit the patriarch found (Job 2:11ff.). The scene is also attested in around a dozen Italic and Gallic *sarcophagi of the pre-Constantinian era (Job seated, his wife who pushes him food, a friend in the background). But Job should not be considered the figure found in a controversial scene (held by others to be the cathedra Petri) on a sarcophagus of the Museo Pio Cristiano (Ws 189). The patriarch is later represented in a gilded glass, now lost, of Neuss (Cologne), of which there survives a poor reproduction. In the Codex of Rabbula (586) and in other MSS, although the scene remains the same, numerous iconographic variants have been identified.

DACL VII, 2, 2554-2570; EC VI, 113; LCI II, 407-414; Le Blant, Sarc., 63, n. 61; 17, n. 17; 25, n. 35; H. Omont, Peintures de l'Ancien Testament dans un manuscrit syriaque du VII[e] au VIII[e] siècle: Monuments Piot XVIII (1909), 92, pl. VI, 5; G. Wilpert, Restauri di sculture antiche e antichità moderne: RivAC 4 (1927) 72-73; Ws 13,142, 1,2,3; 187,6; 189; Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., 79-82, f. 7 a; Ferrua, Via Latina, pls. VI, 1; C; LVIII, 2; M. Thérel, La composition et le symbolisme de l'iconografie du Mausolée de l'Exode à El Bagawat: RivAC 45 (1969) 228ff.; P. Porta, Il sarcofago paleocristiano frammentario a colonne del Museo Cristiano di Brescia: Atti III CongrNazArch-Christ, Trieste 1974, 333-345; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse and Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973, 273-279; 406-407; M. Perraymond, L'iconografia di Giobbe nella catechesi dei primi secoli: Bessarione 5 (1986) 175-193; M. Perraymond, Giobbe (s.v.), in F. Bisconti (ed.), Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000, 190-191; M. Perraymond, Giobbe: annotazioni iconografiche e tradizione esegetica: Studi e materiali di Storia delle Religioni 67 (2001) 229-252; M. Perraymond, La figura di Giobbe nella cultura paleocristiana tra esegesi patristica e manifestazioni iconografiche, Vatican City 2002.

M. Perraymond

JOBIUS. Monk and Byzantine theologian (6th c.). We know nothing about this person, inasmuch as *Photius, the only source, limits himself to the work without saying anything about the author (Bibl., cod. 232). He wrote a (lost) treatise Against Severus (of Antioch), simply mentioned by Photius, who on the other hand minutely describes and cites the other treatise (Οἰκονομικὴ πραγματεία) on the *incarnation with particular attention to the motive and the difficulties of the mystery. According to Photius, Jobius, skilled at posing problems, is not so skilled at resolving them. Nevertheless, this work, of which other fragments have been transmitted by scriptural *catenae, constitutes evidence for the Byzantine theology at the *Justinian era which cannot be ignored.

CPG 6984; PG 103, 736-829; 86, 3313-3320. R. Henry, Photius. Bibliothèque, III, Paris 1964, 153-227; DTC 8, 1486-1487; Beck 383; Grillmeier 2/2, 255.

D. Stiernon

JOBIUS the Apollinarist (end of 4th c.). He is known as a bishop from his signature on a brief text that *Leontius of Byzantium preserves for us as a tomus synodalis of a group of moderate *Apollinarists. Leontius cites from a treatise that he has seen, by a certain *Valentinus, precisely on the moderate group of Apollinaris's disciples. The text signed by Jobius consists in a brief confession of faith which does not lack particular nuances: the idea is refuted there of the flesh of Christ only as a covering for the Logos; a single nature is not affirmed; on the contrary, the text is based on explicit *dyophysite positions. In another fragment from Valentinus, given by Leontius, Jobius appears among those who find themselves in disagreement with the catechesis of *Timothy, head of the radical Apollinarist group.

CPG II, 3730; H. Lietzmann, Apollinarios von Laodicea und seine Schule, Tübingen 1904, 157; frs. 286-287; 278-279; DTC 8, 1486.

E. Cavalcanti

JOHANNITES. Despite the explicit injunction of *John Chrysostom not to take his deposition as a pretext to divide the church (see Pall., Dial. 10), at *Constantinople a compact group of his followers contested the legitimacy of his successors *Arsacius and *Atticus. A similar phenomenon occurred at *Antioch against the bishop *Porphyry, imposed by the adversaries of Chrysostom at the death of *Flavian (404). The schism of the Johannites was reconciled in part with the official church around 417–418, when Chrysostom's name was reintegrated into the diptychs, but was completed only in 438, under *Proclus, with the triumphant return of the relics of the saint to Constantinople. The creation of the first corpus of Chrysostom's writings (already adulterated with the works of other authors) and the composition of spurious works aimed at obtaining the return of Chrysostom from exile and/or his rehabilitation are due to the Johannite milieu. The Antiochene Johannites seem to have played a similar role. Among the Johannite writings the Funerary Speech for John Chrysostom by the deacon Cosmas (ps.-Martyrius of Antioch) stands out.

T.D. Barnes, The Funerary Speech for John Chrysostom (BHG3 871 = CPG 6517): StP 37, 328-345; S.J. Voicu, "Furono chiamati giovanniti . . .". Un'ipotesi sulla nascita del corpus pseudocrisostomico, in Philomathestatos: Studies in Greek and Byzantine Texts Presented to Jacques Noret for His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, ed. B. Janssens - B. Roosen - P. Van Deun, OLA 137, Leuven 2004, 701-711.

S.J. Voicu

JOHN, deacon. In the 2nd half of the 6th c. the Roman deacon John composed an Expositum in Heptateuchum, a patristic *florilegium whose usefulness consists in having preserved fragments of ancient Christian texts, otherwise lost. G. Morin (Jean Diacre et le pseudo-Jérôme, 116-117) advances the hypothesis that this John could have published the ps.-Hieronymian revision of the commentary of *Pelagius on the Pauline letters, or that its author was the other John, a Roman deacon, who with all probability occupied the pontifical throne from 523 to 526 (but see the ed. of the above-mentioned ps.-Hieronymian revision, ed. A. Souter, in TSt IX, 3 [1931] VIIIf., concerning this). It seems that the same John, author of the Expositum, edited a Collectanea on the four gospels, and that perhaps he translated into *Latin the sixth book of the Vitae Patrum, while still a subdeacon.

CPL 951-952; Expositum, in Heptateuchum: fragm. in J.B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense, I, Paris 1852, LV–LXIV; 278-301; Analecta sacra et classica, V (1), Paris 1888, 165-176; G. Morin, Jean Diacre et le pseudo-Jérôme sur les épîtres de S. Paul: RBen 27 (1910) 113-117.

S. Zincone

JOHN, evangelist and theologian. 1. The gospels (particularly John) and the Acts of the Apostles give us much information on John the Evangelist (called Boanerges, "son of thunder"), brother of *James, son of Zebedee, beloved disciple of the Lord, witness to the Transfiguration and to the prayer in the Garden of Olives; alone among the apostles he was under the cross, and to him Jesus confided his Mother; after the resurrection Jesus pronounced mysterious words on his long life (Jn 21:20-23).

Many writers of the patristic period speak of his life. His mission has been linked with Asia Minor and with *Ephesus, acc. to *Irenaeus, *Clement of Alexandria and *Polycrates of Ephesus. According to legend, he suffered the persecutions of *Domitian and was led to *Rome, where he was put in a barrel of boiling oil (Tertullian, De praescr. 36; Acts of John of Prochorus) and passed a certain period of time relegated to the island of Patmos. *Papias distinguishes two Johns: the apostle, author of the gospel, and the presbyter, author of the Apocalypse and of the letters (Eusebius, HE 3,39,3). The patristic writers cite various episodes of his life—e.g., his encounter with *Cerinthus (HE 4,14,6), the story of his young disciple becoming a brigand (Clem. Alex., Quis dives 42) etc.

BS 6, 757-797; LCIK 7, 108-130; BHG 899-932; BHL 4316-4328; LTK³ 5, 866-871; W. von Loewenich, Das Johannes-Verständnis im zweiten Jahrhundert, Giessen 1932; M. Jugie, La mort et l'assomption de S. Jean l'Evangéliste, in Id., La mort et l'assomption de la Sainte Vierge, Vatican City 1944, 710-726; F.M. Braun, Jean le Théologien et son Évangile dans l'Église ancienne, Paris 1959; A. Kragerud, Der Lieblingsjünger im Johannes-Evangelium, Oslo 1959; J. Colson, L'énigme du disciple que Jésus aimait, Paris 1969; M.E. Boismard, Le martyre de Jean l'Apôtre, Paris 1966; O. Cullmann, Der joh. Kreis, Tübingen 1975.

2. The ample patristic literature concerning John the apostle, called in Greek "the theologian," can be divided into three parts: (a) commentaries on biblical books under his name, i.e., on the gospel, on the three letters and on the Apocalypse; (b) homiletic texts on John; (c) texts concerning the life of John, in particular apocryphal texts.

a. For what concerns the Greek world, the most ancient commentary on the gospel of John is the lost one of the gnostic *Heracleon. In Greek there remain the commentaries of *Origen, *Theodore of Mopsuestia (in *Syriac translation), *John Chrysostom and *Cyril of Alexandria; fragments also exist of commentaries by *Didymus of Alexandria, *Eustathius of Antioch, *Theodore of Heraclea, *Apollinaris of Laodicea, *Ammonius of Alexandria, *Severus of Antioch and fragments in the Greek catenae. The poetic paraphrase of the gospel of John of *Nonnus of Panopolis should be added to these texts. For the letters of John, there are no Greek commentaries. The Greek church also had, from the times of *Dionysius of Alexandria, serious doubts on the canonicity of the Apocalypse; the commentaries on the Apocalypse are relatively rare: the scholia on the Apocalypse by Origen, the commentaries of *Oecumenius and *Andreaw of Caesarea, and those in Syriac of Dionysius bar Salibi (cf. CPG 5, index, 138-140).

As for the Latin church, we have only three commentaries on the gospel of John. The first is that of St. *Augustine and two anonymous Irish commentaries of the 7th c. Concerning the letters of John, there were strong doubts about accepting 2-3 Jn; nevertheless, the commentaries of Augustine, *Cassiodorus and *Bede remain. The commentaries on the Apocalypse are more numerous: by *Victor of Petovium (Pettau), the Donatist *Tyconius, *Primasius of Hadrumetum, *Luculentius, *Caesarius of Arles (formerly attributed to *Gennadius), *Apringius of Beja, Bede, ps.-Alcuin (7th c.) and ps.-Isidore of Seville (see CPL, index, 277).

b. There are a certain number of Greek sermons about John: those of John Chrysostom and ps.-John Chrysostom, *Cyril of Alexandria, and some Byzantine writers: Theodore the Studite, Nicephorus Blemmydes, Nicetas Paphlagon and others. The commentary of Augustine is composed of homilies.

BHG; BHL; BHO cited above; W. von Loewenich, Das Johannes-Verständnis im zweiten Jahrhundert, Giessen 1932; J.C. Elowsky, John 1–10, ACCS NT 4a, Downers Grove, IL 2006; Id., John 11–21, ACCS NT 4b, Downers Grove, IL 2007; W.C. Weinrich, Revelation, ACCS NT 12, Downers Grove, IL 2005.

c. Under the name of John there is a group of apocryphal texts. The most important are the Acts of John; we have about two-thirds of the text; into these Acts, generally orthodox, a gnostic fragment has been inserted, chs. 94-102, 109. The Acts of John constitute the oldest text of the five great Acts and were written between 150 and 200, probably in a *Syriac environment or in Egypt. In the text the voyages and miracles of John in Asia Minor (Miletus, Laodicea, Smyrna and in particular Ephesus) and his death (Gr. metastasis) are recounted. Their purpose is not polemical and not even catechetical; they aim to interest the pagans in Christianity. In the Acts of John we find romantic scenes (the story of Callimachus) or anecdotes on philosophy (the scene with the fleas) and poetical fragments (e.g., a hymn of the dancing Christ). Alongside these Acts there is a group of texts on John which might contain fragments of a primitive text: that of the partridge (see John Cassian, Collat. 24, 21-2), the Letter of ps.-Titus, P. Oxyrhinchus 850 and Clement of Alexandria (on the converted thief, mentioned above). The Acts of John, read in heretical circles by the *Manicheans (cited in the book of Manichean psalms) and by the *Priscillianists, had been condemned various times by the ecclesiastical writers and by the Council of *Nicaea II (757); later they were partially destroyed and replaced with other texts: orthodox reworkings or completely different texts, e.g., the Acts of John of ps.-*Procorus in Greek (but also in *Coptic, *Armenian, Arabic, Ethiopian, *Georgian, paleo-Slavic translations), or the Life of John in Syriac and Arabic, or the His- toria Apostolorum Joannis et Jacobi in Armenian.

Nevertheless, they enjoyed a certain popularity; the drama Callimachus of Hrostwitha, a nun of Gandersheim (10th c.) confirms this. Another text was also popular, which was part of chs. 1-17 of the Acts of John, on the sojourn of John in Rome and of his passion in boiling oil, which gave rise to a liturgical feast—S. Johannis in oleo (6 May). The 5th book of ps.-Abdias is dedicated to John. There are, further, a Syriac and an Armenian Life of John and other texts: a Passion of ps.-Melito and a commentary of Symeon Metaphrastes. Next to these texts concerning the life of John there are texts under his name: an Arabic gospel, dealing with the whole life of Jesus; texts of apocalyptic character—alongside the canonical Apocalypse there are two others, an Ethiopian text, the Mysteries of John, and a book in Latin of revelations of John (of medieval Cathar origin but coming from Paulician circles); from gnostic circles comes the Apocryphon Ioannis of *Nag Hammadi (codices II, III, IV). Four texts of the Transitus of Mary appear under the name John; there exists further the Dialogues of John with Jesus (4th–5th c.) in Coptic. This shows the great importance of John in the orthodox and heterodox Christian tradition.

CANT 215-224.

Acts: in Lipsius Bonnet 2, 1, 151-216: read in this order: caps. 18-36, 87-105, 37-86, 106-115; the caps. 1-17 (sojourn in Rome) do not belong to the primitive Acts; fundamental ed. by E. Junod - J.D. Kaestli, CCAp 1-2, 1983.

Translations: Fr.: A.J. Festugière: Cahiers d'Orientalisme 6, Geneva 1983, 1-40; E. Junod - J.D. Kaestli, op. cit.; Id.: EApC 975-1037; It.: Erbetta 2, 27-131; Moraldi 2, 211-302, 583-609; Ger.: K. Schäferdiek, in Schneemelcher 2, 138-193; ps.-Prochorus: T. Zahn, Erlangen 1880 (Heidelberg 1975); It.: Erbetta 2, 68-110; Moraldi 2, 292-302 (summary); Pol.: M. Starowieyski: Studia Parad. 4 (1994) 131-202. Acta syr.: W. Wright, Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, Lo 1871 (Amsterdam 1968), 1-365, 2,3-60; Gospel: I. Galbiati, Milan 1957; L. Moraldi, Milan 1991 (It. tr.).

Apocryphon Joannis: see *Nag Hammadi.

Lipsius 1, 348-542; E. Junod - J.D. Kaestli, L'Histoire des Actes apocryphes du III^e au IX^e siècle: le cas des Actes de Jean, Lausanne 1972; Id., Le dossier des Actes de Jean: état de la question et perspectives nouvelles: ANRW II, 25, 6, 1988, 4293-4362; K. Schäferdiek, Die Passio Joannis und die Virtutes Joannis: AB 103 (1985) 367-382; G. Sirker-Wicklaus, Untersuchungen zu den Johannesakten: Untersuchungen zur Struktur, zur theologischen Tendenz und zum kirchengeschichtlichen Hintergrund, Bonn 1988; R.I. Pervo, Johannine Trajectories in the "Acts of John": Apocrypha 3 (1992) 47-68; E. Plümacher, Paignion und Biberfabel. Zum literarischen und popularphilosophischen Hintergrund von Acta Ioannis 60f. und 48-54: Apocrypha 3 (1992) 69-109; J.N. Brenner, The Apocryphal Acts of John, Kampen 1995; P.G. Schneider, The Mystery of the Acts of John: An Interpretation of the Hymn in Light of the Acts' Theology, San Francisco 1991; F. Sieger, Analyses rhétoriques et stylistiques portant sur les Actes de Jean et les Actes de Thomas: Apocrypha 8 (1997) 231-250; B.E. Bowe, Dancing in the Divine: The Hymn of the Dance in the Acts of John: JECS 7 (1999) 83-104; A. Jakab, Actes de Jean: état de la recherche (1982-1999): RSLR 36 (2000) 299-334.

M. Starowieyski

JOHN, Gospel of. Use and Interpretation in the Ancient Church. The Fourth Gospel, traditionally attributed to the apostle John, son of Zebedee, was completed in its present form not later than AD 100. Although fragment 457 of the Rylands papyrus (P52) shows that the gospel was known in Egypt from AD 130, nevertheless there is little evidence of its use outside of *gnostic circles before 170. The only certain citation before the writings of *Irenaeus of Lyons is found in *Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autolycum 11,22) ca. 170. *Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) could have been aware of the Johannine theological tradition, which acc. to certain authors would have had a *Syriac or *Antiochene stage of development, but he does not cite the gospel or allude to it; in fact, the silence with regard to John in the letter to the church in *Ephesus (traditional place of origin of the gospel) raises considerable doubt that Ignatius knew it. *Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165) does not explicitly cite the gospel, nor allude to it with clarity, a fact which is surprising if one thinks of his use of the concept of Logos. Although this concept primarily has affinity with contemporary *Stoicism, *Middle Platonism and the Judaic wisdom tradition, some reference to the Fourth Gospel would have reinforced the argumentation, whether in the Apologies or in the Dialogue with Trypho the Jew.

The lack of use of the Fourth Gospel and the silence regarding it in the first years of the 2nd c., normally considered "orthodox," could indicate either that the gospel was not known, or that there were hesitations in using it due to some suspicions concerning its orthodoxy. The available evidence, although scarce, points in the second direction. *Epiphanius (Haer. 51) speaks of a sect called the Alogi/Alogoi, who rejected the concept of Logos and attributed the Fourth Gospel to *Cerinthus, a gnostic who, acc. to Irenaeus (Adv. haer. III, 11,1), was an adversary of the apostle John and with whom, as noted by *Eusebius (HE 3, 28,6), John had a confrontation in the baths of Ephesus. The fragment of an unknown gospel (Egerton Papyrus 2), together with some *Nag Hammadi treatises (e.g., Gospel of Truth, Apocryphon of John, Gospel of Thomas, Gospel of Philip, Treatise on the Resurrection, Tripart Treatise) show that the gospel of John enjoyed a particular popularity in gnostic circles of the 2nd and 3rd c.

*Tatian, a member of the gnostic sect of the encratites (ca. 170), composed a harmony of the four gospels, the Diatessaron, in which, it seems, the Fourth Gospel was used as a cornice within which the Synoptic material was adapted. But even more significant is the fact that the most ancient known commentary of a text of the NT is the commentary of *Heracleon, a *Valentinian gnostic, on the Fourth Gospel, written around 170; this commentary had such an influence that in the first years of the 3rd c. the Alexandrian Ambrose, a convert from Valentinian gnosis, commissioned from his protégé *Origen the composition of a commentary which would expose the falsities of the interpretation of Heracleon. The removal of suspicion and the acknowledgment of the Fourth Gospel as orthodox is probably due to Irenaeus of Lyons (d. around 190), as much for the affirmation of its apostolic origin and equality with the Synoptics as for, above all, his having used it as a principal weapon in refuting the heretical teaching of the gnostics. Irenaeus affirms that John wrote to establish the "rule of truth" in the church and asserts that he, citing it, has proved how the gnostics, who "made large use" of the Fourth Gospel, were completely wrong. The Muratorian *Canon, which must have come from the Western church at the end of the 2nd c. (although the matter is heavily disputed) reflects the fact that the existence of the Fourth Gospel caused problems within the church. The Canon says that it was through the encouragement of his fellow disciples that John wrote the gospel. Thus, not only is the authority of the apostle claimed for it, but also that of the entire group of the disciples, which implied also a preeminence over the Synoptics.

A new attestation of the growing popularity of the Fourth Gospel is found in the writings of *Tertullian of Carthage (d. ca. 220). In particular, in the Adv. Praxean, he attacks the primitive *Sabellianism which conflated Father and Son; a large section of this work contains a complete study of the gospel of John (op. cit., 26), and through its exegesis Tertullian demolishes the adversarial position affirming at the same time the doctrine of the distinctions in the unity of the divinity. This is also true for *Hippolytus, who combats a similar doctrine in the Contra Noetum. It seems that the Sabellians had conflated Father and Son on the basis of some texts taken principally from the Fourth Gospel, such as "I and the Father are one" (10,30), "Who has seen me has seen the Father" (14,9), "The Word was God" (1,1). These authors, together with *Novatian, who lived late in the 3rd c., show how the Fourth Gospel testified to the fact that the unity of Father and Son, which they did not deny, is such as to imply the distinction between them; the gospel therefore proclaims that the model of relationship between Father and Son is not that of identity but that of distinction within unity.

At the end of the 2nd c., at *Alexandria, *Clement affirms the preeminence of the Fourth Gospel as a "spiritual gospel" in comparison with the Synoptics, which relate simply "the material facts" (Eus., HE 6, 14,7). Like Irenaeus and others, Clement uses the gospel to refute gnosticism (Excerpta ex Theodoto). His successor, Origen, both in his commentary and in many other writings, underlines the supreme importance and the spiritual value of the gospel. He affirms that the gospels are "the firstfruits of all the Scripture, but that of John is the firstfruit of the gospels, and no one can grasp its meaning, unless he has reposed on the breast of Jesus and has received Mary from Jesus that she be his mother also" (Comm. in Joh. 1,4).

Most of the use and the interpretation of the Fourth Gospel in the 2nd and 3rd c. has as a point of departure the Prologue (vv. 1-18) with its concept of Logos. The speculation on this concept and the variety of ideas indicated by the Greek term logos contributed to the development of the imaginative gnostic systems, on the one hand, and of different apologetic-philosophical theologies, on the other. It might have been the aversion to every kind of speculation on the Logos which led the Alogi to the rejection of the Fourth Gospel and the Sabellians to the identification of God and Logos. Replying to the latter, Tertullian discussed different notions of Logos but, carrying his demonstration of the distinctions within the unity of the divinity further, left the concept of Logos in the background and concentrated on the relationship between Father and Son, which is the focal point of Johannine theology. Thus the reflection on the Logos opened the way for the Western (Latin) theology after Tertullian to reflect on Father and Son, their mutual unity and reciprocal distinction.

In the East the concept of Logos continued to play a central role, whether in the philosophical theology ("Christian Platonism") of Alexandria or in the more biblical and less philosophical tradition of Syria and Asia Minor (Antiochene). At Alexandria, and later at Caesarea, under the influence of the learned Origen, the Logos as preexisting divine being was described as the author of creation, having become in Jesus Christ the master and enlightener of human beings and the mediator of their salvation. The idea of the *subordination of the Logos to God was inherent in this philosophical system. The Logos is theos but not ho theos (Jn 1:1). Connected with this emphasis was the difficulty of maintaining the reality of the humanity of Jesus: there were no doubts that the divinity of the Logos became flesh (Jn 1:14), even if it was that of a divinity of a subordinate rank, but it was difficult for the Alexandrians to admit the full and complete humanity in the *incarnation. Both of these problems became central in the controversies of the 4th c. The Antiochene tradition, on the one hand, as far as we can say based on the scarce testimonies of the 3rd c. or the beginning of the 4th which have reached us, interpreted the Logos not as an intermediate entity but rather in the light of the OT concept of the creative, revelatory and salvific "Word of Yahweh," enriched in content with the parallel ideas in the sapiential literature. With its greater emphasis on history, the Antiochene tradition underlined the full humanity of Jesus but had difficulty in distinguishing between Word and God. In other words, the monotheistic interest, inherited from Palestinian Judaism, militated against the idea of a personal or hypostatic distinction between God and the Word, between Father and Son. The theological antagonism between these two traditions was to a great extent a question of interpretation of the entire Fourth Gospel and of its Prologue in particular.

When the different theologies entered into conflict in the 4th and 5th c., many arguments concerned the interpretation of the Fourth Gospel. The explosion of the *Arian controversy (around 317) at Alexandria led quickly to a large-scale conflict which involved all the different theological traditions of the Eastern empire, with repercussions also in the West. The Arians maintained that the Logos (Son) was a creature and that there was a time when the Logos did not exist. Having denied the eternity of the Logos, they reached the point of denying the fullness of the humanity of Jesus, so that the incarnation, for them, became "the incarnation of that which was not God in that which was not human." A study of the extensive material related to the controversy which has reached us—e.g., the polemics of *Athanasius against the Arians, the Trin. of *Hilary of Poitiers, the works of Eusebius of Caesarea against *Marcellus of Ancyra, those of *Basil of Caesarea and of *Gregory of Nyssa against *Eunomius—demonstrate the importance of the role played by the Fourth Gospel in the doctrinal debate of this period. The writing of the NT which Tertullian had found so useful at the beginning of the 3rd c. in demonstrating the distinction between Father and Son showed itself equally useful in the 4th c. in showing their unity against those who overexaggerated their distinction. The same thing is true also for the debates on the *Holy Spirit (e.g., Basil, De Spiritu sancto; Athanasius, Eps. ad Serapionem) and for the controversy on the doctrines of *Apollinaris (e.g., Gregory of Nyssa, Antirrheticus; ps.-Athanasius, Contra Apollinarium).

Because it is the NT book in which the idea of the incarnation is most explicit, it is natural that the Fourth Gospel became central in the debates concerning the full divinity and humanity of Jesus Christ.

Together with the polemical use of the Fourth Gospel in theological attacks and counterattacks, a considerable number of commentaries on John saw the light in the 4th and 5th c., but unfortunately many are known only by name or in fragments. We know of commentaries by *Asterius the Sophist, an Arian of the first period (ca. 335), *Theodore of Heraclea (ca. 350), *Didymus the Blind (d. ca. 398), Apollinaris (d. ca. 390) and Ammonius of Nitria (d. ca. 370), but they are known principally through the catenae (see Wiles, 4-5). Some more ample commentaries have survived: that of *Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428) in *Syriac translation and that of Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444); also, the Homilies on John of *John Chrysostom (preached before 398) and *Augustine's Treatises on John (ca. 416)—although these last are primarily of a homiletic character, they contain exegetical material of great importance.

M. Comeau, Saint Augustin: Exégète du quatrième évangile, Paris 1930; W. von Loewenich, Das Johannesverständnis im zweiten Jahrhunderte (ZNTW, Beiheft 13), Giessen 1932; J.N. Sanders, The Fourth Gospel in the Early Church, Cambridge 1943; A. Orbe, En los albores de la exégesis Johannea (Joh 1,3) (Estudios Valentinianos 2), Rome 1955; T.E. Pollard, The Exegesis of John X.30 in the Early Trinitarian Controversies: NTS 3 (1956/57) 334-349; M.F. Wiles, The Spiritual Gospel: The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel in the Early Church, Cambridge 1960; A.K. Helmbold, The Nag Hammadi Gnostic Texts and the Bible, Grand Rapids, MI 1967; M. Simonetti, Giovanni 14:28 nella controversia ariana, Kyriakon Festschr., Quasten, Münster 1970, I, 151-161; E. Pagels, The Johannine Gospel in Gnostic Exegesis: Heracleon's Commentary on John, Missoula, MT 1973; D. Pazzini, Il prologo di Giovanni in Cirillo di Alessandria, Brescia 1977; Id., In principio era il Logos: Origene e il prologo del vangelo di Giovanni, Brescia 1983; H.J. Sieben, Exegesis Patrum: saggio bibliografico sull'esegesi biblica dei Padri della Chiesa, Rome 1983; Id., Kirchenväterhomilien zum Neuen Testament: ein Repertorium der Textausgaben und Übersetzungen, mit einem Anhang der Kirchenvaterkommentare, Steenbrugis 1991; G. Iacopino, Il Vangelo di Giovanni nei testi gnostici copti, Rome 1993; see also the publication: AnSE 11 (1994)–14 (1997); G. Lawless, Desiderium sinus cordis est. Biblical Resonances in Augustine's Tractatus in Evangelium Iohannis 40: Augustinian Studies 48 (1998) 305-339; J.C. Elowsky, John 1–10, ACCS NT 4a, Downers Grove, IL 2006; Id., John 11–21, ACCS NT 4b, Downers Grove, IL 2007.

T.E. Pollard

JOHN, primicerius notariorum. A usurper in the West (423–425). Perhaps of *Gothic origin, John was primicerius notariorum in 423 when he took power at *Rome at the death of *Honorius. But not having obtained the acknowledgment of *Theodosius II and feeling himself threatened by *Boniface, usurper in *Africa, John sought the support of the *Huns through the mediation of *Aetius. In 425 he was imprisoned at *Ravenna and then killed. *Procopius (Bell. Vand. I, 3,6-7) remembers him favorably.

PLRE II, 594-595; O. Seeck, PWK IX/2, 1745-6; O. Ulrich-Bansa, La monetazione di Giovanni (423-425 A.D.): NAC 5 (1976) 277-290.

E. Malaspina

JOHN I, pope (523–526). Of Tuscan origin, he succeeded *Hormisdas 13 August 523. As pope he found himself involved in the battles between *Theodoric and the Byzantine emperor *Justin, who sought to unify the empire from a religious point of view, acting above all against the *monothelites and the *Arians. Theodoric, protector of the Arian *Goths, forced Pope John, at this point sick, along with five bishops and four senators, to travel to *Constantinople to obtain from Justin the annulment of his decree along with the restitution of the churches to the Arians and the return to Arianism of the converts to Catholicism. John reached Constantinople, perhaps at the beginning of 526, and was received triumphantly, obtaining recognition of his supremacy from the patriarch of the city. He remained there several months, celebrating Easter there. The success of his mission was only partial, since Justin promised only the restitution of the churches. Upon his return to *Ravenna, Theodoric, now suspicious of everyone, had him locked in prison, where John died 18 May 526, and his body was carried to Rome. His name is linked to the date of the celebration of Easter, inasmuch as he accepted the advice of *Dionysius Exiguus, i.e., to follow the Alexandrian cycle of nineteen years, which became the usual cycle of the Latin church.

LP I, 104-107; 275-278; Gregorio M., Dial. III, 2-3; DTC 8, 593-595; BS 6, 926-927; Fliche-Martin IV, 550-1; M. Rosi, L'ambasceria di papa Giovanni I: Archivio della Soc. Rom. di Storia Patria 21 (1897) 567-584; B. Krusch, Ein Bericht der päpstlichen Kanzelei an Papst Johannes I von 526 und die Oxforder Hs. Digby 63 von 814, in Festschrift Kehr, Munich 1926, 48-58; L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII cent.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 101-103; Patrologia IV, 137-8; EPapi I, 483-487.

A. Di Berardino

JOHN II, pope (533–535). To prevent battles of succession, *Boniface II had designated his deacon *Vigilius, who would later be elected in 537, but having encountered strong opposition he had to withdraw the decree (LP I, 281), and at his death the Roman Mercurius was elected (31 December 532), who took the name John—the first example of a name change. He was a priest of the church of St. Clement, where evidence remains of his presence. The *theopaschite controversy (see *Hormisdas) began again on the part of the Scythian monks against the *acoemetae, who turned to the pope; also *Justinian sent him a profession of faith, which had already been published as an edict (CJ I, 8), and requested the condemnation of the acoemetae. The pope not only agreed with the emperor (CSEL 35, 320-328) but also sent a letter to the senate of *Ravenna (cf. RBen 78 [1968] 83), in which he gave explanations of the theological positions of Justinian (Mansi 8, 803-806; DS 401-402) and condemned the acoemetae. Furthermore, he requested the king *Athalaric to reinforce an earlier senatus consultus against simoniac elections (Cassiod., Var. IX, 15-16). He also had an epistolary exchange with *Caesarius of Arles. He died 8 May 535. Five letters from him survive.

CPL 1613-1614; Verzeichnis 398; PL 66, 13-31; ACO IV/2, XXVIII-XXXII and 206-210; LP 1, 285-286; DTC 8, 595-597; EC 6, 579-80; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 108-117; M.V. Anastos, Justinian's Despotic Control over the Church as Illustrated by His Edicts on Theopaschite Formula and His Letter to Pope John II in 533, in Mélanges Georges Ostrogorsky, II, Beograd 1964, 1-11; A. Chavasse, Composition et date des recueils anciens passés dans la seconde partie du "Parisinus" Lat. 1771: RBen 78 (1968) 82-86; S.M. Meo, La dottrina mariana e le rispettive formule sintetiche dei Papi Ormisda e Giovanni II, del VI sec., in De cultu mariano saec. VI-IX, III, Rome 1972, 17-32; L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 109-118; Patrologia IV, 141-142; Epapi I, 499-503.

A. Di Berardino

JOHN II of Constantinople (the Cappadocian), patriarch (d. 520). He was a priest and syncellus (spiritual counselor) at the time of *Timothy I, patriarch of Constantinople, and his successor (518). Although of orthodox sentiments, he accepted the Henoticon, imposed by the emperor *Anastatius, but at the death of the latter (518) with the Catholic *Justin I rising to the throne, he came out in favor of the Council of *Chalcedon (451) and thereafter put back into the diptychs the names of Pope *Leo and Pope *Hormisdas, at that time on the throne of Peter. With the Endemusa Synod 20 July 518, he put an end to the *Acacian schism which had endured since 484

(publication of the Henoticon), and he contacted Hormisdas to reestablish ecclesiastical communion. The pope sent him a delegation to have him sign a libellus fidei and requested that the names of Acacius and his successors in the schism, along with the emperors *Zeno and Anastasius, be canceled from the diptychs (Mansi 8, 451.454-456). In the aforementioned synod the patriarch of Constantinople received for the first time the title of ecumenical patriarch (Mansi 8, 1041). He died in 520, while he, on behalf of Pope Hormisdas, was dealing with the *theopaschite question raised by the Scythian monks. Some letters from him survive.

CPG III, 6828-6835; ACO 111, 76-7; PL 63, 429, 443-444, 449-50, 480-481, 506-507; Hfl-Lecl 2, 1046-1053; DTC 8, 756; LTK 5, 1049; Cath 6, 511; Patrologia V, 435.

A. De Nicola

JOHN II of Jerusalem, bishop (d. 417). Successor of *Cyril as bishop of *Jerusalem (386–417). *Epiphanius, supported by *Jerome after 393, began the first *Origenist controversy against him, considered the protector of the Origenists. The principal documents come from Jerome: Letter 51 (translation of a letter of Epiphanius) and Contra Johannem Hierosolymitanum. According to these sources and acc. to *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 30 [31]), John justified himself in a memoria addressed to *Theophilus of Alexandria. He was also involved in the *Pelagian controversy, having received Pelagius at Jerusalem and convened an assembly in this city concerning him, and having later taken part in the Council of Diospolis-Lydda (Diospoli) which declared Pelagius innocent. A confession of faith by John has reached us in *Syriac translation. Perhaps he is the author of the Mystagogical Catecheses attributed also to Cyril.

CPG 3620-3627; C. Caspari, Ungedruckte . . . Quellen zur Geschichte des Taufsymbols und der Glaubensregel, I, Christiania 1866, 161-212 (all that remains of the writings of John); F. Cavallera, Saint Jérôme, Louvain 1922; P. Nautin, L'excommunication de Saint Jérôme: AEHE 80-81, fasc. 2, 7-37; E. Clark, The Origenist Controversy: The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate, Princeton, NJ 1992.

H. Crouzel

JOHN III, pope (561–574). A native of *Rome, he succeeded *Pelagius I (556–561). Son of a certain Anastasius, after 554 John probably wrote while a deacon an Expositio in Heptateucum, Collectanea in IV Evangelia and Commentarii in epistulas S. Pauli (see CPL 951-952), but this is not certain. He promoted the restoration of the catacombs of martyrs and continued the construction of the basilica of the Holy Apostles in Via Lata, begun by his predecessor. The era of John is dense with important and also dramatic events for the church, *Italy and Rome. *Narses, who had defeated the *Ostrogoths and removed the menace of Franks and Alemanni, controlled Italy on behalf of *Byzantium. According to the sources (LP, Paul the Deacon, Agnellus), it seems that the Romans did not care for the Byzantine general, esp. because of the hard repressions ordered by him after the disorder that had broken out in Italy at that time (see LP I, 305), and John seems to have acted to soften this attitude of the citizens and faithful of the city.

During his pontificate first *Justinian (565) and later Narses himself (570) died. Further, in 565 Alboinus had taken *Milan and had entered Pavia after a long siege, installing himself in the royal palace of *Theodoric. The next year the *Longobards (Lombards), now established in central Italy (Spoleto), aimed for Rome. After the dispute of the *Three Chapters John had reestablished ecclesial communion with *Africa and N Italy, but not with *Aquileia. He restored the bishops Salonius and Sagittarius to their sees (see Jaffé 1040). According to Chavasse, John compiled the so-called Leonine Sacramentary, contained in the Codex Veronensis LXXXV (80), during a retreat near the cemetery of Praetextatus. He died in 574.

CPL 1704; PL 77, 655, n. h; PL 77, 1348; MGH, Ep. I, 230; PL 72, 13-181 (apocryphal writings attributed to John); LP I, 305-307; H. Grisar, Roma alla fine del mondo antico, II, Rome 1943, 170 and passim; DTC 8, 597 and 1266; 13, 2406; 15, 1915; A. Chavasse, Le Sacramentaire dit Léonien: SE 37 (1984) 151-190 (on the codex Veronensis LXXXV, 80); J.N.D. Kelly, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes, Oxford-New York 1986, 64; Dizionario storico del Papato, ed. Ph. Levillain, I, Milan 1996, 640-641; LTK³ 5, 943 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 537-539 (M.C. Pennacchio).

M. Spinelli

JOHN III Scholasticus (d. 577). Patriarch of *Constantinople (565–577). Born from a clerical family at Sirimis (Antioch) around 510–515, scholastikos (lawyer) by profession, he was ordained a priest by Domninus patriarch of *Antioch (545–559), who chose him as his *apocrisarius at *Constantinople. Called by the emperor *Justinian, acc. to the prophecy of St. *Simeon Stylite the Younger, to replace the deposed patriarch *Eutychius (31 January 565), he treated the latter and the *monophysites harshly, declaring their ordinations invalid. After his death (31 August 577), Eutychius, back in his see, did not spare the memory and the relatives of the defunct patriarch. His name remains linked to a double canonical collection: the Synagogē of the Fifty Titles and the Collectio of the Eighty-Seven Chapters. The Catechetical Logos on the *Trinity held in 570 and refuted by *John Philoponus (Photius, Bibl., cod. 85) has been lost; it was perhaps identical with the Mystagogia which *John of Nikiu attributes to him (Chronica, ed. Zotenberg, 567). The identification of John Scholasticus with the historian *John Malalas should be discarded.

CPG 7750-7751; PG 103, 240; Grumel, Regestes 2, 250-259; Beck 422-423; ODB 2, 1067-1068; Patrologia V, 89, 94-97, 671-673.

D. Stiernon

JOHN IV, pope (640–642). Of Dalmatian origin and son of an imperial scholasticus, he was elected 4 August 640, but had to wait for the approval of the exarch of *Ravenna, by whom he was consecrated 24 December. In the meanwhile, with the other servantes locum sedis apostolicae and signing himself Johannes diaconus et in Dei nomine electus, he sent a letter to the Northern Irish to exhort them to celebrate Easter acc. to the Catholic custom and not the Jewish (PL 80, 601-602). In January 641 he condemned *monothelitism in a Roman synod (see Mansi 10, 607-610) and sent the Acts to the emperor *Heraclius and to *Pyrrhus, patriarch of *Constantinople, where the Acts perhaps arrived after the emperor was already dead (11 February 641). It seems, however, that in the meantime he had already distanced himself from the Ekthesis* (see L. Magi, La sede romana, 205-6; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato, 427). Pyrrhus responded confirming his monothelitism. John then sent to the emperor *Constantine III a long letter (Apologia Honorii: Mansi 10, 682-686), but when the messenger arrived at Constantinople *Constance II was emperor. In this letter the pope defended the memory of his predecessor and his orthodoxy explaining his letter to Sergius (see *Honorius) and criticizing Pyrrhus, who had used Honorius as an authority to propagate his doctrine. The emperor responded—his letter has reached us only in Syriac—in a very positive but ambiguous manner, professing his orthodoxy (L. Magi, La sede romana, 208-211).

John also gathered a great deal of money and sent the abbot Martin to Dalmatia and Istria, invaded by Avars and Slavs, to ransom Christian prisoners and recover the relics of the saints from the destroyed churches (LP I, 330). He died 12 August and was buried in St. Peter's.

CPL 1729-1731; Verzeichnis, 399; PL 80, 601-608; PLS 4, 1660-1662; LP I, 330; III, 94; Hfl-Lecl 3, 392-398; DTC 7, 108-109; 7, 123-124; 8, 597-599; Fliche-Martin V, 531 (cf. index); P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei Papi del secolo VII, Milan 1971, 378-379.; 426-433 (cf. index); L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII cent.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 206-212; I. Nikolajeviç, The Redemption of Captives in Dalmatia in the 6th and 7th Century: Balcanicoslava 2 (Belgrade 1973) 73-79; Patrologia IV, 178-9; EPapi I, 592-594.

A. Di Berardino

JOHN IV of Jerusalem (d. 593/594). Formerly a monk of the *acoemetae at *Constantinople and patriarch of the Holy City from 574, he is known through a letter of Abas, catholicos of Albania (Caucasus), preserved for us in *Armenian and datable to between 574 and 577. John exhorts him to defend the *Chalcedonian doctrine of the two natures of Christ and to reject the solicitations, coming from neighboring Armenia, to pass over to the *monophysite faith. Of particular interest are the profession of trinitarian and christological faith, free of expressions close to Neochalcedonianism, and the polemical impulses against the addition to the Trisagion of the formula ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς (John seems, furthermore, to know apocryphal letters to *Peter the Fuller, analogous to the collection of the Collectio Sabbaitica in ACO III) and against the *aphthartodocetist convictions of *Julian of Halicarnassus. The letter also contains a meaningful acknowledgment of the primacy of *Peter and the infallibility of his successors in the Roman see.

CPG 7021; Epistula ad Abatem episcopum Albanorum, ed. K. Ter-Mekerttschian: Ararat 29 (1896) 252-256; A. Vardarian, Des Johannes von Jerusalem Brief an den albanischen Katholikos Abas: OC n.s. 2 (1912) 64-77; H. Hurter, Ein Zeugnis aus dem 6. Jht. für die Unfehlbarkeit des Papstes: ZKTh 34 (1910) 218-219; S. Salaville, Un témoignage oriental en faveur de la primauté et de l'infaillibilité du pape an VI^e siècle: EO 13 (1910) 171-172; La "Narratio de rebus Armeniae," ed. G. Garitte (CSCO 132), Louvain 1952; R.W. Thomson, Jerusalem and Armenia, SP XVIII, Kalamazoo 1986, 77-91 (repr. in Studies in Armenian Literature and Christianity, Great Aldershot 1994); N. Garsoïan, L'église arménienne et le grand schisme d'Orient (CSCO 574, Subs. 100), Louvain 1999, 490-501; Grillmeier II/3, 168-174.

L. Perrone

JOHN IV the Faster. Patriarch of *Constantinople (d. 595). Born at Constantinople between 500 and 530, an engraver by profession, he was numbered among the clergy of Hagia Sophia after 505. A deacon and patriarchal treasurer, he succeeded, unwillingly, Eutychius (d. 5/6 April 582) in the patriarchal see. A man of great austerity (thus the name), he revealed himself to be intransigent concerning the reconciliation of apostates, but enjoyed among *monophysite circles a reputation as a peacemaker. Around 585 he opened the controversy with the Roman see concerning the title of ecumenical patriarch, while the appeal to St. *Gregory I by the heresiarchs condemned by him provoked further tension with the apostolic see. He died in extreme poverty 2 September 595, the day the Byzantine church commemorates him. Some canonical collections are attributed to him.

CPG 7555-7560; DSp 8,586-589; ODB 2, 1049; RGG4 3, 522-523; Patrologia V, 97-100; J.H. Erickson, Penitential Discipline in the Orthodox Canonical Tradition: St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 21 (1977) 191-206; M. Arranz, I penitenziali bizantini, Rome 1993.

D. Stiernon

JOHN V, pope (685–686). There is hardly any information about him. A native of Syria but a member of the Roman clergy, he took part in the delegation sent by Pope *Agatho (678–681) to the Sixth Ecumenical Council (Constantinople III), which condemned *monothelitism and signaled the reconciliation between the church of Rome on the one hand and the imperial court and the church of Constantinople on the other. John succeeded *Benedict II (684–685) and quickly obtained the imperial confirmation via the exarch of *Ravenna, thanks to this facilitation introduced by the emperor Constantine IV. He was consecrated 23 July 685. The only act of this pope recorded by the sources is the revocation of the privilege of consecrating the bishops of Sardinia, which the archbishop of Cagliari was exercising abusively. John died 2 August 686 and was buried in St. Peter's Basilica.

PL 96, 425-428; MGH 7, 410-412 (G.H. Pertz); LP I, 366-367; Jaffé I, 2128; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, Tübingen 1933, 620-631; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 315-317; New Catholic Encyclopedia 7, Washington 1967, 1008ff.; LTK³ 5, 943 (G. Schwaiger); Catholicisme 6, 474-475 (H. Chirat); Th.F.X. Noble, La repubblica di S. Pietro. Nascita dello Stato pontificio (680-825), Genoa 1998, 45, 180-181, 184, 198 and 218; EPapi I, 625-626 (L.A. Berto).

M. Spinelli

JOHN VI, pope (701–705). Born in Greece, he succeeded *Sergius I (687–701) two months after the death of the latter and was consecrated 30 October 701. John had been elected despite the opposition of the emperor Tiberius III, who actually tried to eliminate him. During this pontificate the new exarch of *Ravenna Theophylactus marched on *Rome, earning for himself, however, the hostility of both the population and the army. The pope nevertheless protected him and acted to calm everyone's spirits. John carried out a similar mediating action faced with the Longobard Gisulph, duke of Benevento, who had become master of Sora and was lording it over the inhabitants. The pope persuaded him to spare them and obtained the release of prisoners with the treasure of the church. John also took interest in the archbishop *Wilfrid who, after having been restored to the episcopal see of *York by Pope *Agatho (678–681) in 679, was being opposed again. In the Roman synod of 704 John reestablished him for the second time in his rights, sending a letter in his favor (which survives) to the kings of Northumbria and of Mercia, Ethelred and Alfred. He died 11 January 705.

LP I, 383-384; MGH VI, 250 (W. Levison); A Dictionary of Christian Biography, London 1882, 392ff.; DTC 8/1, Paris 1923-24, 599ff.; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, Tübingen 1933, 636, 688 and 726; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 408-410; P. Conte, Regesto delle lettere dei papi del secolo VIII, Milan 1984, 189-191; Grande dizionario illustrato dei Papi, Casale Monf. 1989, 232-233; LTK³ 5, 943 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 637-638 (L.A. Berto).

M. Spinelli

JOHN VI of Constantinople (d. 715). Deacon and librarian of the patriarchate, he became patriarch of *Constantinople in 712 and held this seat until 715, the year of his death (E.W. Brooks, On the Lists of the Patriarchs of Constantinople from 638–715: ByzZ 6 [1897] 53; Mansi 12, 190). The report of Zonara 14, 27 (see Theophanes, Chron. a. 6177) acc. to which John was deposed, is doubtful. The emperor Philippicus Bardanes, an obstinate *monothelite, deposed the solidly orthodox patriarch Cyrus in January of 712 and replaced him with John VI. After Philippicus's fall, it was John VI who crowned the new emperor *Anastasius II, who publicly repudiated the monothelite policy of his predecessor. As these new orientations were strengthening, in June of 713 John sent to the pope the Epistula ad Constantinum papam, a synodal letter in which he justified his conduct in having favored monothelitism, because having been constrained by the emperor, he had done so for prudence's sake, hoping to extract some good from him, but he remained inwardly orthodox; he asked pardon for his guilt and claimed to have sworn to orthodoxy in the presence of the Roman *apocrisiarii.

CPG 8000; PG 96, 1416-1433; Mansi 12, 196-208; Fliche-Martin V, 283-285; Grumel, Regestes 1, 250-1; EP 1, 641-647 (spec. 646); J.-M. Sansterre, Le pape Constantin Ier (708–715) et la politique religieuse des empereurs Justinien II et Philippikos: Archivum Historiae Pontificiae 22 (1984) 7-29.

A. Labate

JOHN VII, pope (705–707). A native of Magna Grecia, son of a certain Plato, a Byzantine imperial functionary, he succeeded *John VI (701–705) and was consecrated 1 March 705. The new emperor *Justinian II sent him the Acts of the Council *in Trullo (or Quinisext) of 691–692, already rejected by Pope *Sergius I (687–701), for approval and possible corrections. On this occasion John behaved with a certain ambiguity, sending back the decrees to the emperor without introducing any modifications to them, so that it was uncertain whether the pope had intended to approve them in this way, as they were, or to reject them without further ado. John continued the mediating effort of his predecessor with the *Longobards (Lombards), obtaining from King Aribert the restitution of the ecclesiastical patrimony of the Cottian Alps. He defended monasticism and restored the abbey of Subiaco, destroyed by the Longobards. At Rome he promoted the construction or the restoration of various churches. In the chapel of the Virgin, at St. Peter, some fragments remain of the mosaics finished under his pontificate. He died 18 October 707. From John we have a letter to the bishops of Britain.

LP I, 385-387; DTC 8/1, Paris 1923-24, 600ff.; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, Tübingen 1933, 630-637; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 410-412; J. Richards, The Popes and the Papacy in the Early Middle Ages, London 1979, 211ff., 226, 244, 267 and 270; J.-M. Sansterre, Jean VII (705–707): idéologie pontificale et réalisme politique, in Rayonnement grec. Hommages à Charles Delvoye, Brussels 1982, 377-388; Grande dizionario illustrato dei Papi, Casale Monf. 1989, 234-235; Dizionario storico del Papato (Ph. Levillain), I, Milan 1996, 642-643; LTK³ 5, 943-944 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi I, 638-640 (L.A. Berto).

M. Spinelli

JOHN (III) of Alexandria, bishop (d. 689). Bishop of *Alexandria between 681 and 689, when the Arab domination of Egypt was a fait accompli, but the relationships between Christians and followers of Islam were those of mutual respect. John in particular was in close contact with the emir Abd el-Aziz, in whose presence he held at least two disputes with representatives of the *Chalcedonian confession and the Jewish religion. The emir seems to have permitted him to see to the organization of the ecclesiastical hierarchy and the restoration of sacred buildings. His homily In Honor of St. Mena, transmitted in Coptic, recalls the legend of the saint, but above all speaks of the sanctuary city, an important goal for pilgrimages from every part of Christendom (ed. J. Drescher, Apa Mena).

A. van Lantschoot, Les "Questions de Théodore," ST 192, Vatican City 1957; J. Drescher, Apa Mena, Il Cairo 1946; Coptic Encyclopedia 4, 1337-1338.

T. Orlandi

JOHN ARKAPH (d. after 338). John, called Arkaph, bishop of Memphis (Egypt), 4th c. At the death of *Melitius he became leader of the Melitians. An enemy of *Athanasius, he began a campaign of accusations against him, including one of violence against Ischyras and another concerning the killing of the Melitian bishop *Arsenius of Hypselis. The innocence of Athanasius having been proven once, John, after a brief reconciliation, brought the accusations up again at the Council of *Tyre (335), in collusion with the *Eusebians. After the exile inflicted on Athanasius by the council, *Constantine also had John exiled in the hopes of a pacification (Athan., Ap. c. Arian. 61-69).

Simonetti, 113-114; 131; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVᵉ siècle (328-373), Rome 1996.

E. Prinzivalli

JOHN bar Aphtonia (475/480–537). Known through the biography written in Syriac by one of his disciples, who has remained anonymous (ed. F. Nau, Histoire de Jean bar Aphtonia: ROC 7 [1902] 97-135), John was born ca. 475–480, after the death of his father, rector at *Edessa, and for this reason he bears the name of his mother, Aphtonia. At the age of around fifteen he sought to enter into the monastery of St. Thomas at *Seleucia on the Orontes, but because of his young age he was allowed only to take care of guests and strangers, and he received the monastic habit only after seven years. Before dedicating himself to studies, he had to exercise, for a certain time, the profession of carpenter.

With the arrival of the emperor *Justin (518), the reaction against the anti-Chalcedonians soon made itself felt, and the bishop of Seleucia, Nonnus, had to leave his see and seek refuge with his own family at Amida; the *monophysite monks of the monastery of St. Thomas were chased out by their superiors. They chose John as their leader, and despite everything, they remained in the monastery, or they returned there fairly quickly, because in 528 John was still its *archimandrite.

The fight against the monophysites conducted by the patriarch of Antioch, *Ephrem, was still more violent, and this time John had to leave Seleucia for good, before 531. He went on to found on the left bank of the Euphrates, ancient Europos (Jerabis), the monastery of Qenneshrin, of which he was the first superior. John made of this monastery a center for studies of Greek and Syriac letters, where many generations of learned Hellenists were educated (such as *Thomas of Heraclea, Severus Sabokt, *Jacob of Edessa) and a center of ascetic life where the monophysite church sought a good number of its patriarchs.

During the reign of Emperor *Justinian I, John made many trips to *Constantinople, and around 531, in particular, because of his knowledge of Greek and Syriac, he was designated as the secretary of an assembly of orthodox and monophysite bishops who had come to discuss liturgical questions: the *Syriac account of the meeting has been published recently.

John died in 537, after having chosen his successor, Alexander, whom he recommended strongly not to suppress any of the precepts which were needed to govern the monastery of Qenneshrin. John apparently composed a commentary on the Song of Songs, of which nothing remains except fragments in as-yet-unpublished catenae. He is also the author of hymns which, once translated into Syriac (by the abbot Paul around 624), were added to the Octatheucum of *Severus of Antioch, like the Vita (at least the principal part) of this same patriarch.

Introductory studies: Duval 359; Baumstark 180-181; Chabot 73; Patrologia V, 225-226. Editions: Vita di Giovanni, ed. F. Nau, Histoire de Jean bar Aphtonia: ROC 7 (1902) 97-135; S.P. Brock, The Conversations with the Syrian Orthodox under Justinian: OCP 47 (1981) 87-121. See also J.W. Watt, A Portrait of John bar Aphtonia, Founder of the Monastery of Qenneshre, in H.W. Drijvers - J.W. Watt, Portraits of Spiritual Authority: Religious Power in Early Christianity, Byzantium and the Christian Orient, Leiden 1999, 155-169.

J.-M. Sauget

JOHN bar Kursos (482/483–538). Bishop of Tella. There are two biographies known of this personage, both dating to the 6th c. The first was written by one of his companions in the apostolate, Elias by name (ed. H.G. Kleyn, Leiden 1882); the second is one of the chapters of the Lives of the Blessed Orientals of *John of Ephesus (ed. E.W. Brooks, PO 18, 513-526). Born at Callinicus in 482–483, John first embraced a military career, which he later left to follow his vocation to religious life. Named bishop of Tella (or Constantina), he was consecrated by *Jacob of Sarug himself in 519. He was soon expelled from his diocese (521), at the time of the emperor *Justin and of the orthodox patriarch of *Antioch *Ephrem, because he was an overly ardent propagator of *monophysite ideas. He took refuge in a monastery of Mount Shigar. On returning from a voyage to *Constantinople around 533—the religious policy of the emperor *Justinian was more conciliatory—he was, however, arrested and imprisoned, first at *Nisibis, then at Antioch, where he died in 538 at the age of 55 years. He is remembered as a martyr in the *Jacobite calendar 6 November.

His literary work preserved in Syriac consists of Warnings and Precepts (28) in the form of canons directed to the clergy on liturgical questions (ed. C. Kuberczyk, Leipzig 1901; F. Nau, Paris 1906), of Answers (48) to questions posed by a certain priest Sergius on the *Eucharist (ed. Th.J. Lamy, Louvain 1859), a commentary on the Trisagion and a profession of faith addressed to the monasteries of his diocese. (The last two treatises are as yet unpublished.)

Duval 359; Baumstark 174; Chabot 70-71; Ortiz de Urbina 163.

J.-M. Sauget

JOHN bar Penkaya (7th c.). A monk of the Eastern church, born at Penek in Bēt Zabdai, John lived in the 2nd half of the 7th c.; he was a monk in the monastery of Mar John of Kamul, later in that of Mar Bassima, and he seems to have died in the monastery of Beth Dalyatha. This explains, perhaps, why the MS tradition has sometimes confused him with *John of Dalyatha. He wrote a work in 15 volumes, Ktābā d-rēš mellē, or Summary of the History of the World, which concludes in the year 686 and must have been completed before 693–694. The first four books deal with the history of the world up to Herod the Great; the fifth book speaks of demons; the sixth to eighth books discuss above all the typological interpretation of the OT; the ninth book deals with the cults of pagan peoples, providing important information on Zoroastrianism; the tenth to thirteenth books speak of the life of Christ and of his disciples; the fourteenth book deals with the story of the church up until the Arab conquest; the fifteenth book, finally, speaks of the events of the last decades of the 7th c. These last two books constitute an important contemporary source for our knowledge of the Arab conquests of the 7th c. Only the tenth to fifteenth books have been published, by A. Mingana, Sources syriaques I, Mosul 1908, 2-171; 172-203: Fr. tr. of book XV. S. Brock has published an Eng. tr. of the final section of book XIV and of the majority of book XV in North Mesopotamia in the Late Seventh Century: Book XV of John Bar Penkāyē's Rīš Mellē: Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 9 (1987) 51-75 (now in S. Brock, Studies in Syriac Christianity, London 1992). Among the works attributed to John there is an ascetic book, known as The Merchant: for a Fr. tr. of the first "century," see M. Albert, Une centurie de Mar Jean Bar Penkaye, in Mélanges A. Guillaumont—Contribution à l'étude des christianismes orientaux, Geneva 1988, 143-151.

Baumstark, 210-1; BO III/1, 189-90; Duval, 229-30; T. Jansma, Project d'une édition du Ktābā d-rēš mellē de Jean bar Penkaye: OS 8 (1963) 87-106; R. Beulay, Précisations touchant l'identité et la biographie de Jean Saba de Dalyatha: PdO 8 (1977-1978) 87-116 (esp. 88-102); H. Suermann, Das arabische Reich in der Weltgeschichte des Joḥannan bar Penkaje, in Nubia et OC: Festschrift C.D.G. Müller, Cologne 1987, 59-71.

K. den Biesen

JOHN CALYBITA (ca. 418–450). A son of the senator Eutropius, a general in the army, and of the noble *Theodora, he lived at *Constantinople in the 1st half of the 5th c. Around 430, at the age of twelve, acc. to a usual canon of lives of Christian saints, he left his family to enter a community of *acoemetae ("sleepless") monks, on the Bosphorus, where he lived for six years meditating on the gospel in rigorous asceticism. Then he left the monastery to live incognito as a beggar before the door of his father's house. Here the supervisor of the slaves, partly also to relieve the discomfort caused to the master of the house by the presence of the tramp, had a hut made for him (καλύβη, whence the nickname Calybita), which on his death, 15 February 450, was transformed into a basilica and became a pilgrimage destination. Only three days before dying did John Calybita allow himself to be recognized by his parents, showing them the golden gospel which they had given to him before his flight and thus obtaining their conversion. The family palace was then transformed into a hospice to receive the pilgrims who were coming to visit his tomb. His Vita, of which there are at least three versions preserved in Greek (BHG 868-69h), was translated into Latin around 870 by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, who dedicated it to the future Pope Formosus (891–896). Perhaps also for this reason the construction of a basilica in honor of the saint on the Tiber Island (mentioned for the first time in 1016) is attributed to Formosus, where acc. to a tradition his relics were preserved, translated to *Rome due to the iconoclast crisis. Nevertheless, the presence of his body at Constantinople is attested around 1200 by the Russian pilgrim Anthony of Novgorod. The only evidence of the fortune of the veneration of John Calybita in the West, given that the Western medieval calendars do not mention the saint, is the great influence which his Latin Vita (BHL 4358) had upon that of St. *Alexius (BHL 286), also in Latin.

AASS, Ian. II, 311-320 (Paris 1866); BHL 4358b; BHG 868-869h; BHO 498-499; BS 6, 640-643; Cath 6, 444; PG 114, 568-581; LTK³ 5, 923; Vies des SS. 1, 305-307.

V. Novembri

JOHN CASSIAN (ca. 360–ca. 435). The principal Western exponent of the monastic tradition, born, acc. to the information furnished by *Gennadius (Vir. ill. LXI), around 360 in Scythia (in Provence acc. to Marrou, Cappuyns and other moderns) to a noble family, Cassian received a thorough classical Latin education (Conl. XIV, 12), but other indications within his works and even more his free movements in the East suggest an excellent knowledge of Greek. There are few details of the life of Cassian which we know with precision and certainty. Around 378–380, when he was still a youth (Inst., praef. 4: pueritia nostra), he entered a monastery in Bethlehem along with his friend *Germanus (Conl. I, 1; Conl. XIV, 5). Inspired by the contact with a famous Egyptian monk, Pinuphius—abbot and priest of a large monastery near Panephysis, who, fleeing from his fame, was received in the monastery of Bethlehem as a novice (Conl. XX, 1-2)—they received permission to go to Egypt (Conl. XVII, 5) to visit the famous monks there. It is impossible to determine with precision how many years they spent in Egypt, probably between ten and twenty. Cassian indicates (Conl. XVII, 30) that after seven years, they returned to the monastery of Bethlehem to obtain permission to remain in Egypt.

Initially they went to the monastery of Archebius at Panephysis in the Nile Delta with the plan of going as far as the desert of the *Thebaid "to visit as many as possible of those holy monks whose fame had scattered over all the earth" (Conl. XI, 1). Although Cassian described the customs of the monks of Tabennesi (Inst. IV, 1; Conl. XX, 1,2), it is disputed whether they ever reached the Thebaid: they might have been able to use literary sources. The longest stay of their Egyptian period was at *Scete (Conl. I, 1: Cum in heremo Sciti; Conl. X, 2). The only information given by Cassian which permits a precise dating (399) is the mention of the encyclical letter of *Theophilus bishop of *Alexandria, against the *anthropomorphites (Conl. X, 2). The violent religious conflicts which followed the letter and the accusations of "*Origenism" launched by Theophilus in the letter of 400 with persecution of the "long brothers" might have forced Cassian, together with Germanus and many other monks, to leave Egypt. Later he was at Constantinople, where he was ordained a deacon by *John Chrysostom (Gennadius, Vir. ill. LXI). In the aftermath of the latter's exile, instigated by Theophilus, a letter for the bishop of *Rome, *Innocent, was entrusted to Cassian and Germanus by the friends of Chrysostom (Pallad., Dialog. III, 3). In Rome he would have made the acquaintance of the archdeacon *Leo, future bishop of Rome, to whom he addresses himself in the preface of De incarnatione. It is unknown where he spent the following years, but around 415 he was in *Marseille, having been ordained a priest (Gennadius, Vir. ill. LXI), where he founded two monasteries, St. Victor for men and St. Salvator for women, and wrote in 420–428, in response to the requests of the bishops of S *Gaul, two works, the Institutiones and the Conlationes, to transmit in the West the authentic tradition of Eastern (and esp. Egyptian) monasticism. Toward the end of his life, in response to the request of Leo, he also wrote a polemical and doctrinal work, De incarnatione Domini contra Nestorium. According to Gennadius, Cassian died while *Theodosius (d. 450) and *Valentinian (d. 455) were emperors, but it is surmised that he was already dead around 435.

The different prefaces are important for understanding the literary genre and the structure of the two principal works of Cassian, the Institutiones and the Conlationes. In that placed at the head of the first work, after the dedication to "papa" Castor of Apt (bishop 419–426), Cassian compares himself to the architect Chiram (1 Re 7,13-14), called to aid in the construction of a spiritual temple; insists on the importance of experience, which earlier writers on monastic life did not have; and declares his intention to leave out miracles and wonders which do not contribute to the education to perfection of life. Rather, he tries to illustrate "the institutions and the rules of the monasteries, and esp. the origins and the causes of the principal vices, cataloged by our fathers themselves into eight, and, furthermore, the method of correcting them acc. to the counsels transmitted to us by them" (Inst. praef. 7). In reality the Institutiones, which do not have a title in the MSS, are divided into two parts, as indicated by this citation. The first four books are dedicated to the exterior person (Inst. 2,9,1)—i.e., to the customs of the Egyptian monks, monastic dress, the organization of the canonical hours of prayer etc.—and conclude with a long homily of Abbot Pinufius addressed to a young beginner which contains an important summary of the monastic path based on the cross of Christ. The last eight books are dedicated to the analysis and elimination of the eight principal vices: gastrimargia (V), fornicatio (VI), philargyria (VII), ira (VIII), tristitia (VIIII), acedia (X), cenodoxia (XI) and superbia (XII), which are seen as obstacles to the development of the contemplative life. In previous literature this list appears only in the works of *Evagrius of Pontus, who must have been an important source for Cassian. Evagrius is also the source for the description and the symbolism of the monastic habit in the first book. The detailed analysis of Vogüé shows how Cassian took information from multiple literary sources, including *Tertullian, *Cyprian, *Augustine, *Jerome, *Basil, *Eusebius and *Palladius.

To link the Conlationes, already foreseen in the Institutiones (Inst. II, 9,1), to the preceding work, Cassian introduces (praef. 1) the interpretation of the figure of Jacob who struggles against the carnal vices to earn the name Israel, which symbolizes the contemplative life: an interpretation which goes back to *Philo of Alexandria, but which was previously found in *Origen and *Ambrose. The Conlationes were published in three volumes of ten, seven and seven conferences respectively. The first is dedicated to Leontius, bishop of Fréjus and brother of Castor, and to the hermit Helladius; the second to Honoratus and Eucherius of Lérins; the third to four monks of the islands of Hyères: Jovinian, Minervius, Leontius and Theodore. In the preface to the third volume Cassian compares the 24 conferences to the elders of the Apocalypse, who will be able to enter in the cells to converse with the monks. This idea is linked to the observation in the preface of the Institutiones that spiritual science, "if it is not frequently sifted and elaborated in continuous contact with spiritual men, will quickly fade away" (Inst. praef. 5). In reality the Conlationes were conceived as spiritual exercises in the manner of the dialogues of Plato and Cicero, for pedagogic ends. Each conference is dedicated to a theme; e.g., the distinction between the goal and end of the spiritual life (Conl. I), discretion (Conl. II), the only true good of the soul or indifferent things (Conl. VI), prayer (Conl. IX-X), the contemplative life or the method of interpreting the Scripture (Conl. XIV), friendship (Conl. XVI), impeccability or the sins of the perfect (Conl. XXIII). Some themes belong to the philosophical and Christian tradition, while others reflect the controversies of the time, above all *Pelagianism (e.g. Conl. VI, XIII, XXIII), in which Cassian had taken a position against Pelagius, though different from that of Augustine and Jerome. The primary interest of Cassian always remains the development of the inner person (homo interior, Conl. XVI, 22,2). With elegant language (Gennadius: litterato sermone) and a rich technical vocabulary which shows knowledge of classical and Christian writers in both Greek and Latin, Cassian created a new synthesis of the tradition which corresponds to his intention expressed at the beginning (Inst. praef. 7) to expound "everything which our predecessors have not taken into consideration." Hiding himself behind the façade of celebrated (but otherwise unknown) Egyptian monks, he succeeded in establishing the idea of a normative monastic tradition going back to the era of the apostles in Egypt, with more recent developments (*Anthony and anachoresis). In his last work, De incarnatione Domini contra Nestorium libri VII, Cassian, answering the request of Leo, tried to combat the heresy of *Nestorius, calling on an entire series of Western and Eastern writers for help: *Hilary, Ambrose, Jerome, *Rufinus, Augustine, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Athanasius, John Chrystostom. In the work Nestorius seems to still be bishop of Constantinople, which suggests a date prior to August 430 when he was deposed.

Although Cassian is not venerated in the Western liturgical calendar outside of Marseille, because of conflicts with the Augustinian orthodoxy which was imposing itself at the time (Prosper of Aquitaine, Contra Collatorem) and because his name was included in the list of nonapproved books falsely attributed to Pope *Gelasius (Decretum Gelasianum) in the 8th c., his influence on Western monasticism was assured by the recommendation of his works at the end of the Rule of St. *Benedict. St. Dominic carried them with him everywhere in his voyages. The works of Cassian have been partially transmitted in Greek and are found in the Bibliotheca of *Photius (n. 197) and in the Philokalia of Nicodemus the Hagiorite and Macarius of Corinth. Cassian is venerated as a saint in all the Eastern Churches.

Editions: CPL 512-514; Conlationes, De institutis coenobiorum: PL 49, 477-1321; 53-476; CSEL 13, 1886; CSEL 17, 1888; De incarnatione Domini contra Nestorium: PL 50, 9-270; CSEL 17,1888; E. Pichery, Les conférences, (SC 42, 52, 64), Paris 1955-59 (repr. 1967-71); J.C. Guy, Les institutions cénobitiques, (SC 109), Paris 1959; L.M. and P.M. Sansegundo, Instituciones, Colaciones, Madrid 1957–1961; O. Lari, Conferenze spirituali, 3 vols., Rome 1965; L. Dattrino, Le Istituzioni cenobitiche, Abbazia di Praglia 1989; L. Dattrino, L'Incarnazione del Signore, Rome 1991; John Cassian, The Conferences, ACW 57, New York 1997; B. Ramsey, John Cassian, The Institutes, New York 2000; Conferenze ai Monaci, Rome 2000.

Studies: L. Wrzol, Die Psychologie des Johannes Cassianus: Divus Thomas 5 (1918) 181-213; 425-456; 7 (1920) 70-96; 9 (1922) 269-294; M. Olphe-Galliard, Vie contemplative et vie active d'après Cassien: RAM 16 (1935) 252-298; Id., La pureté du coeur d'après Cassien: RAM 17 (1936) 28-60; Id., Cassien: DSp 2, 214-276; S. Marsili, Giovanni Cassiano ed Evagrio Pontico. Dottrina sulla carità e contemplazione, Rome 1936; L. Cristiani, Cassien, I-II, Paris 1946; DHGE 11, 1319-1348; J.C. Guy, Jean Cassien, Vie et doctrine spirituelle, Paris 1961; O. Chadwick, John Cassian, Oxford 1950 ([2]1968); F. Prinz, Cassiano Giovanni: DIP 2 (1975), 633-638; K.A. Neuhausen, Zu Cassians Traktat De Amicitia (Coll. 16): Studien zur Literatur der Spätantike, ed. Ch. Gnilka - W. Schetter, Antiquitas 1/26, Bonn 1975, 181-218; H.-I. Marrou, La patrie de Jean Cassien, in Patristique et Humanisme, Paris 1976, 345-361; C. Leonardi, Alle origini della cristianità medievale: Giovanni Cassiano e Salviano di Marsiglia: Stud Med 18 (1977) 491-608; C. Tibiletti, Giovanni Cassiano. Formazione e dottrina: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 355-380; Id., Pagine monastiche provenzali. Il monachesimo nella Gallia del quinto secolo, Rome 1990; Ph. Rousseau, Ascetics, Authority and the Church in the Age of Jerome and Cassian, Oxford 1978; Patrologia III, 486-496; C. Leonardi, L'esperienza di Dio in Giovanni Cassiano: Renovatio 13 (1978) 198-219; V. Messana, Povertà e lavoro nella paideia di Giovanni Cassiano, Caltanissetta 1985; A. de Vogüé, Les sources des quartre premiers livres des Institutions de Jean Cassien. Introduction aux recherches sur les anciennes règles monastiques latines: StudMon 27 (1985) 241-311; M. Sheridan, Jacob and Israel: A Contribution to the History of an Interpretation, in Mysterium Christ. Festschrift für Basil Studer, Rome 1995, 219-241; Id., The Controversy over ΑΠΑΘΕΙΑ*: Cassian's Sources and His Use of Them*: StudMon 39 (1997) 287-310; Id., Job and Paul: Philosophy and Exegesis in Cassian's Sixth Conference: StudMon 42 (2000) 271-294; K.S. Frank, Johannes Cassian und seine Schriften: Das ägyptische Mönchtum als spiritueller Mutterboden des abendländischen Mönchtums: Erbe und Auftrag 73 (1997) 288-304; C. Stewart, Cassian the Monk, Oxford 1998; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'antiquité, tome VI: Les derniers écrits de Jérôme et l'oeuvre de Jean Cassien (414–428), Paris 2002; S.D. Driver, John Cassian and the Reading of Egyptian Monastic Culture, New York-London 2002; C. Badilita - A. Jacab, Jean Cassien entre l'Orient et l'Occident, Paris 2003.

M. Sheridan

JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (d. 407)
I. Life - II. Works - III. Spirituality.

I. Life. John was born at *Antioch on the Orontes, in the province of Syria, at a date which is difficult to establish. Historians propose 345 or 349 or 354, but, in the absence of any absolutely certain reference point before 381, the year of his ordination as deacon, his year of birth remains uncertain. In any case, current preference leans toward 349. He belonged to a wealthy family: his father, Secundus, was a civil functionary in the administration of the military government of Syria; his mother, Anthusa, a widow at twenty, obtained a thorough education for him. In all likelihood John followed the lectures of the rhetorician Libanius and prepared himself for a career in the offices of the imperial chancellery. He himself recounts that, in this period, he passed his time in the tribunal and was passionate about theatrical entertainments. Nevertheless, he distanced himself from these things little by little through the influence of a friend whom he calls Basil. Having received *baptism, he frequented the circle of *Diodore, future bishop of *Tarsus. There he dedicated himself to commenting on the Scripture and to an ascetic life in the world. *Meletius, bishop of Antioch, admitted him into his confidence and, probably in 371, nominated him lector. But his desire for perfection pushed him to leave the city for the surrounding deserts. First he put himself, for four years, under the direction of an old Syrian monk; then, longing to be forgotten by the world, he lived, for two years, alone in a cave, learning the Scriptures by heart. Privations and cold got the better of his health, and he was constrained to return to Antioch. In 381 Meletius allowed him to enter the *diaconate. Flavian, successor of Meletius, ordained him priest in 386.

For twelve years a priest of the church of Antioch, he fascinated the crowds with the splendor of his eloquence: thus the nickname "Golden-mouth," which was attributed to him in the course of the 5th c. The bishop of Constantinople *Nectarius having died 27 September 397, the court chose John. To obey the orders of the emperor, the count of Antioch set up an appointment with him at one of the ports of the city, without telling him the reason, and sent him to Constantinople, where he was ordained bishop 26 February 398.

From that moment John sought to repress abuses and reform society in order to lead it to a more faithful observance of the precepts of the gospel. But his demands provoked the hostility of those struck by his censures. The empress *Eudoxia and some women of the court, the bishops of various provinces and the monks who lived as they pleased in the city made coalition against him. *Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, put himself at their head, called the Synod of the *Oak, before which John was told to appear. Knowing the prejudices of the bishops, he refused to present himself. First he was deposed, in 403, and then called back. But it was only a truce. On Easter night in 404 serious disorders broke out, provoked by his enemies, during the baptism of the catechumens. The crowd invaded the churches and profaned them. Five days after Pentecost, 9 June 404, the emperor signed an order of exile, this time definitive. After a voyage of three months across Asia Minor, John arrived at Cucusus in Armenia: "the most deserted place in the world," he wrote. Three years passed, but his enemies did not disarm; rather, they decided to send him to Pithyus (Colchis), on the E shore of the Black Sea. Exhausted by these years of suffering and the forced marches imposed on him by the soldiers assigned to watch him, he died during the voyage, at Comanan in the province of Pontus, 14 September 407. His remains were brought back to Constantinople 27 January 438, and buried in the Church of the Apostles: *Theodosius II, son of Eudoxia and of Arcadius, at that time asked pardon for the persecutions which John had suffered at the hands of his parents (see Theodoret, Hist. eccl. 5,36,2). According to a tradition the mortal remains of John now repose at Rome in the Cappella del Coro in St. Peter's Basilica. On 27 November 2004, Pope John Paul II gave to the patriarch of Constantinople some of these relics, which now repose in the Phanar.

II. Works. Every work of John Chrysostom responds to the demands, arising one by one, of his apostolate, so that it is necessary to follow in detail the course of his life in order to study his abundant literary output. Here we will limit ourselves to the essential. His thought has reached us in the form of exhortations to certain persons, or homilies on the occasion of particular events and liturgical feasts, or finally in a series of commentaries on the OT and NT, essentially in the form of homilies. This variety shows sufficiently that the teaching of John Chrysostom, although remaining coherent in its deepest inspiration, constantly adapts itself to the needs of the faithful.

Thus through three small treatises Against the Adversaries of Monastic Life we see two contemporary problems confronted. Above all, that of the education of young children in a world of corrupt customs. Sometimes this was resolved by entrusting young children to monks, to have them live in a morally healthy environment. But out of this came more or less forced vocations, with the disappointment of the parents. A certain hostility toward the *ascesis practiced in the deserts around Antioch was thus born; this hostility was reinforced by the persecution of *Valens in 375. This called for a defense of monastic life. Along the same line are the three Exhortations to Stagyrius, a young monk who, because of nervous exhaustion, doubted his own vocation, and the two Exhortations to Theodore (SC 117). The latter had abandoned the monastic life, giving in to the attractions of the young Hermione, whom he was setting about to marry. John reproves him for his infidelity: "Binding oneself to a celestial spouse and then leaving him to attach oneself to a woman constitutes an adultery, even if you call it a thousand times a marriage" (Letter to T., II, 3).

Here should be added the two discourses On Compunction, or on remorse for past sins. These are addressed to two monks, Demetrius and Stelechius, but John measures with severity the distance between the Christian ideal and the reality of an often mediocre life, whether among laypeople or monks. In one of the most interesting passages of the first treatise he expounds, inspired by Paul, the relationships between liberty and grace, thus refuting beforehand the entirely unjust accusations which had been made against him concerning this problem, taking from their context certain passages which seemed to give the primacy to human effort. Three works destined for female ascetic groups date back to this period: On Virginity (SC 125), To a Young Widow and On Single Marriage (SC 138). At the same time John denounced an abuse which had insinuated itself into the lives of certain clerics: the presence in their houses, on the pretext of protecting them, of consecrated virgins ironically called agapetai*, or "beloved." Two treatises On Suspicious Cohabitations and How to Observe Virginity (CUF, see final bibl.) castigate in virulent terms the hypocrisy of such conduct. Thus from this era the passionate temperament of John Chrysostom appears. This explains the vigor of his reactions confronted with the weaknesses which discredited the clergy and betrayed his ideal. The six years passed in solitude had profoundly marked him and, even if his health did not allow him to remain there, he always aspired, for himself as for others, to the "angelic" life, that of the monks. Nevertheless, the multiple contacts imposed by his office as deacon put him in touch with the faithful; he began to know their needs and difficulties. Therefore the man whom Flavian, bishop of Antioch, called in 386 "to the dignity of priesthood" is a man already well aware of the concrete problems of Christians living in the world.

The MS tradition has preserved for us the Homily Given on the Day of His Ordination (SC 272). John Chrysostom offers to God the firstfruits of a rhetorical ability which he had put, for around twenty years, to the service of the church with a love "than which nothing stronger and more tyrannical can be imagined." From that moment the homilies follow in lockstep with the liturgical year. John Chrysostom preached Sundays, feast days and, during Lent, several times a week. Thus, in Lent 386, he composed eight sermons On Genesis (SC 433) and, in the summer, the first of the homilies On the Incomprehensibility of God (SC 28 bis) which, along with four others spread along the course of the following year, responds to the pretenses of the *anomoians to know God as he knows himself. Against the anomoians John composed other homilies, of which the last two were delivered at Constantinople (SC 396: homilies 7-12). In the meantime he attacked, in violent terms, those among the Christians who "Judaized," attracted by the ceremonies of the synagogue. On the occasion of the Jewish feasts of autumn and Passover he delivered the eight Discourses Against the Jews. Then the anniversary of the martyrs venerated in the city arrived. It was the occasion for the Panegyrics of Saint Pelagia, of Saint Ignatius and of the Blessed Philogonius. Finally, 25 December, John dedicated a homily to the feast of the *nativity of Christ, adopted a short time before by the church of Antioch.

This first year of priesthood has an exemplary value. The new priest knew how to respond from the beginning to the demands of the moment and of catechesis. It would always be so. In 387 it is possible to follow, day by day, through the homilies On the Statues, the fears of a people who rebelled because of the weight of taxes and were menaced with the worst punishments. To this same year belongs the first of the seven Panegyrics of Saint Paul (SC 300, see final bibl.), in which John expresses his own affection and admiration for him who was the model of his apostolate. The year 388 opens with a homily On the Calends. John opposes the disorders of which the festivals of the new year are the occasion. Next is the anniversary of the martyrs Babila, Iuventinus and Maximinus. Soon the orator begins the series of discourses On the Rich Man and Lazarus. The theme offers him the occasion to hurl himself against the insolent luxury of his compatriots and their hardness of heart toward the poor. The dates of the six homilies On Uzziah (SC 277) are disputed. John sees, in the attitude of the cherubim, a proof of the transcendence of God and warns his audience against the pride which ruined King Uzziah. Afterward he embarked on the long series of 67 homilies On Genesis, probably preached partly during Lent 388. As for the OT, John further commented on the text of Isaiah, up to 8:10 (SC 304) and the book of Job (SC 346, 348). From 390 are the 88 homilies On the Gospel of John and the 90 homilies On the Gospel of Matthew. During his pastoral mission at Antioch and Constantinople, John commented on the entire Pauline epistolary: recent studies (P. Allen - W. Mayer, see bibl.) have revealed that his homilies on Col, Phil and Heb contain material of both Antiochene and Constantinopolitan provenance. In all these works it is possible to study the exegetical method of John Chrysostom, preoccupied with keeping to the text and explaining it in the most minute details acc. to the tradition of the school of Antioch. The fecundity and conscience of the preacher are admirable, esp. since these commentaries did not prevent him from delivering occasional homilies On the Martyrs Berenice, Prosdoce and Domnina; On Diodore of Tarsus; and On the Martyr Julian. It is thus clear how much he was linked to the heroic tradition of his church. John dedicated to the Psalms explanations which seem spread out in time, but the series is now incomplete; of the 150 Psalms, the commentary survives on only 50. Nevertheless, it is possible to find fragments of them in the catenae.

The sudden elevation of John to the see of Constantinople in 398 imposed new duties on him and put him in a particularly difficult situation. The weakness of his predecessor, Nectarius, and his taste for luxury had allowed an indolence to establish itself among the clergy that was incompatible with the ideal that John had continually preached and that he had set forth in the Dialogue on the Priesthood ca. 388-390 (SC 272). Furthermore, the inequality between giant fortunes and extreme miseries reminded Christians of the duties of the rich and the needs of the poor. Uniting action to words, John created works of benevolence thanks to the aid and the generosity of *Olympias, a highly placed lady of Constantinople who had become a deaconess. In this daily battle to put in practice the teaching of the gospel he attracted both love and hate. It was in this tense climate that he delivered the 55 homilies On the Acts of the Apostles, esp. since the external situation of the empire preoccupied him. We have the echo in the homilies On the Fall of Eutropius, On Saturninus and Aurelian, grand figures of the court whose heads Gainas, the *Arian chief, was demanding. The hostility around John grew.

Concerning his exile and his stay in Armenia there are valuable details in the letters addressed to those who had remained faithful to him, esp. to Olympias (SC 13 bis). Beyond the 17 letters which he wrote to her, John charged her to transmit to his friends two messages, prompted by the circumstances, in the form of treatises: the Letter from Exile (SC 103) and On the Providence of God, his last work (SC 79). The so-called Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, of which some elements could date back to the 4th c., is not his.

III. Spirituality. Although Chrysostom's biographers reprove him for his fiery temperament and the excesses of language to which his intrepid zeal pushed him, the entirety of his work leaves the impression of a remarkable equilibrium. Certainly in his youth he desired absolute detachment for himself and preached the same to others, but his ministry as a priest, and later bishop, put him in contact with the entire Christian community in its diversity. A spirituality which corresponds to every state of life can therefore be extracted from his work.

This was not fixed in a theoretical treatise but animates his entire teaching. He was able to indicate with precision the position of the contemplative life within the church. The monks "are lighthouses which appear high above to those who approach from far away. Seated in the port, they attract all men to the calm which they enjoy, not allowing those who turn their gaze on them to sink" (Hom. 14,3 on 1 Tim. 3). But most Christians are called to live in the world. For them John traces the route, giving advice marked at the same time by an extraordinarily concrete sense of situations and by a genuinely evangelical impulse. The love of spouses for one another and the love of children blossoms within the family. While aligning himself with the tradition of a society which subordinated women to men, John found within Pauline theology the just measure of a reciprocity of thoughtfulness and love, basing the relationships between men and women on those between Christ and the church. A conversation, addressed to parents, On Vainglory and on the Education of Children (SC 188), affirms the importance, from the earliest years, of moral and religious training. The love of neighbor—slave or friend, poor or rich—has its source in the love of God. The preacher never stops pulling his audience toward concrete actions, in which beneficence is inspired by an act of faith: the poor man is Christ. The sacraments are the signs of a unity of which Christ is the foundation. Baptism is presented in the Catecheses (SC 50 bis, 366) as a new birth. The Eucharist, an action of grace and sacrifice at the same time, continues the real presence of God among human beings. John excels in emphasizing this mystery: "He whom the angels do not see without trembling and whom they do not dare to look at without fear for the radiance which blazes from him, we take him as food, we receive him, we become one body and one flesh with Christ" (Hom. 82,5 on Mt. 5). On the occasion of religious festivals the Christian community realizes its unity around the priest who celebrates the Eucharist with the entire people, and the church of heaven joins with that on earth. John never ceased inviting those who were listening to him to give glory, to give thanks, and his last words put a seal on his teaching: "Glory to God through all" (Palladius, Dial. 11).

The spirituality of John Chrysostom has preserved its value through the centuries, even if, because of a sumptuous eloquence to which we are no longer habituated, this immense work discourages commentators and translators. Because of the impossibility of mastering the whole, the status of theologian is denied to John Chrysostom, perhaps because he did not venture into audacious speculations and stayed within the limits of a perfect orthodoxy. It can at least be acknowledged that he is the most illustrious representative of the school of Antioch, whose *exegesis is based on the minute explanation of the texts. He is, furthermore, among the fathers of the church, the one who has best understood the difficulties, the trials of an authentically lived Christian life, whether in the monastery or in the world. His apostolic activity took place in the middle of a society which was not at all in harmony with the demands of Christianity. Despite everything, his message, with its charge of love for God and of love for people, has reached even us today in light of its gospel message.

Editions: Monumental edition of the complete works ed. by Montfaucon, 1718-1738, improved by the Benedictines in 1834 and reproduced in the Patrologia graeca of J.P. Migne, Greek-Latin text, vols. 47-64, Paris 1858-1860; J. Barelle, Œuvres complètes, Greek-French text, 19 vols., Bar-le-Duc 1865-1873. Editions of various works mentioned in this article: Coll. "Sources chrétiennes" (SC), Greek-French text, followed by the number of the vol.; Coll. of the University of France (CUF), Greek-French; Coll. "Pères dans la foi" (PF), only French, which has published, under the title La conversion, various homilies on this theme, Paris 1978, and, under the title Homélies sur s. Paul, the seven panegyrics on St. Paul, Paris 1980; finally Omelie sull'oscurità delle profezie, crit. ed., It. tr. and comm. by S. Zincone, Verba Seniorum n.s. 12, Rome 1998.

Translations: Eng.: LFC, 16 vols., Oxford 1839-1859; LNPF, New York 1888; Homilies on Genesis, Washington, DC, FC 74, 1986; FC 82, 1990; FC 87, 1992 (R.C. Hill); Commentary on the Psalms, 2 vols., Brookline, MA 1998 (R.C. Hill); On Repentance and Almsgiving, FC 96, 1998 (G.G. Christo); It.: Commento al vangelo di s. Matteo, 3 vols., Rome 1966-1967; Commento al vangelo di s. Giovanni, 3 vols., Rome 1969-1970; Dall'esilio. Lettere, Milan 1976 (R. Callegari); Vanità—educazione dei figli—matrimonio, CTP 7, Rome 1977 (A. Ceresa Gastaldo); La vera conversione, CTP 22, Rome 1980 (C. Riggi); Il sacerdozio, CTP 24, Rome 1980 (A. Quacquarelli), Le catechesi battesimali, CTP 31, Rome 1982 (A. Ceresa Gastaldo); Commento alla lettera ai Galati, CTP 35, Rome 1982 (S. Zincone); L'unità delle nozze, CTP 45, Rome 1984 (G. Di Nola); Omelie per Eutropio, Naples 1987 (F. Conti Bizzarro - R. Romano); Panegirici su san Paolo, CTP 69, Rome 1988 (S. Zincone); Commento alla prima lettera a Timoteo, CTP 124, Rome 1995 (G. Di Nola); Contro i detrattori della vita monastica, CTP 130, Rome 1996 (L. Dattrino); Lettere a Olimpiade, Letture cristiane del primo millennio 23, Milan 1996 (M. Forlin Patrucco); Commento a Isaia. Omelie su Ozia, CTP 162, Rome 2001 (D. Ciarlo); A Stagirio tormentato da un demone, CTP 163, Rome 2002 (L. Coco); Omelie sul vangelo di Matteo, CTP 170-171-172, Rome 2003 (S. Zincone); Ger.: Kommentar zum Evangelium des hl. Matthäus, BKV[2], vols. 23, 25, 26, 27, 1-238 (J.C. Baur); Über das Priestertum, ibid., vol. 27, immediately after Commentary on Mt. (A. Naegle); Kommentar zum Briefe des hl. Paulus an die Römer, ibid., vols. 39, 42 (J. Jatsch); Kommentar zu den Briefen des hl. Paulus an die Philipper und Kolosser, ibid., vol. 45 (W. Stoderl); Kommentar zu den Briefen des hl. Paulus an die Galater und Epheser, BKV[3], vol. 15 (W. Stoderl); Taufkatechesen I-II (Greek-German), Fontes Christiani 6/1-2, Herder 1992 (R. Kaczynski); Acht Reden gegen Juden, Bibliothek der griechischen Literatur, vol. 41, Stuttgart 1995 (R. Brändle - V. Jegher-Bucher); Sp.: Homilías sobre el Evangelio de San Mateo, 2 vols., Madrid 1955-1956, BAC 141, 146 (D. Ruiz Bueno); Tratados ascéticos, Madrid 1958, BAC 169 (D. Ruiz Bueno).

Studies: A. Puech, S.J. Chrysostome et les moeurs de son temps, Paris 1891; C. Baur, Der hl. Johannes Chrysostomus und seine Zeit, I Antiochien, II Konstantinopel, Munich 1929-30; L. Meyer, S.J. Chrysostome maître de perfection chrétienne, Paris 1933; A.H.M. Jones, St. John Chrysostom's Parentage and Education: HTR 46 (1953) 171-173; G. Fittkau, Der Begriff des Mysteriums bei J. Chrysostomus, Bonn 1953; Ivo auf der Maur, Mönchtum und Glaubensverkündigung in den Schriften des hl. J. Chrys., Freiburg 1959; A.J. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne, Paris 1959; Jean Chrysostome et Augustin, in Acts of the Colloquium of Chantilly 24 settembre 1974, Paris 1975; M. Gonzaga, John Chrysostom and His Time, London 1960; S. Zincone, Ricchezza e povertà nelle omelie di Giovanni Crisostomo, L'Aquila 1973; Id., Giovanni Crisostomo. Commento alla lettera ai Galati. Aspetti dottrinali, storici, letterari, L'Aquila 1980; O. Pasquato, Gli spettacoli in s. Giovanni Crisostomo. Paganesimo e cristianesimo ad Antiochia e Costantinopoli nel IV secolo, OCA 201, Rome 1976; R. Brändle, Matth. 25, 31-46 im Werk des Johannes Chrysostomos, Tübingen 1979; R.L. Wilken, John Chrysostom and the Jews: Rhetoric and Reality in the Late Fourth Century, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1983; C. Militello, Donna e Chiesa. La testimonianza di Giovanni Crisostomo, Palermo 1985; M.A. Schatkin, John Chrysostom as Apologist, with Special Reference to De incomprehensibili, Quod nemo laeditur, Ad eos qui scandalizati sunt, and Adversus oppugnatores vitae monasticae, Analekta Vlatadon 50, Thessaloniki 1987; P. Allen - W. Mayer, Chrysostom and the Preaching of Homilies in Series: A New Approach to the Twelve Homilies In epistulam ad Colossenses (CPG 4433): OCP 60 (1994) 21-39; J.N.D. Kelly, Golden Mouth: The Story of John Chrysostom: Ascetic, Preacher, Bishop, London 1995; P. Allen, The Homilist and the Congregation. A Case-Study of Chrysostom's Homilies on Hebrews: Augustinianum 36 (1996) 397-421; P. Allen - W. Mayer, Traditions of Constantinopolitan Preaching: Towards a New Assessment of Where Chrysostom Preached What: ByzF 24 (1997) 93-114; G. Di Nola, La dottrina eucaristica di Giovanni Crisostomo, Vatican City 1997 (with a collection of passages with Greek text and It. tr.); R. Brändle, Johannes Chrysostomus. Bischof, Reformer, Märtyrer, Stuttgart- Berlin-Cologne 1999; M. Illert, Johannes Chrysostomus und das antiochenisch-syrische Mönchtum. Studien zu Theologie, Rhetorik und Kirchenpolitik im antiochenischen Schrifttum des Johannes Chrysostomus, Zürich-Freiburg i. Br. 2000; M.M. Mitchell, The Heavenly Trumpet: John Chrysostom and the Art of Pauline Interpretation, Tübingen 2000; W. Mayer - P. Allen, John Chrysostom, London-New York 2000; C. Tiersch, Johannes Chrysostomus in Konstantinopel (398–404). Weltsicht und Wirken eines Bischofs in der Hauptstadt des Oströmischen Reiches, Studien und Texte zu Antike und Christentum 6, Tübingen 2000; O. Pasquato, I laici in Giovanni Crisostomo. Tra Chiesa, famiglia e città, Biblioteca di Scienze religiose 144, Rome [2]2001; L. Dattrino, Il matrimonio nel pensiero di Giovanni Crisostomo, Rome 2002; W. Mayer, The Homilies of St John Chrysostom Provenance: Reshaping the Foundations (Orientalia Christiana Analecta 273), Rome 2005; Giovanni Crisostomo: Oriente e Occidente tra IV e V secolo. XXXIII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana. Rome, 6-8 maggio 2004 (SEA 93), Rome 2005.

A.-M. Malingrey - S. Zincone

JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (Latin Collection). Many works attributed to John Chrysostom have been transmitted in *Latin. Some of these texts were composed directly in Latin; in other cases it is a matter of translations from Greek. Among the most important collections can be mentioned (1) the so-called Collection of 38 Latin Homilies attested, at least partially, already by *Augustine around 422, which brings together authentic and spurious texts from various sources (either translated from Greek, among which appears a homily of *Severian of Gabala, or else produced in Latin, as well as works of Augustine, *Jerome and *Potamius of Lisbon); (2) a collection, already known to Erasmus, of 30 Latin sermons, attributed at first to *John "Mediocris," bishop of Naples, whose N African origin, around the 2nd half of the 5th c., was later postulated by Bouhot; (3) a collection of 22 homilies, perhaps made in Africa, which brings together already-known works and unknown translations. (4) Alongside these collections, there are an indefinite number of homilies and treatises translated from the Late Antique to humanistic period, concerning which research is still in progress.

General Bibliography: C. Baur, L'entrée littéraire de Saint Chrysostome dans le monde latin: RHE 8 (1907) 249-265; A. Siegmund, Die Überlieferung der griechischen christlichen Literatur in der lateinischen Kirche bis zum zwölften Jahrhundert (Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Benediktiner- Akademie 5), Munich 1948, 91-101; J.-P. Bouhot, Les traductions latines de Jean Chrysostome du V[e] au XV[e] siècle, in Traduction et traducteurs au Moyen Âge, Paris 1989, 31-39; S.J. Voicu, Le prime traduzioni latine di Crisostomo, in Cristianesimo Latino e cultura Greca sino al cent. IV (SEA 42), Rome 1993, 397-415.

(1) A. Wilmart, La collection des 38 homélies latines de saint Jean Chrysostome: JTS 19 (1918) 305-327; B. Altaner, Augustinus und Johannes Chrysostomus: ZNTW 44 (1952-53) 76-85 (repr.: Id., Kleine patristische Schriften, TU 83, Berlin 1967, 302-311); A. Wenger, Le sermon LXXX de la collection de Mai restitué à Sévérien de Gabala, in Augustinus magister, Paris 1954, 175-185; J.-P. Bouhot, Version inédite du sermon "Ad neophytos" de S. Jean Chrysostome, utilisée par S. Augustin: REAug 17 (1971) 27-41; W. Wenk, Zur Sammlung der 38 Homilien des Chrysostomus Latinus (mit der Edition der Nr. 6, 8, 27, 32 und 33), Vienna 1988.

(2) G. Morin, Étude sur une série de discours d'un évêque [de Naples?] du V[e] siècle: RBen 11 (1894) 385-402; M. Lambert, Édition d'une collection latine découverte par dom Morin: REAug 15 (1969) 255-258; J.-P. Bouhot, La collection homilétique pseudo-chrysostomienne découverte par Dom Morin: REAug 16 (1970) 139-146; A. de Vogüé, Une citation de Cyprien dans le Chrysostome latin et chez le Maitre: RBen 89 (1979) 176-178; Id., Un écho de Césaire d'Arles dans la Règle du Maitre le Chrysostome latin et la Paggio Iuliani: RBen 90 (1980) 288-289; Id., Une sentence de Cyprien citée par le Maitre, le Chrysostome latin, Césaire et la Paggio Iuliani: RBen 91 (1981) 359-362.

(3) F.J. Leroy, Vingt-deux homélies africaines nouvelles attribuables à l'un des anonymes du Chrysostome latin (PLS 4): RBen 104 (1994) 123-147.

(4) P.-P. Verbraken, Deux anciennes versions latines de l'homélie sur l'aumòne CPG 4618 attribuée à Jean Chrysostome, in Antidoron. Hulde aan Dr. Maurits Geerard, I, Wetteren 1984, 33-45; J.-P. Bouhot, Ancienne version latine du sermon De Joseph et de Castitate d'un Pseudo-Jean Chrysostome, ibid., 47-56; Id., Adaptations latines de l'homélie de Jean Chrysostome sur Pierre et Élie (CPG 4513): RBen 112 (2002) 36-71, 201-235; G. Persiani, Notes sur les deux antiques versions latines de l'homélie chrysostomienne De Chananaea (CPG 4529): Classica et Mediaevalia 49 (1998) 69-93.

S.J. VOICU

JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (pseudo)

I. Extent and circulation - II. Origins - III. Systematic attributions - IV. Intentional attributions - V. Localized texts - VI. Accidental attributions - VII. Anthologies and extracts.

I. Extent and circulation. In the absence of a systematic list, it can be estimated that there are more than 1500 ps.-Chrysostomic writings of which there is some mention. Beyond a few letters, the vast majority are in the form of homilies, of which many are anthologies or simply extracts which repeat preexisting homilies. These spurious homilies were composed and/or translated in almost all the languages of Christian Antiquity (Greek, Arabic, *Armenian, *Coptic, Ethiopian, *Georgian, *Latin, Old Slavonic, *Syriac, Syro-Palestinian and even Nubian). The most recent spurious homilies seem to go back to the 15th–16th c.

CPG, above all 4500-5197 (it leaves out almost all the secondary texts); RAC 18, 503-515; J.A. de Aldama, Repertorium Pseudochrysostomicum = Documents, Études et Répertoires publiés par l'Institut de Recherche et d'Histoire des Textes 10, Paris 1965 (almost 600 entries, only on published Greek texts); Codices Chrysostomici Graeci. I-VI, Paris 1968–1999 (they point out some unpublished texts and analyze Greek extracts and anthologies); J.A. de Aldama, Historia y balance de la investigación sobre homilías pseudocrisostómicas impresas: SP 7 (TU 92), Berlin 1966, 117-132; P.G. Nicolopoulos, Hai eis ton Ioannen ton Chrysostomon esphalmenos apodidomenai epistolai, Athenais 1973; A. Rigo, L'Epistola ai monaci (e l'Epistola ad un igumeno) di uno Pseudo-Crisostomo: un trattato dell'orazione esicasta scritto nello spirito dello Pseudo-Macario: Studi e ricerche sull'Oriente Cristiano 6 (1983) 197-215; S.J. Voicu, Fonti dell'omelia pseudocrisostomica "In adorationem uenerandae crucis" (PG 62, 747-754; BHG 415; CPG 4672): OCP 58 (1992) 279-283.

II. Origins. Genuine and spurious texts attributed to John Chrysostom are found together in the first witnesses to his work: both types of writings were transmitted already in the so-called Collection of the 38 Latin Homilies used by *Augustine in the Contra Iulianum opus imperfectum (around 420). In the imperial capital, the Johannine community produced intentional falsifications (esp. relating to the banishment of 404), alongside of which entire corpora of other authors were transmitted under the name John Chrysostom in Johannine circles in *Antioch and *Constantinople.

S.J. Voicu, Pseudo-Giovanni Crisostomo: i confini del corpus: JbAC 39 (1996) 105-115; Id., In Pentecosten sermo 1 (PG 52, 803-808; CPG 4536): il problema dell'autenticità: Historiam perscrutari. Miscellanea di studi offerti al prof. Ottorino Pasquato, ed. M. Maritano, Biblioteca di Scienze Religiose 180, Rome 2002, 849-861; Id., "Furono chiamati giovanniti . . ." Un'ipotesi sulla nascita del corpus pseudocrisostomico, in Philomathestatos: Studies in Greek and Byzantine Texts Presented to Jacques Noret for His Sixty-Fifth Birthday . . . , ed. B. Janssens - B. Roosen - P. Van Deun, OLA 137, Leuven 2004, 701-711; Id., La volontà e il caso: la tipologia dei primi spuri di Crisostomo, in Giovanni Crisostomo: Oriente e Occidente tra IV e V secolo. XXXIII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana. Roma, 6-8 maggio 2004 (SEA 93), Rome 2005, 101-118.

III. Systematic attributions. The known corpora of ps.-Chrysostomic homilies by unknown authors are the following: (1) three homilies of Antiochene provenance from the end of the 4th c.; (2) 37 homilies by an author of Cappadocian education (perhaps a disciple of *Basil the Great), but active in Constantinople around the year 400; (3) five homilies of Antiochene origin given at Constantinople around the year 400; (4) two homilies of Antiochene origin, perhaps from the 1st half of the 5th c.; (5) two Constantinopolitan homilies of the 2nd half of the 5th c. (perhaps by *Acacius of Constantinople); (6) a "plagiarizer," perhaps of the end of the 5th c.; (7) two anonymous homilies, perhaps of the end of the 5th c.; (8) two homilies which comment on Matthew; (9) two Lenten homilies prior to the 8th c.; (10) two Byzantine homilies on *John the Baptist; (11) the De precatione orationes 1-2 (PG 50, 775-786).

(1) S.J. Voicu, "Giovanni di Gerusalemme" e Pseudo-Crisostomo: Saggio di critica di stile: Euntes Docete 24 (1971) 69-90; (2) Id., Tracce origeniane in uno Pseudocrisostomo Cappadoce, in Origene e l'alessandrinismo cappadoce (III-IV secolo). Atti del V Convegno del Gruppo Italiano di ricerca su "Origene e la tradizione alessandrina" (Bari, 20-22 settembre 2000), ed. M. Girardi and M. Marin, Bari 2002, 333-346; Id., Ancora due omelie pseudocrisostomiche di matrice cappadoce (CPG 4669 e 4966), in Ricerche patristiche in onore di Dom Basil Studer OSB (= Augustinianum 32, 1-2), Rome 1993, 476-477; (3) Id., Une nomenclature pour les anonymes du corpus pseudo-chrysostomien: Byzantion 51 (1981) 302, num. 16; (6) Id., "Giovanni di Gerusalemme" . . . , 90-100; (7) M. Simonetti, Note su due omelie ariane pubblicate recentemente, in Studi classici in onore di Quintino Cataudella. II, Catania 1972, 417-423; (8) S.J. Voicu, Une nomenclature . . . , 302, num. 17; (9) ibid., 303, num. 19; (10) C. Datema, Another Unedited Homily of Ps. Chrysostom on the Birth of John the Baptist (BHG 847i): Byzantion 53 (1983) 492-493. Among the spurious works attested in the 5th c. the In natalem Christi diem is isolated (PG 56, 385-394). The following merit a special mention: the liturgy, perhaps contemporaneous with Chrysostom, the Latin Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum (5th c.), the subordinationist homily In operarios undecimae horae (CPG 4763; V c.?) and some homilies on the subintroductae (Ascetam facetiis uti non debere: PG 48, 1055-1060; De corruptoribus virginum: PG 60, 741-744; In evangelii dictum et de virginitate: PG 64, 37-44). R. Taft, The Authenticity of the Chrysostom Anaphora Revisited: Determining the Authorship of Liturgical Texts by Computer: OCA 56 (1990) 5-51; for Eng. tr. of the Opus imperfectum, see Incomplete Commentary on Matthew (Opus imperfectum), tr. J.A. Kellerman, ACT, 2 vols., Downers Grove, IL 2010.

IV. Intentional attributions. The corpora of some authors seem to have been intentionally attributed to John Chrysostom. Sometimes it is a matter of lending credence to heretics, as in cases like *Nestorius, *Apollinaris or perhaps Acacius of Constantinople (see above n. 5); at other times, as in the cases of *Proclus of Constantinople, *Leontius of Constantinople or *Severian of Gabala, the motivations are uncertain.

S.J. Voicu, Nestorio e la Oratio de epiphania (CPG 4882) attribuita a Giovanni Crisostomo: Augustinianum 43 (2003) 495-499; E. Cattaneo, Trois homélies pseudo-chrysostomiennes sur la Pâque comme oeuvre d'Apollinaire de Laodicée (Théol. Hist. 58), Paris 1981; S.J. Voicu, Dieci omelie di Leonzio di Costantinopoli: Studi sull'oriente cristiano 5 (2001) 1, 165-190; Id., Il nome cancellato: la trasmissione delle omelie di Severiano di Gabala: RHT n.s. 1 (2006) 317-333.

V. Localized texts. Some ancient homilies can be localized. From Constantinople come: (1) Laudatio apostolorum (CPG 4970; unpublished; Church of the Holy Apostles, between 363 and 380; cf. S.J. Voicu, Echi costantinopolitani di sant'Ireneo. Note su una pseudocrisostomica "Laudatio apostolorum" [CPG 4970], in B. Magnusson et al. [ed.], Ultra terminum uagari. Scritti in onore di Carl Nylander, Rome 1997, 357-366); (2) In s. Thomam et in oeconomiam domini nostri (CPG 4924); C. Datema - P. Allen, BHG 1841s: An Unedited Homily of Ps. Chrysostom on Thomas: Byzantion 56 (1986) 28-53; in the Great Church, around the middle of the 6th c., see C. Datema, New Evidence for the Encounter Between Constantinople and "India," in C. Laga - J.A. Munitiz - L. Van Rompay, After Chalcedon: Studies in Theology and Church History Offered to Professor Albert Van Roey for His Seventieth Birthday (Orientalia Lovaniensia Analecta 18), Leuven 1985, 57-65; (3) In sanctum Thomam Apostolum sermo (PG 59, 497-500; in 402, in St. Thomas of Drypia; see ibid., 59-60); (4) De circo (PG 59, 567-570; describes the Hippodrome and alludes to Marathonius; 4th–5th c.?).

From Antioch come: (1) De proditione Iudae (PG 50, 715-720; alludes to Daphne); (2) In illud, Simile est regnum caelorum patrifamilias (PG 59, 577-586; alludes to Barlaam the martyr); (3) De anathemate (PG 48, 945-952; probably by Flavian of Antioch; it cites Ignatius of Antioch); (4) Sermo de pseudoprophetis (PG 59, 553-568; around 677; cf. A. Whealey, Sermo de pseudoprophetis of Pseudo-John Chrysostom: A Homily from Antioch Under Early Islamic Rule: Byzantion 69 [1999] 178-186).

VI. Accidental attributions. Some accidental attributions are due to errors in the MS tradition or to scribal conjectures: Protevangelium of James,* *John the Faster, Anatolius of Thessalonica or John the disciple of Basil.

É. de Strycker, De griekse handschriften van het Protevangelie van Jacobus (Mededelingen van de Koninklijke Vlaamse akademie voor wetenschappen. Klasse der Letteren 30, 1), Brussels 1968, 37; S.J. Voicu, Basilio e pseudocrisostomo: nuovi accostamenti, in Basilio di Cesarea, la sua età, la sua opera e il basilianesimo in Sicilia. Atti del Congresso internazionale (Messina 3-6 dicembre 1979), I, Messina 1983, 659-667 (cf. also L. Gambero, Un'omelia pseudo-crisostomica sul Vangelo dell'Annunciazione: Marianum 47 [1985] 517-535).

VII. Anthologies and extracts. The majority of the spurious works are "secondary" texts (extracts or anthologies of preexisting homilies). The number of those known has grown dizzyingly with the publication of the Codices Chrysostomici Graeci. The composition of the works of this genre had begun before the end of the 5th c., as Coptic translations attest. The ethika deserve a particular mention; i.e., the moral conclusions taken from the exegetical homilies (materially, but not formally authentic) and the numerous Eclogues of Theodore Daphnopates (10th c.).

S. Haidacher, Studien über Chrysostomos-Eklogen (Sitzungsberichte der Wiener Akademie der Wissenschaften 144, 4), Vienna 1902.

S.J. Voicu

JOHN CLIMACUS (or Scholasticus) (d. ca. 649). He was born before 579 and died around 649. His life is mostly unknown. It had been thought that he was of the 6th c., but F. Nau believed he was able to date his death to around 649 (Notes sur la date de la mort de Saint Jean Climaque: ByzZ 11 [1902] 35-37). His biographer Daniel (PG 88, 596-608) comments that John was a monk in community at Raithu, to the SW of the Sinai, and later a hermit, and that when he was sixty he was elected abbot of the monastery on the Sinai.

His name Climacus is a nickname taken from the work titled Κλίμαξ τοῦ Παραδείσου (Lat. Scala paradisi, "Ladder of Paradise"): "John of the Ladder": the Greek genitive was Latinized as the nominative Climacus. He was induced to write his work, when he was abbot, by another John, the superior of the monastery of Raithu. In 30 chapters or steps, he explains the vices that are dangerous for monks (1-23) and the virtues which distinguish them (24-30). John himself compares his work to Jacob's ladder or to the 30 years of the life of Jesus. The work found acceptance and success, attested by the existence of 33 Greek MSS and of a great number of *Latin, *Syriac, *Armenian, Slavic and Arabic translations. This circumstance makes a critical edition (as yet nonexistent) difficult. As an appendix a complement is united to the Ladder, a Liber ad Pastorem (PG 88, 1165-1209). The author expounds in it the duties of the superior of the monastery, inspired probably by the Regula pastoralis of *Gregory the Great, which had been translated into Greek around 600 by a patriarch of *Antioch.

John is a typical representative of the tendency which I. Hausherr has called the "Sinaitic school." The monastic ideal is hesychia,* internal and external tranquility. The awareness of the "invisible war" against the logismoi, wicked thoughts, is the preliminary condition for continual prayer. In order to know the spirits of wickedness and the contrary virtues, John proposes numerous "definitions," short aphorisms which bring into relief all the principal aspects of the subject in question and which often synthesize the long experience of the monks. In fact, more than it might seem, John has a good acquaintance with the ancient Fathers, not only with the hermits of the Egyptian desert, but also with the Palestinians *Barsanuphius and *Dorotheus of Gaza.

John considers monastic life necessary for the church, not as an apostolate, nor as an "example" proposed visibly: the monks influence the life of the church by means of their leading "an angelic life, although they inhabit the material and corruptible body" (Ladder, step 1).

The editio princeps is that of M. Raderus, Paris 1633: PG 88, 596-1209. The ed. of the monk Sophronius of Rodosto is insufficient, Constantinople 1883. It. tr., Gentile da Foligno (Venezia 1491), L. Oliger (Florence 1912), Trevisan (Turin 1941: with Greek text which essentially follows Raderus), B. Ignesti (Siena 1955). Eng. tr., L. Moore, New York 1959.

CPG 7850-7853; DTC 8, 690-693; BS 6, 664-666; Cath 6, 445-6; DSp 8, 369-389; DIP 4, 1296-1297; A. Saudrau, La doctrine spirituelle de st. Jean Climaque: Vie Spirit. 9 (1924) 352-370; A. Colunga, La Escala Espiritual de san Juan Clímaco: Vida Sobrenatural 31 (1936) 269-277; J. Gribomont, La "Scala Paradisi." Jean de Raïthou et Ange Clareno: StudMon 2 (1960) 345-358; I. Hausherr, La théologie du monachisme chez saint Jean Climaque, in Théologie de la vie monastique, Paris 1961, 385-410;

W. Völker, Scala Paradisi. Eine Studie zu Johannes Climacus and zugleich eine Vorstudie zu Symeon den Neuen Theologen, Wiesbaden 1968; Ph. Savvopoulos, Ekstatische Person als Bildungsziel bei Johannes Klimakos. Ein Beitrag zur griechisch-orthodoxen Pädagogik, Frankfurt 1986; J. Chryssavgis, Ascent to Heaven: The Theology of the Human Person According to Saint John of the Ladder, Brookline, MA 1989; L'Échelle sainte / Saint-Jean Climaque, Fr. tr. by P. Deseille, Bégrolles-en-Mauge, Abbaye de Bellefontaine, 1993; Klimax oder Die Himmelsleiter / Heiliger Johannes vom Sinai, Ger. tr., G. Makedos, Würzburg 2000; J.-C. Larchet, "Die Leiter des göttlichen Aufstiegs" von Johannes Klimakos: OS 49 (2000) 269-313; Patrologia V, 282-284; C. Benke, Die Gabe der Tränen: zur Tradition und Theologie eines vergessenen Kapitels der Glaubensgeschichte, Echter 2002, 29-90; C. Restagno, Monaci e angeli secondo Giovanni Climaco: Quaderni medievali 53 (2002) 69-86; Giovanni Climaco e il Sinai, ed. S. Chialà - L. Cremaschi, Magnano 2002; J. Chryssavgis, John Climacus: From the Egyptian Desert to the Sinaite Mountain, Aldershot 2004; Giovanni Climaco, La scala, It. tr. and notes by L. D'Ayala Valva, Magnano 2005.

T. Špidlík

JOHN Comes (5th c.). Lived at Antarados in the 5th c. and was a comes sacrarum largitionum—i.e., an official in charge of sacred gifts. In 431, as the report which he sent to *Constantinople witnesses, he went to *Ephesus to consign to the more than fifty bishops who had taken part in the 3rd Ecumenical Council a letter of the emperor *Theodosius II which invited them to put a definitive end to the controversies which had arisen within the Eastern church following the affirmation of the *Nestorian heresy.

CPG 8723-4; PG 84, 605-607; ACO I,I,3, I,I,7, 31-32, 67-68; PLRE II, 607.

P. Marone

JOHN DIACRINOMENOS (6th c.). An author originally from *Syria and of moderate *monophysite allegiance. He composed, after 512, a Historia ecclesiastica in 10 books, which covered the period from *Theodosius II (429) to the reign of the emperor *Anastasius I (491–518). Of this work nothing remains except mentions and citations collected by an anonymous compiler of the beginning of the 7th c., also responsible for the summary of the Historia ecclesiastica of *Theodore the Lector. The first five books of this work were known also to *Photius (Bibliotheca I, cod. 41). A recent attempt to characterize the writer emphasizes his hostility to *dyophysitism, the partisanship in confrontation with Cyrillian Christology, but also the distance from the attitudes of schism typical of *Severus of Antioch or of *Philoxenus of Mabbug.

Editions: Theodoros Anagnostes Kirchengeschichte, ed. G.C. Hansen (GCS, neue Folge, 3), Berlin 1971, 152-157. Studies: Ph. Blaudeau, Mémoire monophysite et besoins chalcédoniens. Quelques réflexions sur les vestiges de l'Histoire ecclésiastique de Jean Diacrinoménos: Adamantius 7 (2001) 76-97.

A. Camplani

JOHN DRUNGARIUS. Catenist (6th–7th c.). There is no information on the life and work of this catenist who lived between the 6th and the 7th c., author of a catena for each of the four major prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel). In the prologue to the catena to Isaiah he declares that, being unable to understand the text of the prophet, he turned to the Fathers to elucidate the difficulties, in particular to *Origen, *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Theodore of Heraclea, *Eusebius of Emesa, *Apollinaris and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus. He observes, however, in order to distance himself from the accusations of heresy against them, that when these authors do not present their own doctrines, they offer interesting observations.

See Patrologia V, the chapter on the catenae; G. Dorival, Des commentaires de l'Écriture aux chaînes, in Le monde grec ancien et la Bible, ed. C. Mondésert, Paris 1984, 360-386, esp. 368ff.

A. Di Berardino

JOHN MALALAS (d. after 565). The nickname Malalas is of *Syriac origin and means "orator" or "advocate." Little is known of his life. He was born in the region of *Antioch, where he was educated between 470 and 480; he spent time in Thessalonica and *Caesarea Philippi (Palestine) and later lived in *Constantinople. He was part of the imperial bureaucracy. Some scholars have proposed an identification with John Scholasticus (d. 577), who was elected patriarch of the imperial capital in 565. He wrote in popular Greek a Chronography or Universal History in 17 books of clear *monophysite leanings; in a second period he added an eighteenth book to it, this time orthodox (PG 97, 627-718), which concentrates on the capital, so that some think that the author is another person. His chronicle goes from the creation of the world until his time; the text, in the only preserved MS, ends at the year of 563 (instead of 574, as it was in the full work). The work presents itself more as a literary history than as a rigorous chronological treatment; it refers to Greek mythology in the section narrating the successions of peoples: the ancient East, the patriarchs, the Greeks, the Macedonians, the Romans. The first book has been reconstructed in part from Greek, Slavic, Latin, Ethiopian and Syriac fragments. Almost all the sources used have been lost. This history had a large influence both in the East and in the West with translations in Syriac, Latin, Slovenian and Ethiopian.

CPG 7511 (with bibl.); Repertorium 6, 356; L. Dindorf, Chronographia: CSHB 15, Bonn 1831 = PG 97, 9-790; A. Schenk von Stauffenberg, Die römische Kaisergeschichte bei Malalas; Griechischer Texte der Bücher IX-XII und Untersuchungen, Stuttgart 1931; Ioannis Malalae Chronographia, recensuit I. Thurm, CFHB 35, Berlin 2000; M.E. Colonna, Gli storici bizantini dal cent. IV al XV cent., Naples 1956, 73ff.; A.-J. Festugière, Notabilia dans Malalas: RPh 52 (1978) 221-241; RPh 53 (1979) 227-237; E. Jeffreys - M. Jeffreys - R. Scott et al., The Chronicle of John Malalas. A Translation, Melbourne 1986; R.D. Scott, Malalas, The Secret History, and Justinian's Propaganda: DOP 39 (1985) 99-109; E. Jeffreys, B. Croke and R. Scott (eds.), Studies in John Malalas, Sydney 1990; E.M. Jeffreys, The Chronicle of John Malalas, Book I: A Commentary, in P. Allen - E.M. Jeffreys (eds.), The Sixth Century—End or Beginning?, Brisbane 1996, 52-74; R. Scott, Writing the Reign of Justinian: Malalas versus Theophanes, ibid., 20-34; ODB 2, 1275; A. Laniado, La Vie d'Hypatius de Gangres (BHG 759a), Jean Malalas et l'impôt du "xylélaion": AB 115 (1997) 133-166; BBKL 3, 468-473; I. Thurn, Ioannis Malalae Chronographia, Berlin 2000 (Corpus fontium historiae Byzantinae. Series Berolinensis 35).

J.-M. Sauget

JOHN MANDAKUNI (484–498). Armenian catholicos to whom 25 homilies are attributed as well as some prayers in the Armenian breviary. Current scholars ascribe these works more often to John of Cak'nut (7th c.).

S. Weber, Ausgewählte Schriften der armenischen Kirchenväter, II, Munich 1927, 29-269; Bardenhewer V, 206-208; Y. Tabakian, Les homélies du catholicos Hovhan Mandakouni (Catholicossat Arménien de Cilicie. Publication du Département de l'Éducation Chrétienne 65), Antélias 2000 (does not discuss the authenticity).

S.J. Voicu

JOHN MAXENTIUS (6th c.). Leader of the so-called Scythian monks, active 519–533 between *Constantinople and *Rome in favor of the theopaschite formula unus de Trinitate passus est. It is uncertain if he should be identified with *John, bishop of Tomi (Thrace) between 530 and 550, author of a brief Disputatio de Nestorianis et Eutychianis. It is still uncertain if the names Maxentius and John should be applied to one and the same person, or whether they indicate two distinct figures, both belonging to the clan of the Scythian monks, the abbot Maxentius and the monk John. Maxentius John (as the Bodl. Laud. misc. 580 calls him, the only source which unites the two names) wrote in Latin, beyond some very short works (Capitula contra nestorianos et pelagianos; Professio brevissima catholicae fidei; Brevissima adunationis ratio verbi ad propriam carnem; Responsio contra acephalos), just two large works: the Dialogus contra nestorianos in two books and the Responsio adversus epistulam quam ad Possessorem a Romano episcopo dicunt haeretici destinatam. In the anti-*Nestorian work John Maxentius maintains a *Christology of *Neochalcedonian type, since he affirms the indispensability of the formula unus de Trinitate passus est and of extremist expressions of Cyrillian stamp, such as una naturalis persona est idem Christus ex Trinitate, to exclude a Nestorian interpretation of the Chalcedonian formula. In the Responsio he tries to reply to the very serious accusations which Pope *Hormisdas had made against the Scythian monks in the letter to *Possessor. In order to be free in his criticism, John Maxentius pretends to believe that the letter of Hormisdas is a falsification of heretics. Usually ascribed to John Maxentius is also the Libellus fidei which in 519 the Scythian monks presented to the delegates of Hormisdas at Constantinople and which the latter did not want to receive.

CPL 656-665; CCL 85A (bibl.); J.A. McGuckin, The "Theopaschite Confession" (Text and Historical Context): A Study in the Cyrilline Reinterpretation of Chalcedon: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 35 (1984) 239-255; F. Carcione, La controversia tra Ormisda e i monaci sciti sulla formula "Unus de Trinitate passus est carne": calcedonismo integralista e calcedonismo integrato a confronto, in Atti del Convegno su Papa Ormisda (514-523). Magistero, cura pastorale ed impegno ecumenico, ed. C. Noce, Frosinone 1993, 57ff.; Patrologia IV, 190-191.

M. Simonetti

JOHN "MEDIOCRIS" of Naples (bishop 532/535–552/555). Author of a collection of 30 (or 31) Latin sermons transmitted under the name of *John Chrysostom. The attribution to John was first advanced and later dropped by Morin. The provenance of the homilies, composed around the 1st half of the 6th c., is uncertain (Africa? S Italy?). Their author used *Augustine; a relationship between them and the Regula magistri remains hypothetical.

PLS 4, 741-834; CPL 915; G. Morin, Étude sur une série de discours d'un évêque [de Naples?] du VI^e siècle: RBen 11 (1894) 385-402; Id., Un essai d'autocritique: RBen 12 (1895) 390-391; Id., Études, textes, découvertes, I, Maredsous-Paris 1913, 37-38; A. Vaccari, La Bibbia nell'ambiente di S. Benedetto: Biblica 29 (1948) 331-337; M. Lambert, Édition d'une collection latine découverte par Dom Morin: REAug 15 (1969) 255-258; J.-P. Bouhot, La collection homilétique pseudo-chrysostomienne découverte par Dom Morin: REAug 16 (1970) 139-146.

S.J. Voicu

JOHN MOSCHUS (Moschos) (d. 620/634). Or rather, John Eukratas. He was born perhaps at *Damascus, more likely in Isauria, before 550. He died in *Constantinople a little after having finished the redaction of his work between 11 November 620 and the spring-summer of 634 (Follieri), while acc. to Louth he died in *Rome. Before dying he gave orders to his friend *Sophronius to carry his body back to the Sinai, but he was buried in the monastery of St. Theodosius near *Jerusalem. A monk of the monastery of St. Theodosius, then later of the monastery of Pharan in Judea (ca. 568–578), he made a long pilgrimage to the East and later to *Italy as far as Rome, together with his disciple Sophronius, future patriarch of Jerusalem. With Sophronius's collaboration, he wrote the Pratum Spirituale (Leimonarion) (the Greek text was published by Fronton du Duc-Ducaeus, Bibliotheca veterum Patrum, II, Paris 1624 and by J.B. Cotelier, Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta, II, Paris 1681, cf. PG 87, 3, 2847-3116; Fr. tr. M.J. Rouët de Journel, SC 12, Paris 1946, repr. 1960). The work shows traces of the literary genre of *Palladius, the Historia monachorum of *Theodoret, and generally the Vitae Patrum; it already reflects, however, a period of crisis which precedes the Persian and Arabic invasions and the divisions provoked between the monks by the christological controversies. It certainly remains an important collection of monastic narrations, fruit of so many pilgrimages, experiences and memories. John Moschus and Sophronius also together wrote a biography of the patriarch of Alexandria *John the Almsgiver (ed. H. Delehaye, AB 45 [1927] 19-25; the chap. I-XV are only a summary of the lost Vita). John Moschus is a defender of the *Chalcedonian church, and his friend Sophronius, starting from 633, became in Jerusalem one of the principal adversaries of *monothelitism, then a founder of the *Melkite Church.

CPG 7376-7377; DTC 10, 2510-2513; DSp 8, 632-640; DIP 4, 1284-5; M.H. Baynes, The "Pratum spirituale": OCP 13 (1947) 404-414; E. Mioni, Paterica dello pseudo-Mosco: St. biz. neoell. 8 (1953) 27-36; H. Chadwick, John Moschus and His Friend Sophronius the Sophist: JTS 25 (1974) 41-74; Il prato, It. tr. and comm. by R. Maisano, Naples 1982; P. Pattenden, The Editions of the Pratum Spirituale of John Moschus: SP XV, 15-19; G. Pasini, Il monachesimo nel Prato di Giovanni Mosco e i suoi aspetti popolari: VetChr 22 (1985) 331-379; J.S. Palmer, La vida monástica en el Pratum spirituale de Juan Mosco, Madrid 1992; Id., El monacato oriental en el Pratum spirituale de Juan Mosco, Madrid 1993; Ph. Pattenden, Some Remarks on the Newly Edited Text of the Pratum of John Moschus: SP 18/2 45-51; E. Follieri, Dove e quando morì Giovanni Mosco: RSBN 25 (1988) 3-39; A. Louth, Did John Moschos Really Die in Constantinople?: JTS 49 (1998) 149-154; Patrologia V, 295-297.

T. Špidlík

JOHN of Aegeates. A miaphysite author of the 5th c. who should not be identified with John of Cilicia. Two fragments have been preserved of a letter from him to *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, in the *Syriac translation of the Contra impium grammaticum of *Severus of Antioch.

F. Nau, Documents pour servir à l'histoire de l'Église nestorienne (PO 13/2), Paris 1916, 188-189; M. Richard, La lettre de Théodoret à Jean d'Égées, in Opera Minora II, Turnhout-Leuven 1977, n. 48.

K. den Biesen

JOHN of Antioch (d. 441/442). He was probably born at *Antioch, on an unknown date in the 2nd half of the 4th c. Educated together with *Nestorius and *Theodore (future bishop of Mopsuestia) in the monastery of St. Euprepius near Antioch, he was elected bishop of Antioch in 428, at the time when the *Nestorian controversy arose, to which his name is closely linked.

Having learned from Pope *Celestine of the decision taken in synod at Rome concerning Nestorius (Jaffé 373), John wrote a friendly letter to the bishop of *Constantinople to exhort him to accept the title of *Theotokos, and at the same time he charged *Andrew of Samosata and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus to refute the anathemas of *Cyril of Alexandria.

Called to the Council of *Ephesus (19 November 430), he traveled there with about forty Syrian bishops. Because of the different difficulties encountered during the voyage, the group reached the conciliar city only 24 June, by which time Cyril, without waiting for the Easterners, had already opened the session two days before and condemned Nestorius. With his group and other bishops offended by the procedure followed by the bishop of *Alexandria, John convened another synod of 43 (or 50) participants who met in a palace where John was staying and decided in synod to depose Cyril of Alexandria and *Memnon of Ephesus, considered authors of the heresies contained in the anathemas, and to excommunicate their followers. This sentence was communicated through fourteen documents, not only to the interested parties but also to the highest authorities of the empire, and to the clergy and people of Constantinople. Having refused, after three canonical summons, to appear before the Ephesian council proper, John was in turn excommunicated with 34 bishops of his party. *Theodosius II approved the condemnation both of Cyril and of Nestorius, which cheered John, convinced that the anathemas had thus been condemned, as he declared in a letter to the emperor in which he accepts without hesitation the title of Theotokos and expounds the christological faith of his party in a formula which would be adopted three years later as a symbol of union. At *Nicodemia, in restricted sessions in the presence of Theodosius (September 431) in which John took part, no accord was reached. The emperor thereupon dissolved the council. On the route back to Antioch, John paused at Berea with the elderly *Acacius, later selected as mediator by Theodosius II, who also had an ultimatum concerning reconciliation brought to Cyril and John by his prefect Aristolaus. Difficult negotiations followed until Cyril accepted the attached formula of faith, slightly reviseed, in which the christological dogma was expressed in terms that would be taken up again by the Council of *Chalcedon. It remained to induce all the bishops of his party to accept this union. Certain "hard-liners," such as Theodoret, finally ceded, though without explicitly condemning Nestorius. With others, such as *Alexander of Hierapolis, obstinate in their opposition to Cyril, the efforts of John were in vain. He had to take action against them.

In the years 437–438, before giving his own assent to the Tome to the Armenians requested by the patriarch *Proclus of Constantinople, John wanted to protect the memory of his deceased friend Theodore of Mopsuestia. It was the last known act of the bishop of Antioch, whose death took place 441/442.

The written work of John is entirely included in the abundant correspondence exchanged in his own name and as a party leader in the years 430–438.

CPG 6301-6360; CPG 6301-6360; PG 84; Fliche-Martin IV, 216-261; M. Richard, Théodoret, Jean d'Antioche et les moines d'Orient, in Opera Minora 2, Turnhout-Leuven 1977, n. 47, 147-156; A. Grillmeier - H. Bacht, Das Konzil von Chalkedon, I, II, Würzburg 1951-54, passim; Cath 6, 525; L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974, 195-299; Grillmeier 12, 484, 488, 497-498; RGG[4] 3, 522; W. Kraatz, Koptische Akten zum ephesinischen Konzil (TU 26/2), Leipzig 1904, 191-200.

D. Stiernon

JOHN of Antioch, chronicler (6th–7th c.). Author of a Historia chronica, a Christian history of the world from the creation of Adam until the ascent of the emperor *Heraclius in AD 610. The work has survived in fragments and an almost entirely indirect tradition (for the edition see Roberto and Sotiroudis). The little information we have regarding John derives exclusively from the reading of the fragments. He wrote in the first years of the reign of Heraclius, thus in the period 610–630. *Antioch, his homeland, is probably the place where he was educated: on this issue his dependence on the Chronographia of the Antiochene *John Malalas is a matter of great significance (see the very early E. Patzig, Johannes Antiochenus und Johannes Malalas, Leipzig 1891). The reference point for all the historical reconstruction for the years closest to him, however, is *Constantinople. It should be deduced from this fact that John wrote at Constantinople and addressed a public who lived in the capital.

There are numerous historical sources used in the Historia: in the cases of Herodian, Cassius Dio, *Zosimus, Priscus of Panium, Candidus Isauricus and Malalas himself, the work of John reveals itself as a valuable witness of indirect tradition (see, e.g., U. Roberto, Sulla tradizione storiografica di Candido Isaurico: Mediterraneo antico 3 [2000] 685-727). The abundance of sources (also in *Latin) suggests that the author had a furnished library in the capital at his disposition. The style of the work is very cultivated; the language and the vocabulary are still based on the classical tradition; and furthermore the adherence to the classicizing historiographic tendency is also expressed by the themes handled. To be precise, the work is a Christian history of the world in the form of a chronicle, which shows a striking interest in political questions, in particular the role of Rome in universal history. After the first two books dedicated to the synchronism between biblical history and Greco-Eastern history (acc. to the well-established method of Christian universal chronicle), and a book on the war of Troy, the attention is concentrated on Rome. In the course of the dense narration a historiographic reflection of great originality emerges: in fact, John exalts the history of republican Rome (which occupies at least 5 books of the work), and presents the men and values of that period as a model of political virtue and moral rigor for his contemporaries. It is interesting to note that the imperial history starting from Augustus is often described as a degeneration of the splendor of the republican era (on this theme see U. Roberto, L'immagine di Roma repubblicana nella Historia chronica di Giovanni di Antiochia: Romanobarbarica 18 [2003-2005] 351-370; L. Zusi, L'età marianosillana in Giovanni Antiocheno, Rome 1989). The tendency to describe political institutions, to deal with military issues and the functioning of the empire, on the one hand, and the solid classical culture, on the other, lead to the conclusion that John worked in Constantinople in the environment of the bureaucracy or in service to some institution of the capital. During the transition between Late Antiquity and *Byzantium, John of Antioch wrote a universal history turning still to the great classical historiographic tradition and, at the same time, reflecting on the great political and cultural themes which marked the entire Late Antique period.

Repertorium 6, 278 (not found in the CPG); C. Müller, FHG 4, 535-622; 5, 27-38; K. Krumbacher 334-337; H. Hunger, Hochsprachliche profane Literatur der Byzantiner, Munich 1978, I, 326-328; P. Sotiroudis, Untersuchungen zum Geschichtswerk des Johannes von Antiocheia, Thessaloniki 1989; Ioannis Antiocheni Fragmenta ex Historia chronica, intr., critical ed. and It. tr. by U. Roberto, TU 154, Berlin-New York 2005.

U. ROBERTO

JOHN of Apamea, "the Solitary" (5th c.?). An extremely prolific writer, to whom more than 90 texts are ascribed—including collections of aphorisms, dialogues, numerous letters, twelve biblical commentaries, mēmrē, doxologies and prayers—of many different origins but all of a monastic character, the greater part of which remain unpublished. Even if the entirety of this corpus cannot be attributed to a single author, it is clear that it comes from the same monastic environment, which seems to be that of *Apamea. From the moment when the first of these works was published, the interest in this spiritual author has not ceased to grow. Even if his precise identity remains unknown, the majority of scholars identify him with the John of Apamea mentioned by *Babai the Great in the margin of a citation of one of his letters. The christological vocabulary of the published writings, which present a post-Ephesian and pre-Chalcedonian orthodoxy, has permitted the dating of his activity to the 1st decades of the 5th c. Even if he seems to belong, therefore, to the Syro-Western tradition, his influence surpassed the ecclesiastical frontiers (as is the case for so many other spiritual writers), and both the MS tradition and explicit citations demonstrate that John was widely read and appreciated in the church of the East.

The *exegesis of John offers an ascetic-monastic reading of the Bible which includes neither Alexandrian *allegory nor Antiochene literalness. In fact, even if he is an exponent of an erudite asceticism which is nourished by the contributions of the Greek schools, John nevertheless opposes vigorously that which he considers "Hellenization" of the Syriac-language churches, i.e., to theological rationalism and the exaltation of beautiful oratory and dialectical ability. His manner of thinking and writing is deeply rooted in the *Syriac tradition, more precisely in that of *Ephrem and the school of *Edessa in general. It is possible that he knew the first Syriac translations of *Evagrius, but in the present state of knowledge his relationship with the latter is anything but clear.

The ascetic doctrine of John demonstrates, in fact, a great originality and had an enormous influence on the later developments of Eastern spirituality and mysticism. (It is enough to mention *Isaac of Nineveh, *Simon of Taybutheh, *Joseph Hazzaya and *John of Dalyatha). John distinguishes three orders in the spiritual life, which reflects his three-part anthropology, acc. to which the soul is a spiritual entity linked to the body and therefore situated at an inferior level to that of the spirit. These three orders of "corporality," "psychicality" and "spirituality" are three ways of feeling, thinking and acting which also can be presented as three successive stages of spiritual growth. In the first stage, the individual refuses to obey the commandments and is dominated by the desires of the body, while in the second he rises above the material world to fight against wicked thoughts and thus reach purity of the soul (dakyūtā). At that point the soul is free from the influences of the body (i.e., the passions) and advances to the last stage of "clarity" or "limpidity" (šapyūtā), which corresponds to the spiritual nature of humanity: a state of perfect readiness to receive the revelation of divine and eschatological mysteries.

Editions: S. Dedering, Johannes von Lycopolis. Ein Dialog über die Seele und die Affekte des Menschen, Uppsala 1936; L.G. Rignell, Briefe von Johannes dem Einsiedler, Lund 1941; L.G. Rignell, Drei Traktate von Johannes dem Einsiedler, Lund 1960; W. Strothmann, Johannes von Apamea. Sechs Gespräche mit Thomasios. Der Briefwechsel zwischen Thomasios und Johannes und drei an Thomasios gerichteten Abhandlungen, Berlin 1972; W. Strothmann, Der Kohelet-Kommentar des Johannes von Apamea, Göttingen 1988; M. Nin, Comentario de Juan el Solitario a Ef 6,11: StudMon 33 (1991) 207-222.

Translations: I. Hausherr, Jean le Solitaire - Pseudo-Jean de Lycopolis. Dialogue sur l'âme et les passions de l'homme (OCA 120), Rome 1939; S. Brock, John the Solitary, "On Prayer": JTS 30 (1979) 84-101; R. Lavenant, Jean d'Apamée. Dialogues et traités (SC 311), Paris 1984; Holy Transfiguration Monastery, The Ascetical Homilies of Saint Isaac the Syrian, Boston 1984, Appendix D: tr. of the treatises On Silence and On Prayer; S. Brock, The Syriac Fathers on the Spiritual Life (Cistercian Studies 101), Kalamazoo 1987, 77-100: tr. of the Letter to Hesychius; M. Nin, Il Commento di Giovanni il Solitario a Mt 5,3: Harp 5 (1992) 29-37; M. Nin, Juan el Solitario, Carta a Hesiquio: Quadernos Monásticos 110 (1994) 367-390; M. Nin, Memra de Juan el Solitario: StudMon 37 (1995) 19-39. DSp 8, 764-772; Patrologia V, 459-60; Bettiolo, Lineamenti, 544-547; P. Harb, Doctrine spirituelle de Jean le Solitaire (Jean d'Apamée): PdO 2 (1971) 225-260; P. Bettiolo, Sulla Preghiera: Filosseno o Giovanni?: Muséon 94 (1981) 75-89; A. de Halleux, La christologie de Jean le Solitaire: Muséon 94 (1981) 84-101; A. de Halleux, Le milieu historique de Jean le Solitaire, in III Symposium Syriacum (OCA 221), Rome 1983, 299-305; J. Martikainen, Johannes von Apamea und die Entwicklung der syrischen Theologie, in IV Symposium Syriacum (OCA 229), Rome 1987, 257-263; R. Beulay, La lumière sans forme. Introduction à l'étude de la mystique chrétienne syro-orientale, Chevetogne 1987, 95-127 (see the index also); M. Nin, Giovanni il Solitario. Due dossologie cristologiche, in Mysterium Christi (Studia Anselmiana 116), Rome 1995, 205-218.

K. DEN BIESEN

JOHN of Arles (7th c.). From this bishop of *Arles (658/659–668) we have a short Epistula ad virgines addressed to the nuns of the convent of St. Mary, situated within the walls of the city; it is an exhortation to the observance of the monastic life and above all on the times for fasts and the relationship with the laity.

CPL 1848; PL 72, 859-860.

A. Di Berardino

JOHN of Berytus (end of the 5th c.). Bishop in the last quarter of the 5th. c., known esp. through the Vita of Severus of Antioch written by *Zacharias Scholasticus (PO 2, 66.69.78). Zacharias and *Severus of Antioch both knew him personally between 474 and 491. Zacharias, who presents John as a follower of the *Chalcedonian party, relates two episodes in which he appears engaged in the fight against magic and necromancy. In the Synaxarium Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae (ed. Delehaye, Brussels 1902, 475, 37) he is cited as a collaborator of *Rabbula of Samosata (450–530) in founding a monastery. A brief Easter homily by him is preserved.

CPG 6720; SC 187 (ed. M. Aubineau), Paris 1972, 284-288, 296-299; Patrologia V, 184.

F. Scorza Barcellona

JOHN of Biclaro (d. ca. 621). Abbot of Biclaro and bishop of *Gerona (*Spain) in the 6th c., he was a *Goth of Catholic faith. Educated in *Constantinople and returned to his homeland at seventeen, he was a witness to the unification of Spain brought about by *Leovigild and to the conversion of Leovigild's son *Recared. His Chronicon reflects all these experiences; it continues that of *Victor of Tunnuna for several years, from 576 to 590. He is interested in events in the East, but above all he exalts the political and military achievement of Leovigild, whose killing of his son *Hermenegild he minimizes as well as his actions hostile to Catholics. It ends with the conversion of the Goths to Catholicism, which is the central ideal of his work, and the peace of the emperor Mauritius with the Persians.

CPL 1866, 2261; PL 72, 863-870; MGH, Auct. ant. 11, 211-220; J.N. Hillgarth, Historiography in Visigothic Spain, in La storiografia altomedievale, Spoleto 1970, 266-271; S. Grabowski, Jan z Biclar i jego Kronika: Meander 35 (1980) 63-73; A. Kollautz, Orient und Okzident am Ausgang des VI. Jahrhunderts. Johannes, Abt von Biclarum, Bischof von Gerona, der Chronist des westgotischen Spaniens: Byzantina 12 (1983) 463-506; Patrologia IV, 79-80; BBKL III, 286-287.

M. Simonetti

JOHN of Caesarea (d. after 515). We know little of this figure, who was called John Grammaticus (= schoolteacher), not even if he was from *Caesarea in Palestine or in Cappadocia. It is not certain whether he was present at a council of *Neochalcedonian orientation which took place at Alexandretta between 514 and 518 or whether he was charged with writing the synodal letter addressed to the emperor *Anastasius. His principal work was the Apologia of the Council of Chalcedon, written around 515, of which we know numerous passages adduced by *Severus of Antioch in the detailed refutation which he wrote of this work (the work of Severus has reached us only in *Syriac translation). Recent studies by Richard and others have assigned to John two short anti-*monophysite texts (Capitula XVII contra acephalos; Adversus aphthartodocetas), two anti-*Manichean homilies and two exegetical fragments on Jn 8:44 and 10:18. He made his name as an author with a Disputatio cum Manichaeo. John was one of the first representatives of the Neochalcedonian theology, since he accepted, together with the Chalcedonian formula, the unus de trinitate passus est* and the Cyrillian anathemas in order to emphasize more effectively in Christ the unity of the subject in the duality of the natures.

CPG III, 6855-6862. CCG 1; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 325; J.A. McGuckin, The "Theopaschite Confession" (Text and Historical Context): A Study in the Cyrilline Reinterpretation of Chalcedon: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 35 (1984) 239-255; Patrologia V, 260-262.

M. Simonetti

JOHN of Carpathus. Nothing is known of his life; in the MSS he is sometimes called a monk, but more frequently bishop of Carpathus (an island of the Sporades). He lived between the 5th and 7th c. He is the author of two spiritual writings: Capita hortatoria ad monachos in India, a "century" which teaches how to overcome the difficulties of the monastic life, and Capita theologica et gnostica, also commonly called seconda centuria, in which the author expounds how one proceeds from the ascetic life to the contemplative, whose summit is constituted by theological gnosis. Spurious are the Narrationes variae de viris anachoretarum and the Florilegium de sacra eucharistia et de communione. The Capitula moralia belongs to Elias Ekdikos. The spiritual doctrine of John depends on earlier spiritual writers, esp. *Evagrius (see Photius, Bibl., cod. 201). The author stresses the importance of ascetic life. The restoration of the image of God in humanity comes, for the concupiscent part, through ἐγκράτεια, and, for the irascible part, through ὑπομονή. Victory over the devil, which has a great role in the spiritual life, is achieved through prayer in all its forms, by mortifications and, esp., by humility—i.e., by works of mercy and with fraternal charity. The ascetic effort is rewarded by God with the gift of apatheia and, thereafter, of contemplation.

CPG III, 7855-7859; PG 85, 791-826, 1837-1860; DTC 8, 753-4; EC 6, 592; Beck 452-453 and 817; LTK 5, 1049; Cath 6, 531; DSp 8, 589-592; Patrologia V, 155-6.

A. De Nicola

JOHN of Cellae (2nd half of 6th c.) (Kellia, to the SW of Alexandria, near *Scete). A *monophysite bishop, ordained by *Jacob Baradeus, in 567 he pronounced in *Alexandria the anathema against the writings of the tritheist *John Philoponus. In a letter to *Longinus, bishop of the Nubians, John promised to protect his clandestine movements in Egypt. In 575 he ordained the deacon Peter patriarch of Alexandria as successor to *Theodosius, after the Alexandrians had refused the Syrian archimandrite Theodore, ordained by Longinus.

CPG 7229 (anathema): CSCO 17, 160-161 (Syriac text): CSCO 52, 111-112 (Lat. tr.); CPG 7230 (letter to Longinus): CSCO 17, 277-278 (Syriac text of a fragment): CSCO 52, 194 (Lat. tr.); G. Furlani, L'anatema di Giovanni di Alessandria contro Giovanni Filopono, AAT 55 (1919-1920) 188-194; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^e siècle, CSCO 127 Subs. 2, Louvain 1951, 175, 183, 226-227, 232-233; DMGE 27, 185 n. 522; Patrologia V, 393.

F. Scorza Barcellona

JOHN of Dalyatha (1st half of the 8th c.); also called John Sabas, i.e., "the elder": a *Nestorian hermit of *Syriac speech, author of homilies and spiritual treatises (partially unpublished) and letters, in which he demonstrates dependence on *Evagrius. Accused (falsely) of *Sabellianism and, concerning the vision of God, of *Messalianism, his works were condemned around 786–787 by Patriarch *Timothy I. In the MS tradition his name has often been confused with that of *John bar Penkaya and of *Joseph 'Abdisho' Hazzaya (Nestorian monks respectively of 7th and 8th c.) as well as with that of Isaac of Nineveh.

DSp 8, 449-452; R. Beulay, L'enseignement spirituel de Jean de Dalyatha: mystique Syro-Oriental du VIII^e siècle (Théol. Hist. 83), Paris 1990; Id., La collection des Lettres de Jean de Dalyatha, PO 39, 3 (1978) 253-538; Id., Jean de Dalyatha et sa Lettre XV: PdO 2 (1971) 261-279; PG 86, 857-859 (cf. CPG 7868); B.E. Colless, Le mystère de Jean Saba: OrSyr 12 (1967) 515-523; Id., The Mysticism of John Saba: OCP 39 (1973) 83-102; P. Sherwood, Jean de Dalyatha, Sur la fuite du monde: Or-Syr 1 (1956) 305-312.

S.J. Voicu

JOHN of Damascus (ca. 650–749/750). Coming from a noble family, Arab but Christian, John must have been born around 650. After having been with his father in the service of the caliphs, he retired after 700 (the date is disputed) to the monastery of St. Sabas near Jerusalem. Ordained a priest by John, patriarch of Jerusalem (705–735), he taught, preached and continued the composition of his numerous works. He died at an advanced age (ca. 750) and was highly esteemed by the Byzantine church (see Nicaea II, a. 787) and from the 12th c. on also in the Latin church (Doctor of the Church in 1890). The writings, preserved in a very extensive MS tradition and soon translated into various languages, concern every field of theology. Among these The Fountain of Knowledge (Dial. Prol. 57) is certainly the most famous work. It includes three parts: Capitula philosophica (a kind of philosophical propaedeutic, with definitions of the Aristotelian and patristic tradition), the Liber de haeresibus (a hundred notes on heresies, eighty taken from Anakephalaiosis, attributed to *Epiphanius [CPG II, 3765], and twenty, including that on Islam, from other sources) and the Expositio fidei (De fide orthodoxa) (100 theological chapters on the *Trinity: 1-14; on the visible and invisible creation: 15-44; on *Christology: 45-81; on various questions, such as baptism and the veneration of the cross: 82-99; and resurrection: 100). In addition there are other writings of equally philosophical, polemical and dogmatic character. Among these the following deserve to be mentioned: the Contra Jacobitas, the De duabus in Christo voluntatibus and above all the three discourses against the iconoclasts, composed perhaps 741, without doubt the most original work. The exegetical and homiletic writings include a commentary on the Pauline letters, for the most part extracted from the commentaries of *John Chrysostom and unknown authors, and sermons on the birth and death (De dormitione) of *Mary, on the Transfiguration etc. Also to be noted is the treatise on fasting (the writings on the virtues and the vices as well as that on the eight spirits are not authentic), and the hagiographic writings which praise Barbara, Chrysostom and other saints. As for the Sacra Parallela, a biblical-patristic anthology on moral and ascetic life, it is unknown to what extent John contributed to it (see CPG III, 8056). The so-called Romance of Barlaam must be later than John (CPG III, 8120) (see Barlaam; Volk does not exclude John of Damascus). Finally John certainly took part in the composition of liturgical hymns (see CPG III, 8070).

The compilatory character of the writings of John does not escape any expert reader. In the Dedicatory

Epistle to the Fountain of Knowledge he himself announces that his general principle is that of not saying anything personal (Dial. prol. 60). For, whether in his principal work or in his other writings, not only does he take up the dialectical and theological terminology of the Fathers, their style of reasoning and method of dividing the assembled material, but he also cites patristic texts in extenso. Thus he has integrated in the Expositio a ps.-Cyrillian treatise on theology and economy (see the differing position of Volk, who accepts at least the influence of *Greg. Naz.), extracts of Nemesius and of *Maximus the Confessor. This assertion sounds negative, inasmuch as it indicates a lack of creative spirit in John. Nevertheless, the richness of the sources employed, even if secondhand, and the manner in which the well-chosen material is put in order demonstrates his ability and his profound knowledge of the material. This evaluation is reinforced if John is compared to other authors of the later patristic period on whom fidelity to the orthodox tradition, and partially also the scholastic goals of the writings, imposed this method of compilation. For John is superior to all (Beck 477), except perhaps *Maximus the Confessor, who did not deal with as many problems but showed a more independent and deeper spirit. Nevertheless, the influence of John on later theology has been considerable, though perhaps less on Byzantine theology than on Latin (Beck 480). As for theological thought, it should be noted that John inserted between theology and economy a long treatment of cosmological and anthropological problems. Thus he contributed to the development of the theological synthesis (Grillmeier). Worth considering among the individual theological ideas are the definitions of certain trinitarian notions, such as φύσις, ὑπόστασις and above all περιχώρησις, the distinction between the antecedent and consequent will of God, the explanations of the hypostatic union and of the two wills of Christ and above all the considerations on the veneration of images (von Schönborn).

Given that acc. to John all theological work should serve monastic life, understood as Christian perfection, his spiritual teaching should be considered his most important. Although it is more difficult to evaluate his influence on later spirituality than that on theology, in particular on Latin Scholasticism, the personal brilliance of John appears more clearly in the spiritual field, as is clear esp. from the homilies. In fact, his spiritual teaching reveals itself as extremely rich, and it is founded on the idea that the entire Christian life must orient itself toward the vision (θεωρία) of God, understood, however, less as Trinity than as divinity. The conditions of this contemplation are purity of heart (ἀπάθεια, ἐγκράτεια) and love (ἀγάπη), i.e., liberty toward God. To arrive at the height of purity and love, where God is contemplated, a double preparation is required, that of the πρᾶξις, a battle against vice and a perfecting of the virtues, and the θεωρία, intellectual deepening of the faith, provided it be orthodox. The polemic against the *monothelites and the *Manicheans induced John to specify also the role which human liberty and divine grace play in this work of purification or ascension of the soul. Finally, in the hagiographic and homiletic writings, but also in the treatises on images, John recalls that, in order to become more virtuous, Christians must associate with holy people, or rather the saints. This idea of imitation finds its most profound justification in the theology of the image. According to John, human beings, created in the image of God, are called to resemble God himself. They respond to this call, imitating the divine goodness and the virtues of all those who pleased Christ. In this way they enter into the economy of the images, founded on the eternal generation of the Word, perfect image of God, manifested in the theophanies of the OT and above all in the *incarnation of the Word, taken up later by all the saints, who did nothing other than imitate Christ. Precisely this final characteristic of the spirituality of John makes us understand his originality. Despite taking his principal ideas from the tradition of the Fathers, he succeeded not only in blending them into an equilibrated synthesis but also in impressing a rather personal note on his choices.

CPG III, 8040-8127; PG 94-96; B. Kotter: PTS 7 (1969); 12 (1973); 17 (1975); 22 (1981); XX (1988); P. Voulet, Jean Damascène. Les Homélies sur la Dormition et la Nativité, SC 80, Paris 1961; F. Gahbauer: SMGB 106 (1995) 133-174. - Bibliographies in CPG III, Kotter and in OS 16 (1967) 200-213; DSp 8,452-466. Studies: B. Studer, Die theologische Arbeitsweise des Johannes von Damaskus, Ettal 1956; Beck 476-486; B. Kotter, Die Überlieferung der Pege Gnoseos, Ettal 1959; K. Rozemond, La Christologie de J., Ettael 1959; G. Richter, Dialektik des J., Ettal 1964; A. Grillmeier, Vom Symbolum zur Summa: Mit ihm und in ihm, Freiburg 1975, 585-636; Th. Nikolaou, Die Ikonenverehrung als Beispiel ostkirchlicher Theologie und Frömmigkeit nach Johannes von Damaskus: OS 25 (1976) 138-165; C. von Schönborn, L'icône du Christ, Fribourg 1976; TRE 17 (1988) 127-132; B. Studer, in Storia della Teologia, Casale Monf. 1993, XX; V.S. Conticello, Ps. Cyril's De SS. Trinitate: OCP 61 (1995) 117-129; R. Volk, in LTK[3] 5, 895-899; B. Studer, in Patrologia V, 233-242 (bibl.); H.C. Brennecke, in RGG[4] 4 (2001) 534-5; LACL (2002) 387-399 (bibl.); A. Louth, St John Damascene: Tradition and Originality in Byzantine Theology, Oxford 2002.

B. Studer

JOHN of Ephesus (or of Asia) (ca. 507–589). John of Ephesus, a *Syriac writer but also knowledgeable in the Greek language, a monk of *monophysite leanings, expressed his original talent both in hagiography and in historiography, creating in both genres a partisan literature, with a strong political-religious engagement. Born in the N of Mesopotamia in the jurisdiction of the metropolitan city of Amida around 507, his youth was marked by the teaching of two local ascetics, Abraham and Maron. After their death he entered the monastery of Mar John Urtaya in Amida. The persecutions against the monophysites forced him and the other monks to abandon the city and to wander in the Near East, even into Egypt. In 529 he was ordained a deacon by *John (bar Kursos) of Tella, he too in exile. He reached *Constantinople around 540, where many monophysites had taken refuge because of the position favorable to them of the empress *Theodora. Having entered into contact with the imperial court he received from the emperor *Justinian the charge of evangelizing Asia Minor. In the course of this mission, in 558, he was consecrated bishop of Ephesus by *John Baradeus, even if he probably did not have lasting contacts with his see, since his base of operations still remained the imperial capital. There, having become the key figure for the monophysites, esp. after the death of *Theodosius of Alexandria, he tried to mediate between the different currents in conflict. With the rise to power of *Justin II in 565 a period of persecutions against the monophysites began again. From this moment on John had to face exile and prison once again. Despite the situation, his literary activity was not interrupted, except by his death in 589.

Two works have sealed the fame of John as a Syriac writer of a notable level: the Lives of the Oriental Saints and the Ecclesiastical History, having reached us largely incomplete. Other works, having been lost, are known to us precisely from his own works: a description of the persecutions against the monophysites, above all those under *Ephrem of Antioch (529–544), and a piece on the negotiations between *Chalcedonians and monophysites shortly after 570. The Lives of the Oriental Saints collect 58 stories of ascetics known by John thanks to his travels and his multiple contacts, between 520 and ca. 560. The first 23 "Vitae" are those of the ascetics known in the region of Amida during his youth, while the following 24 deal with the figures with whom he entered into contact in Egypt and Constantinople, some of them of a certain historical importance, such as John of Tella and Jacob Baradeus; the last is dedicated to the monastery of Mar John Urtaya.

Critics have related these stories—frequently not linked to the biographical genre, but consistent in some episodes, enriched by a still problematical historical background—to the Historia Lausiaca of *Palladius or to the Historia religiosa of *Theodoret of Cyrrhus. The Ecclesiastical History was divided into three parts. The first covered the period which went from Julius Caesar to the death of *Theodosius II, and is known via a few fragments transmitted by Michael the Syrian. The second reached up to 571, and has reached us thanks to ample citations; beyond that of Michael the Syrian are those of the Chronaca of ps.-*Dionysius of Tell-Mahre. The third, preserved almost completely, goes until 589. An engaged and partisan history, it reveals aspects of the persecutions against the monophysites and events which the Greek historiography of Chalcedonian orientation has hidden.

General Introductions: Duval 362-363 (and passim); Baumstark 181-182; DTC 8, 752-753; Chabot 74-76; Ortiz de Urbina 166-167.

Editions: Lives of the Oriental Saints, ed. E.W. Brooks, PO 17-19; Ecclesiastical History, ed. E.W. Brooks, CSCO 105-106, scriptores syri, 54-55; Ephrem-Isa Yousif, Les Chroniqueurs Syriaques, Paris-Budapest-Turin 2002.

On hagiography: S. Ashbrook Harvey, Asceticism and Society in Crisis: John of Ephesus and The Lives of the Eastern Saints, Berkeley, CA 1990.

On historiography: J.J. van Ginkel, John of Ephesus: A Monophysite Historian in Sixth-Century Byzantium, Proefschrift, Gröningen 1995.

A. Camplani

JOHN of Euboea (8th c.). John lived in the 1st half of the 8th c.: a chronological indication in the Homilia in sanctos innocentes (BHG 825) points to the year 744. Although he was younger, in the MSS he is frequently confused with *John of Damascus, who—as is known—attracted to himself, in the medieval tradition, many anonymous writings. He is indicated in titles sometimes as μοναχὸς καὶ πρεσβύτερος, other times as ἐπίσκοπος. If this qualification should not be ascribed to an error of the copyist—as F. Halkin maintains—the problem of the episcopal see remains open, which cannot be Euboea/Euboia, where no bishopric existed. F. Dölger has proposed—on the basis of the name indicated in the codex Neapol. 92 II 33—Εὐαρία (variants Εὐορία and Εὐδρία), today Hawarin near Damascus, and less probably Εὔροια in Epirus.

In addition to the homily on the Holy Innocents, we possess from him Homilia in conceptionem Deiparae (BHG 1117), Homilia in Lazarum (BHG 2220), Passio S. Parascevae (BHGa 1420 p). The Laudatio S. Anastasiae (BHG 83 b) and the Christmas sermon Ὁπόταν τὸ ἔαρ ἐπέλθῃ (ed. S. Eustratiades, Neos Poimen 3, 1921, 23-42) do not seem to belong to him but to John of Damascus. The works of John of Euboea are folksy, free of all doctrinal character, with frequent biblical citations, careless in grammar and style: the exact opposite of that of John of Damascus. His aversion to Judaism is always present in the homilies.

CPG 8135-8138; PG 96, 1459-1508; F. Dölger, Johannes "von Euboia": AB (Mélanges P. Peeters II) 68 (1950) 5-26; F. Halkin, La passion de sainte Parascève par Jean d'Eubée, in Polychardia. Festschrift Franz Dölger, Heidelberg 1966, 226-237; Beck 502-503; J.M. Hueck, Johannes v. Euboia: LTK³ 5, 904; D. Stiernon, Jean d'Eubée: DSp 8, 487; Patrologia V, 242-3.

A. Labate

JOHN of Gabala (beginning of the 5th c.). The *monophysite bishop of Gabala (or, acc. to Honigmann, Gabboula) in Syria Prima, he took part in the council called by the emperor *Justinian in 536 to resolve the division between the followers and the antagonists (monophysites) of the Council of *Chalcedon. A Life of Severus, patriarch of Antioch 512–518, is attributed to a John of Gabala (perhaps the same person), of which a fragment has reached us.

CPG 7525; Mansi 13, 184BC. Translations: Eng.: partial in C. Mango, The Art of the Byzantine Empire 312-1453, Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1972 (repr. in Medieval Academy Reprints for Teaching 16, Toronto-Buffalo-London 1986, 44); It.: Vedere l'invisibile, Nicea e lo statuto dell'immagine, ed. L. Russo, Palermo 1997, 54; E. Honigmann, Évêques et Évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VIe siècle, CSCO 127, Louvain 1951, 29.

A. Louth

JOHN of Lycopolis (d. 394/395). The Historia monachorum in Aegypto which dedicates its first chapter to him (ed. A.J. Festugière, Subs. Hagiogr. 34, Brussels 1960, 9-35; Fr. tr.: Id., Les Moines d'Orient, IV, 1, Paris 1964, 9-28) is the primary source which makes known this great ascetic of the *Thebaid, in close relationship with the emperor *Theodosius (a useful confirmation, as a chronological reference point, of the existence of the figure toward the end of the 4th c.) and whose various charisms (in particular the gifts of healing and prophecy) earned him the name "seer of the Thebaid." He is said to be of Lycopolis (Assyut), of Upper Egypt, because he was perhaps born there. The authors of the cited source visited John a little before his death. Here is the portrait which they have left of him: "The saint could be seen, already ninety years old, so exhausted in his entire body that, through the effects of asceticism, not even the beard had grown on his face. For he ate nothing other than fruit, and this only after sunset, despite his old age, since he had dedicated himself to numerous ascetical exercises, without having ever eaten bread, nor anything which is eaten after cooking" (ch. 17). Another author who speaks about him is *Palladius, who mentions a discussion held with John through an interpreter (Historia lausiaca ch. 35). St. *Augustine mentions the double prophetic response (nuntium victoriae certissimum) given by John to the consultations of the emperor Theodosius concerning the usurpers Maximus and Eugenius (Civ. Dei 5,26,1; cf. De cura gerenda 17,21). As for spirituality, above all his predilection for the practice of humility in all its forms, can be underlined and his insistence on the purification of the heart through the purity of intention, trained in continual struggle and stimulated by faith in the infinite mercy of God.

Did John leave any literary heritage? The problem has been raised (J. Muyldermans) concerning a rediscovered ascetic text in Greek. But it was definitively demonstrated (I. Hausherr, who based himself among other things on the works of the Swedish scholars S. Dedering and L.G. Rignell) that John of Lycopolis has nothing in common with the homonymous author under whose name numerous treatises of mystical spirituality have been transmitted in *Syriac (A. Baumstark has scrupulously edited the entire list).

BS 6, 818-822; I. Hausherr, Jean le Solitaire (Pseudo-Jean de Lycopolis). Dialogue sur l'âme et les passions des homes . . . (OCA, 120) Rome 1939; J. Muyldermans, Un texte grec inédit attribué à Jean de Lycopolis: RecSR 41 (1953) 525-530; Id., À propos d'un texte grec attribué à Jean de Lycopolis: ibid. 43 (1955) 395-401; L.G. Rignell, Drei Traktate von Johannes dem Einsiedler (Johannes von Apameia), Lunds Univer. Arsskrift NF Avd. 1,54,4 (1960); Coptic Encyclopedia 5,1363-1366. On the Coptic tradition: P. Peeters, Une vie copte de S. Jean de Lycopolis: AB 54 (1936) 359-381; P. Devos, La servante de Dieu Poemenia d'après Pallade, la tradition copte et Jean Rufus: AB 87 (1969) 189-208; Id., Fragments coptes de l'Historia Monachorum (Vie de S. Jean de Lycopolis, BHO 515): AB 87 (1969) 417-440; Id., S. Jean de Lyco et la tentatrice: AB 87 (1969) 441; Id., Feuillets coptes nouveaux et anciens concernant S. Jean de Siout: AB 88 (1970) 153-187; Id., Saint Jean de Lycopolis et l'empereur Marcien. À propos de Chalcedoine: AB 94 (1976) 303-316; Id., De Jean Chrysostome à Jean de Lykopolis. Chrysostome et Chalkedon: AB 96 (1978) 389-403. On the documentary papyri: C. Zuckerman, The Hapless Recruit Psois and the Mighty Anchorite, Apa John: Bulletin of the American Society of Papyrologists 32 (1995) 183-194; Ph. Luisier, Jean de Lycopolis. Les derniers fragments réunis par le Père Devos, in Aegyptus christiana: mélanges d'hagiographie égyptienne et orientale dédiés à la mémoire du P. P. Devos bollandiste, ed. U. Zanetti and E. Lucchesi, Geneva 2004, 175-193.

J.-M. Sauget

JOHN of Maiuma (or John Rufus) (d. after 515). John is above all known for his unique literary work whose long and very meaningful title deserves to be cited in its entirety: "Plerophoriae, i.e., testimony and revelations which God has made to the saints, concerning the heresies of his natures and concerning the prevarication which took place at Chalcedon; these were written by one of the disciples of St. Peter the Iberian, called the priest of Beit-Rufin, of Antioch, bishop of Maiuma of Gaza." This work was written around 515. In reality the name of plerophoriae was commonly given to collections of anecdotes and small polemical passages aimed at demonstrating the correctness of the position of the anti-*Chalcedonians. It is probable that the collection of John became the most famous and has kept the title by antonomasia.

Through this work we learn that John, called also John Rufus, was born into an Arab tribe of the S of Palestine, probably of Ashkelon. After having studied law at Beirut, he was ordained a priest at *Antioch, between 476 and 478, by the patriarch *Peter the Fuller, whose syncellus he became. When Peter was chased from his patriarchal see, John retired to Palestine, where he met *Isaiah the Solitary (or of Gaza) and *Peter the Iberian, monophysite bishop of Maiuma (452–489). He was at Jerusalem when Peter the Fuller, reintegrated in his charge, sent his synodal letter to Martyrius. He joined Peter the Iberian definitively (1 December 488), until he became his successor as bishop of Maiuma. John wrote the Plerophoriae (Πληροφορίαι) during the pontificate of *Severus of Antioch (512–518). The work was doubtless written in Greek, but only a few fragments remain in that language; however, two MSS transmit the complete *Syriac translation (ed. Nau, PO 8, 1, Paris 1911). In Coptic, fragments from many MSS have survived (see T. Orlandi, Un frammento delle Pleroforie in copto: Studi e Ricerche sull'Oriente Cristiano 2 [1979] 3-12).

The work is a collection of 89 chapters of anecdotes (which can be compared to the Lives of the Blessed Orientals of *John of Ephesus) concerning the principal representatives of the monophysite church, immersed in a climate of the miraculous, embellished with visions, miracles and predictions. The goal of the work was to demonstrate that the Council of Chalcedon had been above all the revenge of the *Nestorians condemned previously at *Ephesus. Nevertheless, through the quantity of information which they offer on the history, geography and ecclesiastical life of the 6th c., the Plerophoriae enjoyed great success and were used discreetly by later monophysite historians, in particular in the Chronaca of the patriarch Michael the Syrian. John also wrote a Life of Peter the Iberican, his predecessor in the see of Maiuma (CPG 7505/BHO 955), and a Panegyric of Theodosius, Bishop of Jerusalem (CPG 7506/BHO 1178).

CPG 7507; F. Nau, Jean Rufus, évêque de Maiouma. Plérophories, PO VIII, 1, Paris 1912 (with Fr. tr.); E. Schwartz, Iohannes Rufus, ein monophysitischer Schriftsteller, in Sitzungsber. der Heidelberger Akad. der Wissensch., phil. hist. Kl., 1912, Abh. 16; T. Orlandi, Papiri copti di contenuto teologico, Vienna 1974, 110-120; Id., Un frammento delle Pleroforie in copto: Studi e ricerche sull'Oriente cristiano 2 (1979) 3-12; DHGE 27,248-249; J.-E. Steppa, John Rufus and the Vision of the Anti-Chalcedonian Culture, Piscataway, NJ 2002.

J.-M. Sauget - T. Orlandi

JOHN of Naples (d. 432). He was the 14th bishop of *Naples, from 414 to 2 April 432. He had the mortal remains of St. *Januarius transferred from the Ager Marcian near Pozzuoli to the catacombs of Capodimonte. The priest Uranius, in the letter to Pacatus De obitu Paulini 11 (PL 53, 865), recounts that *Paulinus of Nola appeared in a dream to John predicting the imminence of his death, which came three days later. John was buried in the oratory where he had had the body of St. Januarius transferred. In the marble calendar of Naples the Depositio of John is 3 April, while in the Mart. rom. it is erroneously recorded 22 June. The Vita S. Iohannis episcopi (BHL 4417), written in the 2nd half of the 13th c., confuses this John (the first bishop of Naples with this name) with John IV, 44th in the episcopal list of the city.

BS 6, 929-930; LTK[3] 5, 1064; H. Delehaye, Hagiographie napolitaine: AB 59 (1941) 19-21.

S. Zincone

JOHN of Nikiu (d. after 700). An Egyptian bishop who lived in the 2nd half of the 7th c., he was the author of a universal history, written probably in Greek, but having survived only in Ethiopian translation. This began from Adam and Eve and narrated succinctly the events of Eastern, Greek and Roman history, and more fully those of the Byzantine period, with special reference to Egypt. It is a valuable source for the period of the Persian and Arabic invasions of Egypt, for which it offers information which the other sources omit. For earlier times, his principal source is the Chronaca of *John Malalas.

CPL 7967; H. Zotenberg, La Chronique de Jean de Nikiu: Notices et Extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale, 24, Paris 1913; R.H. Charles, The Chronicle of John, Bishop of Nikiu, London 1916; Coptic Encyclopedia 5, 1366-1367; Patrologia V, 408-409; DHGE 27, 379; A. Carile, Giovanni di Nikius, cronista bizantino-copto del VII secolo, in Fest. A.N. Stratos, Atene 1986, II, 358-398.

T. Orlandi

JOHN of Paralos (d. 610/620). An Egyptian, he was an author of works in Coptic who lived between the 6th and 7th c. After having been a monk in the important monastery of St. Macarius at Scete, under the hegumen *Daniel (485–ca. 575), he was named bishop of Paralos, an important city in the delta. He is remembered in the Coptic-Arabic sources as a fierce opponent of the heresies and apocryphal texts which existed at that time. Indeed, the only work from which fragments have reached us is a text (in the form of a homily) which argues against some apocryphal works. Those named in the surviving section are the Investiture of Michael the Archangel (to be identified with a text known in *Coptic, ed. Müller, CSCO 225-226), the Kerygma Iohannis (derived from the Apokryphon Iohannis, a well-known *gnostic text in Coptic, of the 4th c.?), the Smile of the Apostles, the Teachings of Adam and the Counsel of the Savior. Other homilies attributed to John of Paralos have survived in Arabic and Ethiopian.

A. van Lantschoot, Fragments coptes d'une homélie de Jean de Parallos, in Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati, I (ST 121), Rome 1946, 296-326; Coptic Encyclopedia 5, 1367-1368.

T. Orlandi

JOHN of Saint Martin (d. 680). The primary source is *Bede in his Historia Ecclesiastica. A Roman archcantor, abbot of the little monastery of St. Martin, he was called, in his capacity as primicerius, to direct the schola cantorum as archicantor of St. Peter's Basilica. He owes his fame above all to having been a master of sacred music and author of liturgical texts. His name also remains linked to the works of *Benedict Biscop and *Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury. Both contributed, at the request of Popes *Vitalian (657–672) and *Agatho (678–681), to restoring order within that part of England which was at that time convulsed by liturgical conflicts and undisciplined clergy. Benedict Biscop then saw to the foundation of the monastery of Wearmouth (Northumbria), destined to render the entire region famous for its monastic schools. In his voyage to Rome in 678, he obtained from Pope Agatho permission to bring John back with him in order to promote sacred chant and the Roman liturgy. The presence of John also took on an official role when Theodore had him by his side at the synod celebrated at Hartfield (680). John had the function of papal legate. It was thus that the council became a verification of the orthodox faith and a sign of links with Rome. John then had the charge of bringing back to Rome the testimonies of the Anglo-Saxon church's fidelity (Bede, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. IV, 17f.). While he was crossing France, struck by infirmity, he died (680). He was buried at *Tours.

CPL 1998 and 2015; C. Silva-Tarouca, G. Archicantor di S. Pietro e l'Ordo Romanus da lui composto (a. 680): Miscell. De Rossi I (Atti della Pont. Acc. Rom. di Archeol., 3a f., Memorie, I, 1), Rome 1923, 159-219, M. Andrieu, Les "Ordines Romani" du haut Moyen Âge, I, Louvain 1930 (Ordines XV-XIX); LTK 5, 1078; EC VI, 511f. (with bibl.); K. Hallinger, Die römischen Ordines von Lorsch, Murbach und St. Gallen, in Universitas. Festschr. A. Stohr, I, Mainz 1960, 466-477; DHGE 27, 554f. (n. 876).

L. Dattrino

JOHN of Saragossa (ca. 580–ca. 631). Mentioned by *Ildefonsus as pater monachorum and a great expert in the Holy Scriptures (Vir. ill. 6, PL 96, 201) and praised by his younger brother and disciple *Braulio as "master of common life through learning and holiness" (Vita s. Emiliani, Ad Fronimianum presbyterum, PL 80, 699). John was born around 580. After having been abbot, he became bishop of Saragossa in 619 and carried out his episcopal ministry at the time of kings *Sisebut and Suintila. He composed various liturgical offices, later lost, and an Argumentum or Kanon inquirendae Paschalis solemnitatis, which has been recognized in the treatise on the Roman system for calculating Easter preserved in a 10th-c. MS from La Rioja (Vega). He died ca. 631.

A.C. Vega, El "Argumentum" o "Kanon paschalis" de Juan de Zaragoza ¿ha desaparecido?: La Ciudad de Dios 172 (1959) 522-530; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 456-458.

P. Marone

JOHN of Scythopolis (Palestine) (6th c.). We have almost no information about his life, and for the most part his works have also been lost. He was exceptionally cultivated compared to his contemporaries, and wrote about theology in the 1st half of the 6th c., in conflict with the *monophysites, maintaining a doctrine of *Neochalcedonian type, since he integrated the Chalcedonian formula with the theopaschite formula unus de trinitate passus est. We know of three antimonophysite writings: Against the Aposchisti (radical monophysites), Apology of the Council of Chalcedon and Against Severus. His Scholia to the writings of ps.-*Dionysius have been joined to those of *Maximus the Confessor: it was possible to identify them thanks to a *Syriac translation of ps.-Dionysius, which was furnished with the scholia of John.

CPG III, 6850-6852; PG 4, 15-432, 527-576; Photius, Bibl., cod. 107; S. Helmer, Der Neuchalkedonismus, Bonn 1962, 176-184; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 325; BBKL III, 567-568; B.R. Suchla, Verteidigung eines platonischen Denkmodells einer christlichen Welt: Die philosophie- und theologiegeschichtliche Bedeutung des Scholienwerks des Johannes von Skythopolis zu den areopagitischen Traktaten, Göttingen 1995; P. Rorem - J.C. Lamoreaux, John of Scythopolis and the Dionysian Corpus: Annotating the Areopagite, Oxford 1998; Patrologia V, 289-291.

M. Simonetti

JOHN of Shmun (6th–7th c.). Author of *Coptic literature, he lived in the 2nd half of the 6th c., at the time of the Alexandrian patriarch *Damian (d. 605). At first a cloistered monk, he was named bishop of Shmun (Gr. Hermopolis magna, Ar. Ashmunein) in Middle Egypt. With his works he wanted on the one hand to reinforce the validity of Coptic as a literary language and on the other to celebrate the glories of the Egyptian church, which was acquiring an ever more national character, in contraposition to the Byzantine church. For this he wrote an Encomium of Mark (the traditional founder of the Alexandrian church) and an Encomium of Anthony. Strong nationalistic overtones can be found in both.

G. Garitte, Panégyrique de Saint Antonie par Jean, évêque d'Hermopolis: OCP 9 (1943) 100-134, 330-365; T. Orlandi, Un Encomio di Marco evangelista, in Studi Copti, Milan 1968, 1-52; Coptic Encyclopedia 5, 1369; Patrologia V, 572.

T. Orlandi

JOHN of Thessalonica (d. ca. 630). The successor of *Eusebius on the archepiscopal see of *Thessalonica (605), he supported his fellow citizens besieged by the Avars and, with his prayers, appears to have saved the city from an earthquake. He died shortly afterward. He was a popular preacher, and several homilies have been preserved in two recensions. One, on the dormition of the *Theotokos, is important in the history of the feast of the Marian mystery; another is on the "myrrh-bearing" women; and another is on the decapitation of *John the Baptist; while from the homily on the temptations of Jesus only a fragment remains. He also wrote a collection of the Miracles of St. Demetrius, patron of Thessalonica, of great value for the history of liturgy and the penetration of the Slavs into the Balkans.

PG 59, 635-644; 116, 1203-1324; BHG 499-516, 547h, 842t, 1144-1144g; BHG Auct. 500-510/13, 1056, 1056g, 1056gb; P. Lemerle, Les plus anciens recueils des miracles de saint Démétrius, Paris 1980; DSp 8, 778-780; Testi mariani del primo millennio, 2, ed. G. Gharib, Rome 1988, 98-120; Patrologia V, 146-149.

D. Stiernon

JOHN of Tomi (5th c.). Bishop of Tomi (Scythia). He appears in the Collectio Palatina (PG 48, 1088) as the author of sermones against *Nestorians and *Eutychians. G. Morin has discovered a fragment of a work by John, De duabus haeresibus Nestorianorum et Eutychianistarum, perhaps to be identified with that mentioned in the Collectio. It is an interesting witness to the orthodox faith at the boundaries of the West, written in precise and lucid theological language. John is otherwise unknown.

CPL 665; CCL 85A, 234-239. G. Morin, Le témoignage perdu de Jean: JTS 7 (1906) 74-77; Beck, 375, n. 2.

E. Prinzivalli

JOHN PHILOPONUS (6th c.). Presumably of *Alexandrian origin, active more or less between 520 and 570. Despite being Christian, he dedicated much care to commenting on the works of Aristotle, and *Aristotelian realism influenced not a little his trinitarian and christological positions, which displayed a *monophysite character. He was a disciple of the Aristotelian *Ammonius and a study companion of Simplicius, who, however, had occasion to argue with the overly personal interpretation which John gave of Aristotle. The nickname (Philoponus = lover of labor) came to him from his great productivity, which was expressed in a great number of works, some of which have not reached us.

Many commentaries on works of Aristotle have reached us, along with some writings on grammatical and scientific themes, while various theological works, which here interest us more directly, have been lost, except for mentions and fragments. We lament esp. the loss of the The Arbiter or On Unity, in 10 books, which dealt with trinitarian and christological questions. Also treatises have been lost against the Acephaloi, against the Council of *Chalcedon, against John Scholasticus and against Iamblichus (who maintained that the statues of the gods were endowed with divine presence). Among the surviving works are Against Proclus on the Eternity of the World, where the arguments are refuted which the *Neoplatonist offered in favor of the eternity of the world, on an exclusively philosophical basis; and On the Hexaemeron, which maintains that Moses had taught at the beginning of Genesis truths related to the creation which the Greeks brought to light only much later.

An exponent of a Christianity imbued with philosophical rationalism, John transferred his methodological orientation also to the trinitarian field. He transferred the equality nature = hypostasis ("person"), traditionally affirmed by monophysites in the christological area (in Christ a single nature corresponds to a single hypostasis), strengthened by the Aristotelian realism which considered only individual natures as concretely existing, into the trinitarian field, with the result of making three divine natures, distinct among themselves, correspond to the three divine hypostases. For this reason he was accused of tritheism not only by Catholics but also by the monophysites themselves. Clearly, however, it is purely a verbal tritheism. Furthermore, not only did John and his followers avoid speaking about three divinities, but they also explicitly affirmed their faith in the holy and consubstantial *Trinity, in a single essence or nature, in a single divinity, i.e., in a single God, not by number but by the immutable identity of the divinity (PG 86, 61).

CPG III, 7260-7282. R.R.K. Sorabji, Johannes Philoponos: TRE 17 (1988) 144-150; John Philoponus: ODC (1997) 896; B.R. Suchla, Johannes Philoponus: LACL (1998) 355.

Editions and translations: Les fragmentes trithéistes de Jean Philophon, ed. A. van Roey: OLP 11 (1980) 135-163; C. Wildberg (ed.), Iohannes Philoponus, Against Aristotle, on the Eternity of the World, Ithaca 1987; B.R. Suchla, Commentarium: NAWG (1995) 1.12.19-20; C. Scholten (ed.), Iohannes Philoponus, De opificio mundi = Über die Erschaffung der Welt, Freiburg 1997.

Studies: Th. Hermann, Ioannes Philoponus als Monophysit: ZNTW 29 (1930) 209-264; H.D. Saffrey, Le chrétien Jean Philopone et la survivance de l'école d'Alexandrie au VIe siècle: REG 67 (1954) 396-410; H. Martin, Jean Philopone et la controverse trithéite du VIe siècle: SP 5 (TU 80), Berlin 1962, 519-525; T. Soo Lee, Die griechische tradition der aristotelischen Syllogistik in der Spätantike: eine Untersuchung über die Kommentare zu den analytica priora von Alexander Aphrodisiensis, Ammonius und Philoponus, Göttingen 1984; R. Sorabji (ed.), Philoponus and the Rejection of Aristotelian Science, Ithaca, NY 1987; L. Siorvanes, Science, Philosophy and Religion: Philoponus and the Search for Unity in Late Antiquity: History of Science 26 (1988) 93-102; C. Wildberg, John Philoponus' Criticism of Aristotle's Theory of Aether, Berlin-New York 1988; T. Hainthaler - A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche 2/4, 1990, 109-149; K. Verrycken, The Development of Philoponus' Thought and Its Chronology, in R. Sorabji (ed.), Aristotle Transformed, Ithaca, NY 1990, 233-274; K. Verrycken, La psychogonie platonicienne dans l'oeuvre de Philopon: RSPh 75 (1991) 211-234; B.R. Suchla, Verteidigung eines platonischen Denkmodells einer christlichen Welt, Göttingen 1995; C. Scholten, Antike Naturphilosophie und christliche Kosmologie in der Schrift de opificio mundi des Johannes Philoponus, Berlin 1996; C. Wildberg, Johannes Philoponos, in F. Ricken (ed.), Philosophen der Antike, Stuttgart-Berlin-Cologne 1996, 264-276; F.A.J. de Haas, John Philoponus' New Definition of Prime Matter: Aspects of Its Background in Neoplatonism and the Ancient Commentary Tradition, Leiden 1997; U.M. Lang, Nicetas Choniates, a Neglected Witness to the Greek Text of John Philoponus' "Arbiter": JTS n.s. 48 (1997) 540-548; L.S.B. MacCoull, A New Look at the Career of John Philoponus: JECS 3 (1995) 47-60; G.D. Dragas, The Date and Character of the Lord's Supper According to John Philoponus: Kairos I, 179-191; L. Fladerer, Johannes Philoponos, De opificio mundi: spätantikes Sprachdenken und christliche Exegese, Stuttgart 1999; G.R. Giardina, Giovanni Filopono matematico tra neopitagorismo e neoplatonismo: commentario alla Introduzione aritmetica di Nicomaco di Geraso, Catania 1999; C. Wildberg, Impetus Theory and the Hermeneutics of Science in Simplicius and Philoponus: Hyperboreus 5 (1999) 107-124; B. Chiesa, Filologia storica della Bibbia ebraica, I: Da Origene al Medioevo, Brescia 2000, 104-109; S. Lilla, Giovanni Filopono: Patrologia V, 363-388; J. Schamp, Photios et Jean Philopon: sur la date du De opificio mundi: Byzantion 70 (2000) 135-154; H. Inglebert, Interpretatio christiana. Les mutations des savoirs (cosmographie, géographie, ethnographie, histoire) dans l'Antiquité chrétienne (30-630 après J.-C.), Paris 2001, 58-63; 87-88; 219-221; see John in the index, 618; U.M. Lang, John Philoponus and the Controversies over Chalcedon in the Sixth Century: A Study and Translation of the Arbiter, Leuven 2001; M. Roueché, Why the Monad Is Not a Number: John Philoponus and In de anima 3: JÖByz 52 (2002) 95-133.

M. Simonetti

JOHN TALAIAS (d. 495/496). Patriarch of *Alexandria and bishop of *Nola. A Tabennesi monk (perhaps at Canopus, near Alexandria), he became a priest and oikonomos of the church of Alexandria, from where he was sent as a legate to *Constantinople in 478 to request the exile of the *monophysite *Peter Mongus; when the *Chalcedonian bishop *Timothy Salofaciolus had been reestablished at Alexandria, John was sent again as legate to *Zeno to ask him for guarantees for a pro-Chalcedonian succession in Alexandria's episcopal see. At the death of Salofaciolus (February 482), John succeeded him, but after only six months he had to leave the city due to political-religious intrigues. Supported by Pope *Simplicius (d. 483), John went to Rome, and in 484 he participated in the Roman council which on 20 July condemned *Acacius of Constantinople and Peter Mongus, who had by this time become bishop of Alexandria. Since the hostility of Zeno endured, in 490 Pope *Felix III assigned the episcopal see of Nola (= Cimitile, near *Naples) to John. When *Anastasius became emperor (11 April 491), John visited him seeking to obtain the restitution of the Alexandrian see. Back at Nola, he died after a few years (in 495/496 his successor Serenus was in charge). John should perhaps be identified with the John of Alexandria cited by *Photius (Bibl. 15a) as the author of an apology addressed to *Gelasius I (492–496), containing the condemnation of *Pelagius, *Celestius and *Julian of Eclanum.

Evagr., Hist. eccl. III, 12-18: PG 86, 2617-2636; Liberatus, Brev. 16-18: PL 68, 1020-1027; PCBE 2/1, 1063; DCB 3, 347-348; EC 6, 635. Ch. Pietri, D'Alexandrie à Rome: Jean Talaïa, émule d'Athanase au Ve siècle, in Alexandrina: hellénisme, judaïsme et christianisme. Mélanges offerts au P. Claude Mondésert, Paris 1987, 277-295.

E. MALASPINA

JOHN the ALMSGIVER (d. 620). Even if the first biography of John written by his contemporaries *Sophronius the Sophist and *John Moschus has not reached us in its complete form, the Vita (CPG 7882) written by *Leontius bishop of Neapolis (the modern Limassol) of *Cyprus (7th c.) allows us, in compensation, despite its clear, edifying character, to establish the broad outlines of the life of this holy bishop (BHG 886; ed. H. Gelzer, Leipzig 1893).

John was born on the island of Cyprus, perhaps in Amathus itself, in the 2nd half of the 6th c., to a wealthy family. After an education corresponding to his social rank, he must have embraced a secular career, but on this point there is no precise information. All that is known is that after a short period of married life, John, a widower and without children, abandoned all his goods and dedicated himself completely to the service of God and to works of charity.

The earliest period of John's ecclesiastical life is not well known. He became a truly historic figure in the moment when the new emperor *Heraclius, conqueror of Phocas, called him to the *Melkite see of Alexandria (610) to succeed to the patriarch Theodore Scribo, assassinated some months earlier. John showed himself, from the beginning, to be an ardent defender of *Chalcedonian orthodoxy against *monophysitism. His activity was difficult in an environment not favorable to the Chalcedonians, but he obtained notable successes, also with the help of John Moschus. He dedicated all his effort to the formation of a sturdy and deeply virtuous clergy. The construction or reconstruction of the worship buildings necessary for his community was also dear to his heart. The main title of glory, however, for John, is his charity without limits, which won for him the title "the Almsgiver." He tried to reduce immediate misery with daily distributions to the poor, of whom he had had an accurate list compiled. He also did his best to more efficiently organize the struggle against every kind of social calamity, creating nurseries, orphanages and hospitals.

John did not limit his charitable activities to the populations of Egypt. The political events which followed the conquest of *Syria and *Jerusalem (614) on the part of Persians forced him to create new organizations for the welcome of refugees and to help the patriarch of Jerusalem *Modestus reorganize worship in the holy places. When, in its turn, Egypt was menaced by Persian invasion, John, feeling himself now paralyzed in his pastoral action, accepted the aid of the prefect Nicetas, nephew of Heraclius (who, furthermore, had not been uninvolved in his nomination to the see of Alexandria), to reach the capital of the empire. John, however, did not arrive in *Constantinople. Having reached, together with John Moschus and Sophronius, the island of Cyprus, his homeland, he halted and retired to Amathus, where he died soon after on 11 November 620, while John Moschus and Sophronius proceeded to *Rome and wrote a Vita of their friend. His body was buried in the church of St. *Tychon, an earlier bishop of the city. A Vita of St. Tychon is attributed to John (BGH 1859).

H. Usener, Sonderbare Heiligen I. Der heilige Tychon, Leipzig 1907, 111-149; H. Delehaye, Une vie inédite de saint Jean l'Aumonier: AB 45 (1927) 5-74; A.J. Festugière, Léontios de Néapolis, Vie de Syméon le Fou et Vie de Jean de Chypre (Bibliothèque archéologique et historique, 95), Paris 1974, 439-524; Eng. tr..: E. Dawes - N.H. Baynes, Three Byzantine Saints, London-Oxford 1948, 207-262 (abbreviated). Bardenhewer, 5,135-137; BS 6, 750-756; RBBL 3, 251-253; J. Hofstra, Leontius van Neapolis als Hagiograaf, in A. Hilhorst (ed.), De heiligenverering in de eerste eeuwen van het christendom, Nijmegen 1988, 186-192; DHGE 26, 1255; E. Wipszycka, L'économie du patriarcat alexandrin à travers les vies de saint Jean l'Aumônier, in Alexandrie médiévale 2, ed. Ch. Décobert (Études alexandrines 8), Il Cairo 2002, 61-81.

J.-M. SAUGET

JOHN THE BAPTIST. On St. John the Baptist (called by the Greeks ho Prodromos, the Precursor) we have much evidence in the gospels. The most important pieces of evidence are his birth from Zechariah and Elizabeth (Lk 1:5-25, 39-56, 51-79), his apostolic activity, particularly the baptism of Christ (Jn 1:19-38), and his death (Mk 6:17-25); there is also a mention in Flavius Josephus (Antiq. 18,5,1). John is also mentioned in the apocrypha (see Protevangelium of James*) and in the Qur'an. After his death his body must have been deposited at Sebaste, where he enjoyed veneration, but the tomb was partially destroyed at the time of *Julian the Apostate (Rufinus, HE 2,28, PL 21, 536). In the East many churches were founded in his honor, particularly in Palestine; this is confirmed by pilgrims (such as *Egeria), at *Alexandria and in the West (*Rome, *Ravenna); in particular many baptisteries were dedicated to St. John. We have evidence of veneration of St. John already in the 4th c.; this is confirmed by the homilies of St. *Augustine (11), *Peter Chrysologus, *Maximus of Turin; *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Ephrem, *John Chrysostom, *Hesychius, *Antipater of Bostra and many others; at *Byzantium Theodore the Studite, Michael Psellus and others; *Gregory of Tours lists the miracles of John the Baptist (De gloria martyrum, 11-19). We find testimonies on John the Baptist in the biblical commentaries, in the baptismal catechisms and finally in the monastic literature, where John the Baptist is considered, with Elijah and Elisha, one of the precursors of monasticism. Initially we have two feasts, one for the birth (24 June: the feast of the birth, calculated based on Christmas) and one for the commemoration of St. John the Baptist, observed 7 January, the day following the feast of the Baptism of the Lord (6 January). Furthermore, on August 29—the day of the dedication of the church of Sebaste—the decapitation of St. John was observed. Over time other feasts were born: 23 September the conception of John (among the Greeks), 24 September (among the Latins) the translation of the relics, the discovery of the body, of the head etc. The most ancient liturgical formula is found in the Sacramentarium Leonianum (6th c.).

The apocrypha of St. John the Baptist are not numerous. The three last chapters of the Protevangelium of James speak of the death of Zechariah and the flight of Elizabeth with John. There are some lives of John: in Greek, auctore Marco; in *Syriac, attributed to *Serapion of Thmuis (with an addition of miracles); an encomium in *Coptic, attributed to *Theodosius of Alexandria, of the 8th c., and a Gloria Praecursoris ascribed to *John Chrysostom. Four Greek passions also exist, which are generally faithful to the gospel narration with the addition of other elements. There existed also a Book of John (7th–8th c.), used by the *Mandeans.

CANT 180-185; BHG 831-867; BHL 4290-4315; BHO 484-495; H. Leclercq, DACL 7, 1926, 2167-2184; BS 6, 600-624; LCIK 7, 164-190; E. Malatesta - R. Marichal: DSp 8 (1974) 175-192; G. Aranda Perez, Coptic Encyclopedia 4, 1354-1357.

A. Mingana: Woodbrooke Studies 1 (1927) 234-287 (Serapion, with Eng. tr.); A.W. Budge, Coptic Apocrypha in the Dialect of Upper Egypt, London 1913, 128-145, 335-351 (ps.-John, with Eng. tr.); K.H. Kuhn: CSCO 268-269/Copt 33-34, 1966 (encomium); Fr. tr. A. Boud'hors: EApC 1555-1576.

Studies:E. Razy, St. Jean Baptiste sa vie, son culte et sa légende, Paris 1886; G. Vitaletti, Salome nella leggenda e nell'arte, Rome 1908; J.A. Berends, Studien über Zacharias-Apocryphen und Zacharias-Legenden, Leipzig 1895; W.C. Till, Johannes der Täufern der koptischen Litteratur: MDAI(K) 6 (1958) 310-322; W. Speyer, Der Tod der Salome: JAC 10 (1967) 176-180; J. Daniélou, Jean Baptiste témoin de l'Agneau, Paris 1964; M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, 2, Milan 1969, 441-444; E. Bammel, The Baptist in the Early Christian Tradition: NTS 18 (1971-1972) 95-128; D. Sheerin, St. John the Baptist in the Lower World: VChr 30 (1976) 1-22; E.F. Lupieri, Giovanni Battista tra storia e leggenda, Brescia 1988; Id., John the Gnostic: The Figure of the Baptist in Origen and Heterodox Gnosticism: SP 19 (1989) 322-327; Id., John the Baptist in New Testament Tradition and History: ANRW 26, 1, 430-461; F.A. Metzsch, Johannes der Täufer. Seine Geschichte und seine Darstellung in der Kunst, Munich 1989; C. Walter, Salome and the Head of Saint John the Baptist: REArm 23 (1992) 509-523; A. Castellano, La exégesis de Origenes y de Heracleón a los testimonios del Bautista, Santiago (Chile) 1998; E. Lucchesi, Trois éloges coptes de Jean Baptiste attribués à Athanase, Théophile et Cyrille d'Alexandrie: VChr 53 (1999) 323-4.

M. Starowieyski

JOHN THE BAPTIST (iconography). Considered the last and greatest prophet of the OT and precursor of Christ in preaching and in baptism, John the Baptist appears already in the 3rd c. in some cemeterial frescoes in the scene of the baptism of Christ, beardless, in a girded tunic or fascia (Rome, cemetery of Callistus, cubicle of the sacraments A3: middle of the 3rd c.; ibid., area of Lucina, cubicles XY: 220-230; cemetery of Domitilla: 2nd half of the 4th c.; cemetery of Pontianus, John the Baptist appears haloed: 4th c.). Equally ancient, the *sarcophagi usually show, on the contrary, the Baptist bearded and dressed only in the pallium (Rome, S. Maria Antiqua, sarcophagus: 3rd quarter of the 3rd c.) or in a lion skin (Rome, Museo Pio Cristiano, Vat., sarcophagus: last decade of the 3rd c.). In a corner between the columns of the lower level of the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (359), Christ and John the Baptist are represented as lambs.

From the 5th c., next to scenes of baptism, which continued to be represented (*Ravenna, S. Giovanni in Fonte: middle of the 5th c.; London, British Museum, ivory casket: beginning 5th c.; Ravenna, Baptistery of the Arians: 6th c.; Ravenna, ivory throne of Maximian: 6th c.), scenes concerning his life began to spread, which frequently are confused with those from the life of Christ—annunciation to Zechariah or to Elizabeth, birth, song of Zechariah, flight of Elizabeth with John the Baptist as a child, murder of Zechariah—(Rome, S. Maria Maggiore, arch, mosaics: 432–440; Alexandrian Chronicle of the world, miniatures: 5th c.; Evangeliarium of Rabbula: 6th c.; Deir Abu Hennis near Antinoë, baptismal church, frescoes: 6th c.; Sinope, evangeliarium, Paris, Bibl. Nat. suppl. gr. 1286: VI c.). John the Baptist is also shown in the clothing of the prophet of the redemption (Rome, basilica of Sts. John and Paul on the Celian: 498-514; Rome, oratory of St. Venantius in the Lateran: 640–642), in the style of a standing ascetic (Kiev, icon: 6th c.), among the evangelists with allusion to the NT (Ravenna, ivory throne of Maximian: 6th c.), or again associated with Zechariah, with Mary or with Gabriel (Poreč, Euphrasian basilica, apsidal mosaic: 543–544; Rome, basilica of S. Maria Antiqua, fresco: 649). Other episodes, too, are not unknown, like Mt 3:10, the Lenten preaching (Werden, near London, ivory casket: 5th c.) and the martyrdom with decapitation in prison (Sinope, evangeliarium: 6th c.) or the presentation of the head by the executioner during the banquet of Herod, usually to Salome (Alexandrian Chronicle of the world, miniatures: 5th c.; Sinope, evangeliarium: 6th c.; Dittochaeon n. 34: 400?).

As for the sacred buildings dedicated to him, in Palestine the existence of sanctuaries is attested from the end of the 4th c., e.g., in the locality where he baptized Christ at Qasr el-Jehud and above his tomb which was believed to exist at Sebaste (Jer., Comm. in Osea 1,1; Comm. in Michaeam 1,1: PL 25, 825 and 1156). At *Constantinople there were about fifteen sacred buildings, among which the church of Hebdomon, where *Theodosius had the head deposited (Soz., HE 7,21); at Rome around ten, e.g., the oratory of the Lateran Baptistery and, later, the homonymous basilica dedicated to the Savior and to the Baptist. St. *Benedict and *Theodelinda dedicated churches to him at Montecassino and at Monza.

EC 6, 515ff.; LCI 7, 164-190; Wp 237ff.; Wa I,21ff.; J. Myslivec, Ikone des Johannes in der Wüste: Seminarium Kondakovianum 6 (1933) 227-237; S. de Vito Battaglia, L'art et saint Jean. L'intervention de l'ange: L'Ill. Vat. 5 (1934) 824-826; R. Plus, Jean-Baptiste dans l'art, Paris 1937; M. Maynial, L'iconographie de S. Jean-Baptiste depuis les origines jusqu'au XIVe siècle, Paris 1943; E.D. Sdrakas, Johannes der Täufer in der Kunst des christlichen Ostens, Munich 1943; A. Masseron, S. Jean-Baptiste dans l'art, Paris 1957; L. Kötzsche-Breitenbruch, Das Elfenbeinrelief mit Taufszene aus der Sammlung Maskell im British Museum: JbAC 22 (1979) 195-204.

G. Santagata

JOHN the EGYPTIAN (d. after 536). The *monophysite bishop of Hephaestus. A Palestinian of Gaza, monk in Egypt in the convent of *Peter the Iberian, he was ordained bishop by *Theodosius of Alexandria around 534, but in 536 he was deposed and exiled to *Constantinople together with Theodosius himself. From there he secretly undertook various trips to Asia Minor, organizing a monophysite hierarchy and making himself the bearer of messages of other exiled bishops. *John of Ephesus, his future biographer (Lives of the Oriental Saints 25: PO 18, 526-540), was his travel companion; they had met in Rhodes. A letter from him in *Syriac is preserved, addressed to the *archimandrites of the East, but it is unpublished.

CPG 7200: F. Nau, Littérature canonique syriaque inédite: ROC 14 (1909) 48-49 (just the Fr. tr. of the letter); E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VIe siècle, CSCO 127, subs. 2, Louvain 1951, 165-167; DHGE 26, 1495; Patrologia V, 390-1.

F. Scorza Barcellona

JOHN the PRESBYTER (1st c.). A person who lived in the apostolic or subapostolic age, the details of whose life are decidedly obscure. *Eusebius reports that *Papias, in his anxious search for knowledge of the first Christian period, sought information on what *Andrew or *Peter or *Philip or *Thomas or *James or *John or *Matthew or any other disciple of the Lord had said and on what *Aristion and the presbyter John, disciples of the Lord, had said (Eus., HE 3, 39,4). In the analysis that follows the citation of Papias, Eusebius notes that the former clearly distinguishes two Johns, one the apostle, listed among the group of the apostles, whose testimony belonged to the past and was passed on to those who heard them, while the second John is called presbyter and disciple of the Lord in parallel with Aristion, and their testimonies were given in person (ibid. 5). The hypothesis can be proposed that the account of Eusebius has been corrupted or that he has corrected the report of Papias, since he opposed the canonicity of the Apocalypse, which he ascribes to the presbyter John and not to the apostle (VII, 25,16). There are no arguments to credit the opinion that Eusebius falsified the report of Papias. John the Presbyter therefore cannot be other than a disciple of the apostles, probably of the Johannine circle, who lived at Ephesus and encountered Papias. Although the distinction of the two Johns helped Eusebius overcome the hurdle of the attribution of the Apocalypse, it must be admitted that Papias does in fact speak about two different people. An indirect argument in favor of the distinction can be seen in the dedication of 2 and 3 John, where the critics are agreed in supposing that the word "presbyter" can be completed with the word "John," but are not agreed on supposing the author to be the apostle John. In the Adv. haer. (II, 22,5; III, 3,4), *Irenaeus seems to have casually simplified the data from Papias, calling John apostle, author of the Fourth Gospel and disciple of the Lord, and does not even mention John the Presbyter, unless—but this seems unlikely—one wishes to see John in the source named "the Presbyter" (Adv. haer. IV, 27,1.2; 28,1; 30,1; 31,1; 32,1). The question on the identity between John the apostle and John the Presbyter remains open.

G. Bardy, Jean le Presbytre: DBS 4, 843-847; F.M. Braun, Jean le Théologien et son Évangile dans l'Église ancienne (Études Bibliques), Paris 1959, 357-364; A. Feuillet, Le manque de sens critique d'Irénée et le problème des deux Jean: Introduction à la Bible, II, Paris 1959, 650-652; J. Munck, Zur Papiaszeugnis bei Eusebius, H.E. III, 39,3f: HThR 52 (1959) 123-143; O. Merlier, Le quatrième Évangile, Paris 1961, 240-245, 446-447, R. Schnackenburg, Die Johannesbriefe (Herd. Theol. Komm. zum N.T. 13/3), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 41970, 259-301; Id., Il vangelo di Giovanni, I, Brescia 1973, 96-100, 109-114; B.M. Ubach, Giovanni il Presbitero, Enc. della Bibbia, III, Turin 1970, coll. 1165-1166; U.H.J. Koertner, Papias von Hierapolis. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des frühen Christentums, Göttingen 1983; J. Kuerzinger, Papias von Hierapolis und die Evangelien des Neuen Testaments. Gesammelte Aufsätze, Neuausgabe und Übersetzung der Fragmente. Kommentierte Bibliographie, Regensburg 1983 (cf. L. Cirillo, Un recente volume su Papia: CSt 7 [1986] 553-563); W.R. Schoedel, Papias: ANRW 2, 27, 1, 235-270; M.-L. Rigato, La testimonianza di Papia di Gerapoli sul "secondo" Giovanni e il contesto eusebiano: riscontri nel Nuovo Testamento, in Atti del VI Simposio di Efeso su S. Giovanni Apostolo, ed. L. Padovese, Rome 1996, 237-272.

E. Peretto

JOHN the SILENT (d. 559). Also called the *Hesychast or Sabaite, a saint. He was born at Nicopolis (Armenia Maior) in 454. Being left an orphan, he founded a monastery there at 18; at 28 he was elected bishop of Colonia (Taxara, Armenia). After a trip to *Constantinople, he retired at 38 to *Jerusalem to the hospital of St. George and, later, to the laura of St. Sabas, where, under the latter's guidance, he lived in continual seclusion and silence until his death (559). His disciple *Cyril of Scythopolis wrote his Vita. This is complete in the *Georgian version, but in the Greek text the death of the saint is missing.

CPG III, 7537; ed. Schwartz, Cyrillos von Skythopolis, TU 49, 2, 201-222; PO 21, 458-462; AASS Mai III, 14-18, 230-236; DACL 6, 2362-2365; LTK² 5, 1045f.; Cath 6, 423f.; BS 6, 904f.; Patrologia V, 293.

A. De Nicola

JONAH

I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. The book of Jonah, among the Twelve Minor Prophets of the OT, has a narrative form, even if—acc. to the usual interpretation today—it is only a story or a parable. The personage of Jonah is known in the Bible from 2 Kgs 14:25: he was active at the time of Jeroboam II, toward the middle of the 8th c. BC. But the book was written later, about the 4th c. Its boundless universalistic thesis, in terms which appear to anticipate the NT, seems to react against the tendency of Ezra and Nehemiah: God wants the salvation of all, even the Ninevites; and mercy is demanded of Israel toward traditional enemies, on the model of the mercy of Yahweh. Even if it was considered historical for centuries, the story has a fictional character, today generally accepted: miracles are multiplied there to an extreme (the sudden appearance and then disappearance of the storm, the fish which swallows Jonah and preserves him intact for three days in his belly, the growth and instant withering of a plant) in such a way as to emphasize the sarcastic intention toward the only Israelite of the book, who is Jonah. The prophet is sent by God to Nineveh to announce the destruction, but instead of leaving for the East he sets out by sea in the opposite direction. In contrast with the disobedience of Jonah, all the creatures mentioned in the book are shown as obedient to the word of God, transmitted to them, even against his will, by the prophet: the polytheistic sailors, the king and inhabitants of Nineveh, and even the sea, the fish, the animals in act of penance, the plant which grew overnight, the worm which made it wither.

Probably because of the "sign" of Jonah—the only one of the prophets to whom Jesus compares himself and his own mission (Mt 12:39-41)—the book of Jonah is taken into account throughout patristic literature rather more than the other Minor Prophets. The history of its interpretation has two phases: the first is limited to allusions and references; the second is distinguished by the great commentaries. The first phase embraces the 2nd and the 3rd c.: the Fathers do not yet worry about gathering the global meaning and theological message of the book, but cite it, or refer to it implicitly, or introduce it as an argument to respond to questions which are more pressing and immediate for them. Thus, we see used as a polemic against the Jews in the Letter of *Clement of Rome (1 Clem. 7,7), and *Justin (Dial. 108); against the *gnostics, *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 3,21,8; 4,9,2) and *Methodius of Olympus (De resurr. 11,24-25); *Tertullian uses it to demonstrate, against *Marcion, that also in the OT God practices mercy and repents of the threatened evil (Adv. Marc. II, 24,4-6). *Clement of Alexandria, who begins to recognize the universalism of the book, presents the Ninevites as an example of conversion for the pagans (Protrept. X, 99,4): Jonah is the persecuted just man, model of the true gnostic (Strom. II, 20,103-104). With *Origen there is the first commentary on Jonah, lost, but which left a clearly visible trace in later works. The attention with which Origen read the book seems clear from the De oratione, where (for the first time in a patristic writing) the disobedience of the prophet is noted—who in consequence runs the risk of death (De orat. 13,3)—and, later, his lack of mercy (ibid., 13,4), after God had saved him.

In the 4th c., in the West, the signs of a complete *exegesis of the book are already clear. The continual resistance of Jonah to God is pointed out by *Zeno of Verona (Tract. II, 17,2); thus also the author of the Liber quaestionum in polemic with the *Novatians and the *Arians (Quaest. 102,4-8; 97,12: CSEL 50, 202-206.180). *Ambrose reads and explains the book of Job on Holy Thursday (Ep. 20,25-26: PL 16, 1001-1002), at the end of the Lenten penance, of which the Ninevites are the model. In the East the authors who deal with Jonah are rather numerous. With *John Chrysostom begins that exegesis which explains the disobedience of the prophet with the fear that the oracle of condemnation might be refuted by the facts, since God is merciful (De statuis hom. 5,6). The fast of the Ninevites is given as an example of communal prayer and conversion (De incomprehens. Dei natura 3,6; In Gen. hom. 24,6). The Cappadocian fathers move along this line, interpreting the triple immersion of the baptismal rite with the three days of the burial of Christ acc. to the sign of Jonah (see Basil., De spir. sancto 14,32); moreover, *Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. II, 108-109) understands the sending of the prophet to Nineveh as an announcement of the future ruin of Israel. In this century the complete commentaries on the book of Jonah begin. *Jerome writes the In Ionam (PL 25, 1117-1152), one of his best exegetical works. The interpretation of the flight is noteworthy: Jonah refused to travel to Nineveh because he saw in his mission the rejection of Israel for the advantage of the pagans; this is perhaps the thesis of the lost commentary of Origen, of which there is a confirmation in Gregory of Nazianzus. *Theodore of Mopsuestia, who writes at *Antioch the commentary on the Twelve Prophets, explains the theological meaning of the book in this way (PG 66, 317-346): Jonah is familiar with the mercy of God and knows that if the Ninevites repent they will be pardoned. Thence the flight to impede the realization of the pardon (ibid., 325-328).

For the 5th c. the In Ionam (PG 71, 597-638) of *Cyril of Alexandria should be mentioned: the book shows the breadth of God's plan concerning all the pagan nations. Cyril is the only commentator who sees in this universal intention the motive for the mission of Jonah and thus blame for Jonah, who has sentiments unworthy of a prophet. *Theodoret of Cyrrhus in the commentary In Ionam (PG 81, 1719-1740) goes even further, asserting that Israel and the nations are complementary parts of a single plan of salvation: the mission of Jonah is that of revealing the God common to all humankind, a God who for love of sinners does not hesitate to afflict the just (ibid., 1740). Among the Greeks one could mention *Hesychius of Jerusalem, *Gennadius of Constantinople and *Basil of Seleucia, who in the Homilies underlines the pedagogy of God with the just and the sinners, and his bounty toward every creature (Or. 12-13). Basil was the first to explore the theological meaning of the castor plant, which demonstrates the tenderness of God toward all, even toward the reluctant prophet (Or. 12). Among the Latins *Augustine should be mentioned (Ep. 102,30-38: CSEL 34, 570-578): he takes up the thesis of Jerome but emphasizes the refusal of the prophet as a sign of the jealousy of the chosen people faced with the salvation of the pagans.

The book of Jonah enjoyed extraordinary popularity among the Fathers; the authors who cite it are numerous. In the first centuries the "sign of Jonah" of the gospel directed the commentators toward the christological interpretation: the passion of Christ, the prayer of the persecuted just man, the three days and nights in the tomb, the resurrection. God appears there as the almighty Lord who frees the prophet from death. Only with the exegesis of the entire book does the other reading progress, which goes from the recognition of the sin of Jonah to the awareness of a God of mercy, of a God who wants the salvation of every person, even of his prophet who remains the most difficult to convert.

Translations of the In Ionam of Jerome: It. tr. Commento al libro di Giona (Collana di Testi patristici, 96), ed. N. Pavia, Rome 1992; Lat. text and Fr. tr. Sur Jonas, SC 43, P. Antin (Paris 1956); Commentaire sur Jonas, SC 323, Y.-M. Duval, Paris 1985; Lat. text and Ger. tr. Kommentar zu dem Propheten Jona (Fontes Christiani, 90), S. Risse, Turnhout 2003; Pol. tr. Komentarz do ksiegi Jonaszka, Kraków 1998.

DBS 4, 1104-1131; Y.-M. Duval, Le livre de Jonas dans la littérature chrétienne grecque et latine. Sources et influence da Commentaire sur Jonas de saint Jérôme, Paris 1973; E. Biser, Zum frühchristlichen Verständnis des Buches Jonas: Bibel und Kirche 17 (1962) 19-21; Y.-M. Duval, Les sources grecques de l'exégèse de Jonas chez Zénon de Vérone: VChr 20 (1966) 98-115; Y.-M. Duval, Saint Augustin et le Commentaire sur Jonas de Saint Jérôme: REA 12 (1966) 9-40; W. Wischmeyer, Das Beispiel Jonas. Zur Kirchengeschichtlichen Bedeutung von Denkmälern frühchristlicher Grabeskunst zwischen Theologie und Frömmigkeit: ZKG 92 (1981) 161-179; P. Jay, L'exégèse de Jérôme d'après son Commentaire sur Isaïe, Paris 1985; U. Steffen, Die Jona-Geschichte. Ihre Auslegung und Darstellung im Judentum, Christentum und Islam, Neukirchen-Vluyn 1994; R. Lux, Jona. Prophet zwischen "Verweigerung" und "Gehorsam," FRLANT 162, Göttingen 1994; G. Vanoni, Jona. Jonabuch: LTK[3] 5, 985-987; H.-J. Zobel, Jona. Jonabuch: TRE 17, 229-234.

G. Pani

II. Iconography. The short book of Jonah, which narrates the adventures of the prophet charged with carrying the divine message to the Ninevites, was a source of inspiration from the beginnings of Christian iconography. A prefiguration of Christ for having remained three days and three nights in the belly of the sea monster like Jesus in the tomb (Mt 12:40), Jonah alludes to the resurrection and was among the best-known biblical figures. Some moments in particular of the story of the prophet are represented frequently: thrown from the ship into the stormy sea and swallowed by the sea monster; vomited by the sea monster onto the beach and, finally, resting under the shelter of cucurbitae. These scenes are often found united in cyclical compositions. Sometimes a fourth moment is added to these (esp. in Roman cemeterial frescoes), in which Jonah appears sad under the withered plant: this underlines his mission of spreading the message of salvation also among the Gentiles. The iconographic variations are very numerous, and it is not possible to enumerate all of them. Sporadically some new episode appears, such as Jonah sent to Nineveh, or in the act of climbing on the rocks, after having been vomited onto the shore. The prophet usually looks young, beardless and nude (among biblical figures, just like Daniel among the lions); only rarely does he wear a tunic clavata, or else tunic and pallium (e.g., in the floor mosaic of Beth Govrin, in Palestine, or in a miniature of f. 6*a* of the Codex of Rabbula). Standing and clothed, but with a different iconography and in a different context, Jonah is later represented among the prophets in the basilica of St. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna.

It has been remarked that the scenes of Jonah are attested in a smaller number in the East than in the West. However, in funeral painting, the prophet makes his appearance very early, around the 4th decade of the 3rd c., in the Crypt of the Sacraments and in the area of Lucina in the Roman catacombs of St. *Callistus. The compositions already contain all the elements which characterize them (Wp 26,1,2,3; 27,3; 38; 47,1,2). In the Roman cemeteries, the theme reoccurs in about seventy examples, about thirty of which refer to cycles of three or four episodes. A few times Jonah is found sad under the withered plant (e.g. Wp 235; Ferrua, Via Latina tv. LXXI, 1; Josi: RivAC 1928, fig. 21, 198), while in a single case, in a lost picture of the catacomb of *Domitilla (Wp 56), the prophet appeared troubled by the sun. Scenes of Jonah also adorn the later cubiculi or loculi of the Roman cemeteries; they are also known in different locales and regions of the orbis christianus antiquus, e.g., at Cimitile (3rd c.), in the catacombs of *Januarius at *Naples, in the cemetery of Bonaria at Cagliari (4th c.), in the mausoleum of the Exodus at El-Bagawat in Egypt (end 4th–5th c.), or again in a hypogeum of Sopianae, in *Pannonia Secunda.

The story of Jonah is already attested in some of the most ancient Christian *sarcophagi, such as that of S. Maria Antiqua (Ws 1,2; 3,1 = Rep. 747,1,2), from the 1st half of the 3rd c., and in numerous covers from the 2nd half of the 3rd c. up to the so-called sarcophagus of Jonah (Ws 9,3 = Rep. 35), in which the episodes of the prophet occupy a post of first rank on the front. He appears thrown into the sea from the ship, in which there are three sailors, swallowed and vomited by the monster, resting under the bower. Outside of Rome, the theme occurs with a certain frequency in the Iberic and Gallic sarcophagi. The lid of the sarcophagus of the church of Saint-Caprais d'Agen (Ws 168,4) testifies to its persistence in the figurative repertoire up to the end of the 6th c. Jonah appears in some African sarcophagi, such as at Naro-Hamman-el-Cif, where he is represented (with the legend IONA), between two images of Daniel (5th c.). As for sculpture, numerous altar slabs (or "tables") with historiated edges should be mentioned from diverse origins (Split, Athens, Smyrna, Laodicea), in which the usual episodes of the cycle can be identified.

Concerning mosaics, before the middle of the 3rd c. there is that of the mausoleum of the Julii in the Vatican necropolis, with Jonah thrown from the ship, while in the 2nd decade of the 4th c. three scenes of the cycle of Jonah constituted the principal decorative theme of the floor of the Theodorian S hall of *Aquileia, in a sea rich with fish and fishing cupids. The trilogy is represented also on a loculo decorated with mosaic in the Roman cemetery of Apronianus. Of late Constantinian era is the mosaic decoration of the mausoleum of Centcelles in *Spain, in which the three episodes of Jonah also appear (partially preserved). The prophet is found, furthermore, in a limited number of funeral floor mosaics (Thabarca) and of halls of worship, such as in the African basilica of Furnus Minus (5th c.), in which Jonah is shown tossed up (with the legends IONAS and CETVS). Three scenes (in two of which, however, the ship appears) are also inserted in the tesselation of the Palestinian basilica of Beth Govrin (4th–5th c.).

The resting scene, also often represented alone, is not foreign to the biblical text, but finds precise references (Jon 4:5-6). Aside from the polemics on the nature of the plant, already having arisen in Antiquity regarding the translation of the term qîqāyôn, in the paleo-Christian iconography a gourd is certainly depicted, with fruits hanging (a vine, however, appears in the above-mentioned f. 6*a* of the Codex of Rabbula). Sometimes, on the other hand, some Roman funeral slabs show engraved only branches of cucurbitae, or isolated gourds, without other elements. Among the other classes of monuments with scenes of Jonah, numerous golden bases, bronze and terracotta lamps should be mentioned (esp. in *Italy, *Gaul and *Africa) and gems. Among the ivories are the Lipsanotheca of Brescia (2nd half 4th c.) and the pyx formerly of St. Ambrose in Milan (at the Hermitage Museum). The prophet expelled by the whale appears, furthermore, among the stuccoes of the baptistry of the orthodox at Ravenna (2nd half 5th c.), while on some African clay tablets of the museum of the Bardo (5th–6th c.) Jonah expelled can be identified and—perhaps—in the singular attitude of riding the sea monster. Recently a new hypothesis has been advanced (Testini), acc. to which the motive for the spread of this first cyclical composition of the paleo-Christian repertory, esp. Western, would have been a polemic against Jewish-Christianity, for which the scenes of Jonah would be an affirmation of the universality of the divine salvific message, extended to all the nations already in the OT.

Among the most recent discoveries, from Konya (Turkey) comes a relief of the beginning of the 5th c. furnished with legends in Greek, with the head of Jonah emerging from the jaws of the whale, rendered as a big fish. Other attestations of the iconographic cycle are found in the marble tables of the end of the 4th c., of varied provenance and mostly fragmentary, in which sometimes appear, besides the three usual ones, two other episodes (in one case, perhaps, boarding the ship and Jonah sad at the sight of Nineveh).

DACL 7, 2571-2631; EC 6, 428-429; LCI 2, 414-421; O. Mitius, Jonas auf den Denkmälern des christlichen Altertums, Freiburg i.B. 1897; A. Stuiber, Refrigerium interim, Bonn 1957, 136-151; E. Stommel, Zum Problem den frühchristlichen Jonasdarstellungen: JbAC 1 (1958) 112-115; M. Lawrence, Ships, Monsters and Jonah: AJA 66 (1962) 289-296; A. Ferrua, Paralipomeni di Giona: RivAC 38 (1962) 7-69; P. Testini, in Atti IX CongrIntArchChrist Roma 1975, Vatican City 1978, 484-485; BACr s. II, 5 (1874) 150-152; P. Gauckler, Catalogue des Musées et Collections archéologiques de l'Algérie et de la Tunisie. Musée Aloui, II, Paris 1907, L 10, 11, 209; E. Josi, Le pitture rinvenute nel cimitero dei Giordani: RivAC 5 (1928) 198, fig. 21 (in reality, it is the catacomb of the via Anapo); G. Chierici, Edifici sacri particolari: Atti IV CongrIntArchChrist Roma 1948, 39, fig. 8; B.M. Apollonj Ghetti - A. Ferrua - E. Josi - E. Kirschbaum, Esplorazioni sotto la confessione di S. Pietro in Vaticano, Vatican City 1951, 42; F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden Baden 1958, fig. 73; Volbach-Hirmer, figs. 85-87, 75; L. Pani Ermini, Note su alcuni cubicoli dell'antico cimitero cristiano di Bonaria in Cagliari: Studi Sardi 20 (1966) 11-17; U.M. Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975, 47 and 63; M. Sotomayor, Sarcófagos romano-cristianos de España, Granada 1975, 122ff., 129-130, 148-149; A. Balil, Frammenti di sarcofago cristiano nel nord-ovest della Penisola iberica: RivAC 51 (1975) 313-316; G. Rinaldi, I tre quadretti di Giona nel mosaico dell'aula teodoriana: AAAd 8 (1975) 109-130; G. Foerster, The Story of Jonah on the Mosaic Pavement of a Church at Beth Govrin (Israel): Atti IX CongrIntArchChrist Roma 1975, Vatican City 1978, 289-294; N. Duval - M. Cintas, Basiliques et mosaïques funéraires de Furnus Minus: MEFR Ant. 90 (1978) 871-949; H. Schlunk - Th. Hauschild, Hispania antiqua, Mainz 1978, 26 and 124; J. Speigl, Das Bildprogramm des Jonasmotivs in den Malereien der römischen Katakomben: RQA 73 (1978) 1-15; H. Sichtermann, Der Jonaszyklus, in Spätantike und frühes Christentum, Ausstellungkatalog, Frankfurt a.M. 1983, 241-248; D. Korol, Die frühchristlichen Wandmalereien aus den Grabbauten in Cimitile/Nola. Zur Entstehung und Ikonographie alttestamentlicher Darstellungen (JbAC, Ergänzungsbände 13), Münster 1987; C. Stella, Lipsanoteca, in Milano capitale dell'Impero romano, Milan 1990, 344-346; E. Chalkia, Le mense paleocristiane, Vatican City 1991; J. Dresken Weiland, Reliefierte Tischplatten aus theodosianischer Zeit, Vatican City 1991; Id., Ein frühchristliches Jonas-Relief in Konya: MDAI(R) 102 (1995) 405-412; A.M. Nieddu, La pittura paleocristiana in Sardegna. Nuove acquisizioni: RivAC 72 (1996) 245-283; M. Perraymond, Ninive, la città del profeta Giona: iconografia, simbolismo, narrazione, in E. Cavalcanti (ed.), Il "De Civitate Dei." L'opera, le interpretazioni, l'influsso, Rome 1996, 627-640; D. Mazzoleni, Giona (s.v.): TIP, 191-193; M. Dulaey, Le signe de Jonas, in Id., Le berger divin, in "Des forêts de symboles." L'initation chrétienne et la Bible (Ier-VIe siècle), Paris 2001, 85-111.

D. Mazzoleni

JONAS of Bobbio (ca. 600–after 659). Jonas, a *Longobard (Lombard) of Susa and monk of Bobbio (Piacenza), a monastery founded by *Columbanus (ca. 530–615), became in 618 the amanuensis of the abbot Attala (615–ca. 626). In 626 he accompanied the third abbot, Bertulf (626–ca. 640), on his trip to Rome. In the era of this abbot he was asked to write the Vita Columbani (ca. 642); for this purpose he traveled to Gaul to meet acquaintances of Columbanus, given that he had not known him personally. Therefore he had an opportunity to draw on good eyewitness sources both at Bobbio and in other monasteries, esp. in *Gaul. The work is dedicated to Waldebert, abbot at Luxeuil and Bobeleno, the successor of Bertulf at Bobbio. He does not mention episodes which can discredit his subject, such as the dispute with *Gall when Columbanus left Switzerland, or his position—not orthodox—in the controversy on the date of Easter and on the *Three Chapters. Together with the figure of Columbanus, who occupies the first of the two books, his spiritual heirs are also put in relief; more precisely, in the second book, he discusses the disciples and successors (Attala, Eustace, Bertulf, Meroveus, "The miracles of Evoriacum" (Faremoutiers), the abbey founded by St. Burgundofara, whose brother was a monk at Luxeuil. Narrating the life of the successors of Columbanus, Jonas makes it clear that the work of Co-lumbanus has not ended but continues in them. He describes with precision and in great detail the peregrinatio of Columbanus framed within the political and religious events of his time. He also wrote the Life of John, founder of the monastery of Réomé; the oldest redaction of the Vita s. Vedastis episcopi Atrebatensis is attributed to him.

CPL 1175 (1115); 1176 (2144); 1177 (2113) Kenney 48; BHL 742, 2773, 1478-1479, 1311-1312; Repertorium Fontium Historiae Medii Aevi VI, 433-434.

Editions: PL 87, 1011-1184; MGH, scr. mer. IV (1902) 61-152 (Krusch); Jonas, Vita Columbani et discipulorum eius, ed. M. Tosi, with It. tr. by E. Cremona and M. Paramidani, Piacenza 1965; M. Massani, S. Columbano di Bobbio nella storia, nella letteratura, nell'arte: Didaskaleion 6 (1928) 81-112; 6/2 (1928) 1-157; F.G. Nuvolone, Il "Compendium Jonae," il "Sermo de charitate Dei ac proximi," il viaggio di Colombano a Roma e l'aggiornamento dell'orso.

Editions and starting points for turther research: Archivum Bobiense 4 (1982) 91-165; A. de Vogüé. - P. Sangiani, Jonas de Bobbio, Vie de saint Colomban et des ses disciples, Abbaye de Bellefontaine 1988; I. Wood, The Vita Columbani and Merovingian Hagiography: Peritia 1 (1982) 63-80; D. Bullough, Colombano: DBI 27 (1983) 113-129; A. de Vogüé, En lisant Jonas de Bobbio. Notes sur la Vie de saint Colomban: Studia Mon. 30 (1988) 63-103; I. Pagani, "Iona" "Ionatus": a proposito della biografia di Giona di Bobbio: SM 29 (1988) 45-85; M. Lapidge (ed.), Columbanus: Studies on the Latin Writings, Woodbridge 1997; A. de Vogüé, Regards sur le monachisme des premiers siècles: recueil d'articles, Rome 2000.

A. Di Berardino

JORDANES (ca. 500–ca. 570). A historian, probably Alan by nationality, but certainly Gothic in soul and Roman in culture, of the 6th c. Biographical details are cloudy. It is certain that in the first period of his life he was notarius quamvis agramatus (i.e., ignorant of the ars grammatica) to the noble Gunthiges Baza, who belonged to the royal family of the Amali (or Amalings). It is likely that, having moved to *Italy, he entered *Cassiodorus's community at *Vivarium. Following a meditated conversio he became Catholic, probably from the "*Arian sect" against which, in his writings, he showed a particular aversion. There is no reliable evidence that he entered an Eastern monastery (but not even *Ravenna is excluded); likewise, his consecration as bishop of Croton is uncertain. Pope *Vigilius, his friend, mentions Jordanes among the bishops who in 551 supported the condemnation of Bishop Theodore of Caesarea; from this, it has been concluded that Jordanes took part in the escort which accompanied the pope in his exile at Constantinople.

His historical work, De summa temporum vel origine actibusque gentis Romanorum, today commonly called Romana, is laid out as a compendium of universal history from Adam to *Justinian. Begun at the invitation of his friend Vigilius (perhaps the pope) and conceived as a history of human suffering, it was interrupted and taken up again around 551–552. The main sources are naturally Cassiodorus and the Chronicon of *Marcellinus comes, but it also draws on Florus, St. *Jerome, *Orosius, Eutropius, Rufius Festus, Virgilius, Lucan, Livy, Strabo, Pomponius Mela and finally on all those authors, historians or not, in which it was possible to find an ideal relationship between Roman and barbarian culture. Furthermore, the use of passages taken from Tyrannius *Rufinus illuminates a remarkable effort in the study of the Holy Scripture: "The Jordanian reading of the sacred texts never failed to corroborate itself with the study of patristic literature of biblical exegesis" (Luiselli); further, the Romana appear as a historical-universal treatment, centered on biblical-Jewish and Eastern material, not without a human dimension. In the context of Christian-inspired Latin historiography, the work synthesizes the universal historical approach and the specifically Roman, which by then for some time had flowed into the Christian.

The second work of Jordanes, composed after the solicitations of his friend Castalius, bears the title De origine actibusque Getarum (Getica) and is in reality an epitome of the lost History of the Goths of Cassiodorus. In the course of the narration the historian reveals himself as a fervent promoter of the Amali dynasty, whose right to rule the *Goths he recognizes. It is a valuable source for the accurate description of the events concerning the *Huns, the *Visigoths up to Alaric II and the *Ostrogoths with Vitiges defeated by *Justinian. According to Jordanes, the only possibility of salvation for the Gothic kingdom in *Italy consisted in a loyal collaboration with the emperor of the East, Justinian.

Thanks to this pro-Byzantinism, the work supports the policy of Vitiges, who unconditionally supported the imperial policy in order to save his people. In this way Jordanes defended "the encounter between two peoples even if on a different level, even of submission of one toward the other" (Giunta). Animated by the intent of repacifying the Romania and the Gothia, Jordanes attempts to blur and mitigate the bloody conflicts between the two worlds: he contrasts the pacific Gothic flexibility with the rapacity of the Roman civil servants, attributing to the latter and to the emperor *Valens the guilt for the defeat of Adrianople (378) and for having introduced the Arian heresy among the Goths. He locates in the ferocity of the Huns the reasons why the Ostrogoths were opposed to the Romans on the field of battle. He minimizes the extent of the sack of Rome by *Alaric, to whom he attributes religious piety. He grants to *Belisarius, finally, with realism, the merit of having put an end to the state of illegitimacy which had arisen in the Ostrogothic kingdom of Italy after the death of *Theodoric.

From a linguistic perspective, the *Latin of both works of Jordanes is of great interest for the number of vulgarisms which infiltrated the vocabulary and syntax of even educated conversation; the style shows its Cassiodorian origin. The chief merit of Jordanes, who appears as one of the last historians of Rome, is to transmit a thoughtful Augustinian Christianity to historiography, of which he reevaluates the positive aspect against the negative conception of history.

Th. Mommsen, MGH AA V, 1 (1882); E. Bartolini, Jordanes, Storia dei goti, Milan 1991; F. Giunta - A. Grillone, Iordanis De origine actibusque Getarum, Rome 1991; O. Devillers, Histoire des Goths - Jordanes, Paris [2]1995; P.L. Schmidt, NP V, 1085-1087; Manitius, I s.v.; F. Giunta, Jordanes e la cultura dell'alto medioevo. Contributo allo studio del problema gotico, Palermo 1952; J. Svennung, Jordanes und Scandia. Krit.-exeget. Studien, Stockholm 1967; O. Giordano, Jordanes e la storiografia del IV secolo, Bari 1973; B. Luiselli, Sul "De summa temporum" di I.: RomBarb 1 (1976) 83-133; J.J. O'Donnell, The Aims of Jordanes: Historia 31 (1982) 223-240; L.M. Buonomo, Introduzione alla lettura delle opere di Giordane, in M.L. Silvestre - M. Squillante, Mutatio rerum. Letteratura, filosofia, scienza tra tardo antico e altomedioevo, Atti del convegno di studi (Napoli, 25-26 novembre 1996), Naples 1997, 115-169; A. Gillett, Jordanes and Ablabius, in C. Deroux, Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History, Paris 2000; A.S. Christensen, Cassiodorus, Jordanes, and the History of the Goths: Studies in a Migration Myth, Copenhagen 2002; A. Amici, Iordanes e la Storia gotica, Spoleto 2002.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

JOSEPH

I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. Spouse of the Virgin *Mary, putative father of Jesus, certainly Palestinian. The discrepancy between the Lukan genealogy (3:23-38) and the Matthean (1:2-16) has encouraged the appearance of the divergent hypotheses, despite the clear intention of the evangelists of putting Jesus into human history as the descendant of Abraham and David. While there are no mentions of the mother of Joseph, Mt 1:16, which puts Jacob as the last link, and Lk 3:23, which on the contrary names Eli, give information about his father. The discrepancy between Matthew and Luke indicates that the names are not to be taken literally. From the time of *Julius Africanus, who considered Jacob and Eli brothers on their mother's side (Ep. ad Aristidem 3: PG 10, 57), up to the most recent explanations which maintain that the two genealogies are records of the family of Joseph (Matthew) and of Mary (Luke), the problem remains open. According to *Hegesippus, Clopas (Jn 19:25; Mt 13:55) was the brother of Joseph (Eus., HE III, 11; 32,6; IV, 22,4). On the degree of relation with Mary the gospels are silent. Indirectly from Mark (6:3) and directly from Matthew (13:55), we are informed that Joseph was a tektōn (Vg faber, carpenter or woodworker); the wide signification of the term does not allow identifying his profession with precision. Neither from Luke nor from Matthew can the social condition of Mary at the moment of the annunciation be deduced. Joseph is called a "just man," or perfect Israelite, model Jew, obedient to the will of God.

The infancy gospels, read without prejudice, attest that the marriage between Mary and Joseph was a valid marriage, although virginal, within which Joseph played the role of Jesus' putative father. The apocrypha, in the absence of historic information, pursue the reconstruction of imaginative data; their doctrinal contributions do not modify what is recorded in the NT. The information provided by the Protevangelium of James,* even if it could in theory be based on real facts, pursues two clearly identified goals: exalting the virginal maternity of Mary and reducing the role of Joseph to a representative of Mary and Jesus before the law (Protevangelium of James, 9,13-19), despite putting him within the story of salvation. The apocrypha which contain details concerning Joseph divide into two categories: on the one hand, the Gospel of Philip (17,91) and the Acts of Pilate (2,3-4; 16,2) gather beliefs widespread in late Judaism and consider Joseph the natural father of Jesus; on the other, the History of Joseph the Carpenter and the Protevangelium of James defend the virginal maternity of Mary and present the marriage of Mary and Joseph in a broad sense. Joseph, because a virtuous man, died very old (History of Joseph the Carpenter 15,1). Of the place of death and burial there is no trace. Other information is given by the apocryphal literature, but it is difficult to distinguish a real historical memory from a Christian midrash, and frequently the results are disappointing.

Nevertheless, for understanding certain passages of the Fathers and artistic expressions they cannot be neglected. The thought of the Fathers follows the evangelical data but is partially conditioned by the accounts of the apocrypha. Although no Father dedicated a work to the figure of Joseph, they have nonetheless left interesting observations. In the first centuries the preeminent effort was to explain the marriage of Joseph with Mary (Jer., Comm. in Matth. 1,18) and the phrase "brothers of the Lord," said by some to be sons of Joseph from a prior marriage (see Protevangelium of James, 17; 18; Epiph., Haer. 27,7; 78,9), by others to be cousins of the Lord (Jer., Adversus Helvidium 19; Pet. Chrysol., Sermo 48,4; 49,4). *Augustine, appealing to Roman law, said that there was a true marriage between Mary and Joseph, because consent is its root (De cons. evan. II, 12,2; De nupt. et conc. I, 11,12; Sermo 51; cf. Ambr., De inst. virg. 6,41); *Hilary, *Jerome and others called it nominal, others considered it legal and still others only putative. All, however, agreed in affirming that Joseph lived in a chaste marriage with Mary (see Jer., Comm. in Matth. 12,49-50; Adv. Helv. 19). *Maximus of Turin expressed himself very clearly: "Joseph was the spouse of Mary, not the husband" (Sermo 53; PL 57, 639). When commenting or referring to the infancy gospels, the Fathers compared the figure of Joseph to Jacob, to the apostles who brought Christ to the gentiles, to the pastors of the church. As an earthly craftsman he recalls the craftsman of the Word, the heavenly Father (Pet. Chrysol., Sermo 48,3; 49,4. Anonymous, Narratio de rebus Persicis: PG 10, 101; ed. E. Bratke, TU 19,3, 1899, 12). Among Syriac Fathers, *Aphraates observes that Joseph transmitted to Jesus not the biological paternity but the paternity which came to him from Adam made valuable by the blessing of God (Demonstratio XXIII, 20: PS II, 64-65); *Jacob of Sarug interpreted his role as putative father, as a personal minister of God and as a screen for the virginity of Mary (C. Vona, Omelie mariologiche di Giacomo di Sarug, Rome 1953, 145-146, 214, 220-221, 260-261). *Ephrem emphasized that Joseph did not doubt the innocence of Mary because of her imperturbable serenity, of her prior purity and of the reception she received from Elizabeth (Commentaire de l'Évangile concordant ou Diatessaron, SC 121, 1966, 65-613). After Augustine in the West and *Basil in the East, interest in the figure of Joseph increased. In the Middle Ages it enjoyed a notable development aimed at exalting his dedication to Mary and Jesus. Walafrid Strabo considered the Holy Family as a soteriological unity: "The shepherds found Mary, Joseph and the child: by means of these three the world was saved" (In Lucam 2,16). Bernard of Clairvaux took up an idea of *Peter Chrysologus that sketched a parallel between Joseph of the OT (Gen 39:40-41) and Joseph of the NT and discovered in the marriage with Mary a symbol of the marriage of the humanity of Christ with the church (Sermo 146). He developed it and completed the intuition right down to the details (Homilia secunda super "Missus est").

Cath 6, 970-979; BS VI, 1251-1287; DSp 7, 1289-1323; T. Stramare, Figlio di Giuseppe di Nazareth: Problemi dell'infanzia di Gesù, Rovigo 1972; Id., Giuseppe "uomo giusto" in Mt 1,18-25: RivBib 21 (1975) 287-300; X. Léon Dufour, L'annuncio a Giuseppe, in Studi sui Vangeli, Milan 1967, 85-108; G. Giamberardini, S. Giuseppe nella tradizione copta, Il Cairo 1966; E. Peretto, Ricerche su Mt 1-2, Rome 1970; S. Giuseppe nei primi quindici secoli della Chiesa. Atti primo simposio int. proclamazione di S. Giuseppe patrono della chiesa universale (Roma 29 XI–6 XII 1970) Rome 1971; A. Salas, La Infancia de Jésus (Mt 1-2). ¿Historia o teología?, Madrid 1976; T. Egidio López, San José en los dos primeros capítulos de Mateo y Lucas: Marianum 37 (1975) 537-539; B. Bagatti, Historia Josephi Fabri lignarii e ricerche sulla sua origine, Jerusalem 1978; L. Cignelli, Le saint Joseph des judéo-chrétiens: Cahiers de Joséphologie 28 (1980) 197-212; G.M. Bertrand - G. Ponton, Textes patristiques sur S. Joseph: Cahiers de Joséphologie 3-10 (1955-1965); G. Stramare, Giuseppe nella S. Scrittura, nella Teologia e nel culto, Casale Monf. 1983; Id., S. Giuseppe nel mistero di Dio, Casale Monf. 1992; Id., Gesù lo chiamò padre. Rassegna storico-dottrinale su San Giuseppe, Vatican City 1997.

E. Peretto

II. Iconography. In the decorative repertory of Christianity's first centuries the figure of Joseph occurs rather infrequently. The path of his iconography presents a development parallel to that of Marian iconography. Like Mary, Joseph too in fact enters into the iconographic repertory in scenes of the infancy cycle of the Lord and in christological scenes that glorify the incarnation of the Logos and the kingship of the Savior. In these representations the Virgin appears only as the mother of Christ, just as Joseph is represented as a providential element in the economy of redemption and later as spouse and putative father in the image of the Holy Father spread by the apocryphal narratives. Like that of Mary the iconography of Joseph undergoes a change, later, with the Council of *Ephesus (431) and the proclamation of the parthenogenesis. Mary is then exalted as the Queen of Virgins, as *Theotokos and, as such, she is represented seated on a regal and jeweled throne, taking the place of Christ at the center of the apsidal dome. No analogous development for Joseph corresponds to this development of Marian iconography. Joseph's role is preserved as participant, a role almost complementary to that of Mary, even if iconographically important.

There are numerous artworks in which the image of Joseph appears. Ignoring the chronology of the monuments and turning to the succession of the episodes based on the account of the gospels and the apocryphal sources, and particularly from the Arabic History of Joseph the Carpenter from the end of the 4th c. (B. Bagatti, Historia Josephi fabri lignarii e ricerche sulla sua origine, Jerusalem 1978) we mention the following:

1. Dream and betrothal with Mary, presented in succession, e.g., on the front of the sarcophagus of Le Puy (France) from the end of the 4th c. (Ws 26,1) and together on a sarcophagus cover of Arles (Ws 20,1). The mosaic of the triumphal arch of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome, carried out during the pontificate of *Sixtus III (432–440), presents, on the contrary, in a single composition the scene of the Annunciation and that of the exhortation to Joseph, represented not asleep on a rock or stretched on a bed, as in the usual iconography, but standing in front of his house with the virgula brevissima in hand, which, acc. to the apocrypha (Protevangelium of James, VIII; Ps.-Matthew, VIII), miraculously flowered to show him that he should take Mary as wife (C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956, pls. 49-52). The only painting with a representation of the dream, found at Deir-abu-Hennis (Egypt) (X. Leon Dufour, L'annuncio a Giuseppe, in Studi sui Vangeli, Milan 1967, 85-108), should be dated in the 5th c. A panel of the ivory throne of Maximian at Ravenna offers, in the 6th c., the last example of the scene of the dream (C. Cecchelli, La cattedra di Massimiano ed altri avori romano-orientali, Rome 1936, 156ff., pl. XXIV).

2. Trial by bitter water with Mary as protagonist, which appears starting from the 6th c. next to other scenes of apocryphal inspiration exclusively in ivory relief, examples of which should be noted in the panel of the already cited throne of Maximian, in which, in addition to Mary and Joseph, an angel appears (Cecchelli, La cattedra, op. cit., 154f., pl. XXIII), in the Evangeliarium of Ečmiadzin (W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des Frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1976, n. 142 pl. 75) and in an ivory from the Uwaroff Collection in Moscow, in which Mary and Joseph are represented in front of a well (Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, op. cit., n. 130, pl. 68).

3. Trial by bitter water with Joseph as protagonist, of which the representation of the Ravenna sarcophagus of the prophet Elisha or Pignatta, from the beginning of the 5th c., is unique (P. Testini, Su una discussa figurazione del sarcofago detto del profeta Eliseo o Pignatta, in FR 113-114 [1977] 319-337, fig. 1).

4. Journey to Bethlehem, represented on the basis of the account in the apocryphal sources, of which we know different versions: a picture from Deir-abu-Hennis (Egypt) from the 5th c. (H. Leclercq, s.v. Antinoe: DACL 1, 2349, fig. 599), a fresco of Bawit (J. Clédat, s.v. Baouit: DACL 2, 244) and five ivories of the 6th c. (Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, op. cit., nn. 128, 142, 145, 174, pls. 67, 75, 77, 88), among which there is a panel of the already-mentioned throne of Maximian at Ravenna, where Mary, whose advanced pregnancy is rendered realistically, affectionately embraces Joseph's shoulders with one arm (Cecchelli, La cattedra, op. cit., 154f., pl. XXIV). Other than Jesus and Mary, the donkey also appears in these representations, on which the Virgin makes the trip; sometimes—e.g., on the Ravenna throne—an angel is also present.

5. Nativity. This is the scene which offers the greatest number of images of Joseph, although the putative father of Jesus does not appear in the representations of this period with great frequency. The identification with Joseph as the young figure dressed in an exomis, sometimes with a baculus, represented behind the Virgin—as in the sarcophagus of St. Trophime at Arles (Ws 242,1)—or behind the hut with a sickle in his hands—as in the sarcophagus of St. Celsus, in Milan (Ws 243,6)—does not appear sufficiently grounded: the dress, gestures and attributes of these figures would lead, if anything, to prefer their identification as shepherds. The oldest certain representations of Joseph in Nativity scenes are shown on ivories datable to the 1st half of the 5th c., a plaque located within the Victoria and Albert Museum in London and a diptych of the Treasury of the Cathedral of Milan (Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, op. cit., n. 118-119, pls. 62-63), in which Joseph appears in work clothes, an exomis, seated on a block, with a saw in hand; sometimes thoughtful, as in a pyx of Werden (Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, op. cit., n. 169, pl. 86), on two bronze Syro-Palestinian thuribles of the 7th c. (A. St. Clair, in Age of Spirituality, ed. K. Weitzmann, New York 1979, 626-627, n. 563, 564) and on some ampoules from Bobbio and from Monza (A. Grabar, Ampoules de Terre Sainte [Monza, Bobbio], Paris 1958). More rarely Joseph is shown standing next to the child, as in a panel of the throne of Maximian (Cecchelli, La Cattedra, op. cit., 160, pl. 25) and in a miniature of the Syriac Evangeliarium of Rabbula (Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., 54f.).

6. Presentation in the temple, the only surviving representation of which is offered by the mosaic of the triumphal arch in the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome. Joseph is portrayed next to Mary, pointing out to her the prophetess Anna and the elder Simeon, who is approaching to receive the child in hands veiled with the pallium in sign of reverence (Cecchelli, I mosaici, op. cit., 219, pls. 53-58).

7. Adoration of the magi, a scene in which Joseph's certain presence, at least until the 6th c., is recognizable in only two monuments (in which he is shown as an old man, bearded, in a tunic and pallium): (1) a panel of the already-cited throne of Maximian, in which only a part of the scene appears, since the adjacent panel with the figures of the magi has been lost (Cecchelli, La Cattedra, op. cit., 162, pl. 26) and (2) a representation of the ivory diptych of Ečmiadzin (Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, op. cit., n. 142, pl. 375). Just as in the case of the young and beardless figure present in some representations of the Nativity, not a few doubts remain about the identification of Joseph as the figure, sometimes bearded, represented behind the seat of the Virgin in scenes of the adoration of the magi present on some sarcophagi, such as the so-called dogmatic sarcophagus of the Museo Pio Cristiano (Ws 96) or the sarcophagus of St. *Ambrose in Milan (Ws 188,2). Completely unacceptable, however, is the identification with Joseph of the figure shown behind Mary in the inscription of Severa in the Museo Pio Cristiano (E. Kirschbaum, Eine vergessene altchristliche Gemme und das Epitaph der Severa: RivAC 42 [1966] 189-200): pointing to a star qualifies it as an image of a prophet, not traceable to a historical figure, but a personification of the very concept of prophecy. In later representations of the adoration of the magi, as in the mosaic formerly in the chapel of John VII (705–707) of the old St. Peter's in the Vatican (G. Matthiae, Mosaici medievali delle chiese di Roma, Rome 1967, fig. 132) or in a fresco, contemporaneous, of S. Maria Antiqua (G. Matthiae, Pittura romana del Medioevo. Secoli IV-X, scientific update ed. by M. Andaloro, I, Rome 1967, fig. 81) the image of Joseph appears very similar to that of the Ravenna throne.

8. Warning to flee to Egypt, only hypothetically identified in a representation found in the triumphal arch of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome, because of the damage to the mosaic (Cecchelli, I mosaici, op. cit., 220ff.; pl. 53).

9. Flight into Egypt. A very rare episode in the Christian art of the first millennium and, furthermore, when the Child is not represented, very difficult to distinguish from the journey to Bethlehem; among the few certain representations are (1) that of a golden case from Adana, of the 6th–7th c., in which Mary and Joseph appear haloed, and the goal of their voyage, Egypt, is clearly indicated by an inscription (D. Talbot Rice, Arte di Bisanzio, Florence 1959, fig. 66, 1), (2) that of a bronze plaque in the State Museums of Berlin (W.F. Volbach, Einige Neuerwerbungen der frühchristslichen Sammlung, in Amtliche Berichte aus den Königlichen Kunstsammlungen 38 [917], 230ff., fig. 74) and (3) that of the mutilated fresco of S. Maria Antiqua, from the period of John VII (705–707) (Matthiae, Pittura, op. cit., 110).

10. Adoration of Aphrodisius, the pictorial translation of an episode from the flight into Egypt acc. to ps.-Matthew (XXII-XXIV), identifiable in a scene of the mosaic in the triumphal arch of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome, which is unique in Christian iconography (Cecchelli, I mosaici, op. cit., 235, pl. 53).

P. Testini, Alle origini dell'iconografia di Giuseppe di Nazareth: RivAC 48 (1972) 271-347 (with prior bibl.); TIP 196-198.

M. Marinone

JOSEPH HAZZAYA (8th c.). Monastic author of the 8th c. who represents, along with *John of Dalyatha, the culmination of the mystical tradition of the Eastern church. For Joseph "the Seer," an extremely erudite monk, recapitulates this entire tradition in a truly systematic way, while John of Dalyatha constitutes its highest experiential and poetical expression. Almost everything known of the life of Joseph derives from a short biography, written by *Nestorius of Beth Nuhadra and included by *Isho'dnah of Basra in his Book of Chastity. Born between 710 and 713 in a Zoroastrian family of the city Nimrod, at the age of seven years Joseph was captured by the troops of the caliph Omar (717–720), who occupied Nimrod, and then sold as a slave, first to an Arab, and then to a Christian of Beth Nuhadra. The life of the monks of the monastery of John of Kamul—close to the village where his master lived—induced the boy to become a Christian. His master freed him, which allowed him to enter the monastery of Abba Sliba in Beth Nuhadra. Later, he lived as a hermit in the mountains of Beth Qardu until he took on twice—in periods interrupted by a further retreat into solitude on Mt. Zinai in Adiabene—the charge of superior in two monasteries, that of Mar Bassima and that of Rabban Boktisho. At the synod of 786–787, called by the catholicos *Timothy I (779–823), Joseph was censured on multiple points of his teaching, but it is not clear if he was still alive at that point. It seems, however, that he was later removed from his monastery, and that would be confirmed by the fact that he was not buried there, but in the monastery of Mar Atqen.

According to some sources Joseph's literary production was enormous: almost 1,900 texts have been attributed to him, only some of which have reached us. For unknown reasons he put some of his works under the name of his brother 'Abdisho', who had also become a Christian and a monk. His Letter on the Three Steps of the Spiritual Life is important; a long and a short form exist, and it has often been unjustly attributed to *Philoxenus of Mabbug. Parts of his Chapters of Knowledge have reached us which included 27 centuries and a long treatise On the Nature of the Divine Essence, while his commentaries on *Evagrius, ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, Abba

Isaiah and writings attributed to *Gregory of Nazianzus seem to be lost, as also his sermons, a Paradise of the Oriental Fathers, a monastic and ecclesiastic history of Persia and some exegetical writings. This incomplete list permits us already to see the breadth of Joseph's works, which beyond the above-named authors was also influenced by Antiochene theologians such as *Diodore of Tarsus and *Theodore of Mopsuestia, by texts of the first monastic generations such as the letters of *Ammonas and the writings of *John the Solitary (of Apamea), as also by more recent authors such as *Isaac of Nineveh and *Simon of Taybutheh.

Essentially, Joseph was a hermit who wrote for hermits, even when he lived in community. Despite his great erudition, his writings are not learned treatises, but the result of his spiritual guidance. Thus his Book of Questions and Answers is written in the form of a dialogue between teacher and student (a very popular literary genre in the Syriac monastic world) which probably constitutes a faithful reflection of his relationship with his disciples. We also find this personalized style in his letters, which always answer precise questions. Only his Chapters on Knowledge, which Joseph considered his main work, have a much more technical character and are more difficult to understand. This fact, then, pushed him to write the Letter on the Three Steps of the Spiritual Life, which constitutes a summary of his entire spiritual experience. Essentially, his vision of the spiritual life is based on the triple scheme first developed three centuries earlier by John of Apamea, which Joseph modifies to incorporate elements taken from other authors, above all from Evagrius.

Editions and translations: Īšōʿdnaḥ of Basrā, Liber castitatis, see P. Bedjan, Liber Superiorum seu historia monastica auctore Thoma, episcopo Margensi, Paris-Leipzig 1901, 437-517 (Ger. tr. in G. Bunge, Rabban Jausep Hazzaya); A. Mingana, Early Christian Mystics (Woodbrooke Studies VII), Cambridge 1934, 262-281 (text) and 148-184 (Eng. tr.): four mystical treatises under the name ʿAbdīšōʿ, 256-261 (text) and 178-184 (Eng. tr.): the "fifth letter"; R. Beulay, La collection des lettres de Jean de Dalyatha (PO 39/3), Turnhout 1978, Appendice II, 500-521 (ed. and tr. of letters 48-49 of the epistolary corpus of John, which should be attributed to Joseph); G. Bunge, Rabban Jausep Hazzaya. Briefe über das geistliche Leben. Ostsyrische Mystik des 8. Jahrhunderts (Sophia. Quellen östlicher Theologie 21), Trier 1982 (general intr. and tr. annotated with some important writings, including unpublished ones); P. Harb - F. Graffin, Joseph Hazzaya. Lettre sur les trois étappes de la vie monastique (PO 45/2), Turnhout 1992; E. Khalifé- Hachem, Deux textes du Pseudo-Nil identifiés: Melto 5 (1969) 17-59 (ed. and tr. of a version, still partial, but larger of the "fifth letter"); DSpir 8, 1341-1349; Duval, 227-228; Bettiolo, Lineamenti, 595-598; Patrologia V, 489ff.; R. Beulay, La lumière sans forme. Introduction à l'étude de la mystique chrétienne syro-orientale, Chevetogne 1986, passim.

K. den Biesen

JOSEPH of Arimathea (apocrypha). Joseph of Arimathea, mentioned only four times in the gospels (Mt 21:57; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:50; Jn 19:38), became an important figure in the apocrypha. From the 2nd part of the Acts of Pilate (11-16) and the apocryphal History of Joseph of Arimathea, we learn that he was arrested by the Jews and miraculously liberated by Christ himself on the morning of the resurrection. According to another text in Georgian (there are translations in Greek and Latin) Joseph was the founder of a church in Lydda. According to medieval legends he gathered the blood of Christ in the Holy Grail and was one of the apostles to *Gaul.

CANT 76-77, cf. 62; BHG 779r. AASS, Mai 2, 507-510; Tischendorf 459-470; Santos Otero 495-506 (with Sp. tr.). Translations (Greek Narratio): Engl.: Elliott 217-222 (frg.); It.: Erbetta 2, 397-401; Moraldi 1, 683-692; Craveri 401-409; Pol.: Starowieyski 1/2, 647-653, 739-747. Translations (Georgian Narratio): Fr.: M. van Esbroeck: Bedi Kartlisa 35 (1977) 108-131; Ger.: T. Kluge: OrChr 4 (1914) 24-48; A. Harnack, in SPAW 1901, 920-931. R. Gounelle, À propos d'une refonte de la "Narratio Iosephi" jadis confondue avec les "Acta Pilati," et d'un drame religieux qu'elle a inspiré: Apocrypha 5 (1994) 165-188; N. Tchkhivadzé, Une traduction géorgienne d'un original perdu: l'histoire de l'apocryphe de l'Église de Lydda: Apocrypha 8 (1997) 179-191.

M. Starowieyski

JOSEPH THE CARPENTER, History of. A kind of panegyric of his putative father delivered by Jesus to his disciples on the Mount of Olives. Written probably in Greek (text lost) at the end of the 4th c.; the Coptic translation (Bohairic, fragments in Sahidic) comes from the 6th–7th c.; it exists further in an Arabic and Ethiopian translation. The apocryphal text was composed in Egypt and demonstrates the birth of the cult of Joseph; it further constitutes an interesting example of popular piety and hagiography. The text, in 32 chapters, can be divided into two parts: the first discusses the events prior to the birth of Jesus and his childhood (the text is based on the Protevangelium of James); the second part is dedicated to the illness, death and burial of Joseph (transitus); in the latter part many Jewish-Christian concepts regarding eschatology are present. The History of Joseph is the only apocryphal text dedicated to St. Joseph and one of the rare patristic texts which mentions him; it is, finally, a witness to a certain veneration of St. Joseph in Egypt. This apocryphal text, translated into *Latin only in the 17th c. (Wallin), was already known by Isidore of Solanis (16th c.).

CANT 60; BHO 532; BHL 1, 660; BS 6, 1251-1292; LCIK 7, 210-221; Bisconti 196-198; var. aus., Joseph, DSp 8, 1974, 1289-1308.

Editions: Coptic text: P. de Lagarde, Aegyptiaca, Göttingen 1883, 1-37; T. Lefort: Muséon 66 (1953) 206-223; Arabic: A. Battista - B. Bagatti, Edizione critica del testo arabo della "Historia Iosephi fabri lignarii" e ricerche sulla sua origine, Jerusalem 1978 (with It. tr.); Ethiopian: E. Isaak: Journal of Studies Ps. Epigr. 6 (1990) 3-125 (with Eng. tr.). Translations: Eng.: Elliott 111-117 (frg.); It.: Erbetta 1,2, 186-205; Moraldi 1, 313-352; A. Battista - B. Bagatti, see editions; Craveri 227-260; Fr.: P. Peeters, in Évangiles apocryphes, 1, Paris 1924, 191-245; T. Lefort, see above; Lat.: Tischendorf 122-139; Pol.: T. Hergesel, in Starowieyski 1/559-577, 882-883.; Sp.: Santos Otero 333-352; Ger.: Morenz, see below; Schneider 272-283. J. Seitz, Die Verehrung d. hl. Joseph in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung bis zum Konzil von Trient dargestellt, Freiburg 1908; G. Klameth, Über die Herkunft der apokryphen "Geschichte Josephs des Zimmermanns": Angelos 3 (1938) 6-31; S. Morenz, Die Geschichte von Joseph dem Zimmermann: TU 56 (1951) (cf. P. Devos: AB 70 [1952] 282-285); T. Lefort, À propos de l'"Histoire de Joseph le Charpentier": Muséon 66 (1953) 201-223; M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, 2, Milan 1955, 338-341; G. Giamberardini, San Giuseppe nella tradizione copta, Il Cairo 1966 = Saint Joseph dans la tradition copte: Cahiers de Joséphologie 17 (1969); P. Gauthier, La Vierge Marie d'après l'"Histoire de Joseph le Charpentier," in De primordiis cultus mariani, 4, Rome 1970, 353-369; M. Canal Sánchez, S. José en los libros apócrifos de NT, in San Giuseppe nei primi 15 secoli, Rome 1971, 123-149; B. Bagatti, Il culto di S. Giuseppe in Palestina: Cahiers de Joséphologie 19 (1973) 564-573; F. Manns, Le portrait de Joseph dans l'Histoire de Joseph le Charpentier, in Id., Essais sur le Judéo-Christianisme, Jerusalem 1977, 94-105.

M. Starowieyski

JOSEPH the HEBREW (iconography). Favorite son of the patriarch Jacob and of Rachel (Gen 37; 39–48; 50). Already in *Tertullian he was seen as a prefiguration of Christ, because he was sold by his brothers as Christ was by a disciple (Adv. Marc. III, 18: PL 2, 346). The comparison returns later in *Ambrose (De Joseph Patriarcha: PL 14, 641), in *Cyril of Alexandria (Glaphyra in Gen. VI: PG 69, 283f.) and in *John Chrysostom (Homil. 62 in Gen.: PG 54, 532-540). Rarely shown as an isolated image, he always appears inserted in scenes from his very eventful life, narrated with a wealth of details. The most ancient iconographic attestation is found, around the middle of the 3rd c., in the pictures of the synagogue of *Dura Europos, in the scene of Jacob's blessing of his twelve sons (C.H. Kraeling, The Synagogue. The Excavations at Dura-Europos. Final report VIII, 1, New Haven, CT 1956, 221f., pls. XXXIV, LXXIV). At *Rome, around a century later, among the frescoes of a cubiculum in the anonymous catacomb in Via Dino Compagni, two episodes from the life of Joseph are found: the dreams (Gen 37:5-10) (Ferrua, Via Latina, 50, pl. XCVI) and the encounter with his brothers in Egypt (Gen 42:6-8) (Ferrua, Via Latina, 52, pl. XXI, 1); in the same cubiculum two other scenes are pictured which are linked with the story of Joseph: the blessing of Jacob of his grandsons Ephraim and Manasseh, the two sons of Joseph (Gen 48:1-20) (Ferrua, Via Latina, 50, pl. XXV) and the arrival of Jacob in Egypt (Gen 46) (Ferrua, Via Latina, 52, pl. XXVIII). On the lid of a Vatican *sarcophagus, from the middle of the 4th c., two events are shown from Joseph's tormented history: the extraction from the well and the sale to Ishmaelite merchants (Gen 37:28) and the sale of grain in Egypt (Gen 42:25) (Rep. n. 690); also on a sarcophagus lid preserved at Rome in the Palazzo Massimo the episode is present of the sale of Joseph to the merchants, with the bloody tunic resting conspicuously on the well (A. Recio Veganzones, Tapa de sarcófago con escenas de José en el Palacio Massimo de Roma: Antonianum 47 [1972] 431-454). Again the bloody tunic, in this case shown to Jacob, appears in the mosaic decoration of the cupola of the Centcelles mausoleum (A. Recio Veganzones, Il mausoleo di Centcelles [Tarragona] del 350-355 ca.: lettura ed interpretazione iconografica di alcune scene musive del registro "B" della cupola, in Domum tuam dilexi. Miscellanea in onore di A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 709-737).

In the decorative programs of houses of worship, dominated by representations of episodes of the OT and NT chosen to express the concept of the concordantia between the two testamentary covenants, acc. to the Paulinian expression in veteri novitas atque in novitate vetustas (Paul. Nola, Carm. 28, 175), scenes of Joseph's life must have been represented frequently, so as to constitute one of the best-attested biblical cycles, because of its richness in christological and ecclesial symbolism. Four episodes from the story of the patriarch, illustrated by as many tituli historiarum written by Ambrose, appeared among the scenes which decorated the basilica martyrum in *Milan (R. Pillinger, Die Tituli Historiarum, Vienna 1980, 31-34). Two episodes, commented on by the tituli of *Prudentius (Dyttochaeum, 6-7), were found among the OT scenes of a basilica of *Spain, probably from *Saragossa. Also at Nola, in the basilica of St. *Felix, acc. to the testimony of *Paulinus, incidents from Joseph's life were represented (D. Korol, Die frühchristlichen Wandmalereien aus den Grabbauten in Cimitile/Nola, Münster 1987). Basing himself probably on the decoration of the basilica of St. Apollinare at Ravenna, *Elpidius Rusticus, in the 1st half of the 6th c., composed a titulus on the concordantia between Joseph betrayed by his brothers and Christ betrayed by Judas. The tormented adventures of Joseph appeared among the stories of the OT painted on the walls of the central nave of the basilica of the three emperors of S. Paolo furi le Mura, which can be assigned to the intervention of *Leo I (440–461), vanished today but transmitted by watercolors of the 17th c. (M. Guj, La concordia Apostolorum nell'antica decorazione di San Paolo fuori le mura, in Ecclesiae Urbis. Atti del Convegno Internazionale di Studi sulle Chiese di Roma, III, Vatican City 2002, 1873f.). Episodes of the life of Joseph appear among the mosaics of the middle aisle of S. Maria Maggiore (C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956, 143). A mosaic of the basilica of S. Maria di Cami at Majorca, of the 5th–6th c., offers the only surviving testimony in a house of worship to a scene of Joseph, who is here clearly identified by an inscription with his name (P. de Palol, Arqueología cristiana de la España romana, siglos IV-VI, Madrid-Valladolid 1967, 214f., pl. 36).

A very detailed history with various episodes from the patriarch's life is represented on ten splendid panels of the ivory throne of *Maximian at *Ravenna, from the *Justinian era (C. Cecchelli, La cattedra di Massimiano ed altri avorii romano-orientali, Rome 1936, 111-149, pl. XVII-XXI). Individual episodes decorate, then, a number of ivory objects dating between the 5th and 6th c. (see, e.g. W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1976, n. 172, 191, pl. 54, 57). The scene shown on a ceramic plate of the 4th c. in provenance from Tunisia is unique, with Joseph besieged by the wife of Potiphar (Gen 39:12) (G. Vikan, in Age of Spirituality: Late Antique and Early Christian Art: Third to Seventh Century, New York 1979, 464, n. 415), as is that of a marble fragment from the martyrium of *Seleucia, from the end of the 5th to the beginning of the 6th c., with the patriarch in prison who interprets the dreams of the cupbearer and baker of the king (Gen 40:7-18) (ibid., 465, n. 416). The cycle of Joseph's life is frequently found represented, between the 5th and 7th c., in MSS as well, among which are the Vienna Genesis, particularly rich in episodes (H.L. Kessler, in Age of Spirituality, op. cit., 458, n. 410), the Cotton Bible, the Ashburnham Pentateuch, the Vatican Greek Octateuchs 746 and 747; and in textile, as, e.g., in the Coptic Golenischev (J. Strzygowski, Orient oder Rom, Leipzig 1900, 113, fig. 44) or in the one, perhaps of Antiochene provenance, on which three episodes of the patriarch's story are shown (G. Vikan, in Age of Spirituality, op. cit., 462, n. 413).

DACL 7, 2643ff.; EC 6, 790-791; G. von Rad, Die Joseph Geschichte, Neukirchen 1954; BS 6, 1245ff.; RBK 3, 655ff. In particular for the iconography: C. Cecchelli, La cattedra di Massimiano ed altri avorii romano-orientali, Rome 1936, 111ff., LCI 2, 423ff.; A. Recio Veganzones, Tapa de sarcófago con escenas de José en el Palacio Massimo de Roma: Antonianum 47 (1972) 431-454; A. Recio Veganzones, Il mausoleo di Centcelles (Tarragona) del 350-355 ca.: lettura ed interpretazione iconografica di alcune scene musive del registro "B" della cupola, in Domum tuam dilexi. Miscellanea in onore di A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 709-737; TIP 198-200.

M. Marinone

JOSHUA

I. Typology of the Joshua cycle - II. Iconography.

I. Typology of the Joshua cycle. The typology of Joshua-Jesus, common among the Fathers, is founded above all on the perfect homonymy of the two personages (Heb. Jehoshua; Gr. Ἰησοῦς). Implicit already in Heb 4:8-14 (where, however, there is the opposition between Joshua, "who did not enter into repose," and Jesus, "who penetrated into the heavens"), it occurs for the first time explicitly in Epist. Barn. 12,8, and has the largest and most successful development, in anti-Jewish polemic, in *Justin (Dial. 75,1-3; 89,1; 113,1-7) and in *Origen (Hom. Jos.), for whom Joshua, who succeeds Moses and introduces Israel into the Promised Land, is a type of Jesus, who replaces Moses, and of the gospel, which succeeds the law and introduces the new spiritual Israel into eternal salvation, to which the law was not able to lead (in parallel, the death of Moses is seen as a symbol of the abrogation of the law, now dead: Orig., Hom. Jos. 1,3; 2,1). An analogous interpretation can be found in *Cyprian (Testim. 2,21), *Tertullian (Adv. Marc. 3,15; 3,18; 4,7; Adv. Iud. 9 and 10), *Irenaeus (Demonstr. 40), *Eusebius (HE 1,3 and Demonstr. evang. 4,17), *Lactantius (Div. Inst. 4,7), *Hilary (Tract. myst. 2,6), *Augustine (Contr. Faust. 12,32), *Jerome (Ep. 53), *Prudentius (Cath. 12,169) etc. In the Hom. Jos. of Origen, the tropological or psychological interpretation also occupies a notable place, acc. to which Joshua, who leads Israel to victory defeating kingdoms, cities and enemies, is a type for Jesus, who guides the soul to the spiritual victory over the vices and passions (Hom. Jos. 1,7; 9,1; 13,1-4).

The book of Joshua offers the Fathers the opportunity for another apt typology: that of Rahab and her house as a type of the church, and of the scarlet ribbon hung from her window (as a sign for the Hebrews, who had to save only the house of Rahab in the destruction of Jericho) as a type for the salvific blood of Christ. We have the most ancient witness to this typology in *Clement of Rome (Cor. 12): "The hospitable Rahab having received the spies, she hid them . . . and they indicated to her a signal: to hang from her house a scarlet ribbon. Obviously they did this because by means of the blood of the Lord there would be redemption to all those who believe and hope in God." Later the same typology is taken up by Justin (Dial. 111,3-4), who develops it by comparing the scarlet ribbon of Rahab to the blood of the paschal Lamb, sprinkled by the Hebrews on the lintels of the doors in Egypt in order that it serve as a signal to the devastating angel. This too was a type of the salvific blood of Christ. Later it was further developed by Irenaeus (Adv. haer. IV, 20,12) and Origen (Hom. Jos. 3,4-5), who add, alongside the christological typology (scarlet ribbon = blood of Christ), the ecclesiological one (Rahab as type of the church). For Irenaeus the three spies hosted by Rahab are a figure of the three persons of the *Trinity; for Origen the house of Rahab, the only one which is saved with its inhabitants in the total destruction of Jericho, is a type of the church, outside of which there is no salvation; the same interpretation is in Cyprian (De unit. eccl. 8 and Ep. 69,4). The ecclesiological interpretation is thus oriented in an eschatological sense: Jericho becomes a type of this world and the destruction of Jericho a type of the end of the world and the last judgment, when only the church (the house of Rahab) will be saved. This interpretation, already present in Origen and Cyprian, was extensively developed with millenaristic overtones by *Hilary (Tract. Myst. 11,9-10) and later by *Gregory of Elvira (Tract. Orig. 12,9-26) with a comparison of the house of Rahab to the ark of Noah, which only was saved in the flood, this too a figure of the unique salvation within the church. It is significant that both in the ecclesiological and in the eschatological interpretation the background christological typology is present, of the scarlet ribbon as a type of the blood of Christ. A rapid and dense synthesis of the three interpretations (christological, ecclesiological, eschatological), which reveals the contemporary use and influence of the preceding patristic sources, is found in *Paulinus of Nola (Carm. XXVI, 132-149). Later writers (Caes. of Arles, Serm. 116; Fulg. of Ruspe, De remiss. pecc. 20-21) up to the medievals (Pasc. Radb., Expos. in Matth. I, 1; Rup. of Deutz, Comm. in Jos. 10 etc.) prefer to emphasize the ecclesiological typology. The complex typological significance of the entire episode of Rahab is nevertheless univocal and constant among all the interpreters: it signifies that salvation can be obtained only within the church and through the merits of the redeeming blood of Christ. To this interpretation Origen adds the psychological interpretation, rarely repeated later (Jer., Ep. 22,38; Caes. of Arles, Serm. 116), acc. to which the harlot Rahab is a figure of the sinful soul which lives in the vices and passions, until it opens to receive Jesus into itself (Hom. Jos. 1,4: spies of Joshua = the angels, messengers of Jesus).

Finally, in the ecclesiological typology, the theme of the casta meretrix is notable, which unites Rahab, a prostitute and not Hebrew, to other figures of prostitutes taken as types of the church, formed of Gentiles and ex-sinners. This theme, already implicit in Justin (Dial. 111,3-4), is specifically developed by Irenaeus (Adv. haer. IV, 20,12, with an effective referral to Mt 21:31: "The publicans and the prostitutes will proceed you into the kingdom of God"), by Origen (Hom. Jos. 3,4; Rahab and the uxor fornicaria of Hosea as types of the church, in opposition to the synagogue), by Hilary (Tract. Myst. II, 5: again Rahab and the uxor fornicaria of Hosea united as in Origen), by Gregory of Elvira (Tract. Orig. 13: with comparison of Rahab to Mary Magdalene and again a citation of Mt 21:31), by Jerome (Comm. in Os., Prol.: the uxor fornicaria of Hosea, Rahab and the woman who anointed Jesus at Bethany, figura ecclesiae de peccatoribus congregatae) etc.

PL 219, 88 (Latin Fathers); F. Hummelauer, Josué, Paris 1903, 118-119; J. Daniélou, Rahab, figure de l'Église: Irénikon 22 (1949) 26-45; J. Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri, Paris 1950, 203-256; A. Jaubert, Origène. Homélies sur Josué (SC 71), Paris 1960, intr.; H.U. v. Balthasar, Casta meretrix: Sponsa Verbi, Brescia 1969, 189-283 (for Rahab more specifically 207-223); Josua-Rolle, Codex Vaticanus Pal. Graec. 431: facsimile (Codices e Vaticanis selecti 43), Graz 1983-1984 (commentary by O. Mazal); F. Langlamet, s.v. Rahab: DBS 9, 1079-1084; A.-M. La Bonnardière, Biblia Augustiniana. AT II, Livres historiques, Paris 1960; G. Otranto, La tipologia di Giosuè nel "Dialogo con Trifone ebreo" di Giustino: Augustinianum 15 (1975) 29-48; C. Nardi, Giosuè nel primo cristianesimo: Rivista di Ascetica e Mistica 23 (1982) 147-159; S. Leanza, Aspetti esegetici dell'opera di Paolino di Nola: Atti del Convegno nel XXXI cinquantenario della morte di s. Paolino di Nola (431-1981), Rome 1983, 67-91; R. Scognamiglio, Giosuè nell'esegesi dei Padri: Parole di Vita 31 (1986) 127-134; 221-229; 296-302; 357-364; 32 (1987) 144-151; 295-301; 372-377; J.A. Novotný, Les fragments exégétiques sur les livres de l'Ancien Testament d'Eusèbe d'Emèse: OCP 57 (1991) 27-67; R. Scognamiglio - M.I. Danieli, Origene, Omelie su Giosuè, Rome 1993; R. Scognamiglio, in Origene, Dizionario, Rome 2000, 195-197.

S. Leanza

II. Iconography. Scenes relating to the deeds of Joshua appear in the mosaics of the left wall of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome, dated by consensus to the middle of the 5th c. (WMM, pls. 21-27). The following episodes are shown there: the passage through the Jordan and the exploration of Jericho (Josh 2:1-22); the appearance of the angel to Rahab, who aids the spies (Josh 5:10-15); the destruction of Jericho and the ark carried by Levites (Josh 6:1-25); the conquest of the city of Ai (Josh 7:1-29); Joshua putting the Amorites to flight (Josh 10:1-12); the battle of Gibeon (Josh 10:12-14); Joshua punishing the rebel kings (Josh 10:15-17). Not too different, in their iconographic layout, are the 23 miniatures that figuratively comment on the so-called Scroll of Joshua (Vat. Palat. gr. 431), a 10th-c. copy of an archetype datable to the 6th c. This evokes the acts of the leader from Josh 2:15-16 to Josh 10, but must have included the entire story, given that the beginning and the end have been lost. The stylistic connotations, which relate it to the Genesis of Vienna, reveal a classical-Hellenistic stamp.

P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Il rotulo di Giosué. Cod. Vat. Palatino greco 431, riprodotto in fototipia e fotocromografia a cura della Biblioteca Vaticana, Milan 1905; C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Rome 1956; J. Wilpert - W.N. Schumacher, Die römischen Mosaiken der kirchlichen Bauten vom IV. bis XIII. Jahrhundert, Freiburg i.Br. [2]1976; K. Weitzmann, The Joshua Roll: A Work of the Macedonian Renaissance (Studies in Manuscript Illumination 3), Princeton, NJ 1948; J.G. Deckers, Der alttestamentliche Zyklus von S. Maria Maggiore in Rom, Bonn 1976; S. Spain, The Program of the Fifth Century Mosaics of Santa Maria Maggiore. Diss. in the Department of Fine Arts at New York University, 1968, Michigan City, IN 1990; C. Curci, TIP, 193-195.

F. Bisconti

JOSHUA the STYLITE, Chronicle of. Work by an author, probably *Edessan and miaphysite, written possibly between 510–520. The chronicle narrates "the history of the needy times which struck Edessa, Amida and all of Mesopotamia" in the years 495–506. J.S. Assemani indicates Joshua the Stylite, monk of the monastery of Zuqnin (a town near Amida) as the work's author (Bibliotheca Orientalis 1, 260-283). Indeed, toward the end of the 8th c., the chronicle was incorporated by a monk of that monastery into the so-called Chronicle of Zuqnin (or Chronicle of ps.-Dionysius of Tell-Mahre) as its fourth section. However, it seems clear that the author wrote his work in Edessa, and his possible relationship with the monastery of Zuqnin remains unknown.

Baumstark, 146; BO I, 260-283; Duval, 177-178; Patrologia V, 422; J.-B. Chabot, Chronique de Denys de Tell-Mahré, quatrième partie, in Bibliothèque de l'École des Hautes Études. Sciences philologiques et historiques, fasc. 112, Paris 1895 (Syriac text with Fr. tr.); J.-B. Chabot, Incerti auctoris chronicon pseudo-dionysianum vulgo dictum (CSCO 91 & 104), Paris 1927 & 1933, facs. ed. 1952-1953 (tr.: vols. 121 and 507); W. Wright, The Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite Composed in Syriac A.D. 507, Cambridge 1882 (Syriac text with Eng. tr.); H. Leclainche, Crises économiques à Édesse (494-506) d'après la chronique du ps. Josué le Stylite: Pallas. Annales: Université de Toulouse-Le Mirail 16 (1980) 89-100; A. Palmer, Who Wrote the Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite?, in Lingua restituta orientalis: Festgabe für J. Assfalg, Wiesbaden 1990, 272-284; A. Luther, Die syrische Chronik des Joshua Stylites, Berlin-New York 1997 (Ger. tr. with study).

K. den Biesen

JOVIAN, emperor (331–364). Roman emperor from 363 to 364. Proclaimed Augustus by the army, after the death of *Julian (26 June 363), he made peace with the Persians, whom his predecessor died fighting, a peace which *Ammianus Marcellinus (Hist. XXV, 7,13) judged shameful: for the Romans had to abandon five provinces beyond the Tigris, Nisibis and fortified places on the Mesopotamian border and in the neighboring zones. His religious policy was favorable to the Christians, while renouncing forms of intolerance against the pagans (from whom he even received praises; see Themistius, Or. 5,67; Or. 7). He restored to the church privileges abrogated by Julian and concerned himself with the unity of the Christian faith divided between *Athanasians and anti-Athanasians, desiring as much peace and concord as possible. He died in Bithynia, after only a few months of rule, 17 February 364; he was born in Moesia in 331.

O. Seeck: PWK 9, 2006-2011; A. Nagl: PWK 7, A 2, 2198ff.; E. Stein - J.-R. Palanque, Histoire du Bas-Empire, Paris-Bruges 1959, I, 170-172; 186-7; G. Bardy: Fliche-Martin III, 1, 310-313; P. de Labriolle, ibid., 236-237; S. Mazzarino, L'Impero romano, III, Bari 1973, 725ff.; G. Wirth, in Vivarium. Festschrift Th. Klauser: JbAC 11, 353-384; A. Demandt, in Handbuch Altertumswiss, 3, 6 (1989) 109ff.; H.-U. Rosenbaum: BBKL 2 (1992) 735-740; s.v. Iovianus: RAC 18 (1998) 811 and 820; P. Siniscalco, Gli imperatori romani e il cristianesimo nel IV secolo, in var. aus., Legislazione imperiale religione nel IV secolo, Rome 2000, 108-109.

P. Siniscalco

JOVINIAN (d. before 406). A monk who moved to *Rome (from N *Italy?). Vexed by the thesis of a particular reward due to virginity or fasting, he insisted on the identical baptismal grace in all and opened the question of merit, then that of the perpetual virginity (in partu) of Mary. He pushed consecrated virgins toward marriage. In 390 or a little later (Siricius, Ep. 7: PL 13, 1168-1172), the reaction of the monastic party, esp. of *Pammachius, the friend of *Jerome, led to the condemnation of a dozen friends of Jovinian. Invited to intervene in the debate, *Ambrose and one of his synods condemned Jovinian (PL 16, 1124-1129). Two polemical books Contra Iovinianum of Jerome (PL 25, 211-338), however, provoked scandal because of their exaggeration, and his letters 48-50 had to mitigate their effect. *Augustine (De bono coniugali and De sancta virginitate) would take up a more moderate position. It has been possible to point out the "evangelical" (ante literam) character of Jovinian's doctrine, but it is difficult to know it exactly, since his Commentarioli have been lost (frags. in W. Haller, Jovinianus, Leipzig 1897; cf. F. Valli, Gioviniano, Urbino 1954). Jovinian was exiled by *Honorius in 398.

DSp 8, 1469-1470; DIP 4, 1300-1301; BBKL 3, 740-742; Y.-M. Duval, L'affaire Jovinien. D'une crise de la société romaine à une crise de la pensée chrétienne à la fin du IV[e] et au début du V[e] siècle, Rome 2003.

J. Gribomont

JOVINUS (2nd half 4th c.). As magister equitum, in 361 he led a part of the army of the emperor *Julian in *Italy (*Ammianus Marcellinus, Rer. Gest. L., XXI, 8,3). He was later sent to Illyricum and was part of the commission of *Chalcedon which judged the crimes committed by functionaries of the emperor *Constantius. Julian transferred him in 362 to *Gaul with the charge of magister militum per Gallias—to Reims to be precise, a point of strategic importance, where Jovinus remained until 370. After Julian's death, he continued to serve the imperial cause under *Jovian and then under *Valentinian I; in 366 he fought the Alamanni with success (Amm. Marc., Rer. Gest. L., XXVII, 2,1-9) and was rewarded with the consulate (367). He built the church of St. Agricola at Reims, where a dedicatory inscription is preserved, located on his sarcophagus (MGH, Scriptores XIII, 419).

CPL 1486; DACL 7, 2745-2752; PLRE 1, 462-463; DNP 5, Flavius Iovinus 1, 1094.

G. Pilara

JUBILEE. The Levitical legislation concerning the jubilee year (Lev 25) found scarce echo in biblical-Hebrew literature. Apart from texts such as Is 61:1-2 (repeated in Lk 4:16-30), or 11Q Melchizedek, it is in reality only with Hellenistic Jewish authors such as *Philo of Alexandria and Flavius Josephus that the theme begins to receive ample and meaningful treatment. Philo in particular underlines in numerous texts that the jubilar remission (aphesis) of debts with the restoration of patrimonies to their legitimate owners is an act of justice and grand philanthrōpia (see, e.g., Congr. 89; Decal. 164; Virt. 97-100; Spec. leg. II, 86-123; Quaest. Gen. III, 39). Through the mystical *exegesis of the number fifty, which is at the same time the number of the Jubilee and the symbol of liberty (eleutheria), Philo then uses the liberty of the soul from sin (eleutheria) to delve into the jubilar theme, expressly linking the number fifty, symbol of purity and virginity, with the celebration of the Pentecost every fifty days on the part of the Therapeutes (see, e.g., Mut. nom. 228; Congr. 108-109; Quis rer. div. 273; Sacr. 122; Spec. leg. II, 176-178; Quaest. Gen. II, 5; Vita cont. 65; Vita Mos. 80). The word iobelos means liberty (eleutheria) also for Flavius Josephus (Ant. iud. III, 282-283).

Philo certainly influenced later Christian tradition. *Clement of Alexandria, in fact, also knows that the Jubilee puts forward every fifty years the same restitution of property prescribed by the law for the sabbatical year (Strom. II, 18,86,6). The relationship between Jubilee and Pentecost seems implicit in the exegesis of those who interpreted the fifty cubits of the breadth of Noah's ark as a symbol of hope and of remission (aphesis) in the Pentecost (Clem. Alex., Strom. VI, 11,87,2). Alongside this "Alexandrian" tradition, one must consider the "Syro-Asiatic" tradition represented in the 2nd c. by *Theophilus of Antioch. According to what *Jerome writes (Ep. 121 ad Algasiam 6), in the commentary on the Lukan parable of the unfaithful servant (Lk 16:1-8), Theophilus had affirmed that the number fifty is the particular number of penitents, acc. to the Jubilee and acc. to the Lukan parable of the two debtors to whom respectively five hundred and fifty denarii were remitted (Lk 7:41-42). The juxtaposition of the Jubilee—this would be the most ancient appearance of the word in a Christian text—with the Lukan parable of the two debtors reveals how the idea of Jubilee had been reinterpreted very early in the Asiatic environment, already in the course of the 2nd c., in a penitential sense, plausibly as part of the orthodox recovery of the OT legislation in the context of the anti-*Marcionite polemic. But it is only with *Origen that the articulated elaboration of a true and proper Christian theology of the Jubilee begins, in which both the preceding exegetical traditions find an adequate place. In numerous texts Origen dwells on the penitential interpretation of the number fifty and of the Hebrew Jubilee, the jubilar year in which is celebrated the remission of debts, i.e., of sins (see, e.g., Com. Ps. in PG 12, 1073 C-1076 B; De Princ. II, 11,5; De orat. 27,14; Hom. Gen. 2,5; Hom. Num. 5,2,2-3; 25,4; Com. Matth. XV, 31). The Hebrew Jubilee is for Origen the shadow, the prefiguration of the Christian Pentecost (see fr. in GCS 1/2, 138-139 and esp. Com. Matth. XI, 3). To explain the value of the number fifty, alongside numerous supporting biblical texts, Origen also turns to the parable of the two servants (Lk 7:41-42), the gospel passage which, not by chance, will return very frequently in later sources.

With Origen the foundations are laid for the later developments in different Greek and Latin Christian authors such as *Athanasius (Ep. fest. I), *Hilary of Poitiers (Instr. Psalm. 10-12; In Ps. 118, 3,7; 4,5; 5,6; 20,6), *Didymus the Blind (In Ps. 50, 1.2, par. 533), *Ambrose (De Noe 33,123; De Ioseph 3,14; Apol. David 8,41-42; In Ps. 118, 5,11; Exp. Luc. 3,16; 5,94; 8,23.25) and Jerome (Com. Amos II, 5,3; Com. Es. 16,58; Ep. 78,14). Numerous other exegetical and homiletic texts up to the 4th c. are worthy of note, such as *Basil, Ep. 260; *Gregory of Nazianzus, Or. 41,2; *Ambrosiaster, De Psalmo L; *Hesychius of Jerusalem, In Lev. VIII, 25; *Cyril of Alexandria, De adorat. XVII; Maximinus, Hom. VII in Pentecoste; *Eucherius of Lyons, Form. spir. int. 9; *Cassiodorus, Exp. Ps. 50, 21.

Above all, the passages of *Gregory the Great on the iubilaei requies, i.e., on the eschatological value, beyond the penitential and moral ones, of the Jubilee (see, e.g., Hom. Ez. II, 5,15; 7,4; Mor. Iob 16,55,68; 23,11,21; 35,8,16), would exercise a decisive influence on Medieval Latin exegesis, such as that of *Isidore of Seville (Etym. V, 37,3-4; VI, 18,4-5) and *Bede the Venerable (Hom. II, XVII dominica Pentecostes). In this way, through monastic mediation and biblical commentaries, one would arrive in AD 1300 to the institution of the first Christian Jubilee.

A systematic history of the interpretations of the Hebraic Jubilee in Antique and Medieval Christianity still remains to be written.

P.F. Beatrice, Il Giubileo ebraico nell'esegesi biblico-patristica e medievale, in I Giubilei nella storia della Chiesa. Atti del Congr. Int. 23-26 giugno 1999, Vatican City 2001, 11-29; D.P. O'Brien, A Comparison between Early Jewish and Early Christian Interpretations of the Jubilee Year, in M.F. Wiles - E.J. Yarnold (eds.), SP 34, Leuven 2001, 436-442; R. Quinto, Giubileo e attesa escatologica negli autori monastici e nei maestri della "Sacra Pagina": Medioevo 26 (2001) 25-109.

P.F. Beatrice

JUDAEOS, ADVERSUS. This is one of the first ancient sermons in Latin which many scholars have falsely attributed to *Cyprian. The style of the language is rather simple, since it collects passages of the Holy Scripture in order to invite the Jews to conversion. Despite the title, Adversus Iudaeos, the content of the text avoids every intellectual polemic while exhorting the Jews to believe in Christ, the sacrament of God. For this reason the author insists from the beginning of his sermon that his interlocutors use the eyes and ears of the faith to perceive and understand the spiritual things unknown to many educated men.

In the context of salvation the sermon shows how the Jews have renounced the covenant with God the creator, persecuting the prophets in order to turn to idolatry. Despite everything, God offers reconciliation to all through his Son Jesus. Combating the Father himself in the Son, the people refused the heir, cruelly killing the innocent Son on the cross. Because of this incredulity, the people exulted with joy while he was about to die. But beyond all expectations Christ resurrected from the dead and inaugurated the new covenant for all peoples. From that point all sinners may without fear become participants in it though penance. Therefore the invitation to conversion and baptism of the Jews is now more than urgent. All told, the teaching of the sermon shows the divine mercy in Christ who loves the Jews despite their sin.

As can be seen, the sermon justifiably shows a strong link with the liturgy. The vivacity of style truly suggests a text which is directly addressed to a Jewish community at the beginning of the Christian era. Even if the date of composition cannot be established with exactness, current research locates it with great probability in the 3rd c. While Quasten fixed its date around 260, D. van Damme thought it more likely to locate it before 212; in this case it would be the oldest sermon in Latin. However, this fact does not help us resolve the problem of the identification of the author. Even if scholars have abandoned the false opinion which attributed the text to Cyprian, the question still remains without a response. On this subject it does not appear superfluous to consider the article of the same D. van Damme, who in 1966, beyond the similarities with the language of *Melito and *Irenaeus, pointed out some indications of vocabulary links with the De scorpiace of *Tertullian to underline the use of a common Greek source: *Tatian's Diatesseron. Such a rapport of texts has the advantage of removing the hypotheses which tend to look for the presumed author of the sermon in the works of Latin authors before Tertullian such as Apollonius Martyr and Pope *Victor.

CSEL, 3, 3 (1871) 133-144; Patrologia I, 600; E. Peterson, Pseudo-Cyprian. Adversus Iudaeos und Melito von Sardes: VChr 6 (1952) 33-43; D. van Damme, Pseudo-Cyprian, Adversus Iudaeos: The Oldest Sermon in Latin?: SP 7 (TU 92), Berlin 1966, 299-307; W. Horbury, The Purposes of Pseudo-Cyprian, Adversus Iudaeos: SP 18 (1993) 291-317.

M.W. Libambu

JUDAISM

I. History of Judaism from AD 70 to 425 - II. Rabbinical literature - III. Liturgy - IV. Anti-Christian controversy.

I. History of Judaism from AD 70 to 425. It is understandable that the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in the year 70 and the fall of Masada three years later caused a true religious and socio-political upheaval in Judea. The Herodian dynasty disappeared with the death of Agrippa II and Berenice; the Zealots who had escaped the slaughter fled into Egypt and Cyrene, where they kept the spirit of rebellion alive; *Vespasian closed the temple of the Jews at Leontopolis, not far from Memphis, lest it serve as the focal point for revolutionary meetings. In the homeland, apocalyptic groups interpreted the defeat as a cosmic disaster; the common people were overwhelmed by a spirit of defeatism, and not a few became Christians; the Sadducees, linked to the temple, lost their influence. The Pharisees saved the situation by interpreting the defeat as a punishment of God for the failure to observe the Torah and for social divisions. Since the messianic times had not yet arrived, it was good to submit to the emperor and to begin to rebuild a society founded on strict observance of halakah and on the spirit of unity: hesed, in a social sense, replaced sacrifice: "It is mercy that I wanted, not sacrifice" (Hos 6:6). According to tradition, Johanan ben Zakkai, a disciple of Hillel, having fled besieged Jerusalem hidden in a bier, was allowed by Vespasian to found a rabbinical school at Jabne (Jamnia), on the Mediterranean coast, where a reorganization of Judaism from the doctrinal and legal viewpoint began and which later obtained a certain agreement from *Rome. This academy, transferred around 132 to Usha, in Galilee, and later to Tiberias, was mostly Pharisaic of Hillelian tendency; initially it was not much appreciated in the Diaspora both because of its political moderation and because of its hegemonic impulses. At its head was the patriarch (hanasi), and 71 ordained members constituting the new Sanhedrin. There was a break between Pharisaism before 70 and the rabbinism of Jabne and Usha, but there is not doubt that the latter was the child of the former. Fraternities of haberim assured a very strict observance of the halakah. Gradually the Sanhedrin would dominate all Palestine and the Diaspora grounding all Judaism in talmudic unity. A certain closure began not only toward Hellenistic culture but also toward those intertestamental and apocalyptic writings which had contributed so much to the variety within Judaism. Certain cities in Palestine, such as Jabne and Lydda, connected among themselves, became fortresses of rabbinical culture. In the 1st half of the 2nd c. the biblical canon was also closed, with the exclusion of pseudepigrapha.

Vespasian changed the tax of a half shekel, paid for the support of the temple by men only, into the notorious fiscus judaicus of two denarii for the maintenance of the temple of Capitoline Jove imposed on every Jew above three years old.

In the Diaspora things took a different tack. Beyond the fact that the rabbinical domination of Jabne was not voluntarily accepted by all the Jews, the Zealot and apocalyptic elements who had fled from Palestine into Egypt and Cyrene incited continual winds of rebellion. One must keep in mind that the social situation of the Jews in the Diaspora was always precarious. Despite the privileges received from various emperors—the right to observe their religion with all its rules, to keep the sabbath, to send the collections for the temple in Jerusalem protected as if they were the goods of a Greek temple, to have common meals, exemption from military service etc.—the Jews did not enjoy the sympathy of the people either because of jealousy of their privileges or because of their separation and isolation from the rest of the population. Although they made public donations for the benefit of the city as a captatio benevolentiae, social equilibrium remained precarious.

Consequently, in the last year of *Trajan the Jews of Mesopotamia, Egypt, Cyrene and Cyprus, profiting from the withdrawal of Roman troops employed in the war planned against the Parthians, rose up against the oppressors. The troops of Lucius Quietus subdued Mesopotamia while Quintus Turbus subdued Cyrene and Egypt. The Jewish population of Alexandria was decimated and their synagogue destroyed. The Jews of Cyprus were expelled with a permanent ban on returning there. The spirit of rebellion returned, headed by two brothers, Julian and Poppas, to Palestine too, after the hopes of a hypothetical reconstruction of the temple had been dashed, but Quietus checked this revolt as well and put the two brothers to death (polemos shel Kitos). As a sign of mourning, Jewish wives were no longer crowned, and after Bar Kokhba the wedding procession was also omitted. Even Rabbi Aqiba did not approve of this rebellion, saying that the messianic times had not yet arrived. However, when Simon bar Kokhba, in 132, began the great revolt against the Romans in Judea, it is said that it was Aqiba himself who gave him the nickname Bar Kokhba, Son of the Star, with a messianic reference to Num 24:19, against the opinion of the more moderate rabbis. The causes of this war under Hadrian were multiple: the plan to rebuild a Hellenistic Jerusalem as Aelia Capitolina, social reasons, revival of messianic hopes, the questioning of circumcision and the unpopular governor Tineius Rufus. The war, with an enormous army, caught the Romans by surprise. At first even Jerusalem had to be evacuated and the governor was taken prisoner. But Hadrian took time to prepare himself well and sent Julius Severus, who, avoiding encounters in the open field, made the various Palestinian cities surrender by surrounding them and starving them out. The defeat was a true disaster for the Jews and marked the end of Judea. Aelia Capitolina, with the temple of Jupiter in place of the Jewish temple and another to Venus on Golgotha, was built on the site of Jerusalem; the province was named Syria Palestinae; many inhabitants were sold as slaves, and the Jews were banned from the area of the city except for the 9th day of Ab to mourn its destruction. Circumcision was prohibited because it was considered equivalent to castration, and the rabbinical schools were closed. The refugees from Judea caused many socioeconomic problems in Galilee, and the Pharisees had to defend the poor from the abuses of the usurers, but at the same time the haburoth distanced themselves more from the am ha-aretz. Both the Christians and the Jews interpreted the defeat as a punishment from God, but while the Christians considered it the abandonment of the Jews by God, the Jews thought it rather to be a sign that they were not sufficiently worthy of God's kingdom.

Hadrian's successor, Antoninus Pius, mitigated the anti-Jewish legislation, retaining the prohibition on entering Jerusalem and circumcising proselytes. Still, their political choices were often mistaken: in the war between Romans and Parthians they were favorable to the Parthians, and during the battle between *Septimius Severus and Niger they supported Niger. Despite this, Septimius Severus, although renewing the prohibitions of Antoninus Pius, granted them, like the other provincials, admission to all public offices (honores) compatible with the indications of the Torah and therefore not violating their religion. There were occasionally, as often happens among political rebels, Jewish bands of violent men who circled about as bandits. The rabbis condemned them but consoled themselves with the idea that the destroyers of the temple of Jerusalem would one day be destroyed themselves by the Parthians.

A new period opened with the constitutio antoniniana of *Caracalla, which granted Roman citizenship to all the inhabitants of the empire, so that also the Jews became "Romans." His successor, *Heliogabalus, a Syrian, substituted Baal for Capitoline Jove in his pantheon, adding it alongside the God of the Jews and the Christians, to the understandable resentment of both. The Jews fought side by side in the army of *Valerian (d. 260) against the Parthians, and this gave them an opportunity to remove many prejudices, even if the rabbis warned of the danger of religious syncretism. *Diocletian (284–305) was favorable to the Jews and exempted them from those acts of worship that were obligatory in certain circumstances for the pagans. In all this period, despite the prohibitions and limitations, many proselytes were attracted by Judaism, not a few from among the Christians also.

The situation changed, however, when the empire became Christian. The so-called *Edict of Milan in 313 granted to Christianity the same rights as the other religions, thus causing a change in the notion of "religion" prevailing up to then. Although the empire, now in the process of Christianization, produced legislation intended to reduce paganism, the Jews still enjoyed a discrete liberty; this situation remained until *Justinian. After the Council of Nicaea it was insisted that Christians not participate in the worship of the synagogue. But it was the Codex Theodosianus which imposed limits on the Jewish religion to reduce its influence on Christians: e.g., a Hebrew who persecuted a coreligionist converted to Christianity was liable to be burned alive (16,8,1); the Christian slaves of a Jew would be liberated (16,9,2); the privilege of not serving in municipal offices, such as the decurionatus—which initially had been an honor but then had became a burden because of the public expenses involved—was revoked (12,1,100); burning an effigy of crucified Haman during the feast of Purim, an ancient tradition which was interpreted as an insult to Christ, was prohibited (16,8,18); the Jewish patriarch was prohibited from building synagogues and judging Christians (16,8,22); admitting Jews to public service except the office of advocate and the decurionatus was prohibited (16,8,24); all, Christians, Jews and heretics, were barred from celebrating public games on Sunday or other Christian holidays (15,5,6); and converts to Christianity could not be disinherited (16,8,28). Furthermore, the Codex Justinianus* prescribed that Jews could not act as witnesses in trials against Christians (1,5,21); the Novellae of Justinian (146) banned the Mishna and rebuked any who denied the resurrection, the existence of the angels or the last judgment. On the other hand, the Codex Theodosianus favored the Jews since it forbade the invasion of the synagogues on the pretext of seeking sanctuary there (7,8,2); it maintained the right of the Jewish leaders to excommunicate or release from excommunication their underlings (16,8,8); the right of Jewish merchants to establish their prices without interference from Christians was reaffirmed (1,9,9); the jurisdiction of Jewish tribunals concerning the Jewish law was maintained (2,1,10); it established the prohibition on converting Jews with the promise that once they became Christian they would not need to pay their debts to their coreligionists, remaining furthermore excused from juridical trials (9,45,2); it prohibited damaging synagogues and granted the exemption from appearing in tribunals as witnesses on the sabbath (16,8,20); contrary to the previous legislation, Jews could possess Christian slaves, provided these were free to practice their religion (16,9,3); permission to return to Judaism was granted to those who had been seduced into conversion with material promises (16,8,23). All these laws reflect the very complex socioreligious situation after the Constantinian change.

In the war against the Parthians in 351 under *Constantius II, part of the army in Palestine had to be maintained by the inhabitants, with a consequent violation of the sabbath. This provoked a revolt, led by a certain Petronius, which was suffocated by the Romans and led to the destruction of many synagogues and academies. As a result many rabbis emigrated to Babylon.

The Babylonian diaspora was as old as the exile, and the Jews who had remained there had always maintained close relationships with those of Palestine. The exiliarch was the figure corresponding to the patriarch and had a great deal of power. Separate Jewish communities had been formed, at Sura, Pumpadita and in other cities, culturally and politically independent, where the population lived from agriculture and commerce. In the 3rd c., having survived a period of persecution which had endured several decades, the Jews accepted Persian legislation, and theological academies in close collaboration with those of the homeland arose, within which the Babylonian Talmud was born.

*Julian the Apostate favored the Jews; he abolished the fiscus iudaicus, promised to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, repudiated the taxes which the emperor Constantius wanted to impose on them and freed them also from the tribute to their patriarch.

The Jewish patriarchate was abolished in 425 under Gamaliel VI. The Jews, by their own will or through opposition, were marginalized, sometimes victims of public insurrections; they then dedicated themselves to the study of the Torah and of medicine; synagogues were legally protected, but the construction of new ones was blocked. They could not hold command posts within the Roman army. With the abolition of the patriarchate the disintegration of Judaism began.

II. Rabbinical literature. The study of the different currents of Judaism in the first centuries must necessarily begin from the intertestamental literature. Here we limit ourselves to the rabbinical literature in the period of the fathers of the church. The notion of midrash is fundamental for understanding these writings. Already in the continual reinterpretation of the OT, an interpretative traditio grew up around the traditum; it later finished by being inserted into the biblical text itself. From the period of the Hasmoneans, however, other traditions were formed in the Pharisaic environment whether of a halakic—moral-legal-liturgical—character or of a haggadic—theological-narrative—character. The traditions of the Pharisees, later attributed by the rabbis to an unwritten law coming from Moses, were meant to serve as a "fence around the Torah" to make its transgression more difficult. This midrashic material was transmitted orally in the rabbinical schools after AD 70 through the efforts of the tannaim*. Perhaps it was also written in partial collections, but the definitive written compilation was the Mishnah of Yehuda ha-Nasi, made around the year 200, which quickly became the "new testament" of Judaism. It was divided into six orders subdivided into treatises. From the tannaim come further a complementary collection with the same divisions—the tosefta; the mekilta, a commentary on Exodus; Sifra on Leviticus; Sifrei on Numbers and Deuteronomy. All were written in Hebrew and often carried the imprint of authoritative rabbis such as Aqiba, Meir, Yishmael and others. The study of the Mishnah and the other traditions continued for two centuries thanks to the amoraim and issued in two great commentaries on the Mishnah: the Palestinian Talmud (ca. 430) at Tiberias, and the Babylonian Talmud (ca. 500), which incorporated in themselves also baraita, i.e., rabbinical traditions which had remained outside the tannaitic writings. The midrash of the talmudim was of a more haggadic nature than the preceding one. The amoraim, and, after them the rabbinical generation of the gaonim, also produced the midrash rabbah, haggadic commentaries on each book of the Pentateuch and on the hamesh megilloth, i.e., the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Qohelet and Esther. Furthermore, homilies of famous rabbis, including Rab Kahana, are preserved from this period. At this time, since Hebrew was no longer understood by the people, paraphrases in Aramaic were made which contained much of the midrashic material, called targums*. The qabbala literature, which excited so much interest among Christians in the Renaissance, is later, but the roots can already be found in the period described. All this literature, added to the apocrypha of the OT, to Qumran, to *Philo, Josephus and the other Hellenistic writings, constitutes the corpus of our knowledge of Judaism in the first centuries. The Christian fathers, with rare exceptions, did not know the rabbinical literature directly, partly because it was written either in mishnaic Hebrew or in Aramaic, but many echoes of current midrash reached them from converted Jews or Christians who attended the synagogue.

III. Liturgy. Given the impossibility of offering sacrifices after the destruction of the temple, worship passed to the synagogue. It was essentially a "liturgy of the word" which included the tefilla, i.e., the eighteen blessings, a first progressive reading of the Torah, the seder (a triennial cycle in Palestine, annual in Babylon), a second reading from the prophets, the haftara, followed by the homily, the recital of the Shema and the final blessing of a priest, if present. The prayer of the eighteen blessings, also called amida because it is recited standing up, is the most solemn, as old as the temple in certain sections, but which reached its definitive form under Rabbi Gamaliel II.

The Shema ("Hear O Israel") is composed of three biblical passages: Dt 6:4-9, the divine unity; Dt 11:13-21, the principle of retribution; Num 15:36-41, the precept to wear the fringes. They are preceded by two berakoth ("blessings") and followed by a final one or two. This profession of faith constitutes the creed of Israel. The blessing of meals and the qaddish, which sanctifies the divine name and is recited different times both in the synagogue and privately, also occupy an important place among the prayers of the Israelites. The current book of prayer (siddur) dates back essentially to the 11th c.

Beyond the sabbath, the Jewish feasts, which are calculated acc. to the lunar calendar, are (1) 14 Nisan (March–April), Pesach (Esth 12) (the contemporary ritual dates back to the 10th c. but has its roots in the talmudic period when sacrifices could no longer be offered, now recalled by the roast lamb and the hard-boiled eggs). Originally a feast of shepherds and peasants who offered the firstfruits, it came to commemorate the exodus from Egypt and the invocation of the messianic times. Only the circumcised take part, and for validity the narrated haggada has to include necessarily the meaning of pesach ("he has passed over our houses"), of the bitter herbs and the unleavened bread. The feast lasts seven days. For seven weeks after Pesach the omer is observed (Lev 23:15-16), which, contrary to our "paschal time," is a time of mourning and marriages are not celebrated. (2) Pentecost (Ex 13:16; 34:22; Dt 16:9-10) falls 50 days after Pesach. It was the feast of the harvest offered to the divinity but came to signify the covenant and, in the 2nd c., the gift of the law and the testament with Noah. (3) Hanukkah, from 25 Kislev (November–December) lasts eight days and commemorates the rebuilding of the temple destroyed by Antiochus IV acc. to 1 Macc 4:5ff. and 2 Mac 10:5. It is the feast of the eight lights, which are still lit today. (4) 14 Adar (February–March), Purim, is celebrated to recall the liberation at the hands of Esther. (5) 15–22 Tishri (September–October) is the Feast of Booths (Ex 23:16; Lev 23:43) and of the autumn harvests. One stays in huts or under canopies to recall the sojourn in the desert. The original ceremonies took place around the altar of the temple. (6) Yom Kippur (Lev 16) asks for reconciliation between humanity and God, between human and human. When the sacrifice was no longer possible, only the ethical significance of penitence remained. The kol nidre and the aboda are sung in order that unfulfilled vows may be set aside, and prayers are said for the dead.

Yom Kippur falls on 10 Tishri, while 1 Tishri is Rosh Hashana, or the beginning of the new year (Num 29:1; Lev 23:24), which recalls both the creation and the final judgment. One fasts 9 Ab (July–August) for the destruction of the temple, 3 Tishri for the killing of Gedalia, 10 Tebet (December–January) for the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem and 17 Tammuz (June–July) also for the destruction of Jerusalem. Naturally, the sabbath, which begins Friday night, is a day of total repose and of prayer and joy.

IV. Anti-Christian controversy. We will limit ourselves to expounding the classic points of the rabbinical texts. J. Maier has raised questions about some of these texts, but the majority of the authors still consider them valid. Let us begin with the twelfth prayer of the tefilla, the birkat ha-minim, the "blessing" of the heretics. This was composed at Jabne in the 90s by Samuel the Little under Gamaliel II. There are two versions, one Palestinian (from the geniza of Cairo), the other Babylonian. The first recites: "For the apostates there is no hope, and may you quickly annihilate, in our days, the insolent domination [= Rome]; and may the Nazarenes and the heretics die suddenly, be canceled from the book of life and not be counted among the just. Blessed be you, Yahweh, who bends the proud." The Babylonian version does not mention the Nazarenes, only the minim are cursed, the "heretics" in the sense of sectarians, which included however the Jewish Christians, i.e., the Nazarenes, but not all the Christians. Those originating from paganism were simply goyim, at least in Palestine. A min could not act as a preceptor in the synagogue, since a Christian who did this would curse himself and his own. However, a min is still a Jew. This excommunication weighed heavily on the Christians, and not a few returned to the synagogue; this is the context for the insistence of the Fourth Gospel that the followers of Christ "remain in me." The nosrim are the Christians coming from Judaism (see Mt 2:23; Jn 9:22; 12:42; 16:2; Acts 24:5; Justin, Dial. 16,47,96,137; Origen, In Ps 37 (36) II, 8 and in Talmud B Taanit 27b). The Palestinian version which included the Nazarenes explicitly is probably older since the Christian menace had not yet arrived in Babylon and the term min would have included Christians as well, as is confirmed by other controversial passages contained in the Talmud. These texts are generally discussions on the messianic meaning of biblical verses, as occurs in the Dialogue with Trypho, perhaps interpreted in a messianic way at first (e.g., Ps 110) but later, for polemic ends, in reference to historic events. Their messianic interpretation returns in the era of the gaonim when the virulence of the controversy had attenuated.

One must observe that mention of Jesus or of his disciples makes up a minimal part of the Talmud, partly due to the fact that in the period in which Hebrew books were sequestered by Christians, these passages were erased or hidden under another name. Jesus, e.g., is called "the Nazarene" only a few times; more often he is called "Ben Pantera" or "Ben Stada," son born of fornication (Shabb. 104b: Sanh. 103a). Other examples of this polemic are as follows: T. Shab. 13,5 records a rabbinical discussion on whether the gilionim (Hebraization of evangelia) and other books of the minim which contained the name of God could be or should be saved from a fire on the sabbath; Pes. 56: the Shema, originally recited sotto voce by the Jews, later had to be pronounced out loud because of the minim. T. Chull. 2,21 prohibits Jews, their slaves or animals from letting themselves be cured by minim. Shab. 116a forbids taking refuge in the house of the minim, but not in a pagan temple, to save one's own life, since, while the pagans do not know God, the minim know him but dishonor him. T. Chull. 2,20-1 says that one can accept meat from the Gentiles (meat sacrificed to idols?) but not from the minim, and not even bread and wine (the Eucharist?) or fruit. The sons of the minim are "bastards" (mushammer), and the sons of the Jews should not be educated by these minim. Commerce with them is also prohibited. T. Shab. 13,5 warns against the books of the minim which cause hostility between Jew and Jew, between Israel and God, because God hates all those who hate Israel.

Besides these explicit expressions concerning the minim, fairly clear references to the doctrine of the Christians are found, particularly concerning their pretense to be the new Israel, the fact that they consider Jesus as the new Moses, that they admit "two powers" in Heaven (or would that be the *gnostics?), that God has a son, that the OT now belongs to the church and that the (oral) Torah does not come from Heaven. The rabbinical polemic was directed toward those Jews who were letting themselves be dazzled by the Christians or who had become such. Also the Christian polemic adversus Judaeos* was not always directed against the Jews but against those Christians who were attracted to the synagogue, who visited it on feasts and the sabbath or, worse, had converted to Judaism. The fathers of the church did not have a firsthand knowledge of the rabbinical writings, which were written in Hebrew and Aramaic; their knowledge was indirect, through converted Jews or those who visited the synagogue. Much less direct was the knowledge among the Jews of the Christian books, the lecture of which was prohibited to them. It was a knowledge "by hearsay" or through those Christians who returned to the synagogue.

G.F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era, 3 vols., Harvard, MA 1927; J. Bonsirven, Le judaïsme palestinien, 2 vols., Paris 1934; H.L. Strack - P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch, 6 vols., Munich 1956–; K. Bowker, The Targums and Rabbinic Literature, Cambridge 1969; S. Safrai - M. Stern, The Jewish People in the First Century, I, Philadelphia 1974; J. Maier, Jesus von Nazareth in der talmudischen Überlieferung, Darmstadt 1978; F. Mussner, Il popolo della promessa per il dialogo cristiano ebraico, Rome 1979; E.E. Urbach, The Sages, 2 vols., Jerusalem 1979; G.W.E. Nickelsburg, Jewish Literature Between the Bible and the Mishnah, Philadelphia 1981; J. Maier, Jüdische Auseinandersetzung mit dem Christentum in der Antike, Darmstadt 1982; H.L. Strack - G. Stemberger, Einleitung in Talmud und Midrasch, Munich 1982; C. Di Sante, La preghiera di Israele, Casale Monf. 1985; H.G. Kippenberg - G. Wewers, Testi giudaici per lo studio del NT, Brescia 1987; F. Manns, Leggere la Mishna, Brescia 1987; M.J. Mulder (ed.), Mikra: Text, Translation, Reading and Interpretation of the Hebrew Bible in Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity, Philadelphia 1988; A.J. Saldarini, Pharisees, Scribes and Sadducees, Elmington 1988; G. Alon, The Jews in their Own Land in the Talmudic Age, Harvard, MA 1989; N.R. Glatzer, Geschichte der talmudischen Zeit, Neukirchen 1981; J. Maier, Storia del giudaismo nell'antichità, Brescia 1992; S. Frieman, Who's Who in the Talmud, London 1995; J.M.G. Barclay, Jews in the Mediterranean Diaspora, Edinburgh 1996; R.J. Zwi Werblowsky - G. Wigoder, The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, Oxford 1997; H.-M. Döpp, Die Deutung der Zerstörung Jerusalems und des zweiten Tempels im Jahre 70 in den ersten Jahrhunderten nach Christus, Tübingen 1998; W. Horbury, Jews and Christians in Contact and Controversy, Edinburgh 1998; J.L. Kugel, Traditions of the Bible, Harvard, MA 1998; J. Maier, L'Israele di Dio: Sinagoga e Chiesa alle origini cristiane, Bologna 1998.

P. Grech

JUDAIZERS. Judaizing has one distant historical motivation and one less so. Following the decree of rehabilitation of the Jews issued by Ahasuerus (Xerxes 486–465 BC) many people became Jews (Esth 8:12, 17); Paul accused Peter of ambiguity, because with his conduct at *Antioch he was inducing the pagans to Judaize (Gal 2:14). In both texts the meaning of the word "Judaize" indicates living in the manner of the Jews, embracing their laws and customs. A careful examination nevertheless allows the identification of differences which are not merely of nuance. Esther reveals paths of proselytism among the nations in a pagan context (see Mt 23:15; Jn 7:35) crowned with success; in Galatians the historical context is different: a faction of Jews converted to Christianity wants to restore vigor to the Mosaic law within the Christian community and hopes to obtain two goals: induce the ethno-Christians to accept certain Mosaic precepts and cool the missionary zeal of Paul and Barnabas by putting in doubt the results obtained. For Paul and Barnabas did not impose legal observances on converts from paganism and ruled out the supposed necessity of passing through Judaism to reach Christianity. Outside the borders of Palestine, this seemed normal (see Acts 14:26-15,3), but not at Jerusalem, where Peter had to justify the direct acceptance of Cornelius (Acts 10–11) and where the development of the church among the Gentiles was received with certain reservations (Acts 15:7-9). The group, opposed to Paul and a source of disorder with its insistence on the permanent necessity of the Mosaic law and of circumcision to reach Christ—ultimately unsuccessful—has entered history with the name of "Judaizers." From the account in Acts 15:1-5, this seems to have been composed of converted Pharisees, not yet having liberated themselves from their legalistic mentality and of strict observance, having come on their own initiative to Antioch to impose and defend their theses: "If you do not get circumcised acc. to the custom of Moses, you cannot be saved" (Acts 15:1). At Jerusalem the same language is heard (Acts 15:1) before the clarification, and one presumes that it comes from the same figures or from Judaizers belonging to the same circle.

Despite being defeated in the confrontation in the heart of the Christian community over the missionary activity adopted by Paul and his group toward the pagans who accepted the faith, the Judaizers did not abandon their point of view. The most resounding result of the Jerusalem assembly was the recognition of the equality of Jews and pagans before the grace of salvation and the surpassing of the law for all Christians. The characteristics of the Judaizers operating in the communities of Galatia were not substantially different from that of the Judaizers of Jerusalem. Faithful to rabbinical ideas, they presented Christ as an auxiliary to the law and to righteousness; they reaffirmed the absolutes of the law, undermining the teachings of Paul at their root, countering his apostleship (see Gal 1:15-16; 1 Cor 9:1; 15:8), accusing him of not being an apostle from the beginning and emphasizing that his doctrine and conduct had been contested at Jerusalem. The Judaizers had the full right to appeal to the mother church in Jerusalem, where Jewish practices were still in honor but were going beyond the limits of the accord reached there and were undermining the very foundation of the message sent to the ethno-Christian churches, which proclaimed salvation in the name of Jesus, and not under the law (Acts 15:9-11).

They were not only disturbers of the peace of the community, but also false prophets, who reduced the saving action of Jesus to the promotion of legal observance (Acts 15:5). Paul's accusation against them counts as a gesture of liberation of Christianity from the law, from the renewed Pharisaism and as an invitation to follow Christ (Gal 2:14; 4:31; 5:1; 6:13). While there is insufficient evidence from 1–2 Corinthians to conclude the presence and activity of the circle of the Judaizers, one cannot exclude a priori that the adversaries which Paul faced in this community were Judaizers; their typical charges are found: not being an apostle from the beginning, being the latest arrival (2 Cor 10:1-17; 11:22-23). The letters do not make evident the doctrinal points on which they insisted. Since this was a community with a strong ethnic component, it was probably not a matter of circumcision, nor of other observances, but of prejudices or of conduct to be maintained in determined circumstances (2 Cor 3:13-18; 4:2-4).

The call of Jewish practices was always lively in the following centuries; hence the polemic of the fathers of the church to not Judaize—i.e., to resort to Jewish observances, e.g., the sabbath. *Justin, in the 2nd c., wrote that "some want to live in the observance of the prescriptions of Moses and nonetheless believe in Jesus crucified, acknowledging him as the Messiah of God" (Dialogue 46,1). Justin accepted this type of Christian and defended them against those who condemned them, because they are "brothers born from the same womb" (47,2). Much of the literature Adversus Iudaeos in reality was aimed at those Christians who observed the Jewish feasts and their ceremonies, resorted to the Jews to receive any kind of blessing, performed purifications and oaths in the synagogues, socialized with the Jews. Already the Council of *Elvira established that "those who cultivate the earth be admonished not to allow the Jews to bless those fruits which they have received from God through the action of grace, so that our blessing may not seem false and ridiculous. If anyone, despite this admonition, continues [in such a practice] may he be completely excluded from the community of the Christians" (can. 49). *John Chrysostom criticized and reproved that type of Christian in the city of *Antioch, where there was a strong Jewish community. Furthermore, the passage of Christians over to Judaism was prohibited by the civil authorities (CTh 16,7,3; CTh 16,8,29 = CI 1,9,16).

Flavius Josephus, Jewish War III, 454.463; J.B. Colon: Judéo Chrétiens: DBS 4, 1305-1311, H. Schlier, Lettera ai Galati, Brescia 1966, 16-23; W. Gutbrod, Ἰουδαΐζειν, Ἰουδαϊσμός: GLNT 5, 1174-1176 (TDNT 3, 383). L. Randellini, La Chiesa dei Giudeo-cristiani, Brescia 1968; C. Gancho, Giudaizzanti: Enc. della Bibbia, III, Turin 1970, col. 1221-1223; I. Greco, I giudeo-cristiani nel IV secolo, Jerusalem 1982; R.L. Wilken, John Chrysostom and the Jews: Theory and Reality in the Late Fourth Century, Berkeley, CA 1983; G. Dagron, Judaïser: Travaux et Mémoires 11 (1991) 359-380; R. Lim, Public Disputation, Power and Social Order in Late Antiquity, Berkeley, CA 1995; F. Cocchini, La "lettera," il "velo" e l'"ombra": presupposti scritturistici della polemica antigiudaica di Origene: AnSE 14 (1997) 101-119; A. Monaci Castagno, *Ridefinire il confine: ebrei, giudaizzanti, cristiani nell'*Adversus Iudaeos di Giovanni Crisostomo: AnSE 14 (1997) 135-152; Id., I giudaizzanti di Antiochia: bilancio e nuove prospettive di ricerca, in F. Filoramo - C. Gianotto, Verus Israel, Brescia 2001, 304-338; G. Scimè, Giudei e cristiani nei discorsi di San Pietro Crisologo, Rome 2003.

E. Peretto

JUDAS ISCARIOT (apocrypha). Judas Iscariot is always named last in all the lists of the apostles in the NT. In 2006 an incomplete Gospel of Judas was published, an apocryphal work of the *gnostic sect of the *Cainites, who venerated Cain as a hero. The MS (Codex Tchacos which originally had 62 pages) of the 3rd–4th c. also contains a recension of the First Apocalypse of James and of the Letter of Peter to Philip (both present at *Nag Hammadi) and fragments of a text called for the moment Book of Allogenes; this was discovered around 1970 near El Minya in Egypt and is written in Sahidic *Coptic—like the other Coptic writings of Nag Hammadi—but the original was Greek. At the end of the 2nd c., *Irenaeus knew a Gospel of Judas (Adv. haer. I,31,1), also cited by *Epiphanius (Panarion 38,1: PG 41, 658) and by *Theodoret (Haer. fab. 1,15). Its composition should be dated before 180, but not as a writing dating back to Judas himself. The Gospel of Judas is not a narration of the life of Jesus, but a collection of sayings attributed to Jesus and short secret dialogues between Jesus and Judas, to whom "everything is revealed." In contrast to the canonical gospels, it reevaluates Judas as the only one who really knew who Jesus was and from where he came: "You come from the immortal kingdom of Barbelo; I am not worthy to pronounce the name of the one who sent you." To him alone, and not to the other apostles, three days before Easter, Jesus revealed "the mysteries of the kingdom," esp. those of a cosmological character of gnostic inspiration. Judas is the one who would sacrifice the humanity which Jesus wears. The apocryphal work does not present Judas as a revolting traitor but as one who acts on the request of Jesus himself to hand him over to the authorities. His betrayal, viewed positively, contributes to the liberation of the spirit of Jesus from the constraints of his physical form, and therefore Judas "completed a good action for our salvation" (Epiphanius, Panarion 38,3: PG 41, 656); he will be superior to the other apostles despite the fact that he will be "cursed for generations."

There are no Acts of Judas, but he is often mentioned in apocryphal texts. In the Arabic Gospel he is presented as a demoniac child. According to the Ethiopian Death of Pilate Judas was the brother-in-law of Barabbas. His betrayal is generally described acc. to the gospels, with the exception of the strange legend in the History of Joseph of Arimathea and in some codices of the Acts of Pilate (history of Judas and the cock). According to the Muslim Gospel of Barnabas, Judas died on the cross in place of Jesus. From this information it can be concluded that in the patristic period there was no fixed tradition on Judas. For the fathers of the church Judas was represented as a type of the condemned. The legend transmitted by Jacobus de Voragine in the Life of Saint Matthias in the Legenda Aurea as well as in the Greek Vita published by Istin presents Judas on the model of Oedipus (he killed his own father and took his mother as wife). According to Jacobus de Voragine, the account was taken from an Apocryphal History and is native to the Middle Ages, when the figure of Judas excited great interest.

CANT 39; Erbetta I,1, 291-2; D. Bergamaschi, Giuda Iscariota nella leggenda, nella tradizione e nella Bibbia: Scuola Cattolica 15 (1909) 292-303; 423-435; 574-580; W. Creizenach, Judas Ischarioth in Legende und Sage des Mittelalters, Halle 1875; P.F. Baum, The Medieval Legend of Judas Iscariot: Publication of the Modern Languages Association of America 31, series 24 (1916) 480-632; P. Lehman, Judas Ischariot in der lateinischen Legendeüberlieferung des Mittelalters: SM 2 (1929) 289-346; J.H. Klauck, Judas, Freiburg 1987; RAC 19, 972-982 (on the Cainites); F. William, The Panarion of Epiphanius of Salamis, Book I (Sects 1-46), Leiden 1987, 248-255; Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, ed. W.J. Hanegraaff, I, Leiden 2005, 227-229; The Gospel of Judas, ed. R. Kasser, M. Meyer and G. Wurst with additional commentary by Bart D. Ehrman, Washington, DC 2006; J.M. Robinson, The Secrets of Judas: The Story of the Misunderstood

Disciple and His Lost Gospel, San Francisco 2006; J. Monserrat Torrents, El evangelio de Judas, Madrid 2006.

M. Starowieyski - A. Di Berardino

JUDAS ISCARIOT (iconography). Symbol by antonomasia of treason because of the crime with which he stained himself, Judas appears early in ancient Christian iconography. The scene is composed of different incidents: (1) Judas receives the price of his treason; (2) the kiss; (3) the restitution of the thirty denarii; (4) the hanging. The first scene and the last two never appear on the *sarcophagi but preferentially in miniatures. The most ancient representation of the betrayal of Judas is found on the sarcophagus of Servanne (Ws 15,2 = Benoit, Sac. XVI, 2) from the end of the 4th c., where the two successive scenes of Judas's approach to Christ (Jn 18:3-18) and the kiss (Mt 26:41-50; Mk 14:43-45; Lk 22:47-48) are represented together. The kiss scene by itself is, however, rather more frequent. The most ancient example is on the sarcophagus of Verona (Ws 150,2) from the end of the 4th c. and in a group in *Arles such as the sarcophagus of Hydria Tertulla (Benoit, Sarc. II) and that of the Samaritan (Benoit, Sarc. II), both datable to the 2nd half of the 4th c. The entire cycle of Judas in four scenes is found in the reliefs of the columns of the 4th-c. ciborium in St. Mark's in Venice. Also from the 4th c. are the scenes of the kiss and the return of the money to Caiaphas in the mosaics of St. Apollinare Nuovo in *Ravenna. As for the miniature of the purple Codex of Rossano, between the middle of the 5th and the 6th c., the return of the denarii and the hanging appear; in the Evangeliarium of Rabbula (586), on the other hand, are Judas approaching Christ and the hanging. In the sumptuary arts, the most ancient example is the scene of the hanging in an ivory of the British Museum from the early years of the 5th c. The same scene is in the Diptych of *Milan from the end of the 5th c. and in the ivory casket of Brescia from the 4th c. There exists, finally, a series of Christian inscriptions where deprecatory expressions against tomb robbers can be read. The most ancient, cum Iuda partem habeat (Diehl 3845), goes back to the end of the 4th c. and was found in the cemetery of St. Agnese. A habeat partem cum Iuda Iscariota (Diehl 3847) of the 7th c. from Cartagena and an inscription in Greek from Argos, ἐχέτω τὸ ἀνάθεμα τὸ τοῦ Ἰο<ύ>δα, should also be mentioned.

DACL 8, 264-279; EC 6, 690-691; LCI 2, 444-448; H. Hursch, Das Bild des Judas Ischariot im Wandel der Zeiten: Akten VII KongrIntchristlArch, Vatican City 1971, 565-573; J. Kollwitz, Die Lipsanothek von Brescia, Berlin 1933, 15, pl. I, 32, pl. II; F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden-Baden 1958, pl. 188; Volbach-Hirmer, 75, fig. 92; Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp. fol. 12 a, 66; D. Pallas, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Grèce découverts de 1959 à 1973, Vatican City 1971, 309; F. De Maffei, Il Codice purpureo di Rossano Calabro: la sua problematica e alcuni risultati di ricerca, Rossano 1978, 261; M. Perraymond, L'iconografia di Giuda Iscariota e i suoi risvolti evangelici: SMSR 14 (1990) 67-93; Id., TIP 195-196.

A.M. Di Nino

JUDAS KYRIAKOS. A martyred bishop of Jerusalem. The Vita and the Passio which we have for him do not have any historical significance; they are completely legendary. *Eusebius (HE 4,5) mentions a Judas as fifteenth and last Jewish-Christian bishop of Jerusalem at the time of Bar Kokhba (132–135). The two figures are probably identical. According to the legend, Judas was a relative of St. *Stephen, protomartyr, and appears as a protagonist in the legend of the inventio crucis.

BHO 233-236; BHG 465; BHL 4169.7022-7025; BBKL III, 762; H.J.W. Drijvers - J.W. Drijvers, The Finding of the True Cross: The Judas Kyriakos Legend in Syriac: CSCO 565 (1997); S. Heid, Der Ursprung der Helenalegende im Pilgerbetrieb Jerusalems: JbAC 32 (1989) 41-71; Id., Zur frühen Protonike- und Kyriakoslegende: AB 109 (1991) 73-108; S. Borgehammar, How the Holy Cross Was Found: From Events to Medieval Legend, Stockholm 1991; J.W. Drijvers, Helena Augusta: The Mother of Constantine the Great and the Legend of Her Finding the True Cross, Leiden 1992.

S. Samulowitz

JUDAS THADDAEUS. In the catalog of the apostles he is always mentioned with James (Mt 10:3; Mk 3:18; Lk 6:16; Acts 1:13) and carefully distinguished from Judas Iscariot (Lk 6:16; Jn 14:22). The textual tradition reveals uncertainty: the codices D K substitute Lebbeus for Thaddaeus, the codices E F G L have both nicknames, and the codices a b g h q of the Vetus Latina write "Judas the Zealot." Judas Thaddaeus or Lebbeus is presented by Luke (Lk 6:16; Acts 1:13) in the catalog of the apostles with the patronymic "Judas of James," the equivalent of "son of James." It is deduced from this that he has his own characterization (Thaddaeus-Lebbeus; of James), and is distinct from the Judas, brother of James, Simon and Joseph (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3). The data of the NT delineate a Judas Thaddaeus, making up part of the group of the apostles; a Judas Iscariot, who betrayed the Master; a Judas, brother of the Lord, and of James, Simon and Joseph; and a Judas/Jude, author of the Catholic epistle. This letter begins: "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James." Aside from other considerations of criticism, this indication is too feeble, since it allows one to identify the author with several of the mentioned figures. The omission of the title "apostle," the distance which he seems to put between himself and the apostles, the frequency in classical and also Christian Antiquity of the phenomenon of pseudonymity and the possibility that the expression "brother of James" means "brother in the faith of James" leave open the attribution of the letter and indicate that an initially clear tradition was slowly obscured, when the identification of the author of the letter with Judas the apostle was attempted.

Legend took hold of Judas the apostle, who in the Last Supper asked Jesus why he had reserved his manifestation to them, leaving the entire world in the dark (Jn 14:22), and made of him the bridegroom of the wedding of Cana. Similarly tradition, which assigned him Palestine and the surrounding regions as his preferred field of apostolate, pushed him as far as Arabia to the S, into Persia and Mesopotamia to the E, and into Armenia in the N.

According to some information he died at Edessa in the time of King Abgar; acc. to other information he was martyred at Arado, close to Beirut. The Latin church celebrates his feast 28 October, together with Simon; the Greek church 19 June; the Armenian 16 February; and the Coptic 2 July.

Eusebius, HE I, 13,11-22; IV, 5,5; Jerome, In Matt. X, 4; Nicephorus Call., HE II, 40; G.S. Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, III, 2 (Rome 1728) VIII-XIV; P. Douny, Simon et Jude, apôtres, Paris-Brussels 1947; P. De Ambroggi: EC 6, 693-695; K.H. Schelkle, Die Petrusbriefe; Der Judasbrief, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1964, 140-143; J. Blinzler, Judas Taddäus: LTK[3] 5, 1026; E. Peretto: BS 6, 1152-1153; U. Vanni, Lettere di Pietro, Giacomo, Giuda, Rome 1974, 176-180; R.J. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church, Edinburgh 1990; Id., The Letter of Jude: An Account of Research: ANRW II, 25, 5, 3791-3826; for the exegesis of the Fathers, see H.J. Sieben, Exegesis Patrum: saggio bibliografico sull'esegesi biblica dei Padri della Chiesa, Rome 1983; Id., Kirchenväterhomilien zum Neuen Testament: ein Repertorium der Textausgaben und Übersetzungen, mit einem Anhang der Kirchenvaterkommentare, Steenbrugis 1991; see also the journal "Annali di storia dell'esegesi" 11 (1994) – 14 (1997). In particular, see G. Bray, ed., James, 1-2 Peter, 1-3 John, Jude, ACCS NT 11, Downers Grove, IL 2000; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins. Processus missionnaires chrétiens dans l'Empire iranien, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002, 61-71.

E. Peretto

JUDAS THADDAEUS (apocrypha). Judas, penultimate in the lists of the apostles, is frequently confused with *Judas Iscariot, with Judas Thomas, with *Simon and with *Addai. According to *Eusebius (HE 1, 12,2 and 13,11f.), Thaddaeus was one of the Seventy. According to the *Armenian tradition (e.g., *Faustus of Byzantium), Judas Thaddaeus was the apostle of Armenia, but the entire documentation concerning this apostolate is very complicated. According to ps.-Abdias (VI, 7-23—he is treated together with Simon) Judas Thaddaeus and Simeon fought with magi in Persia and consecrated *Abdias as the first bishop of Babylon. In the Acts of Thaddaeus, composed at the beginning of the 7th c., Judas Thaddaeus is linked to the legend of Abgar and is presented as the evangelizer of *Edessa and therefore is presented in iconography with the favorite of Christ. Judas Thaddaeus is also considered one of the Seventy or else the bridegroom of Cana.

CANT 284; BHG 1703-1705; BHL 7749-7754, 8011; BHO 1141-1145; LCI 8, 423-427; BS 6 (1965) 1152-1157; M. van Esbroeck: AB 80 (1962) 430-1; Id., Le roi Sanatrouk et l'apôtre Thaddée: REArm 9 (1972) 167-169, 241-283; Id., L'apôtre Thaddée et le roi Sanatrouk, in Atti del II simposio int. "Armenia-Assiria," Venezia 1988, 93-106; A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 436-7; A. Palmer, Les Actes de Thaddée: Apocrypha 13 (2002) 63-84.

M. Starowieyski

JUDEA, Desert of. A territory which lies in the SE part of Palestine toward the Dead Sea. It is called this in Mt 3:1, which points it out as the place of the temptations of Jesus. It becomes the center of the Jewish resistance, esp. at Masada, at the time of the revolt of Bar Kokhba against *Rome (130-135). In the desert of Judaea, better called Desert of the Jordan, there was the community of *Qumran, where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found. The Christian monks of Palestine, in the desire to find ever more isolated spots, established monasteries, which go by the name *laurae. The first laura was founded by *Gerasimus, considered the founder of monasticism in the area, around 455; at one point it counted seventy cells spread over a certain distance. The monastery consisted of a church, kitchen, refectory and warehouse. The monks had to stay isolated five days in their cells, where they also worked, but they came together Saturday and Sunday. Among the laurae were those of Calamon, founded around 450, Elijah (the "monastery of the eunuchs"), John the Baptist at the end of the 5th c. etc. Among the most important were the laura of St. *Euthymius (d. 473) founded in the 5th c. at Mishor Adummin, and that founded by St. *Sabas in the valley of the Cedron. *Cyril of Scythopolis (545–555) lived in the first; he gives information on Euthymius, a native of Melitene in Cappadocia, and his foundation in the Vita Euthymii; his church was dedicated 7 May 428. The monastery was located not far from the road that led from Jerusalem to Jericho. For this reason it was easily accessible to numerous pilgrims; the monastery grew in number of monks and economic prosperity.

Many monks from this laura occupied important posts in Christian communities. St. Sabas too spent some time in this laura. Since 1920 excavations have been carried out which have brought to light the remains of different monasteries. The laurae founded by St. Chariton (4th c.) and by St. Sabas (5th c.) are still active.

B. Flusin, Miracle et Histoire dans l'oeuvre de Cyrille de Scythopolis, Paris 1983; J. Binns, Ascetics and Ambassadors of Christ: The Monasteries of Palestine 314–631, Oxford 1994; Y. Hirschfeld, Holy Sites in the Vicinity of the Monastery of Chariton, in Early Christianity in Context: Monuments and Documents, ed. F. Manns - E. Alliata, Jerusalem 1995, 297-311; J. Patrich - B. Arubas - B. Agur, Monastic Cells in the Desert of Gerasimus near the Jordan, ibid., 277-296; J. Patrich, Sabas, Leader of Palestinian Monasticism, Washington, DC 1996; D. Bar, Christianisation of Rural Palestine During Late Antiquity: Journal of Eccl. History 54 (2003) 401-421; Id., Rural Monasticism a Key Element in the Christianization of Byzantine Palestine: HTR 98 (2005) 49-65 (rich bibl.).

A. Di Berardino

JUDGMENT
I. In the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Fathers. That Christ would return to judge the living and the dead is an affirmation repeated numerous times in the Apostolic Fathers (Barn. 7,2; 2 Clem. 1,1; Polyc., Phil. 2,1) to confirm the faith of the earliest communities in the *parousia of the Lord and in his function as judge ("the justice of the judgment is the beginning and the end of our faith": Barn. 1,6), based on NT passages, among which Mt 25:31-46 stands out, with the separation of the just from sinners as of sheep from goats on the basis of the works performed in this life (L.J. Frahier, Le jugement dernier: implications éthiques sur le bonheur de l'homme: Mt 25,31-46, Paris 1992, bibl. 411-422). The theme of Judgment therefore appears closely connected with that of the parousia and the resurrection of the dead, and recalls the Johannine Apocalypse, for which see, e.g., the study of J.W. Mealy, After the Thousand Years: Resurrection and Judgment in Revelation 20, Sheffield 1992 (JSNTSup 70); in general for the eschatological theme of the judgment in the NT, see the acts of the convention Weltgericht und Weltvollendung: Zukunftsbilder im Neuen Testament, ed. H.-J. Klauck, Freiburg i.B. 1994. Later, the Fathers normally speak of judgment (κρίσις, iudicium) meaning the universal judgment, even if with time a reflection on the particular judgment won some space. In fact, already in the Apostolic Fathers there are references here and there to the idea of individual judgment (in the sense of retribution) immediately after death. Thus St. *Peter and St. *Paul, acc. to *Clement, went directly to the "holy place" to find there the company of the martyrs and saints (1 Clem. 5,4-7). Likewise, the elders of Smyrna knew that *Polycarp received "the crown of immortality" at his death (Mart. Pol. 17,1). In general, however, the judgment is universal and final. Christ the judge will separate the good from the evil to eliminate the confusion in which they lived on earth (1 Clem. 18,1; 2 Clem. 17,4-7). Destruction and death will constitute the destiny of the wicked, the impenitent, false teachers and those who have refused God (e.g., Ign., Pol. 2,3). At the same time, acc. to Clement (1 Clem. 16,3), the sky and the earth will melt like lead in a furnace; and *Hermas (Vis. 4,3) announces that the present world will perish in blood and fire.

To these observations the *apologists add considerations of a more general character. *Theophilus appeals to the authority of the pagans themselves, seeking parallels in their texts and invoking, as proof of the existence of a judgment, the Sibyl and the poets (Ad Aut. II, 36-38), while *Justin recalls the legend of Minos and Rhadamanthus (1 Apol. 8). Furthermore, they tend to insert the reflections on the universal judgment within a natural theodicy which might be more agreeable to the pagan mentality: as Theophilus observes, "If I call him Lord, I call him (at the same time) judge" (Ad Aut. I, 3). Precisely because humanity is free, contrary to what fatalism teaches, it is necessary to think of a system of wrongs and retributions which has its guarantor in God and its executor in Christ (Just., 1 Apol. 43-45). This examination will take place at the parousia; only in Justin (Dial. 5,3) does there seem to be a hint at a particular judgment at the moment of death.

These themes reoccur in the antiheretical polemics of *Irenaeus and *Tertullian. The latter, e.g., observes, against *Marcion, that justice and goodness are two inseparable attributes of God the legislator (Adv. Marc. 1,26); that the existence of the judgment, known to the pagans themselves (Apol. 47), is demonstrated by reason and follows as a consequence of divine omniscience (De spect. 20), adding (De test. an. II, 6) that it is one of those fundamental religious truths in which the spontaneous testimony of the soul is sufficient.

Also in this area *Origen, while remaining faithful to tradition, offered several significant contributions, inserting his reflections on the judgment within the tension, characteristic of his thought, between the desire to preserve traditional doctrine and that of reinterpreting it in a spiritual way so that it could also be accepted by more educated believers. The just judgment of God is an article of faith of the preaching of the church (De princ. III, 1,1); it is a basic motive for moral conduct and a confirmation of free will, as it does not have the goal of terrifying but of stimulating the will to flee evil (Contra Cels. VIII, 48). Also in Origen a doctrine of an intermediate place appears, through which souls pass as if in a school (quodam eruditionis loco . . . auditorio vel schola animarum, De princ. II, 11,6). But the true judgment is the universal one which will take place at the end of the world. At that time there will be a definitive separation between the good and the evil (Contra Cels. IV, 9); everyone will be judged acc. to their works, in conformity with the traditional image of a tribunal (Com. Rom. II, 1-2). Without wanting to minimize the traditional description of the parousia, Origen nevertheless tends to reinterpret the realistic details in an *allegorical perspective. The throne of the judge signifies the majesty of Christ; the register where wrongs are recorded is none other than the ensemble of our thoughts and our acts, carved in the depths of conscience (Com. Rom. IX, 41). For this reason the judgment will be instantaneous (Com. Mt. XIV, 9). Christ will not appear in a certain place: he will manifest everywhere, and human beings will present themselves before his throne in the sense that they will render homage to his authority. They will see themselves as they are, and in the light of such knowledge the good and the bad will be finally and forever distinct (Com. Mt. LXX). Up to *Augustine, the Greek and Latin fathers moved along these lines, sometimes preferring a spiritual interpretation, sometimes, as in the case of the Latins, taking a generally more ancient tone. They speak, however, of judgment in the singular, as of an absolute reality, which has a meaning known to all. To justify it, they refer to the principle already mentioned acc. to which, given that a just distribution of rewards and punishments will not be possible on earth, one must accept that there will be one in the world to come (see, e.g., John Chrys., De diab. 1,8; Ambrosiast., In Rom. II, 3,6). In the footsteps of Origen, then, it is mentioned that wrongs are written on the conscience of human beings (Cyr. Jer., Cat. XV, 25). For *Basil it will be the face of the judge himself that brings the divine illumination that spreads light into our guilty hearts (In Ps. 48,2).

For the Latin fathers of the 3rd and 4th c., the judgment coincides with the parousia, acc. to a now solid tradition (see, e.g., Ambr., De fide II, 12,100-106). Furthermore, they tend to distinguish people into three categories: the just, who do not need to be judged; the impious, who already have been; and the Christians, whose life is a mixture of good and evil and who alone will undergo the judgment (see Hilar., In Ps. I, 15-18; Ambr., In Ps. I, 51-56: in both cases, the starting point is provided by Ps 1:5 and Jn 3:18). Later *Ambrose reveals Origenian influences. In fact, the judgment takes place within the conscience itself of the sinner and as a result of the knowledge of God (Ep. 2,9-10; 73,3). In this perspective the thrones on which the divine judge sits along with the apostles are also interpreted metaphorically (In Luc. X, 49).

Multiple times, Augustine affirms the truth of belief in the divine judgment and justifies it amply in Civ. Dei XX. The judgment of God, in fact, takes place continuously in history; but since it is not always evident, God has reserved a day in which his wisdom and justice will be proclaimed together before all. The judgment belongs in fact to Christ. Sometimes Augustine is led to interpret certain details in an allegorical sense: thus, the book which will be opened signifies the conscience of each individual whose sins will reemerge all together in the memory; but generally a literal interpretation prevails. All humanity will submit to the judgment of Christ: thus he denies the idea, mentioned earlier, that certain categories of humanity will not have to appear.

J. Rivière, art. Jugement: DTC 8, 1721-1828; V. Herntrich - F. Büchsel, κρίνω, in TWNT III, 920-955 (TDNT 3,921-954) ; J. Loosen, art. Gericht. Zeugnisse des kirchl. Lehramtes: LTK² 4, 731-734; EC 6, 727-735; H. Braun, Gerichtsgedanke und Rechtfertigungslehre bei Paulus, Leipzig 1930 (Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 19); A. Descamps, Les justes et la justice dans les évangiles et le christianisme primitif hormis la doctrine proprement paulinienne, Louvain 1950; J. Goubert - L. Cristiani, Les plus beaux textes sur l'au-delà, Paris 1950; var. aus., MySal, XI, Brescia 1978; A. Orbe, Cristología gnóstica: introducción a la soteriología de los siglos II y III, I-II, Madrid 1976 (Biblioteca de autores cristianos 384-385); M.E. Stone, Signs of the Judgement, Onomastica sacra and the Generations from Adam, Chico, CA 1981; M. Reiser, Die Gerichtspredigt Jesu: eine Untersuchung zur eschatologischen Verkündigung Jesu und ihrem frühjüdischen Hintergrund, Münster 1990 (Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen. N.F. 23); B. Opalinski, Pelagius and Romans 3–5: Examining Grace and Human Effort, paper presented at of the Annual Meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, Atlanta, 22-25Nov. 2003; J. Tloka, Griechische Christen—Christliche Griechen, Tübingen 2005; M.B. Moser, Teacher of Holiness, Piscataway, NJ 2005; A. Becker, Fear of God and the Beginning of Wisdom, Philadelphia 2006; P. Tzamalikos, Origen: Cosmology and Ontology of Time, Leiden 2006.

G. Filoramo - I. Ramelli

II. Iconography. A group of artworks present in Roman funeral monuments has been interpreted by Wilpert as judgment scenes: from the singular representations of the hypogeum of Vibia to the slab with the inscription of Theodolus found in the cemetery of St. Marcus and St. Marcellianus, to a painting in the cemetery of Cyriaca at the Ager Veranus, to a fresco in the cemetery of St. Hermes on the Via Salaria. Among these, only the last displays a "judiciary" apparatus, but it should be specified that if one must speak of judgment this is certainly not in fieri, since that would not be coherent with the nature of primitive Christian art, pervaded by the fundamental concept of the saving work of Christ and therefore, by its own intrinsic exigencies, alien to any kind of pessimism, but rather it must be considered a judgment already passed with favorable results, and therefore the representations must be taken as scenes of receptio of the soul on the part of Christ in Paradise. To the monuments mentioned by Wilpert should be added a relief in the catacomb of St. Victorinus in Amiternum, a picture in the arcosolium of Marcia in the Cassia catacomb at Syracuse and perhaps another painting also at Syracuse in the catacomb of St. John. The iconographic formulation of the mentioned scenes is not fixed and therefore repeatable, but elaborated on different occasions in different ways: the only constant and qualifying element seems to be the gesture of Christ, who welcomes the soul into his kingdom.

L. Pani Ermini, Il santuario di S. Vittorino in Amiternum. Note sulla sua origine: Riv. di Archeol. 3 (1979) 98f.

L. Pani Ermini

JULIA of Antioch (4th–5th c.). The information which we possess today on this *Manichean "elect," who lived between the 4th and 5th c., comes entirely from a single source: the Life of Porphyrius, Bishop of Gaza, written by his deacon Marcus (CPG III, 7622). In this text it is narrated (37, 85-91) how Julia, a follower of Mani, originally from *Antioch, had begun in the year 400 carrying out in *Gaza, in *Palestine, an active and successful effort of propaganda, an effort which was aimed primarily at neophytes. The bishop of the place, *Porphyry, having learned what was happening, immediately summoned the woman to interrogate her. She, after having "confessed" (87,4: homologein) her own origin and adherence to Manicheism, although energetically warned concerning her teaching, refused to renounce it in any way, showing herself ready on the contrary to confront an adversary. The encounter, fixed for the next day, saw Julia, accompanied by four disciples, defending herself with conviction and competence, but in vain. For the bishop, irritated by having heard so many "blasphemous things," launched a curse of a magical flavor against her (89,7-10), whose effect did not delay in making itself felt: the cursed woman, having collapsed to the ground, paralyzed and deprived of the capacity for speech, died in a short time, despite the incantations pronounced in her ear by her companions. The latter, for their part, shocked by the event, anathematized Mani and converted, along with numerous pagans.

According to the most recent criticism (M. Scopello), the writing—despite displaying a state halfway between historic reconstruction and romantic account—once purged of the polemical and propagandistic excesses, permits the observation of the habits and methods of the Manichean "mission" in the act. For it reveals clearly how Manicheism had developed rather early a notable activity of proselytism from which women were anything but excluded (cf. also in this regard the pastoral letter attributed to Theonas of Alexandria [Papyrus Rylands 469, l. 29-35], which dates to 280), but rather exercising roles of clear distinction and responsibility; next it allows one to see the level of organization which supported this same propaganda, often planned in the most minute details (see ibid.), whether on the economic level (Julia uses riches to convince the persons with whom she comes in contact and enjoys in any case an indisputable financial support: 85,6-7), or on that of prior investigation of the terrain (the electa knows exactly toward which individuals or groups to orient herself for a first attempt) and, not least, of persuasive technique. For Julia demonstrates choosing a gradual approach, "door to door," to win (acc. to the text "surreptitiously"—hypeiselthousa) the confidence of her listeners. For this purpose she avoids declaring, at least at first, her own religious adherence, and rather seems to put the figure of Christ at the center of her own discourses. To this is added the fact that the entirety of the preaching, by her and her companions, is described as profoundly anchored in a markedly pagan cultural system with appeals to philosophical argumentation and to knowledge of an astronomical and astrological character. All this confirms the known framework of Manichean universalism, as well as its capacity to adapt itself to the environments with which it entered in relation. The accusation then, directed at Julia and at her companions, of practicing goēteia and of being pharmakoi, although it could be considered almost a polemical topos, should today be analyzed in the light of an objective fact which is now better known to us. For it is probable that the various accusations connected with magic took their origin from the misunderstanding, more or less intentional, of the medical expertise often demonstrated by the adepts of the sect (and inherited from Mani), an expertise joined by a sought-after ability in the preparation of pharmaceutical remedies on the basis of plants and herbs (see Epiph., Panarion 66,3,7). Thus the act of the disciples, bent over their suffering teacher, could also receive interpretations different from those of the author. For current knowledge of peculiar *gnostic practices permits us to suppose that they, far from attempting *thaumaturgic incantations, were practicing a specific Manichean rite, which consisted in murmuring prayers in the ear of the dying, which would allow the soul to traverse unharmed the passage to the beyond, suggesting the necessary passwords to pass through the spheres and to avoid the traps of the archons. In this case the companions of Julia in her proselytizing mission would have been "elect," inasmuch as the knowledge of the power of the nomina was reserved to these alone (see Acta Archelai, ed. Ch. Beeson, GCS 16, Leipzig, 1906, 19, 18-22), and that would add an additional reinforcement to our reconstruction of the structure of the Manichean "mission."

In conclusion it is possible to say that the most recent studies reveal widespread interest in this figure, her dramatic story and, above all, the text which transmits it.

Marc Diacre, Vie de Porphyre, évêque de Gaza, ed. H. Grégoire - M. Kugener (Belles Lettres. Collection Byzantine), Paris 1930; P. Peeters, La vie géorgienne de saint Porphyre de Gaza: AB 59 (1941) 65-216; M. Scopello, Julie, manichéenne d'Antioche (d'après la Vie de Porphyre de Marc le diacre, ch. 85-91): Antiquité Tardive 5 (1997) 187-209 (with a new tr. of the chapters concerning Julia, 189-190); Id., Femmes et propagande dans le manichéisme: Connaissance des Pères de l'Église 83 (2001) 35-44 (partially on Julia, p. 37-40).

E. Zocca

JULIAN, Apollinarist (end 4th c.). The Doctrina Patrum de Incarnatione Verbi preserves the fragment of a letter which it attributes to Julian, disciple of *Apollinaris, and says that it was written in response to the "codisciple" *Polemon (Lietzmann, fr. 180,277). A treatise of the master is addressed to Julian, of which the same Doctrina Patrum preserves fragments (Lietzmann, fr. 150-152, 247-248). The fragment of the letter takes up the same themes as the fragments of the treatise, in particular the theme of the ὁ θεῖος νοῦς αὐτοκίνητος, concerning the works and sufferings of Christ and his unique nature and substance. The fragment of Julian's letter might suggest that he came to agree with Polemon, chief of the extreme Apollinarist party, following the interpretation of the treatise which Apollinaris addressed to him (see Lietzmann, 40f.; 153).

CPG 3720; H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris von Laodicea und seine Schule, Tübingen 1904; F. Diekamp, Doctrina patrum, Münster 1907, 380, XX.

E. Cavalcanti

JULIAN, Arian (4th c.). At the end of the 19th century, when the studies of the catenae began, H. Usener and later L. Dieu attributed to *Julian of Halicarnassus the entirety of the fragments of a Commentary on the Book of Job, traceable in the catenae (see H. Lietzmann, Catenen, 28-34 and L. Dieu, Fragments dogmatiques de Julien d'Halicarnasse, 192-196). This attribution was repeated also when a Prologue in an Armenian translation to that commentary was published (P. Ferhat, Der Jobprolog, 26-31). In 1924, R. Draguet took up the question on the occasion of his studies of Julian of Halicarnassus and judged for the first time that the attribution was not justified. From internal examination he deduced that one should think of an *Arian author of the 4th c. On this track, D. Hagedorn, after looking over the direct and indirect tradition and the complex problem of the different attributions, reconstructed the commentary on Job and produced the critical edition in 1973. He identifies the author with the Julian to whom certain MSS attribute the Prologue, and establishes the spatio-temporal location of this author through a comparative study of the Commentary on Job with the Apostolic Constitutions and with the ps.-Ignatian letters. These writings are assigned by Hagedorn to the same author, Julian, who is placed in an Antiochene Arian environment between 357 and 379–381. To Julian are also attributed the 85 Canons of the Apostles, which originally were part of the Apostolic Constitutions.*

CPG II, 2075; H. Lietzmann, Catenen. Mitteilungen über ihre Geschichte und handschriftliche Überlieferung, Freiburg 1897, 28-34; D. Hagedorn, Der Hiobkommentar des Arianers Julian, Berlin 1973; R. Draguet, Un commentaire grec arien sur Job: RHE 20 (1924) 38-65; Id., Julien d'Halicarnasse: DTC 8, 2, 1931ff.; P. Ferhat, Der Jobprolog des Julianos von Halikarnassos in einer armenischen Bearbeitung: OC n.s. 1 (1911) 26-31.

E. Cavalcanti

JULIAN (the Apostate), emperor (331–363). Flavius Iulianus Augustus, the Apostate (ἀποστάτης and also παραβάτης = "transgressor"), Roman emperor. He was born at *Constantinople in 331 to Julius Constantius and Basilina. Julian and his brother Gallus were the only survivors of the slaughter of all the Constantinians ordered by *Constantius between 337 and 338. Educated at Nicomedia under the care of the bishop *Eusebius, he was influenced by the Scythian eunuch Mardonius, a fervent admirer of classical culture and follower of philosophical abstraction; it was a strange type of upbringing which later conditioned the tormented difficulties of the emperor and, in short, every act of his life. The tutor having died, Constantius, thinking that the two youths might become a dangerous menace, isolated them in Cappadocia at Macellum in 344. Julian found refuge in the study of classical literature, attracted at the same time by Judaism and Christianity. He received baptism very quickly, reached the lectorate and for a certain time cultivated the idea of embracing ecclesiastical orders. The writings of his maturity preserve traces of the sincerity of the ideas which animated this intense period of study and reflection. In 351 Constantius, with a tactical change of opinion, made his cousin Gallus Caesar, while Julian was recalled to Constantinople, where he grew interested in *Neoplatonism. But the idyllic parenthesis only lasted three years; in 354 Gallus was decapitated and Julian was called upon to refute charges of secret anti-imperial views. Saved by the intervention of the empress, Julian was sent into forced residence at *Athens; there, despite encountering personalities like *Gregory of Nazianzus and *Basil of Caesarea, he was influenced decisively by the philosophers Ierius and Diogenes, from which a metanoia emerged, aimed at a return to paganism. After a period of ambiguous oscillation, Julian gradually detached himself from the religion of Christ, which he abandoned in a definitive and official form during a series of visits to the most celebrated pagan sanctuaries of Greece.

Meanwhile the serious political situation persuaded Constantius to call his cousin to the court; in 355 he married the sister of the empress Helena and, in front of the troops, received military investiture at *Milan; he then departed in the direction of *Gaul, deprived of real powers, but accompanied by officials who had the task of watching him. Although in particularly precarious military conditions, Julian defeated the Alamanni at Strasbourg (357); besieged the Franks and conquered Paris; reordered, in 358, the administration of the province, reducing taxes and exercising a more just fiscal oversight; subdued the Salian Franks; and reestablished free navigation on the Rhine. During this period Constantius, while he was defeating the Quadi and the Sarmatians, proved himself inept at settling the religious controversies which had sprung up almost everywhere in the empire. Faced with the Persian threat which menaced the Roman borders in Mesopotamia, it was necessary to strip the western command, where Julian by now enjoyed the unconditional favor of the troops. During the military revolt which followed, Julian, although reluctant, was declared Augustus through elevation on the shields acc. to the Germanic custom (360). Declared deposed by Constantius, Julian tried in every way to avoid the inevitable civil war, but this was made possible only by the unexpected death of the emperor which took place in 361, when he was already preparing to march in the direction of the West. The enthusiasm was enormous with which Julian was received at Constantinople, where the new emperor, who declared himself "Greek among the Greeks," immediately began a series of reforms aimed at lightening the vexatious tax burden, at reducing personal privileges, at distributing honors with equanimity, at moralizing the military administration by imposing a return to a more iron discipline. But the empire had by now entered into a fatal decline, and Julian was fully conscious of the irreversible crisis, of which he thought to identify the now triumphant Christianity as the main responsible party. In the last attempt to stop its further development, Julian restored the Hellenic religion, passing from a first phase of toleration to true and proper persecutions against the Christians.

Particularly important are the edicts on the return home of bishops exiled from Constantinople, on teachers and on funerals. With the first it is possible to measure the good faith with which the emperor sought to return to the principles sanctioned by the *Edict of Milan, but the reaction of the pagan element was not such as to allow illusions about the possibility of peaceful coexistence. Faced with the necessity of a choice, Julian hardened his anti-Christian policy and provoked the reorganization of pagan worship. The edict on teachers, with which it was decreed that the classic authors could be read and commented only by those who believed in the gods, while it removed from teaching the most cultivated and thoughtful spirits of the time, sanctioned de facto the confessional state. But paganism, now crystallized in antiquated cultural forms, was incapable of expressing the noble intentions of the emperor who, however, in the reorganization of the priesthood and the forms of worship, imitated despite himself the by-now consolidated Christian customs and above all sought to spread the NT idea of repentance as the unique possibility of redemption. Nor could the pagans understand the intimate spirituality of the emperor, who showed that he attached greater importance to the principles of charity, of ascetic perfection, of an exquisitely spiritual theology rather than to the acquisition of goods and material honors.

Faced with the extremism of the reactionaries,

Julian did not know how or did not want to impose his will completely. Besides the serious religious problem, new unsettling signs were arriving from the tortured Danube borders, but the emperor sought first of all to resolve the Persian problem. After a series of courageous endeavors, 26 June 363, having pushed far into enemy territory, he was struck mortally by a javelin. He died pronouncing noble words on the immortality of the soul, incapable of seeing, even to the end, that the empire had reached its sunset and that he himself, with his attempt at restoration, had only hastened the end.

Of his writings let us mention eight orations, around eighty letters, two satires, the Antiochicus or Misopogon and the Banquet of the Caesars, two *panegyrics for the emperor Constantius, that for the empress Eusebia, the fragments of the polemic Against the Galileans and the Letter to the Athenians. His commentaries on the campaign in Gallia and another on the wars against the Germans have been lost.

Sources: Beyond the works of Julian himself, Ammianus Marcellinus and the ecclesiastical historians: Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Philostorgius, Libanius, Themistius, Gregory of Nazianzus, Eunapius, the Panegyric of Mamertinus (Gratiarum actio Iuliano). J. Bidez - F. Cumont, Iuliani imperatoris epistulae leges poemata fragmenta, Paris 1922. J. Bidez supervised later the ed. of all the letters. The Contra Christianos was ed. by C.J. Neumann, Leipzig 1880; there are many It. tr. esp. Rostagni (Turin 1920); note also W.C. Wright, The Works of the Emperor Julian, 3 vols., Cambridge-London 1913-26; G. Rochefort, A Themistius; Contre Heracleios le cynique; Sur la mère des Dieux; Contre les cyniques ignorants, Paris 1963; C. Prato - D. Micalella, G. Imperatore, Contro i Cinici ignoranti, Lecce 1988; E. Masaracchia, G. imperatore, Contra Galilaeos, Rome 1990; M. Caltabiano, L'epistolario di Giuliano Imperatore, Naples 1991; C. Prato - A. Marcone, G. Imperatore, Alla madre degli dèi e altri discorsi, Milan [5]1997; I. Tantillo, La prima orazione di G. a Constantius, Rome 1997; R. Guido, G. imperatore, Al Cinico Eraclio, Galatina 2000 (= 2002). The index of epigraphic texts is in De Ruggiero, Dizion. epigr. IV, s.v.

Studies: PWK X, 26-91 and Suppl. 8, 755f.; A.R. Birley, NP VI, 10; P. Allard, Julien l'Apostate, 3 vols., Paris 1900; S. Mazzarino, Aspetti sociali del IV secolo, Rome 1951; E. Vacchina, Flavio G. l'apostata, Rome 1971; G.W. Bowersock, Julian the Apostate, Cambridge, MA 1978; A. Selem, G. l'Apostata nelle Storie di Ammiano, Rome 1979; S. Scicolone, Aspetti della persecuzione giulianea: RSCI 33 (1979) 420-434; G. Bonamente, G. l'Apostata e il Breviario di Eutropio, Rome 1986; D.M. Cosi, Casta mater Idaea: G. l'Apostata e l'etica della sessualità, Venezia 1986; G. Vidal, G., It. tr., Milan 1990; P. Athanassiadi, G.: ultimo degli imperatori pagani, It. tr., Genoa 1994; F.E. Consolino et al., Pagani e cristiani da G. l'Apostata al sacco di Roma. Atti del Conv. int. di studi, Rende, 12-13 novembre 1993, Soveria Mannelli 1995; C. Franco, L'immagine di Alessandro in G. imperatore: Studi Classici e Or. 46 (1997-98) 637-658; G. imperatore, le sue idee, i suoi amici, i suoi avversari. Atti del conv. int. di studi, Lecce 10-12 dicembre 1998, Galatina 1998, with many very important essays; C. Buenacasa, La política religiosa del emperador Juliano y los Valentinianos. Los privilegios de la Iglesia entre los años 361-372, in Homenaje el Profesor Montenegro. Estudios de Historia Antigua, Valladolid 1999, 737-748.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

JULIAN of Brioude (d. 250?). There are two Passiones of this famous martyr of Brioude in the Auvergne, the older of which offers more reliable information. *Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. 3,7) and *Gregory of Tours (Libri Octo Miraculorum, 2), who was very attached to the veneration of Julian, mention him. Born at *Vienne, he fled during a persecution (perhaps that of Decius) to Brioude, where he was decapitated. His head was brought to Vienne while his body was buried at Brioude. In the 5th c. a basilica was built on the tomb of Julian, which became the most important sanctuary in the Auvergne. Eligius of Noyon decorated his tomb.

BHL 4540-4542; BS 6, 1191; P. Cubizolles, S. Julien de Brioude, martyr, Brioude 1987; M. Vieillard-Troiekouroff, Les monuments religieux de la Gaule d'après les oeuvres de Grégoire de Tours, Paris 1976, 65-70.

S. Samulowitz

JULIAN of Cos (d. before 460). Born in *Italy and educated at *Rome, bishop of Cos (the island of Cos or else Cos in Bithynia). He took part in 448 in the Synod of *Constantinople. He was one of the legates of *Leo I to the Council of *Chalcedon (451). For supporting Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople who sought to have can. 28 of the council acknowledged, concerning the primacy of his see, he was reproved by Leo, but he did not lose his confidence. He was the first permanent papal representative at the imperial court, charged with watching over orthodoxy and providing information to the pope; further, he was also employed in the translation of contemporary synodal acts. He died at Constantinople before 460.

ACO II/5 (34) 66,1-39. - T. Jalland, The Life and Times of St. Leo the Great, London 1941; H.J. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1979, 114-118; LTK[3] 5, 1079f.; Ph. Blaudeau, Vice mea. Remarques sur les représentations pontificales auprès de l'empereur d'Orient dans la seconde moitié du V^e^ siècle (452-496): MEFRA 113 (2002) 1058-1123; DHGE 28, 523-524.

B. Studer

JULIAN of Eclanum (386–454). Son of the bishop Memor, at around 30 years of age (in 416) he was consecrated bishop of Eclanum (the ancient Quintodecimo, Aquaputida in Apulia, today Mirabella Eclano near Avellino in Campania). He was already known to *Augustine due to his friendship with his father (Ep. 101; C. Iulianum 1,4,12), who had been his guest in Hippo in 408 (Ep. 101,1-4 requested for Julian De musica and Augustine expressed the wish to have the son Julian as a guest). Julian had paraphrased the Chronicon of *Sulpicius Severus (Op. imp. 5,24; 7,1-4). He became famous in the church when in 418 he refused to sign the Ep. Tractoria of Pope *Zosimus, which confirmed the condemnation of the *Pelagians, and wrote 2 letters to the pope to request explanations, accusing at the same time the church of Rome of prevarications and of collusion with *Manicheism (Contra 2 ep. pelag. 2,3,5). His request was not accepted, and furthermore he ran into the same condemnation as 18 Italian bishops who had also refused to sign the Tractoria (Aug., C. Iulianum 3,1-4). He turned then to the comes Valerius of Ravenna, who passed the request to Augustine. The latter answered him with the 1st book of De nuptiis et concupiscentia (he wrote the 2nd after the response of Julian contained in the 4 books Ad Turbantium). Meanwhile, Augustine began to respond systematically to Julian: to the 2 letters of Julian (to Rufus and to the Romans) which Pope Boniface had sent him, with the work Contra duas ep. pelagianorum; to the 4 books to Turbantius with the Contra Iulianum; for the refutation of the 8 books of Julian (Ad Florum) written in response to the 2nd book of Augustine's De nup. et conc., he waited until the end of his life (Contra secundam Iuliani responsionem opus imperfectum), without, however, completing it (he finished refuting 6 of the books). Beyond the polemic with Augustine, Julian also had a sizeable exegetical activity, along the lines of the *Antiochene school, both as an exegete (Commentary on the Minor Prophets and on Job) and as a translator (Th. Mopsuesteni in psalmos: CCL 88, 1978). Attempts to reconcile him with the Church of Rome met with no success, and he died in exile, perhaps in Sicily. The polemical activity of Julian with Augustine is filled with acrimony: he reproves Augustine over many things, both on a familiar and personal level as well as concerning what is the proper interpretation of Christianity. He accused him of denying free will, of devaluing the importance of the law in the Christian life, of resurrecting Manicheism with his defense of original sin, denying, as a result, both the goodness of marriage and the very goodness of human sensibility because it is infected with "concupiscence." His accusations against Augustine were radical and global and, perhaps, for that reason received a detailed and meticulous response from Augustine himself.

The work of Julian should be studied for its literary value (style, language and models employed); for its *exegesis (from his use of the biblical text close to the circles of Aquileia, to his exegesis which favored an Antiochene approach); for its theological method. Concerning theological method, of the 3 common sources of theological research (the Scriptures, ratio [reason] and the authority of holy men), he puts ratio in 1st place because it constitutes intrinsic argumentation compared to the extrinsic ones of the Scriptures and authority. He writes: Quod ratio arguit, non potest auctoritas vindicare (Aug., Opus imp. 2,16). It escaped Julian, "architect of the Pelagian dogma" (Aug., C. Iulianum 6,11,36), however, that the primacy of reason is of the order of the presuppositions for logical knowledge and not of judgment in itself. As for his theological thought, esp. notable in him is the depth on the ethical plane (nature and goodness of sensibility and therefore of marriage) of the basic principle of Pelagian theology, that of the creation. However, compared to Augustine, he lacks a global vision of the Christian mystery whose historical trajectory starts from the creation, passes through the two Adams and ends at the eternity of God. The discussion with Augustine (between a Punic and an Apulian orator Op. imp. 6,18) took place above all on the exegetical plane and that of method: the hermeneutical key (Op. imp. 2,22), the role of the doctrinal authorities within the church (Op. imp. 2,1, the appeal above all concerned *Ambrose), and the theological points of contact (Augustine reproached Julian, noting that the idea of the Christian people as a witness to the Christian faith was alien to him and that in his arguments he was not preserving the universality of the redemption in Christ [Op. imp. 2,188]).

CPL 773-777; Verzeichnis, 414-416 and see esp. Patrologia III, 463; PL 44; CCL 88A (1977); CCL 88 (1978); A. Brückner, Julianum von Eclanum. Sein Leben und seine Lehre. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Pelagianismus (TU 15/13), Leipzig 1897; G. Bowman, Des Julian von Aeclanum Kommentar Zu den Propheten Osee, Joel und Amos. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Exegese, Rome 1958; H.I. Marrou, La canonisation de Julien d'Eclane: Hist. Jahrbuch 77 (1958) 434-437 (= Festchrift B. Altaner); F. Perago, Annali della facoltà di lettere e filosofia dell'Università di Napoli 10 (1962-1963) 143-160; F. Refoulé, Julien d'Eclane, théologien et philosophe: Rec-SR 52 (1964) 42-84, 233-247; N. Cipriani, Aspetti letterari dell'Ad Florum di Giuliano d'Eclano: Augustinianum 15 (1975) 125-167; Y.-M. Duval, Julien d'Eclane et Rufin d'Aquilée. Du concile de Rimini à la répression pélagienne. L'intervention impériale en matière religieuse: REAug 24 (1978) 243-271; Patrologia III, 460-464; N. Cipriani, Echi antiapollinaristici e aristotelismo nella polemica di G. d'Eclano: Augustinianum 21 (1981) 373-389; Ph.L. Barclift, In Controversy with Augustine: Julian of Aeclanum on the Nature of Sin: Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 58 (1991) 5-20; N. Cipriani, Introduzione, in Opere di S. Agostino, NBA XIX/1-2, Rome 1992 and 1994; M. Lamberigts, Julianum of Aeclanum: A Plea for a Good Creator: Augustiniana 38 (1988) 5-24; Id., Iulianus IV: RAC 19, 149-150, 483-505; Id., Recent Research into Pela- gianism with Particular Emphasis on the Role of Julian of Aeclanum: Augustiniana 52 (2002) 175-198; Ch. Pietri, Prosopographie de l'Italie chrétienne (313-604), I. (A-K), Rome 1999, 1175-1186; J. Lössl, Te Apulia genuit (c. Iul. imp. op. 6,18). Some Notes on the Birthplace of Julian of Eclanum: REAug 44 (1998) 223-239; Id., Julianum von Aeclanum. Studien zu seinem Leben, seinem Werk, seiner Lehre und ihrer Überlieferung, Leiden 2001; Id., Julian of Aeclanum on Pain: JECS 10 (2002) 203-243; M.C. Pennacchio, L'esegesi patristica di Osea nei secoli IV-V. Teodoro di Mopsuestia, Teodoreto di Ciro, Cirillo di Alessandria, Girolamo, Giuliano di Eclano (SEA 81), Rome 2002; R. Villegas Marín, En polémica con Julián de Eclanum: por una nueva lectura del "Syllabus de gratia" de Próspero de Aquitania: Augustinianum 43 (2003) 81-124; A.V. Nazzaro (ed.), Giuliano d'Eclano e l'Hirpinia Christiana. Atti del Convegno Internazionale di Studi (Mirabella Eclano 4-6 giugno 2003), Naples 2004.

V. Grossi

JULIAN of Halicarnassus (d. after 527). Bishop of Halicarnassus of *monophysite creed, around 510 he collaborated with *Severus of Antioch to foment at *Constantinople the disorders which led to the deposition of the patriarch *Macedonius. The antimonophysite reaction which followed the arrival to the throne of *Justin (518) forced him to take refuge, along with Severus, in Egypt. Already during the stay in Constantinople Severus had had occasion to define the body of Christ before the resurrection as corruptible (phthartos). Not convinced, Julian, around 520, wrote in Egypt a Tomus to demonstrate that the body of Christ had always been, by nature, immune to corruption, suffering and death. He sent the work to Severus so that he might examine it; the latter maintained his original position and replied in this sense, and the resulting polemic led to the rupture between the two friends. This ended around 527, and Julian, already old when he went to Egypt, must have died shortly after. Because of this controversy, beyond the Tomus, he wrote Additions to the Tomus, an Apology or Discourse Against the Manicheans and the Eutychians, Against the Blasphemies of Severus. All these works have been lost. We gather information and extensive fragments of them from the refutation which Severus wrote of the first 3 works, which has reached us in *Syriac translation; we add to them the accompanying letters of the first two works addressed to Severus and some other fragments derived from other works. Julian was immediately classified as a radical monophysite, in the sense that, acc. to him, the incarnation of the Logos had provoked an alteration of the characteristics of the body of Christ—i.e., its incorruptibility—and therefore his followers were named *aphthartodocetists; but the studies of Draguet have notably altered this judgment. In fact, while Severus minimized the effects which the sin of Adam had produced in his descendants and thought that Adam was created ab origine corruptible and mortal, Julian thought that Adam was created incorruptible and immortal, and that corruptibility and mortality were the consequences of sin. Therefore, given that Christ was immune from sin, his body, like that of Adam before sin, was immune to corruptibility, passibility and mortality, while Severus maintained that the body of Christ had assumed these gifts only after the resurrection. With this Julian meant to maintain, not as he was accused, i.e., that the sufferings of Christ had only been apparent, but rather that Christ, naturally immune to suffering and death, had suffered and died of his own will. With the idea of voluntary corruptibility and mortality Julian thought he had reconciled the reality of the passion and death of Christ with the absence in him of original *sin. The doctrine of Julian had a certain following in various regions of the East, esp. in Egypt, where one of his friends, *Gaianus, succeeded for a little while in occupying the patriarchal see of *Alexandria. For this reason the Julianists were also called Gaianists.

CPG III, 7125-7127; CSCO 244-245; DTC 8, 1931-1940; R. Draguet, Julien d'Halicarnasse et sa controverse avec Sévère d'Antioche, Louvain 1924; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^e siècle, (CSCO 127 Sub 2), Leuven 1951, 125-131; A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, II.2, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1989, 83-116; TRE 16, 739, 29-41; H.U. Rosenbaum, Julianos v. Halikarnass: BBKL 3 (1992) 792-794; R. Kany, Julianos v. Halikarnassos: LTK³ 5, 1078; Julian of Halicarnassus: ODC (1998) 909; LACL (1998) 362.

M. Simonetti

JULIAN of Serdica (5th c.). Bishop of *Serdica. He took part in the Council of *Ephesus (431), taking up the defense of *John of Antioch, which he maintained until his death (Mansi 4, 1411; 5, 767; Theodoret, Ep. 170). With him Julian signed the letter to the church of Hierapolis (Mansi 5, 776).

CPG 5798; ACO 1, 1, 7, 139-140; C. Hole: DBC 3, 472; DHGE 28, 531-532.

S. Borzì

JULIAN of Tabia (5th c.). Bishop of Tabia, he played a primary role in the acknowledgment of the *monophysite theses of *Eutyches and in the condemnation of Flavian during the "latrocinium of Ephesus" (449). He took part in the Council of *Chalcedon in 451 (Mansi 6, 571, 546, 1092; 7, 147, 404). He informed the emperor *Leo of the death of Poterius (458) (Mansi 7, 616). He wrote many sermons, preserved in *Georgian and Old Russian, and a sermon on the baptism of Christ, this too known in Georgian.

CPG 6155; J.W. Dawis: DCB 3, 472, n. 21; K. Kekelidze, Monumenta Hagiographica Georgica. Pars prima, Keimena, t. I, Tiflis 1918, 10-15; M. von Esbroeck, Les plus anciennes homéliaires géorgiens (Publication de l'Institut Orientaliste de Louvain 10), Louvain-la-Neuve 1975, 73, 297f.

S. Borzì

JULIAN of Toledo (642–690). Bishop of Toledo. Felix, his successor, wrote his elogium (PL 96, 445-452), without speaking of his family; a later source, well informed, the Mozarabic Chronicle of 754, considers him a descendant of Jews: a rather surprising bit of information, but which might be true. He was trained in the school of the Toledan bishopric, under the guidance of the bishop *Eugenius. He received tonsure toward 668 and in January of 680 was consecrated bishop of Toledo. He participated in some way in the deposition of King Wamba and the election of Ervig, with whom he collaborated and toward whom he was always a good friend.

During his government four Toledan councils were held (from 12th to 15th), and he always presided. He obtained that the diocese of Toledo should always be the first see of all *Spain. His conception of the Church of Spain as a single entity, with the see of Toledo at its head, probably provoked his famous conflict with Rome. In the name of the Church of Spain, he confirmed the Acts of the 6th Ecumenical Council, and for this he was censured by Pope *Benedict II, who reproached him for several perilous expressions in the Apologeticum, composed by him to defend those acts, and which at a later time was ratified in all its parts by the 14th Council of Toledo. In 688, the 15th Council of Toledo approved a new text by Julian, where he insisted on the formulas used in the Apologeticum; the council adopted it, harshly censuring the Roman theologians who chose not to understand the theological subtleties, although orthodox, of the first text of Julian. The Church of Spain's awareness of itself was about to provoke a conflict with Rome with consequences unforeseeable at that time. The certainty and exactness with which Julian treated the writings of the Fathers is the best demonstration of his intellectual capacity and of the richness of the library of the church of Toledo. Preoccupied by the problem of the ecclesiastical unity of the *Visigothic monarchy, Julian strove to definitively unify the Spanish liturgy (see *Hispanic liturgy), imposing common norms and rites, which were put in practice in 682–683. He supervised the classical and theological education of his clergy one on one, given that he himself, in all likelihood, was responsible for some lessons of the Grammatica, which survive in a mediocre elaboration.

He died in 690 and was buried in the Toledan church of St. Leocadia, where the councils of Toledo customarily met.

In honor of *Idalius of Barcelona he composed a treatise on the last things, in the form of a catena of patristic texts: the Prognosticon futuri saeculi, which was popular in the Middle Ages. At the request of King Ervig, as part of anti-Jewish polemics, he wrote three books—De comprobatione sextae aetatis. To facilitate biblical studies, he wrote two books Antikeimenon, where he tried to explain the contradictions between the two testaments. His Historia de Wamba, where he narrates the rebellion of Paul, general of *Gaul, against that king, was perhaps born from political pressures. Its appendices (Insultatio in tyrannidem Galliae and Judicium) taken as a rhetorical whole reflect a propagandistic tone. The warm elegy of *Ildefonsus, which he added as an appendix to Ildefonsus's treatise De viris illustribus, should be read in light of his political stance in which he sought to exalt the church of Toledo—a policy, furthermore, already begun by *Ildefonsus.

Recently a letter in verse has been attributed to him, addressed to a certain bishop Modoenus, in which metric poetry is preferred to rhythmic (Bischoff). On the other hand, on the base of the elogium of Felix many other writings are considered the work of Julian, concerning which, however, criticism has not yet provided a definitive pronouncement. This is the case of the Liber responsionum, the Liber carminum diversorum, the Liber sermonum, the Excerpta de libris S. Augustini, but also of the Libellus de divinis iudiciis, the Liber missarum, the Liber orationum and the Liber plurimarum epistolarum.

CPL 1258-1266; Díaz 264-277; PL 96, 43-44, 453-800; PLS 4, 2289-2292; CCL 115; M.A.H. Maestre Yenes, Ars Juliani Toletani Episcopi, Toledo 1973; F. Görres, Der Primas Julian von Toledo (680-690): Zeitschrift fur wissenschaftliche Theologie 46 (1903) 524-533; Z. García Villada, Historia ec. de España, II, 1, 96-106, 149-160; A. Veiga Valina, La doctrina escatológica de S. Julián de Toledo, Lugo 1940; J.F. Rivera Recio, San Julián, Arzobispo de Toledo, Barcelona 1944; J. Madoz, San Julián de Toledo: EstEcl 26 (1952) 36-69; Id., Fuentes teológico-literarias de S. Julián de Toledo: Gregorianum 33 (1952) 399-417; J.N. Hillgarth, El Prognosticon futuri saeculi de S. Julián de Toledo: AST 30 (1957) 5-61; B. Bischoff, Ein Brief Julians von Toledo über Rhythmen, metrische Dichtung und Prosa: Hermes 67 (1959) 247-256; A. Robles Sierra, Fuentes literarias del Antikeimenon de Julián de Toledo: Escritos del Vedat 1 (1971) 58-135; MC. Díaz y Díaz, La fecha de implantación del oracional festivo visigótico: Boletín Arqueologico (Tarragona) 113-120 (1971/2) 215-243; DHEE 2, 1259-1260; J. Campos, San Agustín y la escatología de San Julián de Toledo: Augustinus 25 (1980) 107-115; M. Strohm, Der Konflikt zwischen Erzbischof Julian von Toledo und Papst Benedikt II: Annuarium Historiae Conciliorum 15 (1983) 249-259; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 389-453.

M. Díaz y Díaz

JULIAN POMERIUS (5th–6th c.). A native of Mauretania, he settled in S *Gaul, perhaps due to the difficulties following the *Vandal invasion, and lived at *Arles in the 2nd half of the 5th c., becoming famous there for his teaching and his rhetorical expertise. He was in contact with the illustrious figures of his time, such as *Ennodius of Pavia, *Caesarius of Arles (whose teacher he was when, in 498, Caesarius left the monastery of *Lérins to settle at Arles) and *Ruricius of Limoges. The latter (Epist. II, 10) calls him abbot, while ps.-Gennadius (Vir. ill. 109) says he was a presbyter of the Gallican church. Ps.-Gennadius and *Isidore of Seville (Vir. ill. 25) attribute numerous writings to him. Only the treatise has reached us, in three books, De vita contemplativa, once attributed to *Prosper of Aquitaine, now claimed for Julian Pomerius with general agreement. The title is more properly adapted to the first book, while the second and third confront the broad theme of the Christian virtues and the appropriate means for practicing them.

CPL 998; PL 59, 415-520; The Contemplative Life, Eng. tr., M.J. Suelzer, Westminster, MD 1947, repr. New York 1978; La vita contemplativa, It. tr., M. Spinelli, Rome 1987; La vie contemplative, Fr. tr., R. Jobard - L. Gagliardi, Paris 1995. Studies: F. Degenhart, Studien zu Iulianus Pomerius, Eichstätt 1903; J.C. Plumpe, Pomeriana: VChr 1 (1947) 227-239; É. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, III, Paris 1965, 78-80; C. Tibiletti, La teologia della grazia in Giuliano Pomerio. Alle origini dell'agostinismo provenzale: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 489-506; M. Spinelli, Il sacerdos docens nel De vita contemplativa di Giuliano Pomerio, in Crescita dell'uomo nella catechesi dei Padri (età postnicena), ed. S. Felici, Rome 1988, 287-300.

S. Pricoco

JULIUS AFRICANUS (d. 240). Sextus Julius Africanus, a native of Aelia Capitolina (*Jerusalem), was an official under *Septimius Severus. We know that Alexander Severus charged him with organizing a library at *Rome in the Pantheon. He was at *Alexandria at the school of Heracles and made the acquaintance of *Origen. We find him later in *Palestine, at Nicopolis, where he died around 240. There are only fragments surviving of the two principal works composed by him: the Chronicles, starting from the creation of the world up to 221, put side by side in a synchronic form biblical dates and events with the events of Greek and Roman history. Julius Africanus, who compiled the work with probably millenarist intentions, fixed the duration of the world at 6,000 years and the birth of Christ at the year 5,500. *Eusebius, who opposed his millenarist understanding, profited from his material, which appears to us to be assembled with little critical sense. The Kestoi (Embroideries), in 24 books, were, as the title says, a miscellaneous work, in which the author treated the most varied themes: medicine, magic, military art. It must have been a work of mostly profane subjects, which constituted at that time an exceptional case for a Christian author. Beyond fragments of a letter to Aristides, which treats the gospel genealogies of Christ, his letter to Origen has reached us intact, together with the latter's response, concerning the episode of Susanna in the book of Daniel. Julius Africanus maintains that this episode, of which the Hebrew text is not known, but only the Greek one, was originally composed in Greek. The arguments adopted in support are disparate: next to obvious naivetés on the condition of the Jews in Babylon, on the citation of passages of the OT in other OT works etc., they contain pointed arguments, such as when he points out that certain wordplays present in the Greek text could hardly derive from a Hebrew original. In fact, as far as we can tell from the little left in our possession, the cultural and critical education of Julius Africanus does not seem homogeneous, alternating between information with very little critical evaluation and sharp and important intuitions. His Chronicles, although connected with the millenarist idea, already declining at his time, represented a novelty, proposing in the Christian context the idea of a history extended to cover the entire duration of the world and, in this sense, they mark the beginning of an important literary genre.

PG 10, 63-94; Quasten I, 399-400 (bibl.); J.R. Vieillefond, Les "Cestes" de Julius Africanus. Étude sur l'ensemble des fragments avec édition, traduction et commentaires, Florence-Paris 1970; H. Chantraine, Der metrologische Traktat des Sextus Iulius Africanus, seine Zugehörigkeit zu den KESTOI und seine Authentizität: Hermes 105 (1977) 422-441; F.C.R. Thee, Julius Africanus and the Early Christian View of Magic, Tübingen 1984; BBKL III, 819-824.

M. Simonetti

JULIUS CASSIAN (2nd c.). An *encratite, of unknown origin, he lived around the middle of the 2nd c. and is known to us essentially through the testimony of *Clement of Alexandria, who mentions two of his works, the Ἐξηγητικά and the Περὶ ἐγκρατείας ἢ περὶ εὐνουχίας. Thus we know that in the Ἐξηγητικά, in a similar way to *Tatian, on whom he probably depended, and following a preceding Jewish-Alexandrian tradition, he maintained the chronological priority as well as the spiritual superiority of Moses and the "Hebraic philosophy" (and therefore also Christian) compared with pagan wisdom. A passage from this text was cited literally by Clement of Alexandria, Strom. I, 101,2-107,6 (reproduced by Eus., Praep. evang. X, 12,1-4). In the Περὶ ἐγκρατείας ἢ περὶ εὐνουχίας (Continence or Perfect Chastity), on the other hand, inspired as to the title by Mt 19:12, he defended encratitic ideas, on the basis of *Platonic or Platonizing concepts (e.g., the preexistence of the soul, fallen and imprisoned in the body) and of *gnostic (*Valentinian) ascetic concepts.

Making use of the Gospel According to the Egyptians (Clem. Alex., Strom. III, 13,91,1-93,3), Julius Cassian rigorously forbade the generation of children, while he considered the flesh of Christ only apparent.

F. Bolgiani, La tradizione eresiologica sull'Encratismo II. La confutazione di Clemente d'Alessandria: AAT 96 (1961–1962) 537-664; P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccati. Alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale, Milan 1978, 222-242 (which connects the doctrine of original sin to Cassian, without, however, considering that this doctrine was already widely present in late Judaism); Atti del Convegno "La tradition de l'Enkrateia," Milan 20-23 aprile 1982, Milan 1985; RAC 5, 343-365; LACL 409.

F. Bolgiani

JULIUS I, pope (337–352). Involved in the post-Nicene controversies, Julius defended *Athanasius against the party of *Eusebius of Nicomedia, the Eusebians, as Athanasius himself called them. In a synod which united more than fifty bishops, among whom were also Alexandrian representatives (340/341), he recognized almost as supreme judge the authority of Athanasius, whom the Eusebians had wanted to replace with *Gregory of Cappadocia, as well as that of *Marcellus of Ancyra, who had confessed his faith with the Roman symbol (DS 11). Due to the Eastern protests, expressed above all by the synod held in 341 on the occasion of the dedication of the great church of *Antioch (Athan., Synod. 21), the emperors convened an "ecumenical" council at *Serdica (342/343). After the departure of the Easterners, the Westerners, under the guidance of *Ossius, approved the opinion of Julius. On this occasion they also accepted the right of the bishops, condemned in whatever provincial synod, to appeal to the Roman see (Mirbt, n. 272-274). Although the decisions of Serdica were not accepted by the Easterners (Mirbt, n. 275)—and indeed not even confirmed in the West—they nevertheless reflected the new ecclesiology which had developed in those very complex controversies during which Julius had anticipated the papal theory, founded both on the authority of Peter and that of Nicaea (Athan., Apol. II, 21-35: Mirbt, 271). According to the Liber pontificalis (36), Julius reorganized the Roman chancery and had two basilicas (St. Maria in Trastevere; St. Apostolorum) and some cemeteries built.

CPL 1627. Athanasius, Apol. II, 21-35; Ep. 2; AASS Apr. 2, 1675, 82-86; Jaffé 61, 30f. - J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain: IVe et Ve s., Paris 1958; V. Monachino, Il primato nella controversia ariana, in Saggi storici intorno al Papato, Rome 1959, 17-90; W. Gessel, Das primatiale Bewusstsein Julius I. im Lichte der Interaktionen zwischen Cathedra Petri und den zeitgenössischen Synoden, in FS H. Tüchle, Paderborn 1975, 63-74; Simonetti, 135-209; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, 187-237; H.J. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn 1979, esp. 359-362; J. Ulrich, Die Anfänge der abendländischen Rezeption des Nizänums: PTS 39, Berlin 1994; LTK3 5, 1083; B. Studer, Eusebius e i rapporti con la Chiesa di Roma, in E. dal Covolo et al. (ed.), Eusebius di Vercelli e il suo tempo, Rome 1997, 181-189; RGG 4 (2001) 695-696; LACL (2002) 410.

B. Studer

JULIUS of Aqfahs. Julius of Aqfahs (Khevehs, prov. of Minieh, Egypt) passes for the author of a cycle of Egyptian hagiographic legends. He supposedly got himself assigned to the prefect of Egypt as a secretary in order to be able to approach the martyrs, listen to their declarations, be present at their martyrdoms, bury their bodies and write their Passions. All the typical motifs of the epic Passions appear in them: beyond the eyewitness and the burier of the martyrs, who is then Julius himself, there is the sadistic magistrate, torturers appear with chains, the tortures are multiplied, and the martyrs die and revive many times before dying definitively. Julius himself at the end becomes a martyr. In the account of his Passion, the *Coptic hagiographic legend reaches the utmost unlikelihood: Julius dies six times and revives five times before receiving the crown of martyrdom. The goal which the author sets himself is not only to justify the conversion of the governor Armenius, and not even to put Julius above the other martyrs, but also to ensure, due to divine omnipotence, the corporal integrity of the martyr at the resurrection of the dead. There is reason to fear that the cult of which Julius ended up being the object is merely the product of a legend without any historic foundation. His feast is fixed as 19 September.

BS 6, 1226-1231; Atti di Giulio di Aqfahs, ed. R. Cerulli, CSCO

190.191, Scr. Aet. 37.38, Leuven 1959; Th. Baumeister, Martyr invictus, Münster/W. 1972, 116-117; U. Zanetti, Une pseudo-homélie d'Alexandre d'Alexandrie sur S. Jules d'Aqfahs (CPG 2017): AB 115 (1997) 130-132.

V. Saxer

JULIUS of Puteoli (5th c.). According to two letters of *Leo I (Ep. 28,6; 33,2), Julius, bishop of Puteoli (Pozzuoli), together with the presbyter Renatus and the deacon Hilary, were part of the delegation which represented the apostolic see at the Synod of Ephesus in the year 449, in which, against the indications of the Tomus ad Flavianum, brought by the delegation to the East, *Eutyches was rehabilitated; Flavian, however, was condemned and mistreated.

See the editors' notes in PL 54; T. Jalland, The Life and Times of St. Leo the Great, London 1941, 238ff.

B. Studer

JUNILIUS (6th c.). A learned African active in the middle of the 6th c., he dedicated to *Primasius the Instituta regularia divinae legis, a small introductory manual for the interpretation of the Holy Scripture, which the author declares to have received from *Paul of Nisibis. With a dry and precise style, new for this literary genre, and in the form of questions and answers, Junilius treated the number of the sacred books, the authors, form, content etc. The details on typos—i.e., on the criteria of *allegorical interpretation—are interesting. The work is characteristic of an era which now conceived of culture above all in a manualistic and encyclopedic form.

CPL 872; PL 68, 15-42; Moricca III, 2, 1482-1485; B. Marotta Mannino, Gli "Instituta" di Giunilio: alcuni aspetti esegetici: AnSE 8/2 (1991) 405-419; BBKL III, 883-885.

M. Simonetti

JUNIUS BASSUS (317–359). Son of Junius Bassus, praetorian prefect (318–331) and consul in 331, he died shortly after his nomination as prefect of *Rome, receiving baptism as a neophyte, perhaps on his deathbed (Ammianus 17,11,5: qui recens promotus urbi praefectus, fatali decesserat sorte; see Prudentius, Contra Symm. 1,558-560), 25 August 359. This information is gained from the inscription placed on the upper edge of the *sarcophagus, which indicates his social condition (vir clarissimus), his age and the date of death, his office (prefect of the city, his most important charge, which also included leadership of the senate), and his Christian faith (iit in Deum). An inscription on an architrave which mentions him has recently been found in the Forum of Caesar (praefectus Urbis Iunius Bassus), witnessing to a Late Antique restoration not known before now. His name is linked to the sarcophagus found in 1597, which is now in the Museum of the Treasury of St. Peter's in Rome, considered the king of Christian sarcophagi. Understanding it, in the richness of its representations of biblical scenes, requires knowledge of the biblical exegesis of the time, when *allegory was the normal mode of interpretation. On this exegetical background, it is very elaborate from a stylistic and iconographic point of view, a product of sophisticated thought, where there is ample use of typology and allegory, which allows the artist to represent on the sarcophagus a great profusion of biblical themes.

PLRE 1, 155 n. 15; E. Struthers Malbon, The Iconography of the Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, Princeton, NJ 1990.

A. Di Berardino

JUSTICE. See *RIGHTEOUSNESS (Justice)

JUSTIFICATION. Justification is the focal point of the problem of Christian salvation, because it contains the grace which saves. It involves the Scripture, dogmatics, history and spirituality.

In the Scripture the terms just—justice—justify—justification are rich with different nuances. Especially in St. Paul, where four aspects can be distinguished:

1. Christological. The justification of humanity is Christ, "who became for us wisdom from God, and righteousness and sanctification and redemption" (1 Cor 1:30). He merited it and is its model, and is both the efficient and final cause. For "as one man's trespass led to condemnation for all, so one man's act of righteousness leads to justification and life for all" (Rom 5:18).

2. Charismatic. Justification is a gratuitous gift of God. "Since all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God; they are now justified by his grace as a gift" (Rom 3:23-24). "For no man will be justified in his sight by deeds prescribed by the law," but "man is justified by faith apart from works prescribed by the law" (Rom 3:20, 28).

3. Dynamic. Justification is a seed destined to grow and to bear rich fruits: "Speaking the truth in love, we must grow up in every way into him who is the head, into Christ" (Eph 4:15).

4. Eschatological. Justification begins here on earth and is interior but will have its fulfillment only in Heaven, after the resurrection, which will see the destruction also of "the last enemy . . . death" (1 Cor 15:26). For we have been saved (Tit 3:5), but "in hope" (Rom 8:24); adopted (Gal 4:5), but we are waiting for adoption (Rom 8:23); renewed (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:5; Eph 4:23), but we must renew ourselves day by day (2 Cor 4:15); regenerated (Tit 3:5), but we are waiting for the regeneration (Mt 19:28).

Justification, therefore, is a large and complex notion which includes the present and the future and is essentially, even if not exclusively, eschatological. It includes both the remission of sins, which is "full and total," "full and perfect" (Aug., De pecc. mer. et rem. 2,7,9) and the interior renewal or "new creation" (Gal 6:15; cf. Eph 2:10). The "new creation" indicates and possesses richness and profundity which theological teaching has brought out. Among others: the restoration of the image of the Triune God in humanity, whose image, "immortally impressed on the immortal nature of the soul" (Aug., Trin. 14,4,6), was discolored, deformed, obscured, wounded, although not destroyed, by sin: by means of justification it is "renewed from oldness, reformed from deformation, beatified from unhappiness" (Aug., Trin. 14,13,18; 14,16,22); the divine sonship: "You have received a spirit of adoption . . . and if children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ" (Rom 8:15-17); the "righteousness/justice of God" (Rom 3:21), "not that with which God himself is just, but that with which God renders us just" (Aug., Trin. 14,12,15); participation in the divine nature: "He has given us the precious and very great promises, so that through them you may . . . become participants in the divine nature" (2 Pet 1:4) through which God becomes the life of the soul just as the soul is the life of the body (see Aug., Enarr. in ps. 70, serm. 2,3; Serm. 65,5-8; In Jo. Ev. tr. 19,11-13); deification, which is a concept and expression dear to the fathers of the church, esp. but not only of the East: "He who justifies is the same who deifies . . . and that by the grace of adoption, not by the nature proceeding from generation" (Aug., Enarr. in ps. 49,2); indwelling of the *Holy Spirit (1 Cor 3:16-17; 6:19-20), through which God, who is everywhere with the presence of divinity, is not everywhere with the grace of indwelling, but only in those who mysteriously make up his temple, as is the case with baptized children (see Aug., Ep. 187); friendship with God through the charity which the Holy Spirit diffuses into hearts (Rom 5:5): the Triune God (Jn 14:23) is present in the just "as the known in the knower and the loved in the lover" (St. Thomas, ST, I, q. 43, a. 3); the last effect of justification will be the resurrection of the flesh when the entire person, like Christ, will be a "new creation," that is just and immortal.

In history the nature of justification has been questioned indirectly by the *Pelagians and directly by the Lutherans. The Pelagians, with the doctrines of an original *sin that is spread by imitation (of Adam) and of impeccantia and of grace given acc. to merits, deformed the Pauline notion of grace. The Lutherans insisted on St. Paul, but, starting from an opposite notion of original sin, reached the point of leaving in shadow or denying an aspect, the interior, that is also essential part of justification. The internal renewal is considered by Lutherans to occur in the realm of the sanctification of the individual as a result of justification, which they view forensically rather than as a process.

Catholic doctrine passes between these two extremes. The most solemn and important document of this doctrine is the Decree on Justification of the Council of Trent, which contains not only the clarification of the controversial questions but also a synthesis of the dogmatic and spiritual doctrine of salvation: nature, gift, causes of justification; preparation, nourishment, observance of the divine commandments; the possibility of losing it, the obligation of reacquiring it, trust in God, who "does not abandon if he is not abandoned"; fruits of justification or doctrine of merits, which are also a gift of God, but do not exclude—but rather, includes—the free cooperation of humanity, which grace provokes and accompanies.

Already St. Augustine, at the beginning of the 5th c., had illustrated this same doctrine in substance when, in the Pelagian controversy, he maintained that justification was necessary, because we are all born sinners; is gratuitous, because it is a gift of God which we cannot merit; is interior, because it forgives all sins entirely; is progressive, because, after the justification, the mortalitas and infirmitas remain which prevent the perfection of the just person from being perfect: for perfection will not arrive until "death has been swallowed up in victory" (1 Cor 15:54). Justification, finally, is the foundation of the merit of good works, which are therefore a merit, indeed, but gratuitous, since God, "crowning our merits, crowns his gifts" (Ep. 194, 6 and 19).

δικαιοσύνη, TWNT 2,194-214 (TDNT 2, 192-219); DTC: Justification 16, 2042-2227; Dizionario dei concetti biblici del NT, It. tr., Bologna 1971, 799-808; M. Flick - Z. Alszeghy, Il vangelo della grazia, Florence 1967; P. Grech, Le idee fondamentali del NT, Rome 1968; H. Küng, La giustificazione, Brescia 1969; J. Auer, Il Vangelo della grazia, It. tr.., Assisi 1971; M. Flick - Z. Alszeghy, Fondamenti di una antropologia teologica, Florence 1973; Mysterium salutis, 9, Brescia 1975; B. Drewery, Deification, London 1975; A. Trapè, Introduzione generale a: s. Agostino, Natura e grazia, NBA 17/1, Rome 1981, 7-215; M.A. Seifrid, Justification by Faith: The Origin and Development of a Central Pauline Theme, Leiden 1992; A.E. McGrath, Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification, Cambridge ²1998.

A. Trapè

JUSTIN, gnostic (2nd–3rd c.). The only source for knowledge about this *gnostic who lived between the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd c. AD is represented by *Hippolytus, Ref. V, 23-27 (125,3–133,24 Wendland) and X, 15 (276,10–277,14); chap. 15 of book X is nothing other than a succinct summary of the system exposed more amply in the long chap. 26 of book V (126,29–132,23). In chap. 24 (126,2-5) Hippolytus says he obtained the information which he is about to repeat from the Book of Baruch of Justin. The latter believed in three principles: the absolute Good, which was masculine, Elohim, likewise masculine, and a feminine Eden, a girl in her upper part and spider below. From the union between Elohim and Eden the twelve angels of Elohim and the twelve angels of Eden were born, destined to form the terrestrial paradise of Genesis. The third angel of Elohim is Baruch, who found his symbol in the tree of life of Gen 2:9, while the third angel of Eden, Naas, principle of evil, of transgression and of sin, is symbolized by the tree of knowledge of good and evil and by the serpent (see Gen 2:9 and 3:1). The creation of humanity derives from the combined activity of Elohim and Eden: while Elohim breathes the spirit into him, Eden gives rise to his soul and body. Elohim suddenly realizes the existence of a Good superior to himself, rises toward it, surpassing the limit of the sensible world, and remains near it, obeying its invitation; Eden, abandoned, unleashes her anger on the sensible world and on humanity, putting their πνεῦμα to a hard test through Naas, who rapes both Eve and Adam. To save the πνεῦμα which originated from himself, Elohim, who now can no longer leave the Good, sends his third angel into the world, Baruch, who in the OT is symbolized by God, who speaks to Adam and Eve and to Moses. Jesus too is tempted unsuccessfully by Naas, who finally has him crucified. In Ref. V, 24 and 27, Hippolytus reproduces the formula of the gnostic oath used by Justin's sect; to describe the object of the higher gnosis Justin (chap. 24, 125,25-26; cap. 27, 133,4-5) turns to the famous passage of 1 Cor 2:9 just as *Clement of Alexandria does, Strom. V, 40,1 (on this coincidence cf. E. Baert, FZPhTh 12 [1965] 462 and S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 181). In Ref. V, 27 (133,6-12) Hippolytus also records the difference, established by Justin, between the living water which is spoken of in Jn 4:10, destined for the πνευματικοί and for Elohim, and the material water, destined for the χοϊκοί and the ψυχικοί.

W. Völker, Quellen zur Geschichte der christlichen Gnosis, Tübingen 1932, 27-33; A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, I, 1, Leipzig 1893, 169; G.R.S. Mead, Frammenti di una fede dimenticata. Brevi studi sugli gnostici, Milan 1909, 144-147; E. de Faye, Gnostiques et gnosticisme, Paris 1913, 187-194; J.P. Steffes, Das Wesen des Gnostizismus und sein Verhältnis zum Katholischen Dogma (Forschungen zur christlichen Literatur und Dogmengeschichte XIV, 4), Paderborn 1922, 128-133; E. Haehnchen, Das Buch Baruch: Ein Beitrag zum problem der christlichen Gnosis: ZTK 50 (1953) 123-158; W. Foerster, Das Buch Baruch, in Die Gnosis, I, Zürich-Stuttgart 1969, 65-79 (Eng. tr. W. Foerster, Gnosis: A Selection of Texts, transl. by R.McL. Wilson, Oxford 1972, 48-58); A. Orbe, Hacia la primera teología de la procesión del verbo (Estudios Valentinianos I/1) AG 99, Rome 1958, 232-245; Id., La Christología de Justino gnóstico: Estudios Eclesiásticos 47 (1972) 437-457; R.M. Grant, Gnosticism and Early Christianity, London-New York 1959, 19-25, 41-42; H. Jonas, Gnosis und spätantiker Geist, I, Die mythologische Gnosis, Göttingen 1964, 335-341; R. Haardt, Die Gnosis, Wesen und Zeugnisse, Salzburg 1967, 98-105; M. Simonetti, Note sul libro di Baruch dello gnostico Giustino: VetChr 6 (1969) 71-89; W. Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis, Göttingen 1973, 133-134, 154, 276, 330; K. Rudolph, Die Gnosis Wesen und Geschichte einer spätantiken Religion, Göttingen 1978, 158-160 (in Eng. tr. by R.McL. Wilson, Edinburgh 1983, 144-147); H. Leisegang, Die Gnosis, Stuttgart 1985, 156-168; J. Montserrat-Torrents, La philosophie du Livre de Baruch de Justin, in E.A. Livingstone (ed.), SP 18,1, Kalamazoo 1985, 253-261; LTK³ 5, 1111; RAC Suppl. 1 (2001) 990. Cf. also the bibl. note of M. Maritano in G. Bosio - E. dal Covolo - M. Maritano, Introduzione ai Padri della Chiesa (secoli II e III), Turin 1991, XXV.

S. Lilla

JUSTIN I, emperor (450–527). Born in 450 at Bederiana in Illyria in a peasant family, Justin arrived in *Constantinople around 470, entered the army and fought against the Isaurians, the Persians and against the rebel Vitalian. In 518, after the death of *Anastasius I, he became emperor. Immediately after his coronation, under the pressure of monks of Chalcedonian orientation—among whom were the *acoemetae, who had organized a popular uprising and forced the patriarch *John II to recognize Chalcedon, to reject the Henoticon of *Zeno and to restore communion with the see of Rome—he saw himself forced in 519 to ratify this decision with an edict, by which he resumed relations with Pope *Hormisdas. The pope sent his legates to Constantinople with a Regula fidei Ormisdae, in which the Council of Chalcedon and the Tomus Leonis ad Flavianum* were recognized, while anathemas against *Nestorius, *Eutyches, *Dioscorus and other *monophysite leaders were decreed. Justin forced all the bishops to adhere to the faith of Hormisdas, adopting repressive measures against the dissenters.

This change provoked uneasiness in the empire and, in external politics, tensions with the king of the *Ostrogoths, *Theodoric, who viewed this alliance between the pope and the emperor with displeasure. His nephew *Justinian exercised great influence on the emperor in directing his political and religious choices; a few months before his uncle's death Justinian received the title of Augustus and was crowned by the patriarch; the two emperors immediately promulgated a very severe law against heretics. He died in August 527.

RAC 19, 763-778; A.A. Vasiliev, Justin the First: An Introduction to the Epoch of Justinian the Great, Cambridge, MA 1950; K. Bihlmeyer - H. Tuechle, Storia della Chiesa, 1, Brescia 1989, 331-337; H. Jedin, Storia della Chiesa, III, Milan 1983, 17-27; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa II/1, Brescia 1996, 431-448; var. aus., Storia del Cristianesimo. Religione, politica, cultura, 3, Rome 2002, 142-153.

C. Dell'Osso

JUSTIN II, emperor (565–578). Nephew of *Justinian I, in 552 he was commander in chief of the Palatine guard and then Caesar at odds with the son of *Germanus, cousin of Justinian, also named Justin. In 565 he became emperor and had to witness in 568 the invasion of *Italy on the part of the *Longobards (Lombards), the occupation of Cordoba in 572 on the part of the *Visigoths, while the N African positions and the Danube borders resisted and he had to defend himself against the Persians at the cost of harsh wars.

Under him a favorable period for the *monophysites began: the monophysite bishops in prison or in exile were released and could return to their sees. He applied himself, with the mediation of his legates, to resolve the internal quarrels among the monophysites and allowed *Jacob Baradeus to hold a conference at *Constantinople, but after months of discussion no result was reached, so he made an attempt with a Henoticon (567) in which he repeated the formulas of *Zeno, the *Three Chapters were condemned, the monophysites were amnestied, the rehabilitation of *Severus was recommended and the Council of *Chalcedon was cited only in the last phrase. But the monophysites, under the pressure of their monks, did not accept the document. The emperor then prepared a new redaction of the edict which recognized the single nature of the Word made flesh and spoke of a mental distinction of the two natures, without mentioning either the Council of Chalcedon or Severus. This edict was imposed by force and gave rise to a series of persecutions which faded away only when the emperor little by little fell into madness and in 574 the prefect of the Palatine guard, Tiberius, was taken into the coregency. In the last years he was influenced by his wife Sophia, niece of Justinian's wife *Theodora.

RAC 19, 778-801; P. Goubert, Byzance avant l'Islam, 1, Paris 1951, 51-54; H. Jedin, Storia della Chiesa, III, Milan 1983, 44-45; Storia del Cristianesimo 3, 436-442.

C. Dell'Osso

JUSTIN MARTYR (d. before 167). Justin, apologist of the 2nd c., was born at Flavia Neapolis, modern Nablus, in *Palestine (1 Apol. 1,1). The search for truth carried him successively to the *Stoic, peripatetic, Pythagorean and *Platonic philosophical schools (Dial. 2,1-6) and finally to Christianity, "the only certain and worthy philosophy," which was revealed to him by "a very old man" (Dial. 3-8). After conversion (132–135; Bagatti 322), Justin went to *Rome, where he wrote (ca. 148–161; see 1 Apol. 1,46) his Apologies (2 Apol. was originally an appendix or a later edition of the first) addressed to *Antoninus Pius (emperor 138–161), and the Dialogue with Trypho, the oldest surviving Christian apology addressed against the Jews (the introduction and part of chap. 74 are lost). This is later than the Apologies (Dial. 120,6). These are the only works which survive from him, already known to *Eusebius (HE IV, 18,2,6), and preserved in a single MS of 1364 (Paris. Gr. 450). For the lost works, see 1 Apol. 1,26; Irenaeus, Adv. haer. IV, 6,2; Eusebius, HE IV, 11,8-9; IV, 18,3-6. Among the disciples of Justin was *Tatian the Syrian (Iren., Adv. haer. I, 28,1). According to the authentic Martyrium SS. Justini et sociorum VI, Justin was put to death under Rusticus, prefect of Rome 163–167. Beyond these two certain works some fragments remain (CPLG 1078). Moreover, various works are attributed to him. A De resurrectione (CPG 1081) might well be his acc. to some (see Sanchez). Others are certainly spurious: (1) Oratio ad Graecos (CPG 1082; RAC 19, 858f.); (2) Cohortatio ad Graecos (CPG 1083; RAC 19, 861f.); (3) De monarchia (CPG 1084; RAC 19, 859); (4) Epistula ad Zenam et Serenum (CPG 1085; RAC 19, 866); (5) Confutatio dogmatum quorundam Aristotelicorum (CPG 1086); (6) Quaestiones Christianorum ad Graecos (CPG 1087; RAC 19, 870); (7) Quaestiones Graecorum ad Christianos (CPG 1088); (8) Epistula ad Euphrasium sophistam (CPG 1089; RAC 19, 871). Wrapped in his philosopher's mantle (Dial. 1,9), Justin was the first Christian to use *Aristotelian categories, to use philosophical terminology in Christian thought (Falls, FC 6, 17) and to reconcile faith and reason.

The central theme of Justin is the creative and salvific plan of God, ἡ οἰκονομία, manifested and completed by the Christ-Logos: the wisdom of the ancients finds its place within this divine plan (Bourgeois). His basic premise is that human reason (λόγος) is a participation in the Word (Λόγος): in every person there is a "seed [σπέρμα] of the Logos" resulting from the action of the "Word which gives the seed [σπερματικὸς Λόγος]" (2 Apol. 7,3: 13,3). Justin turned to this Stoic-Platonic notion (his concept is more akin to *Middle Platonism than it is to *Stoicism: the terminology, i.e., is Stoic, but the underlying thought is *Platonic: Andresen 157-195; Daniélou 42-43; Barnard 96-99; Holte 115-117; the concept was taken from Philo) to explain that "Christ is the firstborn of God, the Word, in whom everyone is a participant, and all those who live in conformity with the Logos are Christians such as, among the Greeks, Socrates and Heraclitus and others like them" (1 Apol. 46,2-3). The incomplete and obscure truths of the Greek philosophers were only "seeds of the Logos." *Jerome and *Augustine refined this notion, developing the theme of the captiva gentilis (to be purified) and the spoliatio aegyptiorum (use of the pagan truths).

Given that the criterion of truth is antiquity, Justin, as before him the Jewish apologists, insisted on the fact that the philosophers had borrowed from the prophets and Moses (1 Apol. 59,1-6; 60,1-7). Justin (1 Apol. 60,1-7) identifies Christ with the world soul of Plato (Timaeus 36 b), extended in the form of a cross (X) which Plato supposedly took from Num 21:7-8. The Word, "numerically distinct" (Dial. 61,11) from the Father, is differentiated from the world soul, in turn distinct from the supreme Intelligence in which Middle Platonism saw the first God (see Albinus, Epitome X, 3). The Middle Platonists tended to transform the mythical demiurge of Plato into a mind transcending the world and referred to it (see Timaeus 28 c) as "Father and Creator of the world" (see 2 Apol. 6,1-2; Dial. 60,2; Norris 46-48). The Logos is God born from God, like a fire lit from another fire or like the light which flows from the sun (Dial. 128). The Son is preexistent: "We adore him [the Father] and the Son having emerged from him [τὸν παρὰ αὐτοῦ υἱὸν ἐλθόντα]."

In Christ the Christians have the fullness of knowledge and revelation (2 Apol. 10,1): "Our doctrine surpasses every human teaching because we have the Logos in his entirety in Christ, who was made manifest for us, body, reason and soul." The Logos is the creator of his own humanity (1 Apol. 22,2; 32,10). Christ, Son of God, is the eternal law (αἰώνιος νόμος) and the new covenant (καινὴ διαθήκη) for the entire world (Dial. 43,1; cf. 11,2; 51,3). Justin was the first true theologian to formulate a Christocentric theology of history (Jossa 176). There are other contributions for which Justin was a pioneer. He was the first Christian author to deal with Gen 1:1-2 (1 Apol. 59,1-5; 60; 62-64: Nautin 62-67); he put Mary in opposition to Eve, speaking about the divine plan (ἡ οἰκονομία) of redemption through the Virgin Mary (Dial. 100; 120,1; Otranto 11); he organized the oldest collection of heretical doctrines in his (lost) Syntagma against all the heresies (1 Apol. 26,8); he was the first to attribute the theophanies of the OT to the Logos "in human form" (Dial. 61,1; 68,10); he spoke of a dilatio inferni and of a general she'ol (Dial. 5; 80); he departed from the limits of the disciplina arcani* to describe in detail the Christian rites of *baptism and the *Eucharist (1 Apol. 61-67); he introduced the theory of the double state of the Word (2 Apol. 6,3). "In Justin we encounter for the first time citations from semi-formal professions of faith" (J.N.D. Kelly, Creeds, 71). Justin was also one of the first Christian authors to formulate an exegesis of the presence of the Word-Messiah in the Law and the Prophets (Dial. 26-140; de Margerie 37-63). He explicitly mentioned the priesthood of the faithful (Dial. 116); testified to the catechumenate (1 Apol. 61,2), the emergence of the NT corpus (1 Apol. 66,3) and the veneration of angels (1 Apol. 6); and gave a theological interpretation of the Eucharist: he spoke of the sacrificial nature of the Eucharist, referring to Mal 1:11 (Dial. 41; 117). The Eucharist is offered as a memorial of the body and blood of Christ (Dial. 70,4).

According to Justin (Dial. 88,4), "Christ was born and was crucified for humanity which, by the transgression of Adam through the serpent's deception, had fallen under sentence of death." The demons are the sons of the fallen angels: "The angels transgressed and had relations with women and from them came sons, called demons" (2 Apol. 5,3). For Justin the devil fell from grace when he tempted Eve (Dial. 124,3), and in another passage he identified the Leviathan of Is 27:1 with Satan (Dial. 112,2). The goal of the demons is to reduce men and women to be their slaves and assistants (1 Apol. 14,1). The demons are the founders of paganism, before the coming of Christ and, after his coming, of the heresies (1 Apol. 25; 26). The demons are "exorcized by many of us Christians in the name of Jesus Christ" (2 Apol. 6,6) and are subject to his name (Dial. 30,3). Justin is the first among Christian authors to define the devil and delineate his grim mission (Fernández 158-160).

The eschatology of Justin underlines the second coming of Christ: he coined the phrase "the second coming": τὴν δευτέραν παρουσίαν (1 Apol. 52,3; 14,8; 51,2). Human history is oriented toward the *parousia. First, the resurrection of the saints alone will take place; the millennium will follow, i.e., the reign of the saints for a thousand years in *Jerusalem. At the end of the millennium will be the resurrection of the wicked, followed by the final judgment (Dial. 80,5; 81,4; 132,1). "The millenarism of Justin seems to owe more to Jewish apocalyptic than to the Johannine Apocalypse" (E. Pietrella 41).

Justin reflects the eclectic Middle Platonism of his day (Andresen, ZNTW 157-195; W. Schmid 163-182). His writings are not "a spotless amalgam of Plato and biblical faith." Platonism was a preparation for the gospel, but the gospel came first (Barnard 170). He tends toward *subordinationism (2 Apol. 6,3; Dial. 56,4) and his pneumatology puts in relief the notion of the divine δύναμις: the invisible power of God operating in creation and in history (Martin 328-332). The greatest importance of Justin is that he is the first Christian writer after *Paul to recognize the universalistic implications of Christianity. With his characteristic doctrine of the Logos, he recapitulated in a single vigorous movement the entire history of humanity, which finds its consummation in Christ.

CPG 1073-1089 (see also the Supplementum).

Bibliography: A. Wartelle, Bibliographie historique et critique de saint Justin, philosophe et martyr, et des apologistes grecs du IIe siècle: 1494-1994: (avec un supplément), Paris 2001.

Editions and translations: (1) Apologies: J.C.T. Otto, Corpus Apologetarum, I-V, Jena, repr. 1968; E.J. Goodspeed, Göttingen 1915, repr. 1950; A. Wartelle, Paris 1987; M. Marcovich, Berlin 1994; Ch. Munier, Fribourg 1995. Translations: Fr.: Wartelle; Munier; G. Archambault - L. Pautigny, Paris 1994; Eng.: ANF vol. I; FC 6 (1948); W. Barnard (ACW 56), Mahwah, NJ 1997; It.: I. Giordani, Rome 1962; G. Girgenti, Milan 1994; C. Burini, Rome 2001; Sp.: H. Yaben, Madrid 1943, and D. Ruiz Bueno, Madrid 1954; (2) Dialogue: Goodspeed, op. cit., 90-265; M. Marcovich, Berlin 1997. Translations: Fr.: G. Archambault - L. Pautigny; It.: Giustino, Dialogo con Trifone, intr., tr. and notes by G. Visonà, Turin 1988. DSp 8, 1640-1647; S. Heid: RAC 19, 801-874; H. Meyer, Geschichte der Lehre von den Keimkräften, Bonn 1914, 80-93; J. Quasten, Patrology, I, Westminster, MD 1950, 198-219 (It. tr. Turin 1980, I, 175-194, more recent bibl.); Studies: W. Schmid, Frühe Apologetik und Platonismus: FS O. Regenbogen, Heidelberg 1952, 163-182; C. Andresen, Justin und der mittlere Platonismus: ZNTW 44 (1952/53) 157-195; Id., Logos und Nomos, Berlin 1955; G. Aeby, Les missions divines de saint Justin à Origène, Fribourg 1958, 6-15; R. Holte, Logos spermatikos: Christianity and Ancient Philosophy According to St. Justin's Apologies: STh 12 (1958) 109-168; A. Orbe, La Unción del Verbo, Rome 1961, 21-89; P. Prigent, Justin et l'Ancien Testament, Paris 1964; N. Hyldahl, Philosophie und Christentum. Eine Interpretation der Einleitung zum Dialog Justins, Copenhagen 1966; R.A. Norris, God and World in Early Christian Theology, London 1966, 33-56; A.J. Bellinzoni, The Sayings of Jesus in the Writings of Justin Martyr, Leiden 1967; L. Barnard, Justin Martyr, His Life and Thought, Cambridge 1967; E.R. Goodenough, The Theology of Justin Martyr, Jena 1968 (repr.); J.P. Martín, El Espíritu Santo en los orígenes del Cristianismo, Zürich 1971, 163-332; P. Nautin, Genèse I, 1-2, de Justin a Origène, in In Principio, Paris 1973, 62-67; J. Daniélou, Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture, London 1973 (It. tr. Bologna 1976); R. Joly, Christianisme et philosophie. Étude sur Justin et les apologistes du IIe siècle, Brussels 1973; C. Mazzucco - E. Pietrella, Il rapporto tra la concezione del millennio dei primi autori cristiani e l'Apocalisse di Giovanni: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 38-41; G. Otranto, Esegesi biblica e storia in Giustino (Dial. 63-84), Bari 1979; B. Bagatti, S. Giustino e la sua patria: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 319-331; W. Rordorf, La Trinité dans les écrits de Justin Martyr: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 285-297; D. Bourgeois, La sagesse des Anciens dans le mystère du Verbe. Évangile et philosophie de saint Justin, Paris 1981; E. Chat, Die Opferlehre des Apologeten Justin; religionswissenschaftliche Studie, Bonn 1981; M. Fédou, La vision de la Croix dans l'oeuvre de saint Justin, "philosophe et martyr": RecAug 19 (1984) 29-210; H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition. Studies in Justin, Clement, and Origen, Oxford 1984; O. Skarsaune, The Proof from Prophecy: A Study in Justin Martyr's Proof-Text Tradition. Text-Type, Provenance, Theological Profile, Leiden 1987; G.A. Nocilli, La catechesi battesimale di San Giustino martire, Bologna 1990; A.-G. Hamman, Essai de chronologie de la vie et des oeuvres de Justin: Augustinianum 35 (1995) 231-239; G. Girgenti, Giustino martire: il primo cristiano platonico: con in appendice "Atti del martirio di San Giustino," Milan 1995; P. Merlo, Liberi per vivere secondo il Logos: principi e criteri dell'agire morale in San Giustino filosofo e martire, Rome 1995; M. Maritano, Giustino martire e gli eretici negatori della maternità di Maria: Augustinianum 37 (1997) 285-301; G. Otranto, La polemica antigiudaica da Barnaba a Giustino: AnnSE 14 (1997) 55-82; G. Valenti, Alcune osservazioni su Giustino martire, i Samaritani e la città di Neapolis: SMSR 22 (1998) 245-273; A. Rudolph, "Denn wir sind jenes Volk . . .": die neue Gottesverehrung in Justins Dialog mit dem Juden Tryphon in historisch-theologischer Sicht, Bonn 1999; R. Hanig, Tatian und Justin: ein Vergleich: VChr 53 (1999) 31-73; Ph. Bobichon, Les enseignements juif, païen, hérétique et chrétien dans l'oeuvre de Justin Martyr: REAug 45 (1999) 233-259; S.J.G. Sanchez, Justin, apologiste chrétien: travaux sur le "Dialogue avec Tryphon" de Justin Martyr, Paris 2000; T.J. Horner, Listening to Trypho: Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho Reconsidered, Leuven 2001.

R.J. De Simone

JUSTIN MARTYR (pseudo). Various works have reached us attributed to Justin, besides numerous fragments. Three of these have titles similar to some of those cited by *Eusebius (HE 4,18) in the list of works which he considered to have been written by the Apologist; however, in their contents they do not coincide at all or only in part with the description given in the Historia ecclesiastica.

It is possible to distinguish the De resurrectione (DR), whose attribution to Justin is still debated today; the oldest apologetic-propagandistic tracts; the works of *Antiochene context; and the Epistula ad Zenam et Serenum.

1. The DR (CPG 1081) (10 chapters) can be reconstructed for the most part thanks to three ample excerpta inserted in Greek *florilegia deriving from the Sacra Parallela (such extracts constitute the most conspicuous part of the fragments transmitted with Justinian attribution). The work is structured rhetorically acc. to the plan of an apologetic speech (DR 1: proemium; DR 2: narratio; DR 3-9: argumentatio, divided into refutatio, 3-4, and probatio, 5-9; DR 10: epilogue). It confronts three objections to the faith in the resurrection of the flesh, i.e., of the material part of humanity: the impossibility of the reconstitution of the flesh once decomposed; the inappropriateness that the flesh be resuscitated; absence of a promise of the resurrection of the flesh. The deniers of the resurrection linked two supposed aporias to the second of the objections: the return, with the resurrection, of sexual functions and physical defects. All these criticisms seem to come from educated Christians, influenced by *Middle Platonism and also by *Galen. (This would explain, among other things, the preliminary insistence of the author of the DR on epistemological questions, with a partial coincidence with the Galenic position.) They believed in one God, creator and savior; in the fact that Jesus rose from the dead with a spiritual body; and that in the future, believers would participate in the same resurrection. They used both the OT and the proto-Christian work, with particular attention to those of *Paul. *Irenaeus also took issue with them (Haer V, 2,2-3,3; 5,1-2; 31,1-35,2). To such adversaries the author of the discourse opposes a demonstration of the possibility, appropriateness and promise of the resurrection of the flesh founded on arguments taken either from the content of the faith, or from sensible or intellectual commonplaces, or from the Greek cultural tradition, chosen acc. to a precise strategic (exclusion of proofs of doubtful argumentative effectiveness with the adversaries) and epistemological (choice of arguments that respected the demands for certainty of the adversaries) plan. The author of the DR aims, therefore, not only at opposing but also at convincing his adversary, through a discourse which can be legitimately defined as "doctrinal apology."

The DR does not furnish explicit references to places or people. From the internal analysis, the context in which to locate the polemic is most likely Rome of the 70s-80s of the 2nd c. The author of the DR has sometimes been identified with Justin (Pouderon), with one of his students and collaborators (D'Anna), or with Athenagoras (Heimgartner).

2. Apologetic-propagandistic works: Cohortatio ad Graecos (CPG 1083), Oratio ad Graecos (CPG 1082), De monarchia (CPG 1084). The Cohortio (38 chapters) is a protreptic treatise, in which the harmony of the biblical authors, inspired by the same Spirit, is opposed to the contradictions of the Greek philosophers and poets. There are numerous citations of Greek authors, often taken from anthologies. The harsh polemic against the doctrine of the Platonic ideas, derived, acc. to the author, from misunderstanding the texts of Moses, sought to undermine as well the Platonizing interpretation given to Moses in the Alexandrian environment. The coincidence, studied by Riedweg, of the stylistic characteristics of the Cohortio with those of authentic fragments of *Marcellus of Ancyra reliably confirm the attribution of the work to Marcellus.

The Oratio (5 chapters) is a short treatise in which a Christian, converted from paganism, criticizes the divinities of the Greeks, whose behavior is marked by licentiousness, and invites others to conversion. There are no poetic citations. The De monarchia (6 chapters) is a treatise aimed at demonstrating that the ancient Greeks sometimes reached the point of recognizing the existence of the one true God. The work does not have a strong Christian character. There are many citations, including spurious ones, of classic poets, taken from anthologies. Both of the works are generally held to date to the 3rd c.

3. Works of Antiochene context: Four works of a single author, of Antiochene training, have been transmitted under the name of Justin: Quaestiones et responsiones ad orthodoxos (CPG 6285), Quaestiones Christianorum ad Graecos (CPG 1087), Quaestiones Graecorum ad Christianos (CPG 1088), Confutatio dogmatum quorundam Aristotelicorum (CPG 1086). They are dated between the 4th (Harnack attributes them to *Diodore) and 5th c. (attributed by many scholars to *Theodoret, whose name appears in one MS of the Q. et r. ad orthod.). The longest work is the Q. et r. ad orthod. (146/161 questions, acc. to the MSS): beyond exegetical problems of every kind, numerous objections coming from pagan anti-Christian tradition are confronted, so that the work also plays an obvious apologetic role. The other two little works are of a polemical antipagan character (5 questions for the Greeks, 15 for the Christians), which focus on dogmatic arguments. The Confutatio is a treatise criticizing *Aristotelian cosmology. An Expositio rectae fidei (CPG 6218) has also been transmitted under Justin's name; it is a treatise on the *Trinity and the *incarnation, which can be attributed with certainty to *Theodoret, thanks to some citations by *Severus of Antioch in Contra impium Grammaticum 3,1,5.

4. The Epistula ad Zenam et Serenum (CPG 1085) is a little treatise of Christian asceticism, of a Stoicizing character, dated 4th–5th c.

Corpus Apologetarum Christianorum Saeculi Secundi (ed. J.C.T. Otto), volumen III (Iustinus philosophus et martyr), tomus II (Opera Iustini addubitata), Jena [3]1879, tomus III (Opera Iustini subditicia), Jena [3]1880 (ed. of all the pseudo-Justinian works); Fragmente vornicänischer Kirchenväter aus den Sacra Parallela (ed. K. Holl) (TU 20,2), Leipzig 1899, 32-55 (ed. of many of the fragments).

De resurrectione: Pseudo-Giustino, Sulla resurrezione (ed. A. D'Anna), Brescia 2001; M. Heimgartner, Pseudojustin—Über die Auferstehung, Berlin-New York 2001; B. Pouderon, À propos de l'ouvrage recent . . . : Apocrypha 13 (2002) 245-256.

Apologetic-propagandistic works: N. Zeegers-Vander Vorst, Les citations des poètes grecs chez les apologistes chrétiens du II^e^ siècle, Louvain 1972; W.C. van Unnik, The Character of Early Christian Apologetics in the Pseudo-Justinian Oratio ad Graecos, in Id., Sparsa collecta, Leiden 1983, III, 106-113; C. Riedweg, Ps.-Justin (Markell von Ankyra?), Ad Graecos de vera religione (bisher "Cohortatio ad Graecos"), I-II, Basel 1994; P.W. van der Horst, Plato's Fear as a Topic in Early Christian Apologetics: JECS 6 (1998) 1-13.

Works of Antiochene context: G. Bardy, La littérature patristique des "Quaestiones et responsiones" sur l'Écriture sainte: RB 42 (1933) 211-219; M.G. Crepaldi, Pseudo-Giustino, Confutazione di alcune dottrine aristoteliche, PhD thesis, Padua 1987; J.P. Martín, El Pseudo-Justino en la historia del aristotelismo: Patrística & Mediaevalia 10 (1989) 3-19; L. Perrone, Sulla preistoria delle "Quaestiones" nella letteratura patristica: AnSE 8 (1991) 485-505; M.G. Crepaldi, En arché: una confutazione cristiana della dottrina aristotelica del tempo (Ps. Iust. Confut. 31-38), in G. Casertano (ed.), Il concetto di tempo, Naples 1997, 173-182.

A. D'Anna

JUSTINA (d. after 388). The widow of Magnentius, she married *Valentinian I around 370. Her second husband having also died in 375, she devoted herself to inspiring and supporting the politics of her son *Valentinian II, above all after the death of *Gratian. Always favorable to the *Arians (on her pro-Arian attitude see Ruf., HE 2, 15; Socr., HE V, II; Soz., HE VII, 13; Philost., HE X, 7), whose creed she shared. She opposed *Ambrose on many occasions, even though he had supported her independence and that of her son against the imperial pretensions of the usurper *Maximus, going to *Trier in the autumn of 383 and negotiating with Maximus for the young Valentinian to stay in *Italy. For some details, matching the hagiographic style, concerning an insurrection organized by Justina against Ambrose, see Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii 11. An allusion to Justina represented in the biblical figure of Jezebel might be present in Ep. 20,14-19 of Ambrose. Following the invasion of Maximus in 387, she fled with her son to *Thessalonica (Zos., Hist. nova IV, 43; Oros., Hist. adv. paganos VII, 35,4; Theodrt., HE V, 14), to *Theodosius, but was able to return to Italy in 388, where she died shortly after the reestablishment of Valentinian II as emperor of the West.

J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'Empire Romain, Paris 1933; PLRE 1, 488-489; PCBE 2/1, 1209-1211.

M.G. Mara

JUSTINA of Padua. martyr (d. 304). According to the oldest Passio, of the 11th c., Justina, belonging to a distinguished Paduan family, was executed under *Diocletian and *Maximian; perhaps she should be identified with her Justina of Trieste. The body of the martyr was buried outside the pomerium to the E of the city near the Roman theater. The Mart. hier. does not mention her. The oldest attestation of her veneration is the basilica ad corpus which the vir clarissimus et inlustris Opilius had built at Padua around 500 (CIL 5, 3100), on the site of the present basilica. *Venantius Fortunatus knew the tomb of the saint and the basilica, decorated with scenes from the Vita of St. Martin (Vita Martini 4,672-674). Her image appears in the procession of martyrs in St. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna and in the intrados of the apse of the Euphrasian basilica of Parenzo.

Two inscriptions attest her veneration at Rimini in the 6th–7th c. and at Como in 617. Her name is found in the canon of the Ambrosian Mass, written around that same time.

The witnesses to her veneration are therefore certain and ancient, but the details of her life are late and without value. In the Passio of the 11th c. there is only one bit of reliable information: the burial of the saint 1,000 feet from the city. In the medieval liturgical books her feast is inserted 7 October.

BHL 4571-4575; BS 6, 1345-1349; LCI 7, 253-255; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 911-912; A. Barzon, Padova cristiana dalle origini all'anno 800, Padua 1955; G. Prevedello, S. Giustina di Padova, Padua 1972; 641-644; G. Cuscito, Martiri cristiani ad Aquileia e in Istria, Udine 1992, 101-107.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

JUSTINIAN, emperor (482–565). Flavius Petrus Sabbatius Iustinianus, Roman emperor of the East. Born in 482, of a peasant father, at Tauresium near Bederiana in Illyria (an unknown location), Justinian was called to the court at *Constantinople by his uncle *Justin. He received a comprehensive education there and, during the reign of Justin, was his most authoritative advisor. He began joint rule with his uncle 1 April 527 and assumed full power in August when his uncle died. In 525 he married the former actress *Theodora, who exercised a notable influence on Justinian, both in private and in political life. Taking advantage of the middle class, in the city and in the countryside, Justinian systematically pursued the internal and external restoration of the imperium romanum. In 529, with the ban on teaching philosophy and the consequent closure of the Academy in Athens, he reinforced the unity of the state; in 532, drawing up a "perpetual" peace with the king of the Persians *Chosroes I, he guaranteed himself freedom of action in the West; at the same time the bloody repression of the "Nika" revolt silenced the forces of opposition whether in the heart of the ancient aristocracy or among the plebeian masses of the capital. The sumptuous reconstruction in the years 532–537 of Hagia Sophia, which had been burnt in the Nika revolt, and the publication of the Institutiones (manual of Roman law) and of the Digesta (collection of opinions of illustrious jurists, with normative force) in 533, which, together with the Codex Iustinianus* already published in 529, were united later with the Novellae (later legislation of Justinian) in the Corpus iuris civilis, equally served the reinforcement of the state and of the imperial absolutism, also with regard to the church and its hierarchy.

The legislative effort also revealed reforming tendencies. Postulating an absolute bond of peasants to the land, the Corpus resisted the progressive socio-economic developments which had already begun, but nevertheless opposed slavery (whose economic significance was already considerably reduced) on the basis of the principles of Christian humanitarianism. Furthermore, the Christian church was also involved in the program of restoration. The Imperium romanum and the Christian oecumene were considered identical.

Strengthening the empire, spreading the true faith and annihilating heretics were a single project; to accomplish it, with the effective armies which the generals *Belisarius and *Narses had organized, Justinian conducted a harsh offensive war for more than twenty years. In 534 the *Vandal state of N Africa, of *Arian faith, fell. The next blow was struck in *Italy at the supremacy of the *Ostrogoths, they too were Arians: in 536 *Rome was taken, in 540 *Ravenna. Violation of the peace treaty contracted with Chosroes inaugurated in the East a long period of war as well. Only in 562 was it possible to negotiate peace, at the cost of heavy tributes. Rome had to be temporarily abandoned, while Ravenna, residence of the Byzantine governor (exarch), remained a seat of central power, and was adorned with the churches of St. Vitale, St. Apollinare Nuovo, St. Apollinare in Classe and St. Michael in Affricisco. In 552 the king of the *Goths, *Totila, was defeated on the Via Flaminia; in 554 the Pragmatic Sanction annulled the measures of Totila in favor of slaves and colonists and reintroduced Byzantine administration in Italy. In the same year a Byzantine army occupied SE *Spain. The Mediterranean again became an internal sea of the empire. With the territorial expansion commerce also developed; the imperial regime tried to maintain a positive balance of trade. Textiles, utensils and jewelry were exported, coming above all from Syrian and Egyptian workshops.

When Byzantine monks discovered the secret of silk manufacture, production, processing and marketing of the valuable product became a state monopoly. Craft production for practical and artistic purposes prospered, and thus also the production of artistic books of both spiritual and profane content.

In literature—e.g., in the Histories of *Procopius and in the Epigrams of Agathias and of *Paul the Silent—elements of the classical tradition were introduced. At the same time, new contents appeared in new forms in the rhythmic-accentuative ecclesiastical prose of *Romanus Melodus and in the Universal Chronicle of *John Malalas, he too coming from Syria like Romanus.

Justinian was perfectly aware of the atmosphere of divinization which surrounded his imperial authority. The Christian church nevertheless found in him not only its patron and defender but also its guide. Just as he ruled the state in all its functions, in the same way Justinian governed the church, considering the hierarchy dependent on him. That the emperor possessed the effective competence is attested by his theological writings, whose positions, characterized by the *Neochalcedonian theology, are in fact original. There remain a treatise against the *monophysite doctrine, dating to the years 542/543, an expositio fidei of 551, a more recent edict against the *Origenian doctrine that concludes with twenty anathemas, and finally a reply of the emperor to a pamphlet which had attacked the condemnation of the *Three Chapters. It seems that Justinian also distinguished himself as an author of ecclesiastical hymns.

The period of Justinian's reign has been discussed as the classic epoch of Byzantine *Caesaropapism. The emperor, as theocratic sovereign, considered himself authorized to determine dogma and ecclesiastical discipline down to the tiniest details, making them serve political ends. The *theopaschite formula, e.g., met his approval, and to facilitate the reunion of the Severian monophysites with the church of the empire he promoted a religious discussion at Constantinople in 532 (Collatio cum Severianis), which, however, had no success. Under the impulse of his wife Theodora, he conspired to have the deacon *Vigilius seated in Rome. In 543 he issued an edict in which 9 propositions of Origen, contained in the De principiis, were condemned, and he had Origen's name added to the list of heretics that the bishops and abbots had to anathematize during their entry into office. He intervened in the dispute over the *Three Chapters, concerning which, moved by zeal for dogmatizing, he accepted the proposal of *Theodore Askidas, bishop of Caesarea and very influential at the court, to condemn the heads of the Antiochene school. Making another attempt at reunification with the monophysites, he published a treatise in 543 in which he flung anathemas against *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and *Ibas of Edessa, called more simply the Three Chapters. Given the serious discontent arising after the publication of the edict, Pope Vigilius and the emperor decided in 550 to call an ecumenical council, but because of further quarrels with the emperor the pope did not participate in the work of the council, which was celebrated at Constantinople between May and June 553. In this council, later acknowledged as ecumenical, the condemnations of the Three Chapters and Origenism, including *Didymus of Alexandria and *Evagrius of Pontus, were confirmed.

The era of Justinian, appearing to posterity as a golden age, survived its creator only a short time. The dream of a universal empire was lost under new barbarian incursions, and it took a century before the Byzantine state could consolidate itself again.

CPG III, 6865-6893; PG 86, 1, 913-1152 (for the most relevant texts see, most recently, E. Schwartz, Drei dogmatische Schriften Iustinians, Milan [2]1973); PL 63, 430-510 (CSEL 35, 592-743), PL 66, 14-43, PL 69, 30-328, PL 72, 919-1110; Corpus iuris civilis, eds. Th. Mommsen - F. Krüger - R. Schöll - G. Kroll, 3 vols., Berlin 1908-1912; RAC 19, 668-763; B. Rubin, Das Zeitalter Iustinians, 1, Berlin 1960 (not continued); J. Irmscher, Das Zeitalter Iustianians: Živa Antika 13/14 (1964) 171-186; R. Browning, Justinian and Theodora, London 1971; Ἰ. Ἐ. Καραγιαννόπουλος, Ἱστορία βυζαντινοῦ κράτους, 1, Thessaloniki 1978, 368-605; H. Jedin, Storia della Chiesa, III, Milan 1983, 17-43; K. Bihlmeyer - H. Tuechle, Storia della Chiesa, 1, Brescia 1989, 348-355; R. Marin Conesa, Cristianismo y aculturación en la política de Justiniano: Antigüedad y Cristianismo 7 (1990) 541-549; J.A.S. Evans, The Age of Justinian, London 1996; O. Mazal, Justinian I und seine Zeit. Geschichte und Kultur des Byzantinischen Reiches im 6. Jahrhundert, Cologne 2001; var. aus., Storia del Cristianesimo. Religione, politica, cultura, 3, Rome 2003, 373-406; Patrologia V, 54-89.

J. Irmscher - C. Dell'Osso

JUSTINIAN of Valencia (d. 547). From a family of the province of *Tarragona which had given several bishops to the church (*Justus of Urgel, Elpidius of Huesca and Nebridius were his brothers), he was bishop of Valencia from 527 to 547 (Isid., Vir. ill. 20). It seems that he was a good preacher, a father to the monks and a builder of churches: an activity which he was able to perform only due to the prestige and education received, thanks to his family, during the *Arian monarchy of the *Visigoths. *Isidore records him as the author of a treatise addressed to a certain Rusticus (Liber responsionum ad quemdam Rusticium de interrogatis quaestionibus) and divided into five parts concerning trinitarian, christological and disciplinary questions. There have been attempts to reconstruct this treatise starting from the De cognitione baptismi of *Ildefonsus of Toledo. Furthermore, a sermon which has reached us as a work of Pope *Leo in honor of St. *Vincent has been attributed to Justinian, although with much caution. Surviving, however, is his epitaph in verse (Hübner, Insc. Hisp. Christ. 1871, n. 409).

A. Helfferich, Der westgotische Arianismus, Berlin 1860; P. Glaue, Zur Geschichte der Taufe in Spanien: Stzb. Heidelberg Phil. hist. Kl. 4 (1913) 10, 1-23; A. Braegelmann, The Life and Writings of Saint Ildefonsus of Toledo, Washington, DC 1942, 60-96; A. Linage Conde, Tras las huellas de Justiniano de Valencia: Primer Congreso de Historia del País Valenciano, II, Valencia 1981, 353-363; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 348-350.

P. Marone

JUSTUS of Canterbury (d. ca. 627). Monk of Roman origin. With *Mellitus, *Paulinus and Rufinian, he was part of the second mission sent by St. *Gregory the Great to England to help St. *Augustine (601), who consecrated him bishop of Rochester (Kent) in 604. The restoration of paganism by Eadbald forced Justus to retreat among the Franks (618). In 624 he succeeded Mellitus as fourth bishop of Canterbury, and *Boniface V sent him the pallium with a letter full of praises. *Bede (Hist. eccl. I, 29; II, 3-5; II, 7; II, 17-18) and Gregory (Ep. 11) inform us about Justus's stay in England.

DCB 3, 592-593; W.H. Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, I, London 1861, 100-110; AASS Nov. IV, Brussels 1925, 532-537; P. Grosjean, Le faux de 606 provient-il de Cantorbéry? Date de la lettre des ss. Laurent, Mellitus et Justus aux Irlandais: AB 64 (1946) 231-244; BS 7, 28-29; PCBE 2, 1223, n. 10.

E. Romero Pose

JUSTUS of Lyons (d. ca. 400). Deacon of the church of *Vienne and later bishop of *Lyons, where he was a holy and zealous shepherd. Perhaps he took part in the Council of *Valence in 374 and that of *Aquileia in 381. On his return from Aquileia, because of a bloody uproar which had broken out in the city, he renounced his office and retired to Egypt, where he lived as a hermit. He was visited by the priest Antiochus, who would be his third successor at Lyons. His mortal remains were repatriated and deposited in the church of the Maccabees which took his name (as did the neighborhood). His tomb was quickly the object of intense popular veneration; *Sidononius Apollinaris (d. 469) speaks of it in a letter (Ep. V, 17,3-4). His feast is celebrated 14 October.

AASS Sept. I, 365-376; BS 7, 31-32; Cath 6, 123f.; Topographie chrétienne de la Gaule, IV, Province ecclésiastique de Lyon (Lugdunensis prima), Paris 1986, 27-28.

A. Hamman

JUSTUS of Toledo (d. 633). Monk and then abbot in the monastery of Agali (close to *Toledo). A man of great eloquence, he became archbishop of *Toledo around 630. Concerning the inescapable responsibilities of a pastor of souls, he dedicated to Rechilanus, his successor in governing the monastery of Agali, a work which has not reached us (Ildef., Vir. Ill. 7). A treatise De aenigmatibus Salomonis has been attributed to him, which today, however, is believed to have been composed by *Taio of *Saragossa (Vega, Étaix). He died young in 633.

CPL 1235; Díaz 135; A.C. Vega, Tajón de Saragoza: Una obra inédita: Ciudad de Dios 155 (1943) 174-177; Id., ES 56, Madrid 1957, 411-419; R. Étaix, Note sur le De aenigmatibus Salomonis: MSR 15 (1958) 137-142; U. Domínguez del Val, El "De aenigmatibus Salomonis" ante la crítica: Ciudad de Dios 163 (1960) 139-143; Id., Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 468-471.

P. Marone

JUSTUS of Trieste (d. 303?). The famous Hieronymian Martyrology, compiled in the Venetian area around the middle of the 5th c., records a St. Justus for 2, 3, 8 and 16 November, but on none of these dates is he referred to Istria, let alone to Trieste, but rather to *Africa or *Capppadocia, to *Capua or to *Caesarea in Mauretania. The editors of the Hieronymian consider the repetition under these dates of a single original report, which could be that of 2 November, taken from the Passio of the martyr venerated at Trieste (Passus est autem beatissimus Iustus sub die IV nonas novembris). Among the Passiones which transmit the martyrdom of the Triestine saint between the time of the Antonines and that of *Diocletian, the Passio of St. Justus would be the most reliable and sincere, derived as it seems from the official minutes of the trial or from notes of witnesses (acc. to the judgment of V. van Hooff, to whom is due a first critical edition of the Acta Sanctorum Novembris in 1887). Every attempt to get the young Justus to abjure having failed, the magistrate pronounced the death sentence against him, and the torturers drowned him in the waters of the gulf. The priest Sebastian, per visum commonitus, found his body next to the shore of the sea, near the suburban location where the remains of a cross-shaped martyrial basilica have recently come to light (5th–6th c.). After Van Hooff, however, more recent scholars have leaned toward distancing the composition of the Passio from the facts narrated in it, therefore denying its historical reliability. The great Bollandist H. Delehaye had expressed his reservations on the account of the martyrdom and, in more recent years, V. Saxer and R. Grégoire proposed locating the composition in the Carolingian period, perhaps under the guidance of a more ancient nucleus. Recently, however, S. Di Brazzano has published a new critical edition and, taking account of the presence of MS witnesses of the 9th c. already corrupted in some places, has excluded this possibility. Thus, along the lines of V. Ussani, he has proposed assigning the text to the 6th c., in a period of particular dynamism such as that of the bishopric of Frugifer, first historically noted bishop of Tergeste.

As for the relics of Justus, one should observe that just as in the 10th c. frequent attestations are found of their presence in the cathedral on the Capitoline Hill, they were found there in 1624 by Bishop Scarlicchio under the altar of the saint, together with the little *sarcophagus in Aurisina limestone with a pitched cover with angular acroteria, probably of Late Antique manufacture, which until 1624 contained the silver urn (12th–13th c.) with the relics of Justus, now in the chapel of the treasury. The recent examination of the skeletal remains attributed to him have proven that these belong to the same individual of a rather advance age and masculine sex, in agreement with the indications of the Passio, where Justus is called vir Dei, contrary to the later iconographic tradition which settled on showing him as a beardless youth.

H. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels 1933, 330; G. Cuscito, San Giusto e le origini cristiane a Trieste: Archeografo Triestino 31-32 (1969-70) 3-36; Id., Cristianesimo antico ad Aquileia e in Istria, Trieste 1977, 106-124 (with bibl.); V. Saxer, L'Istria e i santi istriani Servolo, Giusto e Mauro nei martirologi e le passioni: Atti e Memorie della Società Istriana di Archeologia e Storia Patria 22 n.s. (1984) 60ff.; G. Cuscito, Le origini cristiane a Trieste fra tradizione agiografica e riscontri archeologici, in La tradizione martiriale tergestina. Storia, culto e arte, ed. V. Cian - G. Cuscito, Trieste 1992, 47-93; R. Grégoire, Le passioni degli antichi martiri di Trieste, in La tradizione mar- tiriale . . . , op. cit., 97-111; S. Di Brazzano, Passio sancti Iusti martyris: Atti e Memorie della Società Istriana di Archeologia e Storia Patria 98 (1998) 57-85; DHGE 28, 63.

G. Cuscito

JUSTUS of Urgel. A Spanish exegete, in the middle of the 6th c. he wrote a Commentary on the Song of Songs, short and entirely unoriginal, in which he offers the traditional interpretation which sees in the two spouses the symbol of Christ and the church and develops this theme in the thousand variations already codified by a long interpretative line (*Hippolytus, *Origen etc.).

CPL 1091-1092; PL 67, 961-994; Moricca III, 2, 1518-1519; J. Aldazábal, Influencia de Gregorio de Elvira y de Justo de Urgel en el Liber psalmographus hispánico: Fons vivus, Zürich 1971, 143-161; Patrologia IV, 68.

M. Simonetti

JUVENAL (4th c.). Manuscript B of the Mart. hier. mentions Juvenal, along with three martyrs of the Via Nomentana, Eventius, Alexander and Theodolus, on 3 May. Belisarius dedicated a monastery to him near Orte (Duchesne LP 1, 296). *Gregory the Great speaks of a Juvenal martyr—not necessarily in a strict sense—and bishop of Narni in Umbria, whose tomb still existed in his own times (Dial. 4,12; Hom. in Ev. 37,9). In the Sacramentarium Gelasianum a prayer appears in his honor. According to the Passio of the 7th–8th c., Pope *Damasus ordained Juvenal, a doctor and priest of N African origin; he died in peace 3 May, the feast of the discovery of the holy cross. Veneration has encouraged the identification of Juvenal as bishop of Benevento as well, while the relics of Juvenal of Fossano might belong to yet another man named Juvenal identified with him.

BHL 4614-4616; BS 6, 1069-1070; LCI 7, 260; E. Wuescher-Becchi, Das Oratorium des hl. Cassius und das Grab des hl. Juvenalis in Narni: Römische Quartalschrift 25 (1911) 61-71; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 402-404; L. Pani Ermini, Il culto di S. Giovenale nell'Italia centrale. Le testimonianze monumentali: Bollettino della Deputazione di Storia Patria per l'Umbria 75 (1978) 1-29; A. Amore, Problemi agiografici relativi a S. Giovenale di Spoleto: Studia Historico-Ecclesiastica, Misc. L.G. Spätling, Rome 1977, 169-181.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

JUVENAL of Jerusalem. Bishop of *Jerusalem (422–458), he took advantage of the christological controversies between 431 and 451 to increase the authority of his episcopal see. At *Ephesus in 431, he sided with *Cyril against *Nestorius; and in 449, again at Ephesus, he sided with *Dioscorus of Alexandria against *Flavian in favor of *Eutyches. But at *Chalcedon, in 451, given the new situation created by the antimonophysite reaction, he abandoned Dioscorus to his fate and signed the decisions of the council. He obtained in this way, in the session of 26 October, an extension of the bishop of Jerusalem's authority over the three Palestines, so as to make of his see a fourth patriarchate next to those of *Constantinople, *Antioch and *Alexandria. At his return home, violent outbursts provoked against him by *monophysite monks forced him to flee to Constantinople, and only the support of the militia allowed him to regain possession, with force, of his throne.

CPG III, 6710-6712; E Honigmann, Juvenal of Jerusalem: DOP 5 (1950) 211-279; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 325; Patrologia V, 255-256.

M. Simonetti

JUVENCUS (1st half of the 4th c.). Gaius Vettius Aquilinus Juvencus composed around 330 a hexametric paraphrase of the gospel of *Matthew with supplements from the other Evangelists (esp. from Luke), the Euangeliorum libri IV, which transform the evangelical narratio into an epic story through a constant imitation of Virgilian poetry.

*Jerome informs us on this poet in two places: in one (Ep. 70,5), he says that Juvencus, who lived under *Constantine, was the first to put the story of the Lord into verse (uersibus explicauit) not fearing to transpose the Word of God into the highest literary forms of the pagan human word (nec pertimuit Euangelii maiestatem sub metri leges mittere); and in the other (Vir. inl. 84), he says that the priest, belonging to a very noble family, composed four books transposing the gospels into hexameters almost literally (quattuor euangelia hexametris uersibus paene ad uerbum transferens quattuor libros composuit). This second judgment has influenced modern critics, who have insisted too much on the slavishly literal character of the activity of Juvencus, presented as a laborious and insipid versifier. In reality, in the difficult task of inaugurating a poetic genre, the Spanish priest had to reckon, on the one hand, with the sensitivities of those who considered it a profanation to submit the words of Jesus to the laws of classical verse, which had sung the obscenities of the pagan gods, and, on the other, with the simplicity of the Semitically incisive language of the gospel text. In contrast with *Paulinus of Nola or with *Sedulius, more inclined to ekphraseis, to rhetorical and pathetic amplifications, as well as to exegetical and meditative elaborations, Juvencus adheres more closely to the evangelical narratio, which he versifies paene ad uerbum. The paraphrase of Juvencus, therefore, can easily be called literal or grammatical, on the condition that with such a definition one intends only to underline the pronounced fidelity of the Euangeliorum libri to the original sacred text and the attention to scrupulous exactness in historical and doctrinal detail, and not the poor quality of a versification free from all poetic worth.

Employing with conscious mastery the two privileged instruments of paraphrase—i.e., abbreviatio and amplificatio—the Spanish poet composed a work which is not only the first example of a successful paraphrase in the field of ancient Christian poetry but also a meaningful example of an epic catechism aimed at readers nourished by the poetry and spirituality of Virgil. It is in this attempt to convert the cultivated aristocracy to the Christian message that Juvencus takes his place in the cultural-religious policy of Constantine. On the level of compositional practice, Juvencus—while respectful of the letter of the original text—omits Hebraic toponyms and patronyms, eliminates the Semitisms of the gospel language, obliterates the geographic and genealogical details present in the evangelical account, and replaces the original Palestinian landscapes with the landscapes of ancient *Italy sung by Virgil, effecting what Poinsotte calls politique du silence, intended to de-Judaize the biblical story and underline the universality of Christianity. The tendency to eliminate secondary figures from the evangelical account contributes, furthermore, to better illuminate the figure of Christ, the protagonist of the poem. The suppression of narrative elements of the original is nevertheless compensated with amplificationes; the ancient poetry of nature penetrates into the interstices of the evangelical account, even when the parables of Jesus do not offer particular opportunities. With his paraphrase Juvencus, beautifying the Holy Scripture with rhetorical ornaments (ornamenta terrestria linguae; see 4,805), intended, on the one hand, to win for Christianity the most culturally elevated social classes and, on the other, to offer to catechumens and Christians a pious reading, centered on meditation and prayer.

To give an idea of the importance and the originality—on the cultural level not less than the religious one—of the paraphrastic work it is necessary to point out the praefatio, which cannot be ignored by anyone who wishes to correctly evaluate all the Christian poetic genera, including paraphrase.

Considering that nothing in the world is immortal, Juvencus points out splendid human enterprises, of which the poets increase the glory and prolong the memory (v. 1-8). The glory of the poets is no less durable; of the classics only the two greatest are mentioned, the Smyrnean Homer and sweet Virgil, born on the banks of the Mincius (v. 9-14). So, if the glory of the profane poets is almost eternal, who sang of fictitious things, full of lies, how much more do Christian poets deserve immortal glory, who sing of true things (v. 15-18). The Spanish priest therefore declares that he will sing the Christi uitalia gesta (v. 19-20) in the hope of escaping the eternal fire on the day of judgment (vv. 21-24). The praefatio finishes with an invocation of the *Holy Spirit which substitutes for the traditional one to Apollo and to the Muses: "May the Holy Spirit inspire the mind of the poet who girds himself to sing things worthy of Christ and wash his mind with the waters of the sweet Jordan, the baptismal river par excellence" (vv. 25-27: Ergo age! sanctificus adsit mihi carminis auctor/Spiritus, et puro mentem riget amne canentis/dulcis Iordanis, ut Christo digna loquamur), in contrast to pagan bards, who had composed things worthy of Phoebus (Virg. Aen. 6,662: quique pii uates et Phoebo digna locuti), obtaining residence in the blessed seats.

Finally, the paraphrase will propitiate salvation for its author, just as the governmental action in favor of Christianity will guarantee to Constantine immortal glory in the diuina saecula. However, the happy result of the paraphrase is explicitly attributed to the religious peace established by Constantine, who therefore has a place of honor, next to Christ, at the end of the poem: 4,806-808: Haec mihi pax Christi tribuit, pax haec mihi saecli / quam fouet indulgens terrae regnator apertae /Constantinus. The parallelism pax Christi / pax saecli defines the ideological importance of a poetic experiment in which the gospel and Virgil agree without dissonances under the pen of a provincial aristocrat having become a priest.

CPL 1385. Editions: PL 19, 53-346; J. Hümer, CSEL 24, 1891.

Exegetical Commentaries: H.H. Kievits, Groningen 1940 (l. I); J. De Wit, ibid. 1947 (l. II) - Concordantia: M. Wacht, Hildesheim 1990. Gr. tr.: A. Knappitsch, Graz 1910-1913 (4 fasc.); Sp. tr.: M. Castillo Bejarano, Madrid 1998.

Studies: H. Nestler, Studien über die Messiade des J., Passau 1910; F. Laganà, Giovenco, Catania 1947; L. Stroelecki, Studia prosodica et metrica, Krakow 1949, 14-49 (on the synaloephe); H. Hansson, Textkritisches zu I. mit vollständigem Index verborum, Lund 1950; M. Donnini, Annotazioni sulla tecnica parafrastica negli Evangeliorum libri di Giovenco: Vichiana 1 (1972) 231-249; Id., Un aspetto dell'espressività di G.

L'aggettivazione: ibid. 2 (1973) 54-67; Id., L'allitterazione e l'omeoteleuto in G.: Ann. Fac. Lett. Perugia 12 (1974-75) 128-159; A. Longpré, Aspects de métrique et de prosodie chez J.: Phoenix 29 (1975) 128-138; I. Opelt, Die Szenerie bei Iuvencus: VChr 29 (1975) 191-207; J.-M. Poinsotte, Juvencus et Israël. La représentation des juifs dans le premier poème latin chrétien, Paris 1979; J. Fontaine, Naissance de la poésie dans l'Occident chrétien, Paris 1981, 67-80; Id., "Dominus lucis": un titre singulier du Christ dans le dernier vers de J., in Mem. A.-J. Festugière, Geneva 1984, 131-141; S. Costanza, Da Giovenco a Sedulio. I proemi degli "Evangeliorum libri" e del "Carmen Paschale": Civiltà Classica e Cristiana 6 (1985) 253-286; Chr. Ratkowitsch, Vergils Seesturm bei Iuvencus und Sedulius: JbAC 29 (1986) 40-58; P. Flury, Juvencus und Alcimus Avitus: Philologus 132 (1988) 286-296; W. Kirsch, Die lateinische Versepik des 4. Jahrhunderts, Berlin 1989, 84-117; M. Castro Jiménez, V. Cristóbal, S. Mauro Melle, Sobre el estilo de J.: Helmantica (1989) 211-219; M. Testard, J. et le sacré dans un épisode des Euangeliorum libri IV: Bull. Ass. G. Budé (1990) 3-31; E. Borrel Vidal, Las palabras de Virgilio en J., Barcelona 1991; P. Orbán, Die Versifikation von Lk 1, 5-80 in den Euangeliorum libri quattuor des Iuvencus. Eine analyse von Juvenc. 1, 1-132: ZNTW 83 (1992) 224-244; G. Campagnuolo, Caratteri e tecniche della parafrasi di Giovenco: VetChr 30 (1993) 47-84; M. Flieger, Interpretationen zum Bibeldichter Iuvencus. Gethsemane, Festnahme Jesu und Kaiphasprozess (4, 478-564), Stuttgart 1993; R. Fichtner, Juvencus. Taufe und Versuchung Jesu in den Evangeliorum libri quattuor des Bibeldichters Juvencus (1, 346-408), Stuttgart-Leipzig 1994; D. Ertmer, Studien zur althochdeutschen und altsächsischen Iuvencusglossierung, Göttingen 1994; G. Simonetti Abbolito, Scritti vari, ed. C. Curti - B. Clausi, Catania 1995, 97-154; W. Röttger, Studien zur Lichtmotivik bei Iuvencus: JbAC 24 (1996); E. Colombi, Paene ad verbum. Gli Evangeliorum libri di G. tra parafrasi e commento: Cassiodorus 3 (1997) 9-36; Id. Sull'uso delle preposizioni negli Evangeliorum libri IV di G., in Discentibus obvius. Omaggio degli allievi a D. Magnino, Como 1997, 9-21; Id., Poesia ed esegesi cristiana: interferenze tra i Vangeli di Matteo e Luca negli Evangeliorum libri di Giovenco, in G. Mazzoli - F. Gasti (ed.), Prospettive sul Tardoantico. Atti del Convegno di Pavia (27-28 novembre 1997), Como 1999, 151-156; Id., Iuvenciana I: Vet-Chr 37 (2000) 235-269; R. Palla, La parafrasi di Matth. 7, 13-14 negli Evangeliorum libri di Giovenco: Boll. Badia Greca Grottaferrata 52 (1998) 19-29; A.V. Nazzaro, Poesia biblica come espressione teologica: fra tardoantico e altomedioevo, in F. Stella (ed.), La Scrittura infinita. Bibbia e poesia in età medievale e umanistica, Florence 2001, 119-153 (pp. 130-152 are dedicated to a comparative analysis of Iuvenc. 1, 224-270 and Sedul. 2, 73-133); Id., L'Annunzio dell'Angelo a Maria (Lc 1, 26-38) nelle riscritture metriche di Giovenco (1, 52-79) e Paolino di Nola (Carm. 6, 108-138), in A.M. Taragna (ed.), La poesia tardoantica e medievale. Atti del II Conv. int. di studi, Perugia 15-16 novembre 2001, Alessandria 2004; Id., La visita di Maria a Elisabetta (Lc 1, 39-56) nelle riscritture metriche di Giovenco (I 80-104) e Paolino di Nola (Carm. 6, 139-78), in U. Criscuolo (ed.), Societas Studiorum. Per Salvatore D'Elia (Pubblicazioni del Dipartimento di Filologia Classica Francesco Arnaldi), Naples 2004, 423-440. On the praefatio: P.G. van der Nat, Die Praefatio der Evangelienparaphrase des J., in Romanitas et Christianitas, Amsterdam-London 1973, 249-257; F. Quadlbauer, Zur Invocatio des I.: Grazer Beiträge 2 (1974) 189-212; R. Palla, Aeterna in saecula in Giovenco, Praefatio 17: Studi Classici e Orientali 26 (1977) 377-382; F. Murru, Analisi semiologica e strutturale della praefatio agli Evangeliorum libri di G.: WS 14 (1980) 133-151; R.W. Carrubba, The Preface to Juvencus' Biblical Epic: A Structural Study: Amer. Journ. Philol. 114 (1993) 303-312; K. Thraede, Anfänge frühchristlich-lateinischer Bibelepik: Buchgrenzen bei Juvencus, in M. Salvadore (ed.), La poesia tardoantica e medievale, Alessandria 2001, 13-23.

A.V. NAZZARO

K

KERYGMA. The term kērygma (“proclamation/preaching”), in the NT, as already in the Greek world, indicates both the content of the message and the act itself of announcing, or else the nucleus itself not only of the gospel, but also of the whole primitive Christian community. Elements which constitute the kerygma are first of all the death and resurrection of Christ, which, in the moment itself in which they are announced, realize in the life of each believer that salvation of which they speak (see 1 Cor 1:21; 2:4). The kerygma thus becomes both a historical and eschatological reality. In the NT there are various formulations of the kerygma inserted both in discourses pronounced by Peter (Acts 2:14-36; 2:38-39; 3:12-26; 4:8-12; 10:34-43) or by Paul (Acts 13:16-41), which give some biographical information on Christ, and in other passages which, however, are free of any mention concerning characteristics or events of the life of Jesus. In the latter case the so-called historical section of the kerygma (i.e., that part which historicizes the figure of Jesus) is used acc. to the scheme of “humiliation/glorification,” where the humiliation is seen in the announcement of the incarnation (and in this case also speaks of preexistence: Rom 10:6-9; 1 Cor 8:6; 2 Cor 8:9; Phil 2:6-11; Col 1:15-20; Heb 1:2f.) or else directly in the moment of death (Rom 1:3-4; 1 Tim 3:16; 1 Pet 3:18). For the Fathers of the first centuries the term kerygma indicates the entirety of the mystery of Christ (Hermas, Sim. 8,3). The “seal of the kerygma” is baptism (Sim. 9,16). For *Irenaeus, kerygma is constituted of what was preached by the apostles and their disciples concerning God the creator; Jesus Christ, his Son; the *Holy Spirit and the “economy,” including the advent, the virgin birth, the passion, resurrection, ascension, return of Christ and recapitulation, resurrection and universal judgment (Adv. haer. I, 10,1). This kerygma is “diligently kept” (Adv. haer. I, 10,2-3). But heretics too propose their own kerygma (e.g., Carpocrates: Iren., Adv. haer. I, 25,3). *Origen mentions, however, that the kerygma of the Christians is public, known to all in its constitutive elements which once again are the virgin birth, the crucifixion, the resurrection of Christ and the eschatological judgment (C. Cels. 1,7). The content of the kerygma will show itself to be divine to the degree that the person who announces it is a person of little account (ps.-Chrys., PG 64, 25; see also Orig., C. Cels. 1,62). In the widest meaning of “preaching,” the term kerygma is found in *Eusebius (HE I, 10,1), for whom the entire activity of Christ is also included in the term kerygma (HE I, 10,7; III, 24,7) as well as the salvific and missionary activity of the primitive apostolic community (HE II, 1,13; 9,4; 22,4; IV, 8,2). The content of the kerygma is in this case the “kingdom of the heavens” (HE II, 14,6) or “the truth” (opposed to the “lying science” of the heretics: HE III, 32,8), but the expression “kerygma of truth” also indicates the main activity of *Polycarp (HE IV, 14,8) and of the bishops of Rome (HE V, 6,5) up to *Victor (HE V, 28,3).

GLNT 5, 472-482 (TDNT 3, 683–718); J.M. Robinson, Kerygma e Gesù storico, Brescia 1977; J.I.H. McDonald, Kerygma and Didache: The Articulation and the Structure of the Earliest Christian Message, Cambridge 1980.

M.G. Mara

KINGDOM of GOD (developments of the formula in the first three centuries). In the NT, outside the synoptic tradition of the sayings of *Jesus, the formula βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ/τῶν οὐρανῶν (“the kingdom of God/ of the heavens”) gradually vanished. It was rarely used by the apostle *Paul (13 times in the 13 Epistles); it occurs twice in the gospel of *John and another two times in the book of Revelation; eight times in the Acts of the Apostles, once in the Epistle to the Hebrews and another time in the Epistle of *James: in all, there are 27 occurrences contrasting with the more than 60 appearances of the term in the gospels of *Mark, *Matthew and *Luke.

If we then pass to the writings immediately after the NT and the *Apostolic Fathers, the absence of the term is almost complete, with the exception of *Justin Martyr's first Apologia and the Dialogue with Trypho the Jew.

There is only one reference in *Athenagoras's Plea for the Christians, where God and his Son's heavenly kingdom is compared to the empire of *Marcus Aurelius and his son *Commodus, who have a hand on everything: "O great emperors," one reads, "from your state you can make an argument for the heavenly kingdom. In fact, like you, father and son, all things have been given into your hand when you received the empire from on high (because 'the soul of the King is in the hand of God,' says the prophetic Spirit), so too the entire universe is subjected to the only God and the Word, the Son, who is in his presence, understood as inseparable" (Plea 18,2). As one can see, Athenagoras spoke here of the basileia ("kingdom") understood not so much as "a future good," but as the sovereign power of the Creator who is above all things. Even the basileia of the Caesars comes from on high (ἄνωθεν), and in fact—as it is said in Prov 21:1—"The king's heart is a stream of water in the hand of the Lord; he turns it wherever he will." Thus Athenagoras's reference to the "prophetic Spirit" leads to a decisive relativization of Caesar's power. One must recognize, however, that this representation of God the creator and Lord, firmly anchored in the biblical tradition, is harmonized with great difficulty with the abstract concept of God, which is elaborated as a general rule in Athenagoras's Plea.

The references of *Justin Martyr's first Apologia pertain primarily to the conditions of belonging to the kingdom of God. Thus 1 Apol. 15,2 cites Mt 18:9 ("It is better for you to enter life with one eye . . ."); 1 Apol. 15,4 cites the mention of castration for the sake of the kingdom in Mt 19:12; 1 Apol. 15,16 uses Mt 6:33 ("But seek first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things shall be yours as well"). Again 1 Apol. 16,9, appeals to Mt 7:21 and places as a condition of belonging to the kingdom one's adherence without reservation to the will of the *Father: it is necessary to be converted, "to be born again," in order to enter the kingdom; in this perspective 1 Apol. 61,4 freely cites from Jn 3:3. Last, there is a passage from the Apologia that does not contain a direct reference to *Scripture. One reads therein: "We were instructed that in the beginning he [God], being good, made all things from unformed matter for humankind; who, if with their works show themselves worthy of his design, we have learned that they will be deserving of rest with him, reigning together with him, having become incorruptible and impassible. Because, as in the beginning when they did not exist he created them, thus we believe that those who choose things that are pleasing to him will be worthy of incorruptibility and of dwelling with him" (1 Apol. 10,2-3). This last citation is revealing. It demonstrates that in any case Justin's reference to the preaching of Jesus on the kingdom is more formal than real. If it is true that the reference to the Scriptures and the word of the Lord effectively resists the transformation of the Christian faith into philosophy, hope in the promised salvation finds its expression less in the NT concept of basileia than in the Greek concepts of immortality, incorruptibility, eternal life and full knowledge.

Finally, we refer to the Dialogue with Trypho. It has numerous OT testimonies (testimonia) pertaining both to the promise of the kingdom (basileia) and the future realization of it. Justin freely cites the prophecy of Nathan to *David (2 Sam 7:14-16), and another passage that makes reference to the same context (Dial. 118,2; 68,5). Moreover, he mentions various "royal *psalms" or "psalms of feasts and liturgies," and attributes the prophetic announcement of Christ's royalty to these: specifically Ps 24 (Dial. 36,3-6; 85,1-4; 100,4; 127,5); Ps 45 (Dial. 38,3-5; 56,14; 63,4-5; 76,7; 86,3; 126,1); Ps 47 (Dial. 37,1); Ps 72 (Dial. 34,2-6; 45,4; 64,6; 76,6-7; 121,1-2); Ps 99 (Dial. 37,3-4; 64,4); Ps 110 (Dial. 19,4; 32,3-6; 33,1-2; 36,5; 45,2-4; 56,14; 63,3; 76,7; 83,1-4; 96,1; 113,5; 118,1; 127,5) and last Ps 132 (Dial. 68,5). Even the prophetic citations pursue the same objectives such as Is 7:10-17 with respect to the Messiah's virgin birth (Dial. 43,5-8; 66,2-3; 67,1; 68,6-7; 71,3; 84,1-3) or Is 43:15 (Dial. 135,1). But of particular importance in the Dialogue is a frequent reference to Dan 7:9-28 (Dial. 31,2-7; 46,1; 76,1; 79,2; 86,1; 110,2; 118,1; 120,4). Therefore, the conclusions that one gathers from the analysis of this testimonium, which was so widely used by Justin, can be generalized in order to offer a "hermeneutical key" to the entire OT dossier adopted for this point.

At ch. 31, Justin cites the passage under discussion in its entirety. It is the longest citation from *Daniel in Christian writings of the first two centuries. In that passage, Justin precedes and follows the citation with a few comments, which are sufficient, however, for clarifying the objectives of the citation itself. The objection that Trypho formulates at the beginning of ch. 32 is interesting: "This"—i.e., Dan 7—"and other similar Scriptures," Trypho observes, "invite one to await the one who, like a son of man, receives the eternal kingdom in glory and power from the Ancient of Days: but that one, your supposed Christ, was entirely without honor and glory, to such an extent as to incur the ultimate curse of the divine law. In fact, he was crucified" (Dial. 32,1). Justin's response is not expected: unveiling the objectives of the citation from Daniel, he demonstrates that the glorious destiny of the Son of Man and the inauguration of his kingdom refer to the second coming of Christ. In a study entirely dedicated to the exegesis of Daniel and the church of the first three centuries, R. Bodenmann asked why Justin in ch. 31 of the Dialogue cited more than 20 verses of Dan 7. For the specific demands of the controversy with Trypho, it would have been enough for him to cite only verses 13-14, which specifically contain the description of the solemn investiture of the Son of Man. He was able to find only one answer to this question: Justin intended to focus the reader's attention on the preceding circumstances of the glorious coming of the Lord, and, without compromising himself before the civil authorities of the time, he wished to suggest that such circumstances were already at their developed stages. Therefore, Justin presented the context of Dan 7:13-14 in such a way that a Jew or a Christian—in contradistinction to a "noninitiated" person—could without much difficulty discern the author's message.

We can summarize the message in these terms: one must only await the coming of the one who will bring forth blasphemies against the most high, and who must maintain power "for a time, more time and a half time." (Justin did not explain this formula, but Bodenmann, following the path of *John's book of Revelation and the Adversus haereses—the testimonies of the Danielic tradition that are in every sense closer to Justin—maintained that it equaled three and a half years.) After this event, the Roman Empire would be destroyed and the Messiah would return (R. Bodenmann, Naissance d'une Exégèse. Daniel dans l'Église ancienne des trois premiers siècles, Tübingen 1986, 227-231). I shall add three considerations to Bodenmann's conclusions.

1. The frequent recourse to the Old Testament testimonies (testimonia) without a doubt places the concept of basileia present in the Dialogue in the biblical and historical-salvific dimension and articulates its stages of realization by notably distinguishing the first coming of Christ in the humility of the cross from his definitive glorious *parousia. This certainly prevents one from simply reducing Justin's biblical discussion on the kingdom to a *Middle Platonist and *Stoic philosophical concept. Nonetheless, Justin did not develop, starting from the OT concepts, a theological elaboration established on the corresponding adequate recovery of the Synoptic tradition of the sayings of Jesus: precisely because—as we will have the opportunity to see—even in the Dialogue, as in the Apology, this recovery is more formal than real. All of this did not allow Justin to do what *Origen did 70 years later, i.e., the reconfiguring—in the context of a much more mature scriptural *exegesis—of eschatological interpretations foreign to the preaching of Jesus as much as they were disturbing for the imperial authorities.

2. Certainly, the discussion on the kingdom found in chs. 31-39 of the Dialogue was not immune to chiliast conclusions: here and elsewhere in Justin's writings it is actually possible to identify a confusion between the heavenly basileia proclaimed by *Jesus and the millennial kingdom preached by the Jewish tradition. The doctrine of the millennium would be clearly explained at the end of ch. 80, and even identified—probably by the catalyst of the controversy against eschatological, *gnostic spiritualism—as an undeniable element of Christian *orthodoxy: "I," Justin states, "and those who are entirely orthodox, maintain that there will be a resurrection of the flesh and one thousand years in Jerusalem reconstructed, adorned and enlarged, as the prophets *Ezekiel, Isaiah and others affirmed" (Dial. 80,5).

3. If Bodenmann's interpretation is right, the apocalyptic citation of Dan 7 undoubtedly masks the spirit of retaliation against Caesar's kingdom that Justin had shrewdly put to rest in the Apology addressed to the emperor and his heirs.

Then, with respect to the NT testimonies, among the sayings of Jesus on the kingdom, Justin used Mt 4:17 (Dial. 51,2) and Mt 11:12-15 (Dial. 51,3); and three times in a substantially identical way, Mt 8:11-12 (Dial. 76,4; 120,6; 140,4). In addition to these citations, which illustrate the coming of the basileia in Christ's first and second *parousia, there are not lacking in the Dialogue some references to Jesus' words on the indispensable moral conditions for those belonging to the kingdom. In fact, the special attention given by the cultural climate surrounding the topic of the destiny of the individual and the voluntary exercise of virtue for assimilation to God and the divine led Justin to grasp more than anything else the ethical implications of Jesus' preaching on the kingdom of God. Last, there is a passage in which Justin discusses the kingdom of God without making a direct appeal to the Scriptures. He throws in Trypho's face the fact that the "high priests of the Jewish people did everything they could so that Jesus Christ's name would be profaned and smeared with blasphemies in every part of the earth." "But God," Justin continues, "would show that the sordid lies that you hurled on all those who became Christians in the name of Jesus should be removed from us: and this will occur when he will call all to life and will establish every one of them [the Christians]—incorruptible, immortal and free from all pain—in the eternal and indestructible kingdom; the others [their adversaries] he will send into the eternal punishment of fire" (Dial. 117,3). In this passage—which in truth remains rather isolated in Justin's works—the hope of the kingdom matches the Greek philosophical ideals of aphtharsia ("incorruptibility"), athanasia ("immortality") and apatheia ("impassibility"). Accordingly, he withdraws the historical-salvific tension and forwards the Middle Platonist conception of assimilation to God and the divine through the voluntary exercise of virtue. The development of individual ethics, which rests in turn on the privileged consideration of the individual's destiny and judgment (in fact, it is well known how dear to Justin, even for its apologetic relevance, was the theme of the irreproachable conduct of Christians), corresponds to the tendential fall of the eschatological horizon. In sum—with the analysis of the most important texts already exhausted—we can confirm that not even in the Dialogue with Trypho did Jesus' preaching on the kingdom find an elaboration that was adequate and coherent with the historic-salvific revelation of the Bible. In Justin's debate with Trypho—or rather in the confrontation between 2nd-c. Christianity and *Judaism—the pertinent OT testimonies were not always correctly reread in deep agreement with the Synoptic tradition of the sayings of Jesus. In turn, the NT preaching itself on the kingdom tended to be received more in the function of the voluntary exercise of virtue—which corresponds to the attainment of the award—than the function of divine, efficacious and salvific grace. Thus, on the one hand, one can detect the temptation to assimilate the biblical doctrine of the kingdom to Greek philosophical concepts, and on the other hand, the definitive basileia of the Son, who is seated at the right hand of the Father, remains confused with the millennial kingdom of Christ and his righteous ones in the heavenly *Jerusalem descended to earth. This does not mean that in the writings of the Greek *Apologists there was a development in the millennialist sense of the concept of the kingdom of God: neither in the writings of *Tatian nor in *Athenagoras nor in *Theophilus can one find a belief in the millennial earthly kingdom of the righteous with Christ. Justin places some scriptural citations in a context in which it is difficult to determine whether the author intended to speak of a millennial kingdom or of God's eternal Lordship in heaven.

But one can hypothesize that an adequate theological elaboration of Jesus' preaching on the kingdom of God by the 2nd-c. Apologists could have reassessed the ambiguous doctrinal holes such as the expectation of the millennial kingdom of Christ. And still, one can rightfully ask if one of the elements of misunderstanding between empire and the church before the Constantinian turn was not determined, on the Christian side, by an insufficient theological elaboration of Jesus' sayings on the basileia.

E. dal Covolo, Escatologia e apocalittica nei primi secoli cristiani. Il Regno di Dio e la sua attesa negli apologisti greci del II secolo: Salesianum 62 (2000) 625-643 (exhaustive bibl. throughout); Ch. Grappe, Le Royaume de Dieu: avant, avec et après Jésus, Geneva 2001.

E. dal Covolo

KISS, HOLY. A highly meaningful gesture acc. to the context in which it occurs, the ways and times in which it is given and received, the persons or things involved, etc. A kiss may indicate love, affection, friendship, homage, protection, welcome, subjection, respect or veneration. Today we use a single word to express all these various meanings, whereas in Latin there was more than one; *Isidore of Seville wrote: Pacem amicis, filiis osculum dari dicemus, uxoribus basium, scorto savium, item osculum caritatis, basium blanditiae, savium voluptatis (Diff. 1,398). Even in a Christian setting the kiss had various meanings acc. to the context. It was esp. a sign of fraternity and unity (Tertull., Ad uxorem 2,4; De orat. 18; Ambrosiaster, In 1 Cor. 16,20), going back to the beginnings of Christianity (Rom 16:16; 1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12; 1 Th 5:26; 1 Pet 5:14). Its more common meaning was that of a greeting, but for Christians it expressed something more. During the liturgy a kiss of peace was exchanged, but only among the faithful and not with catechumens, lapsi* or penitents (see Apos. Trad. 18; Counc. of Laodicea, can. 19; Aug., Contra litt. Pet. 2,23), and without distinction of the sexes (see Just., 1 Apol. 65; Athen., Legat. 32; Clem. Alex., Paed. III,11; Tertull. Ad uxor. 2,4; Counc. of Laodicea, can. 19). When at a later time men and women were separated, the kiss of peace was exchanged only among those of the same sex (Apos. Con. II, 57,17; VIII, 11,9). The exchange took place at different times in different regions: in the West, customarily before communion (see Pope Innocent, Ad Decent. 25, PL 20, 553). A kiss was also exchanged on other liturgical occasions, where it always seals something that has already occurred: after baptism (Apos. Trad. 21; Testam. D.N.J. 2,9; Can. of Hippo. 19; Cypr., Ep. 59); after the ordination of a bishop (Trad. Apost. 4; Const. apost. VIII,5,10); and in the wedding rite during the act of "betrothal" (Tertull., De virg. vel. 11; Ambr., Ep. 41,18), where the kiss also took on a legal value (CTh III,5,6).

DACL 2, 117-130; EC 2, 661-665; RAC 8, 505-519; E. Scerbo, Il bacio nel costume e nei secoli, Rome 1963; K. Thraede, Ursprung und Formen des "hl. Kuss" im frühen Christentum: JbAC 11/12 (1968-69) 124-180; G.W. Clark, Cyprian's Epistle 64 and the Kissing of Feet in Baptism: HTR 66 (1973) 147-152; C.G. Mor, Simbologia e simboli nella vita giuridica, in Simboli e simbologia nell'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1976, I, 15-29; J. Le Goff, Les gestes symboliques dans la vie sociale. Les gestes de vassalité, ibid., II, 679-779; N.J. Perella, The Kiss Sacred and Profane: An Interpretative History of Kiss Symbolism and Related Religioerotic Themes, Berkeley, CA 1969; W. Klassen, The Sacred Kiss in the New Testament: An Example of Social Boundary Lines: NTS 39 (1993) 122-135; G. Cipriani, Il vocabolario latino dei baci: Aufidus 17 (1992) 69-102; L.E. Phillips, The Ritual Kiss in Early Christian Worship, Cambridge 1996; R. Calatayud Gascó, Beso humano y osculo cristiano, Valencia 2003.

A. Di Berardino

KNIK' HAWATOY (Seal of faith). An extensive and important Armenian christological *florilegia composed at the beginning of the 7th c., probably at the request of the *catholicos Comitas. Next to Armenian authors, it cites numerous Greek and *Syriac works, in general taken from preexisting *Armenian translations.

Knik'hawatoy ěndhanowr sowrb ekełœec'woy yowłłap'ar ew s. hogekir harc'n meroc'dawanowt'eanc'yawowrs Komitas kat'ołikosi hamahawak'eal ("Seal of the faith of the holy universal church, of our holy orthodox and inspired Fathers, composed in the days of the catholicos Comitas"), S. Ēčmiacin 1914; J. Lebon, Les citations patristiques grecques du "Sceau de la foi": RHE 25 (1929) 5-32.

S.J. Voicu

KOINE. A language based on the Attic dialect of the Athenian area, mixed with the language of the Cyclades, Ionia and the Ionic colonies on the N part of the Aegean Sea; it was common to various Greek ethnic groups, having established itself from the 4th c. BC at the cost of local dialects (Boeotian, Doric, etc.) from which it received influences, becoming the language generally spoken, but also easier due to grammatical simplifications. The vocabulary was enriched, some words changed their meaning and even the orthography underwent modifications. This language was also introduced into Macedonia, becoming with time the official language under Philip II and also taking on local elements. This common form of the language (koinē) was spread by Alexander the Great through his troops and the founding of colonies, creating a linguistic unity. It was a lingua franca, spoken by different peoples who did not renounce their local languages. The NT, like the Greek translation of the OT, is in this language. The NT Koine shows a fusion of the Attic dialect, which is preponderant, with the dialects of the NE of Greece and preserves strong traces of Semitic contaminations. An eclectic language, it enriches its vocabulary with words borrowed from other languages not just as a lexicographical fact, but also a semantic one. It coins new words, willingly compounds them and loves diminutives. In grammar and syntax it tends toward simplification, modifies the declensions, abandons some classical forms, such as the dual, and privileges the prepositions since the declensions and their cases had lost their original expressiveness. In the conjugations of the verb there are new and popular forms, more frequent use of periphrastics, the taste for normalizing irregular verbs, for making the conjugation uniform and for transforming intransitive verbs into transitive verbs. The differences with classical Greek so far pointed out, which are not all of them, are the emblematic signs of the decline of forms and of linguistic impersonality and the prevalence of popular speech over the academic and literary, but also of a language in evolution. Some Christian authors, such as *Basil and *John Chrysostom, tried to use the Attic dialect, with a certain success. The Christians, in the official language, in the Middle East adopted a form which rejected popular forms. The written language changed little up to the 9th c., while the spoken language underwent profound transformations.

DBS 3, 1320-1369; M. Zerwick, Graecitas biblica, Rome [4]1960; A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, W. Bauer - W. Arndt - F. Wilbur Gingrich - F. Danker, Chicago 1979; F. Blass - A. Debrunner, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch, Göttingen [12]1965 (Eng. tr. of 10th ed.: R.W. Funk, A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, Chicago 1961); E. Springhetti, Introductio historica grammatica in graecitatem Novi Testamenti, Rome 1966; Cath 6, 1803-1807; J. O'Callaghan, Koiné: Enc. della Bibbia 4, Turin 1970, cols. 488-492; R. Browning, Medieval and Modern Greek, Cambridge [2]1983 (ch. 2 on Greek at the time of the Roman Empire); V. Bubenik, Dialect Contact and Koineization: The Case of Hellenistic Greek: International Journal of the Sociology of Language 99 (1993) 9-23; S.E. Porter, Idioms of the Greek New Testament, Sheffield [2]1994 (1992); N. Basile - P. Radici Colace, Sintassi storica del greco antico, Bari 1998.

E. Peretto

KOINONIA. Among the Fathers of the first centuries the term koinōnia, used in a religious context, indicates mostly a relationship of vital character which is established (1) within the trinitarian context, (2) between God and humans, and (3) in the relationships among humans.

1. In the trinitarian context the knowledge of the koinōnia of the Father with the Son is recognized as the aspiration of every Christian (Athenag., Leg. 12,2), but the existence of a koinōnia of nature between the Spirit and God is also proclaimed (Basil., Spir. 30), and between the Spirit and the Father and the Son (Basil., Spir. 38). The *gnostics, on the basis of Jn 1:1, acknowledge a koinōnia between God, the Principle and the Logos with the Father (Iren., Adv. haer. 1,8,5).

2. The koinōnia between human nature and divine nature takes its beginning from *Origen in the *incarnation of Christ, but is destined to extend to all those who follow his teachings (C. Cels. III, 28). Virginity is seen as koinōnia with the *Holy Spirit, from which is born life and incorruptibility (Greg. Nyss., Verg. 13,3), just as the ecstasy into which humans can enter, while praying is koinōnia with the Holy Spirit (Did., In Gen. 15,12). Following mostly Pauline passages, the koinōnia between God and humans takes place, acc. to the Fathers, thanks to the mediation of Christ particularly in the *Eucharist, which is itself also indicated at the same time with the term koinōnia (Dion. Ar., E.h. III, 1; Cyr. Jer., Catech. 23,23). But more or less all the rites of Christian initiation have the goal of realizing this koinōnia (Cyr. Jer., Catech. 20,3.6). Also among the gnostics the formulas of initiation offer a koinōnia with the powers (Iren., Adv. haer. 1,21,3).

3. Among humans, koinōnia is spoken of when the same dogmas of the faith are accepted (Theodrt. H. rel. II, 16; III, 17), and it is for this reason that communion with heretics is forbidden (Leontius Const., Hom. pasc. I, 8: SC 187, 382). In the Latin context the communio, or concordia or unanimitas, is seen above all as a characteristic of the church (Cypr., De unit. 4; Ep. 11,3; 45,1; Aug., Ep. 49,2); it is a participation and reflection of the koinōnia existing between the Father, the Son and the Spirit (Cypr., Or. 23).

Ecclesial koinōnia can never be abandoned by the believer, even if faults are verified in it (Aug., Ep. 44,11). It is from the spiritual koinōnia which links humans to one another that the necessity is born of realizing a material koinōnia as well (Barn. 19,8), but the most complete experience of such a koinōnia extended in all directions is that which is found in monastic environments, where the monks attempt to put into practice the communitarian ideal described in Acts 4:32 (see Chrom., Serm. 1,7; 31,4; Aug., Mor. eccl. cath. 1,21,67; C. Faust. 5,9; Praecept. 2-4.8; Cass., Conl. IV, 21,3).

GLNT 5, 693-726 (TDNT 3,789-809); DSp 8, 1750-1758 (It. tr. in one volume, Turin 1982); H. Pétré, Caritas. Étude sur le vocabulaire latin de la charité chrétienne, Louvain 1948; A. Matellanes, Communicatio. El sentido de la comunión eclesial en San Cipriano: Communio 1 (1970) 19-64, 347-401; P.C. Bori, Koinonia: l'idea della comunione nell'ecclesiologia recente e nel Nuovo Testamento, Brescia 1972; J. Heinz, Koinonia. "Kirche" als Gemeinschaft bei Paulus, Regensburg 1982, 206-231 (in the Fathers); P. Tamburino, Koinonia. Aspetti ecclesiologici del cenobitismo pacomiano nel IV secolo, Rome 1989; Fr. Reni - A. Vásquez Vizcaya, La "Koinonia" en la literatura patrística de los siglos II y III. Estudio sobre la evolución de una doctrina, Rome 1993; J. Binns, Ascetics and Ambassadors of Christ: The Monasteries of Palestine, 314-631, Oxford 1994; Y. Hirschfeld, The Judaean Desert Monasteries in the Byzantine Period, New Haven, CT 1992; J. Patrich, Sabas, Leader of Palestinian Monasticism: A Comparative Study in Eastern Monasticism, Fourth to Seventh Centuries, Washington, DC 1995.

M.G. Mara

KORIUN (1st half of 5th c.). An Armenian author, around 445 he wrote a life of his teacher Mesrob, the inventor of the Armenian alphabet, handed down in two different redactions. The work contains some autobiographical cues, from which we learn that Koriun was part of a group of the first Armenian translators of the Scriptures and of works of the Greek Fathers.

LTK² 6, 556-557; M. Abegjan, Koriywn, Vark' Maštoc'i [Koriun, Vita di Maštots], Erevan 1941 (repr. with Eng. tr. and concordance, ed. B. Norehad - K.H. Maksoudian); V. Inglisian, Das Leben des hl. Maschtotz von seinem Schuler Koriun, Vienna 1963; B. Norehad, Koriun, The Life of Mashtots, New York 1964; C. Gugerotti, L'invenzione dell'alfabeto in Armenia: teologia della storia nella Vita di Maštoc' di Koriwn, in C. Moreschini - G. Menestrina, La traduzione dei testi religiosi. Atti del convegno tenuto a Trento il 10-11 febbraio 1993 (Religione e Cultura 6), Brescia 1994, 101-126; G. Winkler, Koriwns Biographie des Mesrop Maštoc'. Übersetzung und Kommentar (OCA 245), Rome 1994.

S.J. Voicu

L

LABOR

I. Labor law - II. Christians and trades - III. Employers and workers.

